START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

May 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-034

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916

VOL	TITLE	DATES
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 01/1996
1461-0334-024-07
CAT 840 3594
29-10

REEL 34

Volumes 61-62

BSO
1937 to BSO
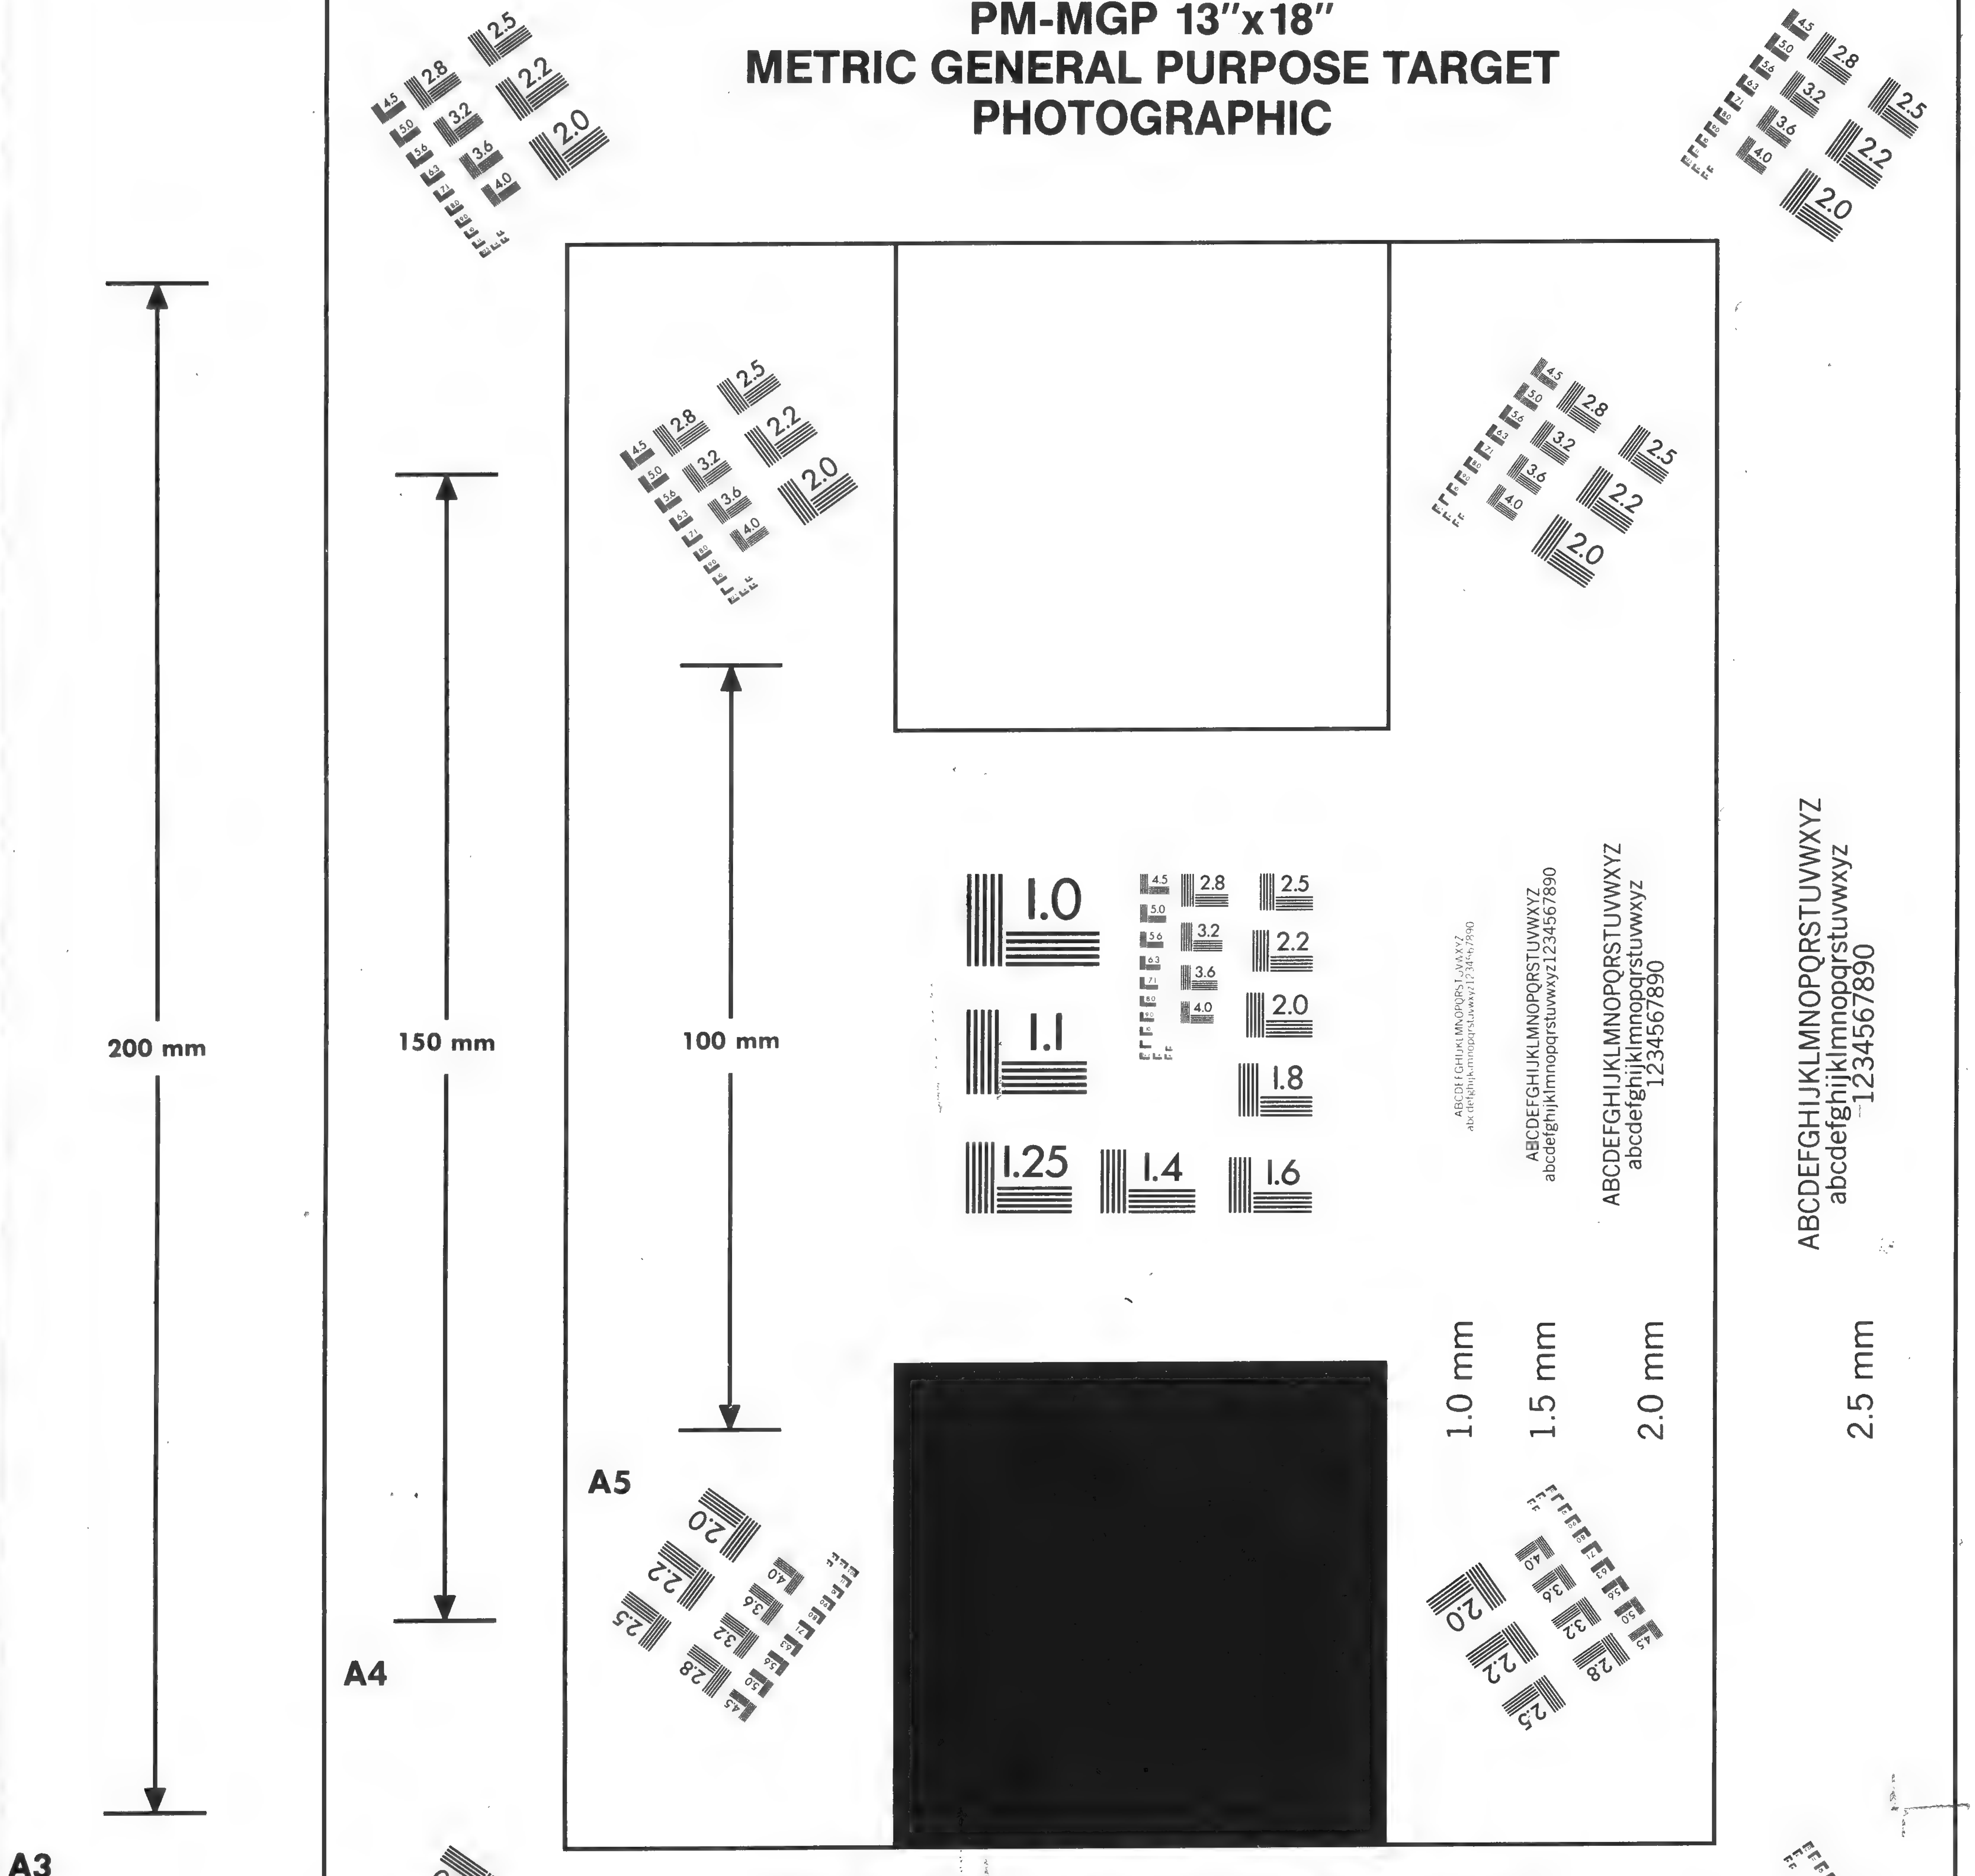
1937-1938

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
2.0
5.6
3.6
6.3
4.0
7.1
8.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

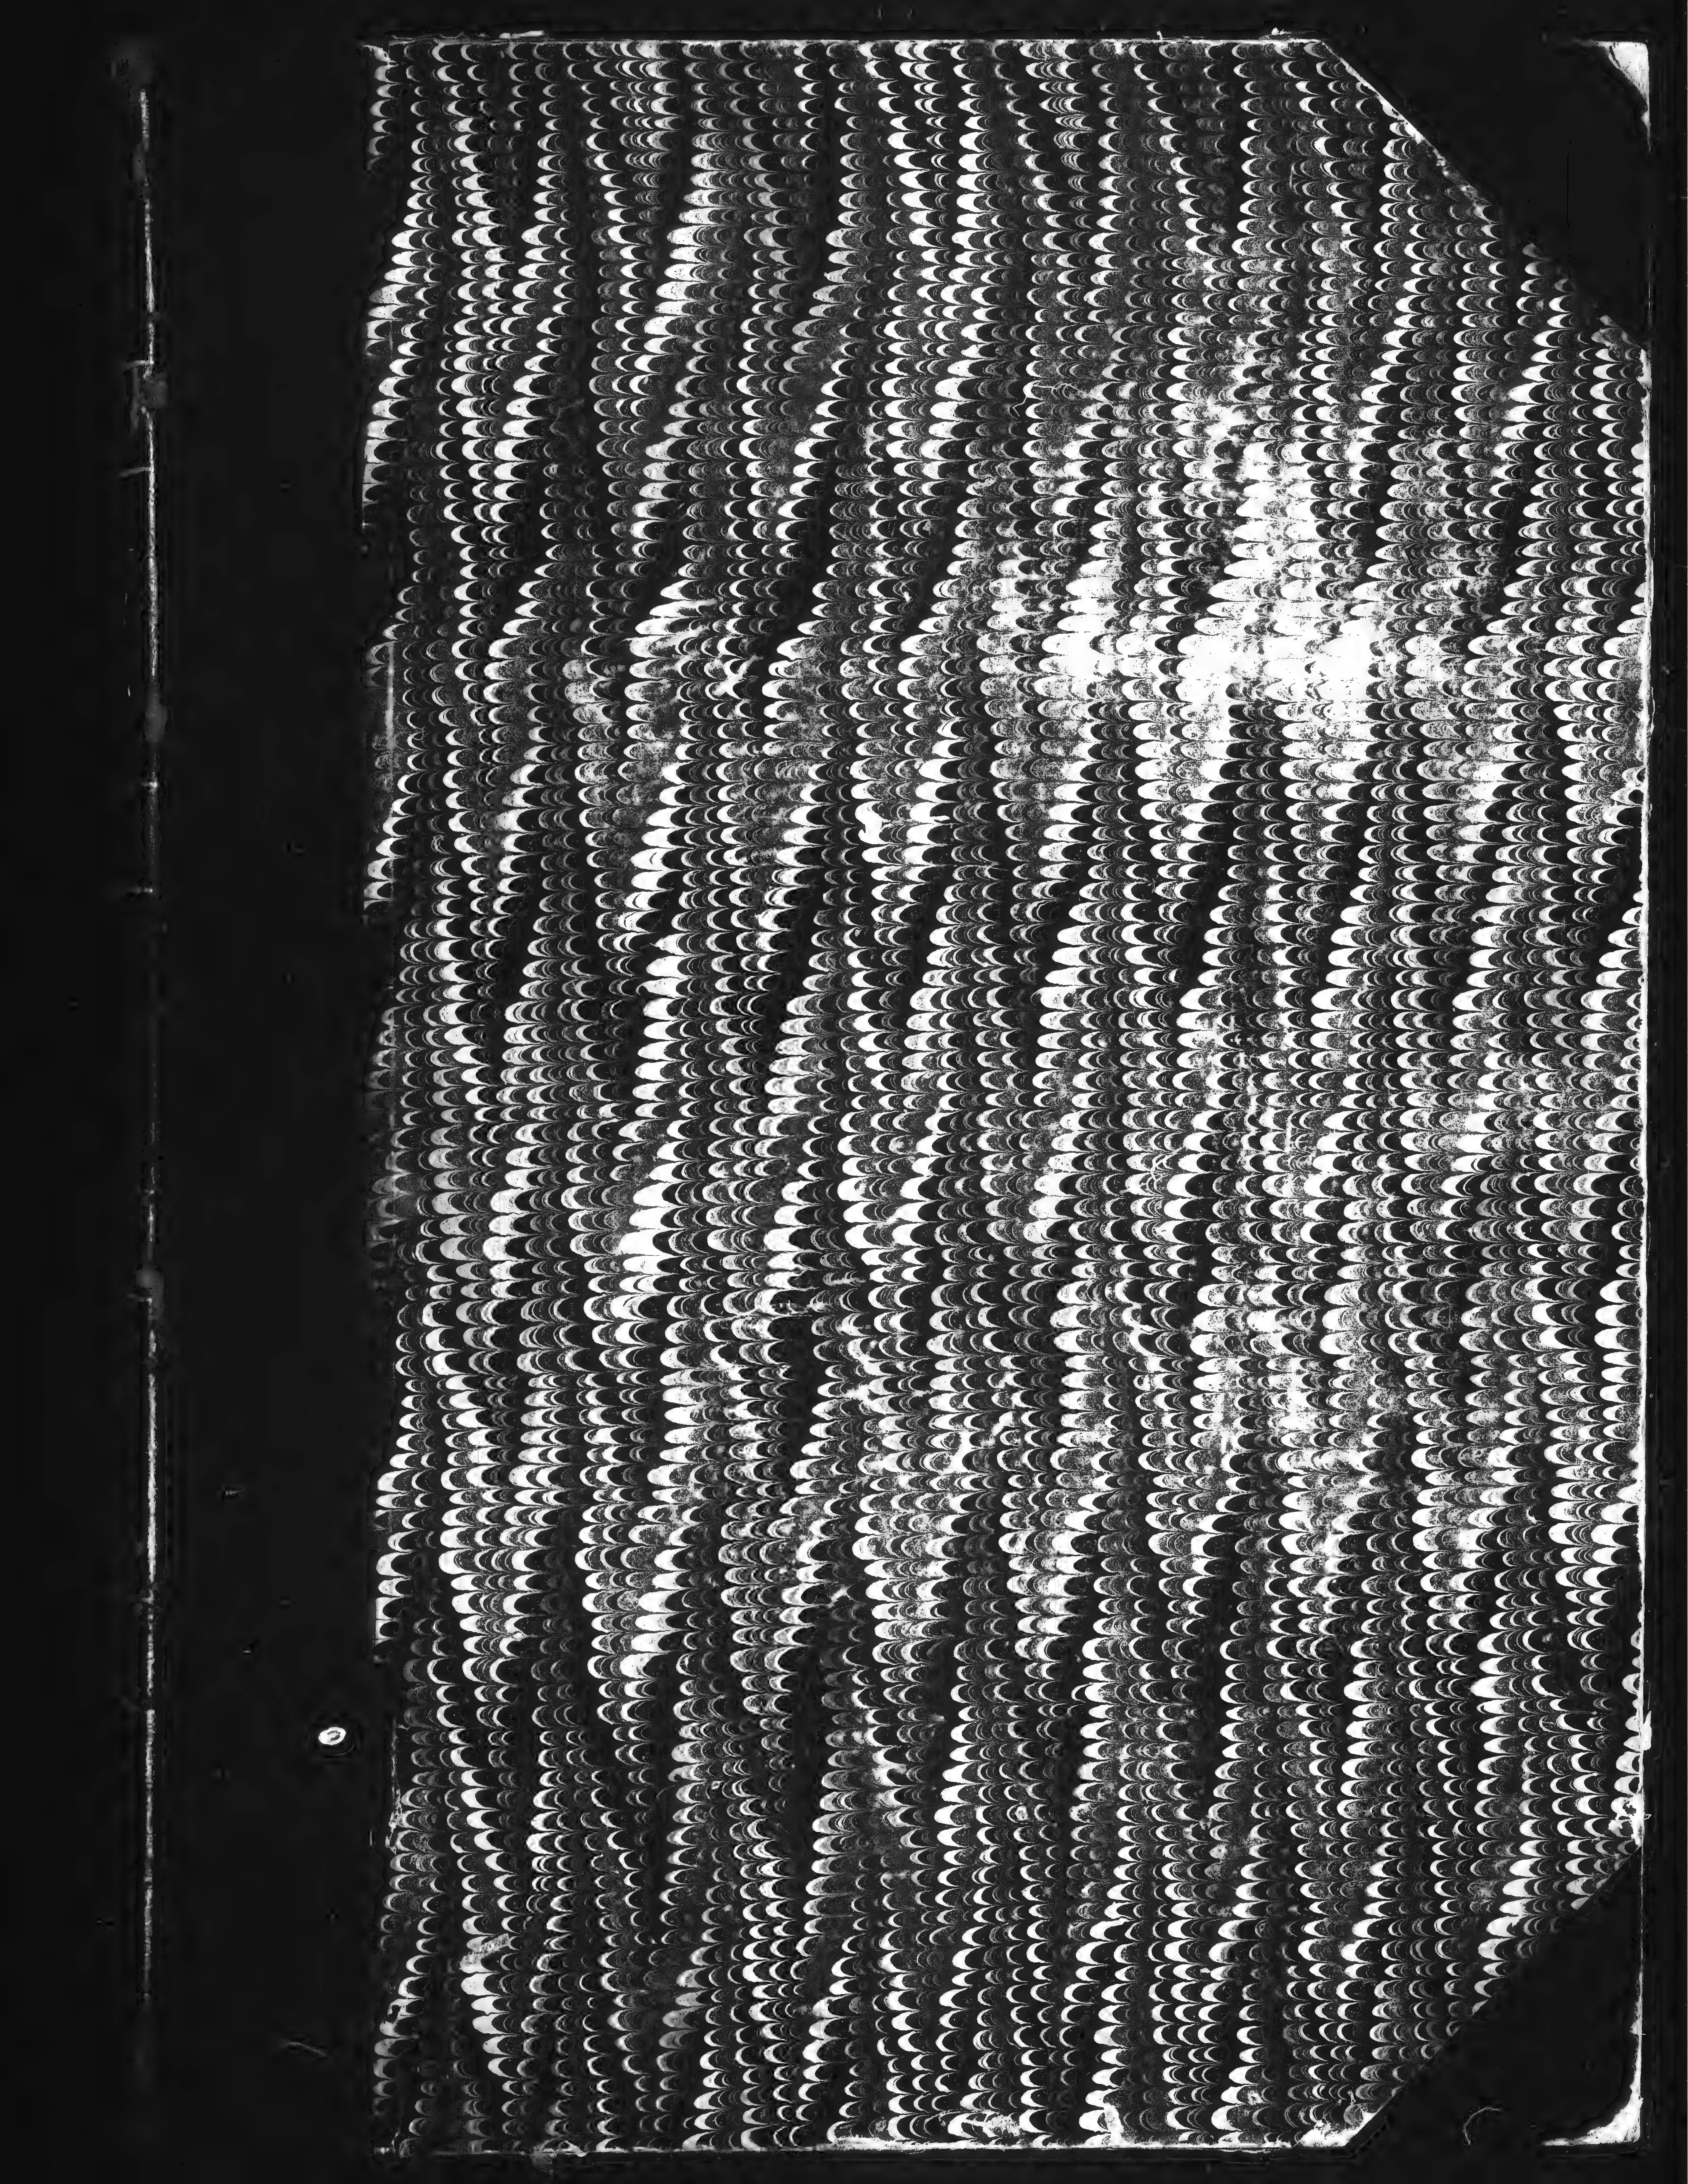
VOLUME 61

BSO

1937



Ward's
STATIONERS
57-61 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON

Season of 1937 Continued from March 13

INDEX

SUBJECT — PAGE

Berkshire Festival — 1,2,3,4,7,9,10,11 14,19,26,31,36,
Broadcasts — 4,
Brush, Gerome — 32,7,
Conductors — 3,6,12,17,
Critics — 5,6,
Editorials — 12,
Exhibits — 17
Fiedler, Arthur —
Friends, of the B.S.O —
Foote, Arthur — 30,31,33,41,
Harvard Glee Club — 16,18,19,14,23,
Koussevitzky, Dr. Serge — 8,17,19,20,21, 22,24,26,26, 28,33
Matthew Passion (Bach) — 4,6,7,13,14,15, 16,
Metropoulos, Dimitri — 18,12
Orchestras — 25,20,39,
Pension Fund (see Matthew Passion)
Prokofieff 2,3
Radcliff Choral Society — 14,
Recordings —
  B.S.O. — [illegible],18,34,35 39,43,
  Pops —

Reviews —
1. Boston
  a. Mon. Series Apr. 12 — 31,
  b. Tues. Series Mar. 16 — 4
    Apr. 6
    Apr. 27 — 43,45,
  c. Fri. Series Mar. 19 — 5,6,
    Sat. Series Mar. 25 — 15,16,21
    Apr. 9 — 29,30,32,
    Apr. 16 — 33,34,40,
    Apr. 23 — 42,43,
    Apr. 31
2. Brooklyn, N.Y. Apr. 2 — ~~22~~,23,~~24~~,27
3. Cambridge, Mass. Mar. 18 — ~~4~~,5,6,
4. New Brunswick, N.J. Mar. 30 — 20,21
5. New York Mar. 13 — 1,~~2~~3,
  Apr. 1 — 21,22,23,~~24~~27,
  Apr. 3 — 24,25,28
6. Philadelphia, Pa. Mar. 31 — 26,21

SUBJECT — PAGE

7. Providence, R.I. Apr. 20 — 41,
8. Worcester, Mass. Apr. 14 — 36,

Soloists with B.S.O — 4,7,13,24,29

"Tanglewood" — 3,9,10,31
(see Bershire Festival)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 1 3 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Boston Symphony Plays at Academy of Music—'La Boheme' Heard at Metropolitan—'Die Meistersinger' Repeated

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Academy of Music last night. The concert began with Beethoven's extraordinarily concise and dynamic Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which is a favorite of Mr. Koussevitzky, and which he conducts with impressive effect. Last night's performance was up to its usual high level in all respects except one: for some reason—possibly the acoustic effect of the new stage set—the orchestra sounded dry.

There was more of its usual luminous quality of tone, in addition to other virtuoso qualities of performance, in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which followed the overture. But my feeling about Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the symphony was the same as it had been at Thursday evening's performance in Carnegie Hall. Music of any consequence is not a mere spinning of notes but a product of human imagination and feeling. A conductor brings to bear on these his own imagination and feeling—but so does the listener—and conductor and listener may not agree. Mr. Koussevitzky once defined the task of the conductor as that of bending not only the orchestra but the listener to his own way of thinking and feeling about a piece of music. On Thursday evening he succeeded in winning Mr. Downes' agreement to his way of thinking and feeling about Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, but not mine—and not, I discovered in last night's Post, Mr. Chotzinoff's. It was interesting to find Mr. Chotzinoff's disagreement concerned with the same matters as my own. He found Mr. Koussevitzky's tempo in the slow movement too fast, his tempo in the scherzo movement too slow; and like myself Mr. Chotzinoff was concerned not with the tempos in and for themselves, but with the tempos for the way they affected the music. These two movements, in the tempos in which Mr. Koussevitzky took him, did not have the character, the significance wsich they have when taken at the pace indicated by the terms Beethoven uses—Adagio (slow) in the one case, Allegro vivace (quick and lively, or very quick, or very lively) in the other.

The performance gave much pleasure to the large audience—and Mr. Koussevitzky had the orchestra rise in acknowledgement of the applause. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

The Metropolitan's Puccini reper-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

R

Berg Concerto First Time

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

True to his reputation for introducing important and controvesial works, Serge Koussevitzky gave New York its first hearing last night of the much discussed Violin Concerto of Alban Berg at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work represents the final effort of the famous Austrian modernist who died a little more than a year ago in his native Vienna. It is said to have been inspired by the composer's sadness at the death of a young friend, Manon Gropius, who was the daughter of the widow of Gustav Mahler.

Berg's concerto already has caused a great deal of controversy, not to mention considerable splitting of hairs, between the English critic, Ernest Newman, and the Viennese musicologist, Willi Reich. It was Newman's contention that the composition represented a departure of its composer from the more extreme methods of his teacher, Schoenberg, and that had Berg lived longer he might have repudiated modernism for more romantic paths.

Music like Berg's always invites the sort of highly technical comment that is out of place in a daily newspaper. Suffice it to say that if there is any difference between the concerto and Berg's previous work in point of technique, it is hardly a difference worth arguing about.

The concerto, like the rest of his output, is the highly complicated expression of a deeply sincere and somewhat morbid musical mind. In it is to be found again the peculiar sensitiveness to macabre moods, and the remarkable command of instrumentation that were Berg's main characteristics as a composer. And here, as in his other works, one feels that a great deal of the composer's message remains uncommunicated because of the enormously involved language it is expressed in.

The soloist in the concerto was Louis Krasner, a violinist whose suggestions were in some degree responsible for the writing of the work. Mr. Krasner gave what appeared to be a faithful and technically accurate account of his part, and the orchestra provided a delineation that was as lucid as possible.

The concerto was preceded by Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in one of those readings for which the Bostonians have to be heard to be appreciated. It has been a long time since New Yorker's have been privileged to hear this particular symphony done with such immaculate clarity of detail, such perfect balance and such transparent qualities of tone.

The final number of a notably well-balanced program was Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 1 4 1937

RECENT RE

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

out.

* * *

The Rakoczy March responsible for Berlioz placing his version of "Faust" in Hungary has done yeoman service on records. For the dubious honor of being the most used filler in the catalogues it competes only with bits from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." It is of convenient length and, moreover, its seemingly endless peroration has been found susceptible to manipulation. Koussevitzky uses it this month, together with the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and the presto and waltz, and his performance has the virtue of sounding as though it was played for its own values, not because it was needed to go on the back of something else.

The three selections are admirably suited to the Boston Symphony as a well-drilled orchestra with a clear-cut attack and capable of excessive gusto. Recording conditions in Boston seem to have undergone alterations. There is an entire absence of echo here and the accent is definitely toward the higher strings. On the fourth side the larghetto from Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, beautifully rendered though it is, seems a trifle out of place.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

MAR 1 3 1937

Dr. Koussevitzky Coming To Tanglewood

Conductor of Orchestra Will Spend Week-End in Berkshire

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Madame Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager, will spend the week-end in the Berkshires. The purpose is to visit Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, given by Mrs. Gorham Brooks as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Judd and trustees of the orchestra will meet with officers of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at the home of the Gertrude R bridge. Dr.

NEW YORK MIRROR

MAR 1 4 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

THE PROGRAM.

Symphonic Picture—"From the Apocalypse" (Opus 66) . . . . Liadov
Prelude to "Khovantschina" Moussorgsky
Scythian Suite—"Ala and Lolli" (Opus 20) . . . . Prokofieff
Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathetique") . . . . Tchaikowsky

The first part of an all-Russian program, devised by Dr. Koussevitzky for a matinee audience yesterday, ended amid boos, hisses and cheers, as the astringent climax of the Prokofieff suite burst upon ears more familiar with the bland splendors of older masters.

It is comforting to realize that the musical public still rises to the bait so cleverly provided in the dry mockeries of Prokofieff. But the tempest yesterday seemed a bit belated. There should be nothing in Prokofieff at this date to astonish or anger the average listener.

"From the Apocalypse" is less Greek than Wagnerian, and rather obvious withal, though Dr. Koussevitzky gave it a studied and careful reading. And the prelude to "Khovantschina" came forth in as delicate and sensitive a version as I have heard in many years. I did not hear the "Pathetique."

* * *

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 1 [illegible] 1937

CONCERT RECORDS

Symphonies and Operas

Leopold Stokowski and The Philadelphia Orchestra seem to be re-recording many of their early albums. This month, it's Victor M-22 that's being replaced. M-22 was a famous recording of the Franck symphony, but its successor, Victor M-300, is an even better performance, musically; the reproduction itself is one of the best jobs now available.

There's a new version of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the conductor being Felix Weingartner, the orchestra the Vienna Philharmonic, and the maker Columbia. The album is No. 285. Dr. Weingartner's "Eroica" is the most satisfactory recording that I've heard of this symphony. If there's such a thing as a definitive disc version of the music, this is it.

Tchaikovsky has two recent additions to his library. One is his fourth symphony, in a magnificent performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Victor album M-327). There's one large cut in the symphony, but most customers probably won't mind that. The "Pathetic" symphony has an unusual interpretation in Columbia album 277—a presentation which treats the sometimes gloomy work to an unwonted brightness and crispness. It's unorthodox, of course, and yet it's a pleasant switch from the sogginess that usually gets into the "Pathetic." Philippe Gaubert is the conductor who thought up this notion, and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra plays efficiently.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

MAR 1 4 1937

Koussevitzky Concert Offers Russian Music

Boston Symphony Revives Liadoff Number After 12 Years at Carnegie Hall

By Jerome D. Bohm

Music exclusively by Russian composers occupied the attention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in the eighth concert of its season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The program began with Liadoff's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse," Op. 66, and continued with the prelude to "Khovantchia" of Moussorgsky and the Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20 of Prokofieff. After the intermission. Tchaikovsky's sixth "Pathetique" symphony was performed.

Twelve years have elapsed since Mr. Koussevitzky brought Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse" to hearing here. In that time the music, which is highly derivative in its origins, with Liszt and Wagner as its chief sources of inspiration, and already dated over a decade ago, is now so faded that not even the devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra could impart even that spurious vitality to its vacuous pages, which is occasionally possible with poor music, if the interpretation is first rate.

Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude is, however, a creation of enduring worth and an impressively, autochthonous bit of tonal painting. It was set forth with ravishing effect; the hushed pianissimo with which the final measures were disclosed will linger long in the memory.

Unlike the product of his compatriot, Liadoff, Prokofieff's Scythian suite, which had not been played here since Mr. Koussevitzky directed it seven years ago, is the composition of an original mind, and has consequently lost none of its pristine impact. In the four sections, "The Adoration of Veles" and "Ala," "The Enemy of God" and the "Dance of the Black Spirits," "Night" and "The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun," Prokofieff has penned music which often kindles the imagination and stirs the senses. All four episodes are not equally compelling, but one feels at all times the touch of a genuine creative gift. The performance was one of surpassing virtuosity and at the close Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians were greeted with thunderous applause mingled with prolonged cheers.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

MAR [illegible] 1937

MUSICAL SHRINE PLANS PROGRESS

Tanglewood, Mass. Chosen By Trustees of Berkshire Festival

New York.—Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., meeting with the president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith at her home in New York city today, enthusiastically endorsed the proposal to make Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., a great musical shrine in America.

Tanglewood, where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, was recently given to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston as a permanent home for the Festival because of the outstanding success of the concerts in 1936. The trustees of both organizations have drafted an agreement for perpetual use of the property as a great Festival center.

The gardens were planned by Mrs. Brooks' parents, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey of Boston. The formal garden, which will be used as an outside foyer, was planted about 1900, with the assistance of their gardener Alexander McConnachie. The hemlocks for this planting were secured from neighboring woods, which was also the case for the 12 foot hedge, extending 1200 feet along the front of the grounds. The latter is much older.

Mrs. Dixey was a painter of renown, having exhibited in Paris and other cities. Mr. Dixey was much interested in music, though he did not follow this as a career. He conducted the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Boston, which he did in concert form.

It is hoped to make a substantial start on a building, a suitable inclosure, for the concerts this spring, for which the trustees planned today to raise the necessary funds. Miss Robinson Smith reported several gifts of $1,000 each for the building fund.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 1 3 1937

Old Berkshire Estate to Be Home Of Music Festival

Tanglewood Is Donated to Boston Orchestra by Tappan Family.

Special Dispatch to THE SUN.

LENOX, Mass., March 13.—Tanglewood on the north shore of Mahkeenac Lake, midway between Lenox and Stockbridge, which is to be the permanent home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the summer headquarters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is rich in history and tradition.

The property was so named because of its association with Nathaniel Hawthorne, who from 1851 to 1853 lived in a little red cottage that was burned on June 22, 1890. There he wrote the delightful children's stories, known as "Tanglewood Tales," "The Wonder Book," and collected the material for "The House of Seven Gables." The country road where he lived is known as Hawthorne avenue. Its double rows of giant trees are known as the Hawthorne Pines.

The 210-acre estate is the gift to the Boston Symphony orchestra of Mrs. Gorham Brooks and her aunt, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan of Brookline. Last summer for the first time in eighty-eight years Tanglewood was not occupied by members of the Tappan family.

In 1849 Miss Tappan's father, William Aspinwall Tappan, Boston banker and merchant, bought several farms and incorporated them into an estate, now the oldest in Berkshire with the exception of Highwood, the adjoining William Norton Bullard place.

Typical of Civil War Days.

Typical of the Civil War period with many valleys and ridges the house was completed in 1865. The ornate formal garden is surrounded by a California privet hedge interspersed with hemlock. The garden has two richly decorated fountains.

The former tennis court at the further end from the house is now a rose garden. Entrance is through a concrete arch and ornamental iron gate, which came from a garden in Florence, Italy. From the garden and house surrounded by a large area of finely kept lawn is a view across the lake to Monument mountain and other peaks of the Southern Berkshires.

Mrs. Brooks is the former Miss Rosamond Sturgis Dixey. Her mother (Ellen Sturgis Tappan), now deceased, married Richard C. Dixey, a Boston musician. She was an artist and annually displayed her pictures at the Stockbridge Exhibition. Paintings of her garden always were admired. The wealth and fashion of Lenox and Stockbridge were represented at the garden parties that Miss Tappan and Mrs. Dixey gave at Tanglewood. They represented the old time aristocracy of Boston and Lenox.

Ancient Pines on Estate.

Mr. and Mrs. Dixey's son, Arthur Sturgis Dixey, died while in the American diplomatic service at Seoul, Korea. He was keenly interested in gymkhana games that were introduced to Lenox in 1905 by Sir Mortimer Durand, who was at that time British ambassador at Washington. Various gymkhana tournaments were held at Tanglewood.

On the estate are many ancient pines and hemlocks, which help to give the place an atmosphere of age and refinement. On the lake shore is believed to be the largest birch in Berkshire. It is ten feet six inches in diameter. For centuries the Mahkeenac shore has been the habitat of aquatic birds and many Indian arrows have been found there.

Tanglewood lies mostly in Stockbridge with a small sector over the line in Lenox.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS

MAR 1 5 1937

ORCHESTRA LEADER MODEST

Boston—(UP)—Asked for his telephone number, Arthur Fiedler, Boston orchestra conductor, blushingly reached for a telephone directory. "I never," he explained, "have any occasion to call myself up."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

I

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 13 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Boston Symphony Plays at Academy of Music—'La Boheme' Heard at Metropolitan—'Die Meistersinger' Repeated

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, played at the Academy of Music last night. The concert began with Beethoven's extraordinarily concise and dynamic Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which is a favorite of Mr. Koussevitzky, and which he conducts with impressive effect. Last night's performance was up to its usual high level in all respects except one: for some reason—possibly the acoustic effect of the new stage set—the orchestra sounded dry.

There was more of its usual luminous quality of tone, in addition to other virtuoso qualities of performance, in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, which followed the overture. But my feeling about Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the symphony was the same as it had been at Thursday evening's performance in Carnegie Hall. Music of any consequence is not a mere spinning of notes but a product of human imagination and feeling. A conductor brings to bear on these his own imagination and feeling—but so does the listener—and conductor and listener may not agree. Mr. Koussevitzky once defined the task of the conductor as that of bending not only the orchestra but the listener to his own way of thinking and feeling about a piece of music. On Thursday evening he succeeded in winning Mr. Downes' agreement to his way of thinking and feeling about Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, but not mine—and not, I discovered in last night's Post, Mr. Chotzinoff's. It was interesting to find Mr. Chotzinoff's disagreement concerned with the same matters as my own. He found Mr. Koussevitzky's tempo in the slow movement too fast, his tempo in the scherzo movement too slow; and like myself Mr. Chotzinoff was concerned not with the tempos in and for themselves, but with the tempos for the way they affected the music. These two movements, in the tempos in which Mr. Koussevitzky took him, did not have the character, the significance wsich they have when taken at the pace indicated by the terms Beethoven uses—Adagio (slow) in the one case, Allegro vivace (quick and lively, or very quick, or very lively) in the other.

The performance gave much pleasure to the large audience—and Mr. Koussevitzky had the orchestra rise in acknowledgement of the applause. The concert ended with Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

The Metropolitan's Puccini reper-

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
MAR 13 1937

Berg Concerto Played First Time by Bostonians

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

True to his reputation for introducing important and controvesial works, Serge Koussevitzky gave New York its first hearing last night of the much discussed Violin Concerto of Alban Berg at the Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work represents the final effort of the famous Austrian modernist who died a little more than a year ago in his native Vienna. It is said to have been inspired by the composer's sadness at the death of a young friend, Manon Gropius, who was the daughter of the widow of Gustav Mahler.

Berg's concerto already has caused a great deal of controversy, not to mention considerable splitting of hairs, between the English critic, Ernest Newman, and the Viennese musicologist, Willi Reich. It was Newman's contention that the composition represented a departure of its composer from the more extreme methods of his teacher, Schoenberg, and that had Berg lived longer he might have repudiated modernism for more romantic paths.

Music like Berg's always invites the sort of highly technical comment that is out of place in a daily newspaper. Suffice it to say that if there is any difference between the concerto and Berg's previous work in point of technique, it is hardly a difference worth arguing about.

The concerto, like the rest of his output, is the highly complicated expression of a deeply sincere and somewhat morbid musical mind. In it is to be found again the peculiar sensitiveness to macabre moods, and the remarkable command of instrumentation that were Berg's main characteristics as a composer. And here, as in his other works, one feels that a great deal of the composer's message remains uncommunicated because of the enormously involved language it is expressed in.

The soloist in the concerto was Louis Krasner, a violinist whose suggestions were in some degree responsible for the writing of the work. Mr. Krasner gave what appeared to be a faithful and technically accurate account of his part, and the orchestra provided a delineation that was as lucid as possible.

The concerto was preceded by Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in one of those readings for which the Bostonians have to be heard to be appreciated. It has been a long time since New Yorker's have been privileged to hear this particular symphony done with such immaculate clarity of detail, such perfect balance and such transparent qualities of tone.

The final number of a notably well-balanced program was Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 14 1937

RECENT RE

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

out.

* * *

The Rakoczy March responsible for Berlioz placing his version of "Faust" in Hungary has done yeoman service on records. For the dubious honor of being the most used filler in the catalogues it competes only with bits from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." It is of convenient length and, moreover, its seemingly endless peroration has been found susceptible to manipulation. Koussevitzky uses it this month, together with the minuet of the Will-o'-the-Wisps and the presto and waltz, and his performance has the virtue of sounding as though it was played for its own values, not because it was needed to go on the back of something else.

The three selections are admirably suited to the Boston Symphony as a well-drilled orchestra with a clear-cut attack and capable of excessive gusto. Recording conditions in Boston seem to have undergone alterations. There is an entire absence of echo here and the accent is definitely toward the higher strings. On the fourth side the larghetto from Handel's twelfth concerto grosso, beautifully rendered though it is, seems a trifle out of place.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE
MAR 13 1937

Dr. Koussevitzky Coming To Tanglewood

Conductor of Orchestra Will Spend Week-End in Berkshire

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Madame Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager, will spend the week-end in the Berkshires. The purpose is to visit Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, given by Mrs. Gorham Brooks as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Judd and trustees of the orchestra will meet with officers of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at the home of the [illegible] Gertrude R[illegible] [illegible] Dr. [illegible]

NEW YORK MIRROR
MAR 14 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

THE PROGRAM.

Symphonic Picture—"From the Apocalypse" (Opus 66) .... Liadoff
Prelude to "Khovantchina" .... Moussorgsky
Scythian Suite—"Ala and Lolli" (Opus 20) .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 6 in B minor ("Pathetique") .... Tchaikowsky

The first part of an all-Russian program, devised by Dr. Koussevitzky for a matinee audience yesterday, ended amid boos, hisses and cheers, as the astringent climax of the Prokofieff suite burst upon ears more familiar with the bland splendors of older masters.

It is comforting to realize that the musical public still rises to the bait so cleverly provided in the dry mockeries of Prokofieff. But the tempest yesterday seemed a bit belated. There should be nothing in Prokofieff at this date to astonish [illegible] the average listener. [illegible] Apocalypse" is less [illegible] gnerian, and rather [illegible] though Dr. Kous- [illegible] studied and care- [illegible] the prelude to [illegible] forth in as [illegible] a version [illegible] years. I [illegible] ue."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1937

Koussevitzky Concert Offers Russian Music

Boston Symphony Revives Liadoff Number After 12 Years at Carnegie Hall

By Jerome D. Bohm

Music exclusively by Russian composers occupied the attention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in the eighth concert of its season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The program began with Liadoff's symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse," Op. 66, and continued with the prelude to "Khovantchia" of Moussorgsky and the Scythian suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20 of Prokofieff. After the intermission, Tchaikovsky's sixth "Pathetique" symphony was performed.

Twelve years have elapsed since Mr. Koussevitzky brought Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse" to hearing here. In that time the music, which is highly derivative in its origins, with Liszt and Wagner as its chief sources of inspiration, and already dated over a decade ago, is now so faded that not even the devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra could impart even that spurious vitality to its vacuous pages, which is occasionally possible with poor music, if the interpretation is first rate.

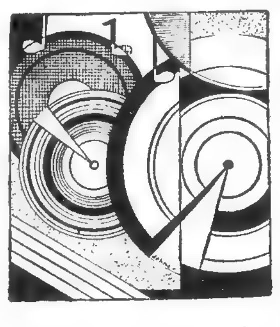
Moussorgsky's "Khovantchina" prelude is, however, a creation of enduring worth and an impressively, autochthonous bit of tonal painting. It was set forth with ravishing effect; the hushed pianissimo with which the final measures were disclosed will linger long in the memory.

Unlike the product of his compatriot, Liadoff, Prokofieff's Scythian suite, which had not been played here since Mr. Koussevitzky directed it seven years ago, is the composition of an original mind, and has consequently lost none of its pristine impact. In the four sections, "The Adoration of Veles" and "Ala," "The Enemy of God" and the "Dance of the Black Spirits," "Night" and "The Glorious Departure of Lolli and the Procession of the Sun," Prokofieff has penned music which often kindles the imagination and stirs the senses. All four episodes are not equally compelling, but one feels at all times the touch of a genuine creative gift. The performance was one of surpassing virtuosity and at the close Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians were greeted with thunderous applause mingled with prolonged cheers.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 13 1937

CONCERT RECORDS

Symphonies and Operas



LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI and The Philadelphia Orchestra seem to be re-recording many of their early albums. This month, it's Victor M-22 that's being replaced. M-22 was a famous recording of the Franck symphony, but its successor, Victor M-300, is an even better performance, musically; the reproduction itself is one of the best jobs now available.

There's a new version of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the conductor being Felix Weingartner, the orchestra the Vienna Philharmonic, and the maker Columbia. The album is No. 285. Dr. Weingartner's "Eroica" is the most satisfactory recording that I've heard of this symphony. If there's such a thing as a definitive disc version of the music, this is it.

Tchaikovsky has two recent additions to his library. One is his fourth symphony, in a magnificent performance by Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Victor album M-327). There's one large cut in the symphony, but most customers probably won't mind that. The "Pathetic" symphony has an unusual interpretation in Columbia album 277—a presentation which treats the sometimes gloomy work to an unwonted brightness and crispness. It's unorthodox, of course, and yet it's a pleasant switch from the sogginess that usually gets into the "Pathetic." Philippe Gaubert is the conductor who thought up this notion, and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra plays efficiently.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
MAR 13 1937

MUSICAL SHRINE PLANS PROGRESS

Tanglewood, Mass. Chosen By Trustees of Berkshire Festival

New York,—Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc., meeting with the president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith at her home in New York city today, enthusiastically endorsed the proposal to make Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., a great musical shrine in America.

Tanglewood, where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, was recently given to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston as a permanent home for the Festival because of the outstanding success of the concerts in 1936. The trustees of both organizations have drafted an agreement for perpetual use of the property as a great Festival center.

The gardens were planned by Mrs. Brooks' parents, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C. Dixey of Boston. The formal garden, which will be used as an outside foyer, was planted about 1900, with the assistance of their gardener Alexander McConnachie. The hemlocks for this planting were secured from neighboring woods, which was also the case for the 12 foot hedge, extending 1200 feet along the front of the grounds. The latter is much older.

Mrs. Dixey was a painter of renown, having exhibited in Paris and other cities. Mr. Dixey was much interested in music, though he did not follow this as a career. He conducted the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Boston, which he did in concert form.

It is hoped to make a substantial start on a building, a suitable inclosure, for the concerts this spring, for which the trustees planned today to raise the necessary funds. Miss Robinson Smith reported several gifts of $1,000 each for the building fund.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 13 1937

Old Berkshire Estate to Be Home Of Music Festival

Tanglewood Is Donated to Boston Orchestra by Tappan Family.

Special Dispatch to THE SUN.

LENOX, Mass., March 13.—Tanglewood on the north shore of Mahkeenac Lake, midway between Lenox and Stockbridge, which is to be the permanent home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the summer headquarters of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is rich in history and tradition.

The property was so named because of its association with Nathaniel Hawthorne, who from 1851 to 1853 lived in a little red cottage that was burned on June 22, 1890. There he wrote the delightful children's stories, known as "Tanglewood Tales," "The Wonder Book," and collected the material for "The House of Seven Gables." The country road where he lived is known as Hawthorne avenue. Its double rows of giant trees are known as the Hawthorne Pines.

The 210-acre estate is the gift to the Boston Symphony orchestra of Mrs. Gorham Brooks and her aunt, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan of Brookline. Last summer for the first time in eighty-eight years Tanglewood was not occupied by members of the Tappan family.

In 1849 Miss Tappan's father, William Aspinwall Tappan, Boston banker and merchant, bought several farms and incorporated them into an estate, now the oldest in Berkshire with the exception of Highwood, the adjoining William Norton Bullard place.

Typical of Civil War Days.

Typical of the Civil War period with many valleys and ridges the house was completed in 1865. The ornate formal garden is surrounded by a California privet hedge interspersed with hemlock. The garden has two richly decorated fountains.

The former tennis court at the further end from the house is now a rose garden. Entrance is through a concrete arch and ornamental iron gate, which came from a garden in Florence, Italy. From the garden and house surrounded by a large area of finely kept lawn is a view across the lake to Monument mountain and other peaks of the Southern Berkshires.

Mrs. Brooks is the former Miss Rosamond Sturgis Dixey. Her mother (Ellen Sturgis Tappan), now deceased, married Richard C. Dixey, a Boston musician. She was an artist and annually displayed her pictures at the Stockbridge Exhibition. Paintings of her garden always were admired. The wealth and fashion of Lenox and Stockbridge were represented at the garden parties that Miss Tappan and Mrs. Dixey gave at Tanglewood. They represented the old time aristocracy of Boston and Lenox.

Ancient Pines on Estate.

Mr. and Mrs. Dixey's son, Arthur Sturgis Dixey, died while in the American diplomatic service at Seoul, Korea. He was keenly interested in gymkhana games that were introduced to Lenox in 1905 by Sir Mortimer Durand, who was at that time British ambassador at Washington. Various gymkhana tournaments were held at Tanglewood.

On the estate are many ancient pines and hemlocks, which help to give the place an atmosphere of age and refinement. On the lake shore is believed to be the largest birch in Berkshire. It is ten feet six inches in diameter. For centuries the Mahkeenac shore has been the habitat of aquatic birds and many Indian arrows have been found there.

Tanglewood lies mostly in Stockbridge with a small sector over the line in Lenox.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
PRESS
MAR 15 1937

ORCHESTRA LEADER MODEST

Boston—(UP)—Asked for his telephone number, Arthur Fiedler, Boston orchestra conductor, blushingly reached for a telephone directory. "I never," he explained, "have any occasion to call myself up."

2

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 14 1937

BOSTONIANS PLAY PROKOFIEFF SUITE

Koussevitzky Conducts Work, Still a Provocative One, at Carnegie Hall

CHEERS AND JEERS MINGLE

All-Russian Program Includes Tchaikovsky, Mussorgsky and Liadoff Symphonies

By OLIN DOWNES

Although Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" had been heard a number of times in this city previous to its performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and although the piece is vintage of 1914, it nevertheless provoked a rather amusing demonstration. A derisive cry, in a feminine voice, of "Oh, oh," after the last measure was followed by cheers from the other camp and by prolonged applause from the majority in the audience.

Mr. Prokofieff, for these considerable years a bad boy of modern music, may thus congratulate himself that he is emphatically in the running, before the public and the press. His comparatively early score has not lost the power to stir up dissension which it emphatically possessed twenty-odd years ago.

The performance of this music was simply another tribute in the form of inescapable evidence to the remarkable finish and brilliancy of the orchestra and the authority of the conductor who has made it what it is today. The music retains much of its bite, if it is no longer as amazing to those acquainted with its details as it was in an earlier day.

Still Provokes Sensation

In spite of the phenomenal advances, or, as some would say, the phenomenal harmonic license that composers permit themselves today, this "Scythian Suite" still provokes a sensation. How long it will endure as a work of art sufficient unto itself, or whether it will appear to the next generation as a very interesting and talented exhibition of a certain phase of modern composition remains to be seen.

But Mr. Prokofieff's banner of those days, "toujours de l'audace," has not been lowered, and is not lowered an inch in this score. He composes therein with prodigious audacity, brilliancy and self-confidence.

The program, consisting entirely of Russian music, began with the "symphonic picture," "From the Apocalypse," by Liadoff, continued with Mussorgsky's prelude to "Khovantchina," and ended with Tchaikovsky's "Symphonie pathetique."

This latter performance impressed one as somewhat fused in detail and a little mannered, as though the piece had been played so often by the same conductor and band—as indeed it has—that leader and men were a trifle satiated with it, and had, therefore, altered a traditional detail here and there in order to afford themselves a little variety of experience.

Worthy of Its Title

The same time could have been devoted to less familiar music, and not all people in a symphonic-minded audience are afraid of novelty, or at least reasonable variety.

There are, on the other hand, certain justifications for another hearing of the work. The symphony remains astonishingly expressive and original. And it shows, incontrovertibly and tragically, that Tschaikovsky, when he died at the age of 53, was just entering his great period as a symphonist.

The "Pathetique" is one of the few works in which a composer really did something quite new and yet worthy of the title "symphonic" in the treatment of the form. There are no parallels, in form or content, in other symphonies, to the five-four second movement, the nightmarish march-scherzo, the threnody which makes the finale. It remains immortal and searing music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 15 1937

Charles A. Ellis.

BOSTON, March 15 (By International News Service).—Teacher and advisor of Paderewski, Melba and Rachmaninoff, Charles A. Ellis, 81, who created the first Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, was dead today. Funeral services were scheduled tomorrow afternoon at Forest Hills Chapel.

* * *

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
MAR 14 1937

American Music Festival Possible

Dr. Koussevitzky to Bring Artistic Tone of Salzburg.

NEW YORK, March 13.—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "The American Salzburg," or the "Bayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat wierd violin concerto to New York, "that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

Gift of Estate.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks's gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the sort of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

Apace With Interest.

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

KOUSSEVEITSKY ABSTAINS.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a symphony by the Soviet composer Yuri Shapurin not long ago Serge Kousseveitsky turned over the baton to Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor, just as he did last year when Dmitri Shostakovich's was played. Announcement from the management denied that Kousseveitsky's absence had political significance.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE
MAR 14 1937

U. S. MUSIC FESTIVAL IS NEAR GOAL

Dr. Koussevitzky's Dream For High Artistic Quality Being Realized, Due to Gift of Estate.

BY JOHN SELBY.
By Associated Press.

New York, March 13.—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American

---

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
MAR 14 1937

American Festival Planned

NEW YORK, March 13—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "The American Salzburg," or the "Brayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat weird violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" that hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony.

The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desires; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
MAR 14 1937

Dream of U. S. Music Festival Becomes Real

By JOHN SELBY.

NEW YORK, March 13.—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky' most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

(ETC. like above

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
MAR 14 1937

Brain Truster

Added To Metropolitan Staff For Spring Series Of Opera—Lee Pattison Reserves Comment On Season—Believes In Dramatic Ideas.

BY JOHN SELBY.

New York—(AP).

THE operatic New Deal has brought a brain-truster to the Metropolitan.

The recruit is Lee Pattison, who will have active charge of the Metropolitan's spring season, acting sometimes independently, sometimes as Edward Johnson's right-hand man.

Mr. Pattison began his New York work only this week, and is a little chary of making broad pronouncements, though not at all diffident about indicating possible trends. For example, he hopes in time to produce some operas according to an idea, instead of merely assembling them.

"That is," he explains, "Mr. Johnson and I feel that in staging a work we should have at the beginning a clearly defined objective. I for one do not frown on entertainment, and perhaps in one production that might be the idea.

"Then we should, having determined on the idea of entertainment, analyze the work and plot the production with that idea in view. We should not merely worm around in the storehouse, find a few sets and a few props that would 'do,' have a few rehearsals, and call it a day.

"We both know perfectly well what the problems of running an organization of this sort are. Compromises are necessary, of course. But I feel, and so I am sure does Mr. Johnson, that if we're ever to make opera a living thing, we've got to design productions, from the ground up, to fit a sound idea."

Mr. Pattison does not expect, with so late a start, to be able to do over everything this spring. He would like to present Rabaud's "Marouf," for example, and perhaps even Strauss's "The Queen's Lace Handkerchief." But he does not want to do either unless an integrated and intelligent production can be had. Better to concentrate on polishing up the good old jobs.

Eventually, Mr. Pattison hopes to broaden the repertory considerably. "There are so many unfamiliar works which I have proved have a public," he suggests. "I think we could do a Haendel opera or two, and I am certain that Mozart has a place in the repertory. There are others."

Mr. Pattison means he has proved that a public exists for unhackneyed programs in his term as director of the New York Division of the Federal Music project. Up to the moment of his resignation in order to join the Metropolitan staff, he maintained that the music project programs should not be duplicates of ordinary concert programs, but should offer things one could not hear elsewhere.

His now famous series of Bach concerts at the new School for Social Research is one of a dozen examples of the idea. Some of his operatic ideas came from the Federal Music project, too. "The Princess On the Pea" was done from the ground up to suit an idea—and it was a great success.

Some of the ideas came from Mr. Pattison's years of touring in concert. With Guy Maier, he began the vogue for two-piano programs, and until the team dissolved, it was pretty generally regarded as the best in existence.

Incidentally, says Mr. Pattison, grinning youthfully under prematurely graying hair, the team is done for. "Too busy doing other things," he declares.

* * *

One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American Music Festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg," or the "Bayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alan Berg's somewhat weird violin concerto to New York, "that the comparisons between this festival and other Musical Festivals in Europe or elswhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks's gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire Festival next summer.

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
MAR 14 1937

Conductor Plans To Stage American Music Festival

By JOHN SELBY.

NEW YORK, March 13.—(Associated Press.)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an

---

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
1937

The Music Box

Plans for an American Musical Festival; High School Glee Club Prepares for Annual Concert Next Saturday Night; Events in Philadelphia and New York

One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American musical festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

3

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 1 5 1937

Boston Symphony Concert At Carnegie Hall

So rarely is music of any kind received with other than polite applause in Carnegie Hall that the repeated "boos" which followed a brilliant performance of Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" both startled and amused the large audience which attended the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday afternoon. Though the voice of the elderly woman who thus expressed her disapproval of things Scythian and Prokofieffian was speedily overwhelmed by the volume of enthusiastic plaudits, something had been added to the animation of the proceedings. Serge Koussevitzky had conducted the work here several times in the past, but its particular brand of savagery had never won such whole-hearted recognition, even from a minority of one. The score, as the incident would seem to prove, holds up well. But in view of the world's tardy recognition of genius, perhaps a general hissing is too much for a once, audacious composer to hope for in his lifetime.

If Mr. Koussevitzky was surprised or even aware of the one-woman disturbance, he gave no sign, but took his bows as genially as he did after each of the other compositions of an all-Russian list. In the beginning was a symphonic picture by Liadov with the awe-inspiring title, "From the Apocalypse," the score of which is dedicated to Alexander Siloti. The musical vision back of its fluent writing was scarcely an apocalyptic one. The "seven thunders" borrowed from Scripture were hardly in a class with the harmonic doings of Prokofieff's Scythians. Mr. Koussevitzky gave to the performance of this work the same fervor that he brought to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony later in the afternoon, but it must be conceded that the latter made much the more memorable effect. For beauty of playing, however, the palm must go to the orchestra's performance of the "Dawn Over Moscow" prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovantshina," which was tone painting of a superlative order.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 1 5 1937

'Scythian' Suite Played by Boston Symphony.

An all-but-unanimous demonstration of approval followed the playing of Prokofieff's barbaric "Scythian" suite, "Ala and Lolli," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. The one dissenting voice was that of an irrepressible little woman in the rear of the orchestra. She uttered a long hiss and then a boo that dragged out like the hoot of an owl. Those around clapped even harder to drown her out.

The suite has been before the American public almost twenty years now, and yesterday Mr. Koussevitzky and his men gave it all the driving energy and overwhelming impact it deserved. In the second section the conductor made the orchestra fairly rock with the elephantine dance of pagan monsters.

Prokofieff was third of four composers on an all Russian program. First came Liadoff with the symphonic picture, "From the Apocalypse," with its persistent reminders of Siegfried's "Rhine Journey," and then Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" prelude. Both earned sonorous readings, the prelude fading off in a sustained pianissimo that hung threadlike on the verge of silence.

Last came Tschaikowsky with the "Pathetic" symphony. A performance remarkable for euphony suffered in places from a lack of incisive contrasts, as in the announcement of the second subject of the first movement. L. B.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN
MAR 1 5 1937

MANAGER OF FAMOUS OPERA STARS DIES

BOSTON, March 14.— (AP) — Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died today at a local (Ritz-Carlton) hotel.

Ellis had been a prominent figure in Boston music circles since he brought together 75 musicians from New York and Boston to form the Boston Symphony in 1881.

Among the opera stars he managed for a time were Ignace Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Rachmaninoff. Only last week Miss Farrar visited Ellis and sang for him in his hotel room.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 1 5 1937

Philharmonic Presents All-Russian Program

For its concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony offered an all-Russian program, the second to be heard there in as many days. Rather remarkably, it duplicated none of the previous day's music of the Boston orchestra; for to the sixth symphony of Miaskowsky, heard earlier in the week, Artur Rodzinski added Moussorgsky's "Night on Bald Mountain" and the Tschaikowsky violin concerto.

The day's soloist was Mishel Piastro, concert master of the orchestra, who made his appearance from the wings, however, not from the first desk of the string section. As both a Russian and a disciple of Leopold Auer (for whom the concerto was written) it was to be surmised that Mr. Piastro's performance would be both idiomatic and authoritative. It was, indeed, marked by occasional moments of unusually facile execution, though the playing was not invariably accurate in pitch or suave in tone. Mr. Piastro's conception of the work was a vigorous one, but it was not impressively poetic or expressive. He enjoyed a considerable success with the audience. Mr. Rodzinski and the orchestra offered an excellent reading of the Moussorgsky tone-poem, with a particularly fine adjustment of tone and pace for the subdued concluding pages.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 1 5 1937

Koussevitsky in Berkshires

Boston Orchestra Conductor Confers With Symphonic Festival Officers

Special to the Herald Tribune

BERKSHIRE HILLS, Mass., March 14.—Dr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitsky are with Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith at Stockbridge, where a conference of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Koussevitsky is conductor, and Berkshire Symphonic Festival officers was held this afternoon.

Dr. and Mrs. C. A. Brooks-Cunningham, of London and New York, who were at Berkshire Inn, Great Barrington, have bought a seventy-five-acre farm in Monument Valley as a summer home.

At Olde Egremont Tavern, South Egremont, are Mrs. Carr V. Van Anda, of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. Theodore N. Ripson, of Hempstead, L. I.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 1 5 1937

THE BERKSHIRE HILLS

Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, had as week-end guests Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Koussevitzky.

Dr. and Mrs. C. A. Brooke Cunningham of London and New York, who are at the Berkshire Inn, Great Barrington, have bought a farm in Monument Valley and are building a Summer home there.

Mrs. Frederick S. Delafield of the Lenox colony is visiting Mr. and Mrs. John E. P. Morgan at Rye, N. Y.

Mrs. Carr V. Van Anda of New York and Mr. and Mrs. Theodore N. Ripson of Hempstead, L. I., are at Olde Egremont Tavern, South Egremont.

Mrs. Philip Weston of Pittsfield has departed for Pasadena to visit her sister-in-law, Mrs. John MacWilliams.

WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE
MAR 1 5 1937

PEOPLE AND EVENTS

Boston, March 15—Funeral services for Charles Adams Ellis, 82, manager of the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra for 33 years prior to his retirement in 1918, will be held tomorrow. Adams, friend and former manager of Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler, Nellie Melba, Sergei Rachmaninoff and Walter Damrosch, died yesterday at a hotel here.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
MAR 1 5 1937

MANAGER OF OPERA STARS EXPIRES AT 81

(By The Associated Press)

Boston, March 14.—Charles A. Ellis, 81 years old, manager of famous

---

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE
MAR 1 5 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY DELIGHTED WITH TANGLEWOOD AS SITE FOR BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

"Festivals of Music Grow Up," Says Conductor of Boston Symphony—Orchestra Board Members and Executive Committee Inspect Various Locations for Building

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, accompanied by Madame Koussevitzky and George J. Judd, the manager, returned to Boston this noon after another visit to Tanglewood with members of the orchestra board of trustees and the executive committee of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Tanglewood is the former Tappen estate between Lenox and Stockbridge.

They spent yesterday afternoon and this morning studying possible sites for the building to be erected for the concerts. There are several sites under consideration, including a gentle slope near the formal garden, immediately north of the house, another one in about the center of the 210-acre estate near the east line of the property and even another on the slope toward Stockbridge Bowl.

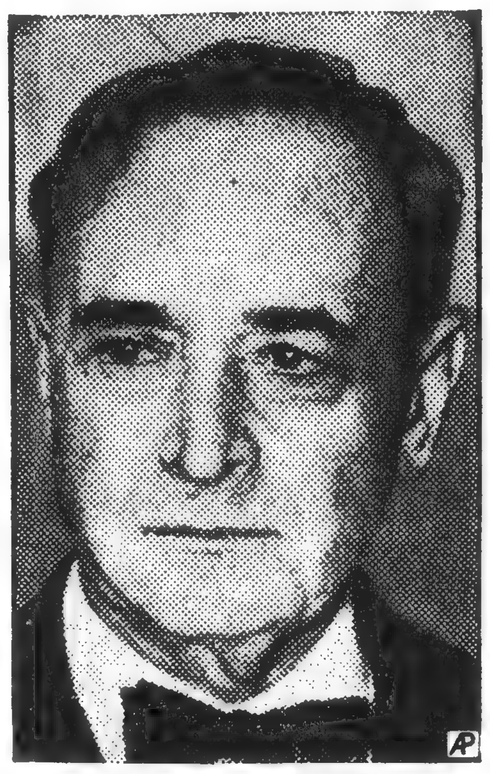
It was Dr. Koussevitzky's first intimate view of the estate given to trustees of the orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks and Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappen.

Unfolds Some of Plans

Standing on an elevation commanding the panorama to the south, Dr. Koussevitzky gazed today in ecstasy at his surrounding. He could scarcely contain himself as he unfolded some of his plans.

"Wonderful," he exclaimed, as his arms swept out to embrace the vista. "We make beautiful music here."

"Festivals of music grow up," he said, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the Festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of the Berkshires, in the summer time. While symphonic music will be largely the basis of the Festival, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of other forms of music with the orchestra.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
". . . Wonderful. We make beautiful music here."

No Commercial Aspects

"An effort will be made to make the Festival fit the interests and desires of American music lovers. The Festival will be free from all commercial aspects."

This last remark of the conductor was a direct answer applying to certain European festivals where artistic considerations have been submerged or threatened by eagerness for tourist money.

As one member of the Boston board interpreted it:

"You won't need a Tyrolean costume to come to the Festival."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
MAR 1 5 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS DIES IN BOSTON

Boston, March 14-AP-Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera

---

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD
MAR 1 5 1937

MUSIC LEADER DIES

BOSTON, March 14—(AP)—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera

---

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
MAR 1 5 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORGANIZER DEAD

BOSTON, March 14 — (AP) — Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 1 5 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS

Boston, Marih 14.—(AP)—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the

---

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
MAR 1 5 1937

BOSTON, March 15 (AP)—Charles A. Ellis, 81, former manager of Ignace Paderewski and Geraldine Farrar, who also served as first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died in a hotel here yesterday.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
MAR 1 5 1937

BOSTON—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the Boston symphony orchestra.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
MAR 1 5 1937

DEATH TAKES FOUNDER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, March 14 (AP)—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra,

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
MAR 1 5 1937

Charles A. Ellis

Manager of Famous Opera Stars Formed Boston Symphony

Boston, March 15.—(AP)—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager

---

BARRE, VT.
TIMES
MAR 1 5 1937

Boston.—Charles A. Ellis, 81, former manager of Ignace Paderewski and Geraldine Farrar, who also served as

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 1 6 1937

The Late Charles A. Ellis

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the passing of Charles A. Ellis it seems fitting on behalf of my family and myself that I give voice to public expression of the affection and esteem in which we held this friend.

His services on behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are too well known for extended comment. As artistic guide of such personages of Paderewski, Melba, Kreisler and Rachmaninoff the American public has reason to be grateful for his management of their professional activity.

In his unfailing loyalty to friends and the cause of justice during those unhappy times when Karl Muck was under a cloud he never faltered in his efforts to bring the truth forward despite disapproval that descended upon him in no uncertain manner.

Since early youth I have especial reasons to signal his friendship and encouragement in my own career. His unfaltering loyalty and integrity will be attested as well by a large circle of those who will share this inadequate tribute to a rare character who enjoyed all the virtues. GERALDINE FARRAR.

Ridgefield, Conn., March 15, 1937.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 1 6 1937

Geraldine Farrar Pays Tribute to Charles A. Ellis

Sends Wire to Herald Tribune in Memory of Old Friend

In memory of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1881 to 1918, who died in Boston on Sunday, Geraldine Farrar sent the following telegram yesterday from her home in Ridgefield, Conn., to the music editor of the New York Herald Tribune:

"In the passing of Charles A. Ellis it seems fitting on behalf of my family and myself that I give voice to public expressions of the affection and esteem in which we held this friend. His services on behalf of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are too well known for extended comment. As artistic guide of such personages as Paderewski, Melba, Kreisler and Rachmaninoff, the American public has reason to be grateful for his management of their professional activity. . . .

"In his unfailing loyalty to friends and the cause of justice during those unhappy times when Karl Muck was under a cloud he never faltered in his efforts to bring the truth forward despite disapproval that descended upon him in no uncertain manner.

"Since early youth I have especial reason to signal his friendship and encouragement in my own career. His unfaltering loyalty and integrity will be attested as well by a large circle of those who will share this inadequate tribute to a rare character that enjoyed all the virtues. GERALDINE FARRAR."

The Boston Symphony, then under the leadership of the noted German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, was one of the most prominent of the musical institutions affected by events of the war period, beginning in October, 1917, when demands were made that Dr. Muck begin his programs with "The Star-Spangled Banner." This was done, but in March, 1918, five weeks before the close of the season, Dr. Muck was arrested by Federal agents and later interned at Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, until June, 1919, when he returned to Germany. The charges against him were never officially made public.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
MAR 1 6 1937

Northampton. The performance, sponsored by the Federated Churches of Hampshire County, will include some of the most popular and best Easter music. The concert will be free and open to the public. An offering will be taken, however, to defray the expenses.

Six outstanding programs are listed in the Bushnell concert series of 1937-38. The series opens in November with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. The National Symphony will play in December, with Dr. Hans Kindler conducting. The Boston Symphony will return in January. The Cleveland Orchestra follows in February, with Arthur Rodzinski conducting. Later the same month will be heard the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of Eugene Ormandy. In March the New York

4

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAR 16 1937

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY IN SHORT VISIT

Highly Pleased With Festival's New Home

AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony Leader's Dream of American Music Festival is Becoming Concrete.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, left the Berkshires yesterday afternoon after spending the morning at Tanglewood, given by Mrs. Gorham Brooks and Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappen as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic festival. The 210-acre estate is located between Lenox and Stockbridge.

Also at Tanglewood were members of the orchestra's board of trustees and the executive committee of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Mrs. Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

"Wonderful," exclaimed Dr. Koussevitzky as he gazed at the panorama unfolding from the elevation near the residence at Tanglewood. "We will make beautiful music here," he said.

The group inspected the property carefully with a view to choosing the best possible location for the building to house the concerts in August. One site studied is at the eastern end of the property about half way between Hawthorne street, Stockbridge, and West street, Lenox. Another is the land which slopes toward Stockbridge bowl between the south entrance to the estate and the Bullard property. A third location is immediately north of the house, adjacent to the formal garden.

One of Dr. Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg" or the "Bayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the Old World.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood" to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music grow up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

In the World of Music

Trans. March 17/37

Koussevitzky Gives Brahms Fourth Symphony

By Redfern Mason

From Grieg to Brahms is a long distance, but from Liszt to Brahms is even farther. But there is virtue in an intermission and the audience at yesterday's Symphony made the aesthetic journey without difficulty.

It was delightful to hear the "wood notes wild" of the First Peer Gynt Suite and the music fell on ears that welcomed it. There is enough naturalism in that morning song to make it grateful to folk who love the magic of daybreak and, at the same time, there is enough craftsmanship in the way in which Grieg knits his tonal fabric to interest the music maker.

Our Symphony men may have their sophisticated moments; but they can appreciate good melody, and the sighing of the strings in that notable piece of realism, "Aase's Death" seemed to prove that, while playing the notes, they do not forget the story which they relate. Whether they believe, like Anitra, that women have no soul, I would hesitate to say; but they certainly believe that the lady has fascination.

Serge Koussevitzky does not condescend to Grieg, as Debussy did when he compared his compositions to "bonbons swathed in ice." He is a Russian, and the Russians are nearer to Mother Earth than are the Parisians. He probably likes Hans Christian Andersen, that Shakespeare of children, and therefore lends himself readily to the peasant wisdom of which "Peer Gynt" illustrates.

But I wonder whether he sympathizes as heartily with the Liszt of the "Faust" music. He gave us the "Gretchen" movement, and the orchestra played it effectively, but, I thought, without enthusiasm. Perhaps they divined the truth that Liszt re-created Gretchen in his own image, and that image is not Goethe's. By his life, which was one amorous adventure after another, Liszt made himself incapable of understanding the sweet womanliness of the maiden whom Goethe makes even Mephistopheles admire in the very moment when he is plotting her ruin.

Liszt's portrait of Gretchen is an oleograph; Goethe painted her with the grand simplicity of a Van Eyck. The score is a fascinating one; but its fascination is that of a sophisticated sentimentalism. No wonder the abbe shunned symphony and gave us "symphonic poems"; his spirit of the man cannot be denied; but it is as a virtuoso that he is a master, not as creator.

The music flowed equably; the audience was manifestly interested; but no enthusiasm was developed.

It was otherwise when we came to the Brahms No. 4, that great symphony in which the mighty Johannes seems to be brooding over his past attempts and his approximations to the ideal which he had set before him. Here both Koussevitzky and the orchestra seemed to be moving in a different atmosphere, an atmosphere of profound distances, crystalline and etherial.

We delighted in that opening movement, over which the spirit of Handel seems to move in spiritual domination. Brahms was deeply religious and here we feel him meditating on the mystery of existence, the why and the wherefore of it all, the whence and the whither.

This is music which keys Koussevitzky up to the best that is in him, and after that glorious Andante and the impassioned clangors of the Passacaglia, we felt that we had communed with the great ones of the earth.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 16 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY PLEASED BY NEW FESTIVAL HOME

Tanglewood Inspected for Possible Sites for Concert Building

Pittsfield, March 15 — Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, left the Berkshires this afternoon after spending the morning at Tanglewood, given by Mrs Gorham Brooks and Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappen as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic festival. The 210-acre estate is located between Lenox and Stockbridge.

Also at Tanglewood were members of the orchestra's board of trustees and the executive committee of the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Mrs Koussevitzky and George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra.

"Wonderful," exclaimed Dr Koussevitzky as he gazed at the panorama unfolding from the elevation near the residence at Tanglewood. "We will make beautiful music here," he said.

The group inspected the property carefully with a view to choosing the best possible location for the building to house the concerts in August. One site studied is at the eastern end of the property about half way between Hawthorne street, Stockbridge, and West street, Lenox. Another is the land which slopes toward Stockbridge bowl between the South entrance to the estate and the Bullard property. A third location is immediately north of the house, adjacent to the formal garden.

Miss Elizabeth B. Bliss, employed at the trust department of the Agricultural National bank, has accepted the position of executive secretary with the Berkshire Symphonic festival. Miss Bliss will assume her new duties April 1 and will be in charge of the office at Stockbridge. She is a graduate of Vassar college, the daughter of Mr and Mrs Albert L. Bliss of 30 Crofut street. She has been employed at the bank six years.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 19 1937

Warner 'Find' On Way Here

Keith Falkner, handsome young English stage and screen player, who has been signed by Warner Bros. will arrive in New York next Monday aboard the Queen Mary en route to Hollywood where he will start work in the near future, possibly in the leading role of "Desert Song."

Falkner, a strapping six-footer, is not only an actor but also a singer, and has appeared in this country as a concert soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For the past few months he has been at work in various British moving picture studios, completing contract commitments before sailing for the United States to begin work here under the Warner banner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 18 1937

$15,000 Left to Miss Farrar

BOSTON, March 17 (AP).—The will of Charles Adams Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Sunday, left $15,000 to Geraldine Farrar, opera singer now in retirement at Ridgefield, Conn. Principal beneficiaries are Alice E. Hardy of New York, Sally Hyde of Port Angeles, Wash., and Jane Patterson, Wayland, Mass. To Virginia Barton of New York goes $5,000 and a piano, and to Mary Adams of Oakham, Mass., $5,000.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1937

Ellis Will Filed at Boston

BOSTON, March 17 (AP).—The will of Charles Adams Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died on March 14, was filed in Suffolk Probate Court today. It left $15,000 to Geraldine Farrar, opera singer, now in retirement at Ridgefield, Conn.

SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL
MAR 18 1937

Geraldine Farrar Gets $15,000 Estate

BOSTON, March 18.—The will of Charles Adams Ellis, first man-

---

Bach's "Passion" At Symphony Hall On Good Friday

Cambridge Sun

A Good Friday observance giving every promise of most unusual impressiveness although not in the form of a church service will take place at Symphony hall. This will be the presentation of the narrative of the Last Supper and the betrayal, trial and crucifixion of Christ in the form of what has been called "the richest and noblest example of devotional music in existence", namely. John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to Saint Matthew".

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This extraordinary music, unsurpassed in the more than two centuries since its creation, will be performed by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee club, the Radcliffe Choral society and six notable soloists, all under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund. The performance will start at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon of Good Friday (March 26), and will resume at 8:15 in the evening.

March 18/37

JEANNETTE VREELAND

The singers present the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh chapters of the Gospel According to St. Matthew, with the addition of lyrical religious reflections by the poet "Picander", and verses from majestic ancient German chorales (precursors of the modern hymn form).

All the narrative and descriptive passages of the Gospel are sung by the tenor soloist (John Priebe), in impersonation of St. Matthew as chronicler of the events set forth. The words of Christ are sung by the baritone soloist (Keith Falkner). To the bass fall the words of the remaining chief characters, such as Peter, Judas, the High Priest, and Pilate. Dialogue of the Disciples is given voice by the male chorus. The women's chorus represents the Angelic Choir, the Believers, or "Daughters of Zion" and joins with the men in the chorales and in mob scenes. Solos will be sung by Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Kathryn Meisle, contralto.

Those conversant with the "Matthew Passion", fervently state that its great scenes are without equal for the depth of combined religious, dramatic and musical impression made upon the listener whether believer or unbeliever. Such, for example, are the representation of the Way of the Cross, through the excited populace, with the orchestra mirroring the victim's agonized tread; the Disciples' feverish query, "Lord, is it I? Is it I? Is it I?" when they are told that one shall betray his Master; the horrifying shouts of the mob: "Let him be crucified!" and "Come down, then, from the Cross!" Enthrallingly beautiful and touching impressions are aroused by the mob turned penitent in the double chorus of the Believers. "Around Thy tomb, here sit we weeping, hearts turned to Thee, O Saviour blest; rest Thee softly, softly rest."

Boston Symphony Orchestra

For a conductor with a reputation as a program designer, Dr. Koussevitzky made up a remarkably ill-balanced list for the season's nineteenth pair of concerts (March 19-20). It stood as follows: Haydn, "Surprise" Symphony; Berezowsky, Symphony No. 3; Sibelius, Symphony No. 7, "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia."

The major position was held by a novelty conspicuously unworthy of the dignity. The climax came immediately after the intermission, and then the program tapered off. It was really unnecessary to play the "Finlandia"; the concert would have been long enough without it. With that out, the "Swan" legend could have opened the second half, and the concert could have closed with the Sibelius symphony.

That would have been an improvement, but nothing could have helped test that his devotion to Mr. Berezowsky is excessive. The Third Symphony differs little in character or style from the works of its composer previously heard here. It is a compendium of clichés. It was conducted by its composer, although Dr. Koussevitzky led the rest of the program.

There are still people who speak patronizingly of "Papa" Haydn. They are unwise. Haydn was a genius, the author of masterpieces, of which the "Surprise," for all its seeming naïveté, is one. He does not need much help from a conductor. Yesterday he had too much. Instead of allowing the charming melodies, the captivating devices, the firm structure and high spirits of the work to appear in their transparent beauty, Dr. Koussevitzky attempted an "interpretation." Contrasts of tempi and dynamics were exaggerated. Inner voices were too much subordinated. The first movement and the last were taken so fast that the line was blurred—not even the Boston Symphony Orchestra could keep it clear at such a pace. Tension was introduced into measures of simple delight. Gaiety was lighted with emotionalism. There was apparently an effort to make Haydn an Austrian Tchaikovsky. It was not successful.

The very qualities of interpretation which spoiled the Haydn made the Sibelius symphony irresistible. This superb piece of writing, stripped, somberly colorful, closely knit, charged with emotion, came to pulsing life under the conductor's magistral baton. Such a performance was enough—almost—to make one forget what had gone before. The rest of the program was well played, too, but inevitably it was anti-climax.

L. A. S.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
MAR 19 1937

Among the many written tributes to the memory of Charles A. Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra was one from Geraldine Farrar who had made concer tours under his direction. She said that he had done much to help her in her artistic career and she always cherished his friendship. This regard, evidently, was mutual, for now comes the news that in his will Mr. Ellis left $15,000 to the singer. That is a token that will increase her kindly thoughts of the donor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
MAR 21 1937

Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in an Easter music concert Friday afternoon over the NBC network.

In the World of Music

Alban Berg's Violin Concerto in the Intimacy of Sanders Theater, Cambridge

Trans. Mar 19 '37

By Moses Smith

The performance of Alban Berg's Violin Concerto by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, with Louis Krasner as soloist, in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening was the fifth by the same forces within two weeks. The first two American performances were given a couple of weeks ago in Symphony Hall, it will be recalled. On last week's trip the work was played in Northampton and New York.

Not in recent years has Dr. Koussevitzky been so taken with a new work. His enthusiasm plus the understanding, beautiful presentation of the solo part by Mr. Krasner have even begun to prevail over the orchestral musicians themselves, frequently the most antagonistic listeners to new and significant music. For it is a mistake to suppose that because an orchestra presents a first-rate performance of a new work the members necessarily find pleasure in it.

Since the present writer heard neither of the road performances of the Concerto, he cannot compare last night's with them. But certainly this Cambridge presentation attracted and engrossed the attention of the listeners more than either of the other two hereabouts. I do not think it was principally a matter of better playing, although that may have been contributory. It was rather the smaller, more resonant auditorium, where every detail of the score stood revealed as it had not in Symphony Hall.

The smaller size of Sanders Theater was even more effectual in another—if closely related—regard. It promoted an intimacy between the hearers and the performers quite impossible in Symphony Hall, much as Bostonians may take pride in the admirable acoustical properties of that auditorium. Last night we listeners seemed ourselves to be contributing to the performance. The work thus stood revealed in what I am now convinced is its true form, a chamber concerto. There is, it may be remembered, a large supporting orchestra, but it never seems like a large orchestra, even at the moment of the catastrophe in the middle of the second movement.

In this respect, as in others, the Concerto is unique, so far as memory serves: in the particular kind of both lyrical and dramatic ecstasy for which chamber music is regarded as the appropriate medium, which is rarely encountered in symphonic music and never in recent times in a concerto, although the Prokofiev Violin Concerto occasionally has the same quality. The essential ingredient in a concerto—display of the soloist—would seem to preclude this quality. The fact that Berg has been able to capture it without subduing the solo instrument is another indication of the uniqueness of this work.

It would be pointless and even tiresome to rehearse the other reasons leading to my conclusion that the Concerto is a masterpiece of our times, since they have been sufficiently and repeatedly stated in these columns. The fact that the critical brethren of New York arrived at a different conclusion, on first hearing the Concerto there, is probably an example of the truth of the old proverb about tastes. It may with equal justification serve to illustrate another adage dealing with the deceptiveness of first appearances.

Last night's audience listened intently and with evident enjoyment. The applause, if not profuse, was warm. The Concerto was preceded on the program by Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201) and followed by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

Symphony Presents New Composition

Amer Mar 20

By RUTH MARSTERS

Nicolai Berezowsky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest, presented his latest work, the Third Symphony in its first Boston performance at yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

The young Russian composer, at present a member of the staff of the Columbia Broadcasting System, has won a steadily increasing importance among the younger contemporary composers.

The promise evidenced in previous works, however, is the direct cause of the disappointment which follows a hearing of the new work.

The youthful exuberance, the wealth of poetic lyricism, the spontaneous rhythmic energy of earlier works are not consistently apparent in the new work.

Its character, to be sure, is somewhat more introspective than Berezowsky's works are usually, but there is a lack of a sustained motivating force throughout.

The Symphony opens with an Introduction, Adagio. It is independent in thought from the main body of the movement, and its lyricism is broken off by an abrupt entry into an enervating Allegro con fuoco.

The second movement, Allegro, is written in three-quarter rhythm. Its nature is a studied eccentricity which, however, doesn't quite come off.

The third and last movement, Lento, comprises a theme and variations. It ends sonorously but is without climax.

Mr. Berezowsky, unfortunately, lacks the adequate technique of conducting as he does any intuitive ability in this medium.

Dr. Koussevitzky resumed conducting the orchestra following the intermission. And as the performance of the Haydn "Surprise" Symphony with which he had opened the program amounted to a revelation of the familiar work, so the performance of the Sibelius of the closing group was singularly inspired.

The orchestra was superb throughout and the enthusiasm of the audience mounted steadily through the lofty Seventh Symphony, "The Swan of Tuonela," and "Finlandia."

The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

Classic Haydn, Novel Berezowsky And Masterly Sibelius at Symphony

Trans. March 20/37

By Moses Smith

In the old days (not so long ago) a conductor was venturesome who placed two symphonies on a program. For yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be repeated this evening, Serge Koussevitzky listed three symphonies originally and, when that apparently formidable array proved to be too short, he added "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" by Sibelius.

If the balance and symmetry of the original list were thus destroyed, they contributed to a new lineup; the second half of the program is all-Sibelius, with the one-movement Seventh Symphony to begin. The first half is divided between Haydn's "Surprise" and the Third Symphony of Nicolai Berezowsky, in first Boston presentation, with the composer as guest conductor.

Yesterday was an afternoon of magnificent orchestral playing. Perhaps it would be safer to make a reservation as to the new work, since the composer alone would be judge. But the performance here seemed to be excellent and to please the composer as well. As to the other four numbers, with Dr. Koussevitzky in characteristic vein, it was difficult to know whether to admire more the alternate delicacy and sparkling vivacity of the Haydn playing or the perfect adjustment of parts in the Sibelius Symphony, the exquisitely tinted orchestral tone in "The Swan of Tuonela," the vigor and dramatic sweep of a work like "Finlandia," which, one had supposed, had largely exhausted its appeal.

The performance of the Haydn Symphony exhibited Dr. Koussevitzky in a most classical approach to the music. There were no exaggerated tempos or dynamics, no attempts to make the music more "expressive." There was merely music-making, but with the greatest care and refinement. As a result the measures of Haydn now danced or now glowed with his peculiar brand of sentiment.

Hearing the three Sibelius compositions, one after another, was instructive. It showed us the variety of the man's genius. It also made plain the essential sameness of that genius. "Finlandia" is early Sibelius, and it sounds Tchaikovskyan. "Tuonela" is even earlier, and it is almost prophetically Debussyan in its impressionism (beautifully aided yesterday by the English horn playing of Mr. Speyer). Yet one observed in both the roots of that unique melos that had been heard previously on the program in the masterly Seventh Symphony.

Mr. Berezowsky's work was thus in distinguished company. It is the duty of a civilized listener, though, to hear a new work without prejudice, not to compare it with music of another time or country. It is, also, unfair to demand that only masterpieces be represented on symphony programs—unfair and unwise. Many a work of lesser rank can give pleasure.

This Symphony of Mr. Berezovsky, which the present writer, in company with most of the audience, was hearing for the first time, seems unimportant but pleasant. The composer seems not to have made up his mind whether to remain a Russian or become a one hundred per cent American. The last of the three movements especially exhibits an alternation between elements of jazz and the Russian dance.

The composer also shows some hesitation in his formal plan—hesitation or unwillingness to use the eraser. The Symphony is short, but it is still too long. Certain repetitions should be cut; the rhetoric is often prolonged. The instrumentation, too, is sometimes forced, although on the whole, it is cleverly scored. (Mr. Berezwsky has a liking for the trombone.) The best of the Symphony is its easy melodic flow, when it is not artificially forced by the composer into a channel unsuited to it. Here would seem to be Mr. Berezowsky's happiest vein.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mar. 20

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Nicolai Berezowsky was the guest composer and conductor in his own work. The program was as follows:

Haydn
  Symphony in G major No. 94 "Surprise" Berezowsky
  Symphony No. 3 Op. 21
Sibelius
  Symphony No. 7 Op. 105
Sibelius
  "The Swan of Tuonela" Op. 22 No. 3
Sibelius
  "Finlandia" Op. 26

Mr. Berezowsky is no stranger to the concerts of the Boston Symphony, for Dr. Koussevitzky has evidently faith in his talent and has consequently brought forward a number of his compositions. The Third Symphony, which the composer himself conducted yesterday for the first time here, is a singularly interesting work. It begins with a poignantly beautiful slow introduction, which leads to a vigorous allegro. The second movement is eerily fantastic in character and most ingeniously worked out. If the composer had written it a hundred years ago, he would undoubtedly have named E. T. A. Hoffmann as a source of inspiration. Today one does not have to go any further than the surrealist exhibition to realize that fantastic moods are a common influence on contemporary art. The third movement is more solemn, and the symphony closes with an old-fashioned sonorous climax.

We felt that Mr. Berezowsky had given best expression to his musical ideas in the first two movements. At a first hearing the finale sounded less sincere and less well ordered than the other movements. In those, however, Mr. Berezowsky has something of real importance to communicate, and he has written it with convincing eloquence.

Mr. Berezowsky appeared to get just the performance that he wanted from the orchestra. The Symphony was cordially applauded. Previously we listened to Haydn's best-known—though not his best—symphony. The "surprise" is an old joke, and the variations which follow are not very remarkable. It would really be kinder to Haydn's genius as a composer if almost any of the other "Salomon" symphonies were customarily chosen.

Some splendid performances of Sibelius' music concluded the concert. Repeated hearings of the Seventh Symphony serve only to increase one's respect for that amazing work. The condensation of creative intelligence is an interesting phenomenon at the end of an artistic career. Most artists expand their ideas into larger and larger forms, as for example, the Ninth Symphony and Goethe's "Faust," Bach's compositions in the Leipzig period, Verdi's last operas and innumerable other instances.

"The Swan of Tuonela" is a mood picture of simple and moving beauty. Even so it might be slightly too prolonged, if the solo English horn part had been less artistically handled. Mr. Speyer's performance was superb; and the applause for him was a real tribute. It is odd that Sibelius, who could write so beautifully for this instrument, never scored it in his symphonies. A stirring performance of "Finlandia" brought this concert to an end.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 20th regular concerts on Thursday and Saturday of next week offer Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, Mozart's Symphony in E flat and Beethoven's Second Symphony. On Good Friday Bach's St. Matthew Passion will be given.

Mar 20

OSTON GLOBE—SA

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Nicolai Berezowsky conducted the first local performance of his new Third Symphony at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. The program otherwise consisted of the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn, and three compositions by Sibelius—the glorious Seventh Symphony," "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia." These were conducted by Dr Koussevitzky.

Mr Berezowsky, a young Russian musician now living in New York, has enjoyed the good fortune of having five scores played by this orchestra in the past six years. The Third Symphony, composed in 1935-36, is still in manuscript, and has been heard but once before, when the Rochester, N Y, Philharmonic, under Jose Iturbi, played it only last January.

The new symphony is expertly written for large orchestra, designed on a spacious and elaborate formal scale within the scope of three movements. Mr Berezowsky has mastered the craft of instrumentation. Harmonically, the Third Symphony indicates a growing conservatism, particularly the brief codas of the first and last movements, which, aside from slight dissonance, remind one of the typical Beethoven coda.

The composer's rhythmic vitality and technical skill nevertheless cannot make up for the absence of striking ideas, of emotion, nor for his dryness of melody and the cliches which appear from beginning to end of a work that is far too long. One's total impression was of complicated dullness. Mr Berezowsky was greeted by the Friday audience with accustomed warmth.

As is usually the case with masterpieces, the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius discloses new beauties at each succeeding performance. The words of Cecil Gray, quoted in the program book, sum in few words the essential qualities of this product of a great creative mind: "It is not merely a consummate masterpiece of formal construction . . . but also a work of great expressive beauty, of a lofty grandeur and dignity, a truly Olympian serenity and repose which are unique in modern music . . ." These phrases have been used loosely by others in application to other music. But in this case, here is the whole truth.

The compactness, the concentration of the Seventh Symphony continue to delight at least one listener. Hardly a measure could be omitted without injury to the train of thought. Far more important, however, is the spell exerted upon imagination and the emotions, by means of a style absolutely personal. The 19th century Germans would have called this "nature music" and they would have been correct. The score is glowing and vital and exalted; sensuous insofar as it brings remembrance of the abiding beauties of earth. All this cannot be logically reasoned; it can only be grasped instinctively.

Neither "The Swan of Tuonela" nor "Finlandia" had been heard at a Symphony concert for more than 10 years. The first of the two is marvelously depictive of the episode in the Finnish epic, the "Kalevela," which prompted its writing. The English horn solo was superbly played by Mr Speyer, who was twice called to the front of the stage by Dr Koussevitzky and the audience.

"Finlandia" has become hackneyed by many indifferent performances upon so-called "popular" programs until it has for some lost the electrifying effect implicit in the music and its esthetic idea. Dr Koussevitzky read it with that simple though profound ardor which has renewed the vitality of many another score during his regime at Symphony Hall.

A memorial leaflet referring to the passing of Charles A. Ellis was inserted in the program book. Perhaps the younger generation of Symphony-goers were not familiar with his name, for the former manager of the orchestra had been retired for nearly 20 years. By elder Bostonians Mr Ellis was recognized as an able and faithful collaborator with Maj Higginson—who selected Mr Ellis as first manager of the orchestra—in the building of what is now perhaps the greatest symphonic organization in the world.

The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday because on Friday there will be a special performance, for the benefit of the pension fund, of the "Passion According to St Matthew," by J. S. Bach. The program for Thursday and Saturday lists the Second Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, the E-flat Symphony (K 543) of Mozart, and Beethoven's Second Symphony.

C. W. D.

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Post

Berezowski's Third Is Played for First Time

March 20/37

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Admittedly it is the business of a symphony orchestra to play symphonies. There are two on the programme announced for the Symphony Concerts of next week; there are three on that of the concerts of yesterday and this evening. But since these three came from composers so diverse as Haydn, Sibelius and Nicolai Berezowski, the monotony is a matter of title only.

THREE SIBELIUS PIECES

To be more specific, the Haydn Symphony is the "Surprise"; that of Mr. Berezowski is his Third, and was played here yesterday for the first time, and under the composer's direction. Sibelius was represented not only by his Seventh Symphony, but by his "Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" as well.

There are other worthy symphonies of Haydn which have not been heard in Symphony Hall since last the "Surprise" made its appearance there, but that is not to deny that, besides being the most popular, the "Surprise" is one of the most genial and attractive, and Dr. Koussevitzky's and the orchestra's performance of it has now attained a state of perfection.

Berezowski's Work

There are four movements in Haydn's symphony, while Sibelius' Seventh runs in one, yet in the matter of length they are not very different. It might have been better if Sibelius had retained his original title of "Fantasia Sinfonica," for the Seventh is scarcely a symphony in the commonly accepted sense. Rather is it an isolated symphonic movement that makes no attempt to be several movements in one like, for example, the piano concertos of Liszt or the "Domestica" of Strauss.

Mr. Berezowski is in this instance more conventional, and yet not wholly so. This Third Symphony of his has but three movements, and the last, if not exactly a slow movement, is nevertheless the slowest. This Americanized Russian, now in his 37th year, may well feel that Boston has been kind to him. Since 1930 we have heard from his pen three symphonies and two concertos. Surely a flattering emphasis, especially upon the music of a composer who has not yet evinced much more than skill, taste and facility.

The Seventh Well Received

But was it exactly kind of Dr. Koussevitzky, although an intermission intervened, to follow this agreeable but unoriginal work with so personal a tonal document as the Sibelius Seventh? The Finn's symphony gives us a portrait in tone of the composer himself, which is amazingly like the one drawn in words by Lucien Price in his "Saga of Sibelius," printed in the programme-book. Both bespeak the composer as spiritually lonely, austere, ascetic and Olympian. A fascinating detail in Mr. Price's essay is the mention of the composer's use of kerosene lamps and candles in his home. His music is no less Spartan. The symphonies from the Fifth onward may betray a falling-off in what is commonly known as inspiration, but there is a compensatory increase in logic of construction and in loftiness of thought.

That the Seventh was received with so much enthusiasm yesterday was quite as much a credit to the audience itself as it was to the music and its superb performance.

Mr. Speyer's English Horn

"The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" are the product at once of a more fecund and a lesser Sibelius. But the "Swan" is a gloomily eloquent bit of tone-painting, and Mr. Speyer's playing of the English horn solo was worth coming a long way to hear. Even Dr. Koussevitzky was plainly impressed.

The musical expression of patriotism comes sometimes close to jingoism, and "Finlandia" hardly escapes such reproach. In yesterday's impassioned performance it sounded, happily, above itself.

NEWARK, N. J.
LEDGER
MAR 12 1937

NIGHT LETTER

The Boston Symphony Orchestra knocked the high hat off serious music last night in a 45-minute WJZ program that had interest and appeal straight down the line from Park ave. penthouses to time-clock punchers' flats.

WNEW went Cosmopolitan for the evening judging from foreign names on its broadcasts. Nut Chuck, an Eskimo, represented the Frozen North.

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post

Case for and Against Translated Opera

March 21/37

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

READERS of this department who might chance to compare its editorial objections to translated opera with its occasional enthusiasm for the the thing in practice could accuse it of inconsistency. But the fact is that the issue, like so many others, is not clear cut. This department rejoices that the Metropolitan Company is about to give us its Wagner in German and its Verdi in Italian, although both "Hansel and Gretel" and the Russian "Coq d'Or," to be sung in French, might well be sung in English. It also heartily applauded the federal music project for its English "Carmen" at the Majestic Theatre last week. Seven-dollar opera in the Opera House should have different—if you choose, higher—standards than popular opera. If you hear "Tristan" under the former auspices and do not know what it is all about, the fault is yours. But $7 opera, so to speak, started at the top, and WPA opera is starting at the bottom and carrying its public along with it. That public, presumably untutored both in opera and in foreign languages, can best be reached, as these WPA performances endeavor to reach it, through opera presented primarily as an understandable play with music.

Comic operas, Verdi's "Falstaff," for example, should always be sung in the vernacular. Even the Metropolitan Company acknowledges this occasionally, as when it lately revived Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio Segreto" as "The Clandestine Marriage." It it is altogether desirable, however, that translated operas be sung in sensible translations, not in librettoese, as "Carmen" was sung last week, with frequent appeals to the risibilities. Those made by Robert A. Simon for the performances of the American Opera Company were models of their kind. Opera is unreasonable enough at best. In this country we are all too ready to laugh in the wrong places, and that tendency should not be encouraged. A London reviewer a few years ago, discussing an English "Il Trovatore" at the hands of the Carl Rosa Company, deplored the fact that the words "Ah, those features" emerged, through misplaced accentuation, as "Are those feet yours?"

* * * *

From 1918 to 1929 Boston heard no performances of Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew. In the latter year, which marked the 200th anniversary of the first performance of the work and the 100th anniversary of its revival under Mendelsshon after a century of silence, it was given us by the Handel and Haydn Society. Last year the Boston Symphony Orchestra restored the Passion to its repertory, and on Friday next, once more assisted by the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, it will perform it again in aid of its pension fund. This performance, in two sessions, the first at 4:30, the second at 8:15, is not a substitute for the regular Friday afternoon Symphony concert. That matinee will fall on Thursday, and the programme to ge given then and again on Saturday evening comprises Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto, Mozart's familiar Symphony in E-flat major and the Second Symphony of Beethoven, which has not been heard in Symphony Hall since the concerts of the Beethoven Centenary 10 years ago. . . . To return to the Passion, the soloists in it will be Jeannette Vreeland, Kathryn Meisle, Keith Falkner, John Priebe and Fritz Lechner. Dr. V. Ernst Wolff will play the harpsichord accompaniments to the recitatives.

* * * *

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER
MAR 12 1937

"TANGLEWOOD," where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote the Tanglewood Tales, located in the Berkshire mountains is to be the permanent home of the Boston Symphony. This estate of over 200 acres, known as the Dixey estate, is the gift of Mrs. Gorham Brooks (nee Dixey) and her aunt, Miss Mary Tappan. A building to cost around $25,000 is to be erected to seat 5,000 and the gardens of the estate, surrounded by ancient hemlock hedges, will provide natural promenades during intermissions. Dr. Serge Konssevitzsky is the conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Bach 'Passion' and Other Music Notes

Adv. Mar 21

BACH'S setting of the Passion According to St. Matthew will be performed on Friday afternoon (Good Friday) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The assisting chorus will be drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and will be prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

The list of soloists includes two singers new to Boston audiences—John Priebe, who will sing the tenor part of the Evangelist, and Fritz Lechner, who will be heard in the incidental bass parts.

For the rest, the soloists will be the same as appeared in the revival of the great work last season, Keith Falkner singing the part of Christ, and Jeannette Vreeland and Kathryn Meisle taking the soprano and contralto parts.

Due to the length of the work the performance will be given in two parts, the first from 4:30 to 6, the second from 8:15 to 9:45.

The regular Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Thursday of this week. The Saturday evening concert will take place as usual.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, K, 543, and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major at these concerts.

Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet, and Mager, will be the soloists in the performance of the Brandenburg Concerto.

* * *

ONE OF the notable music events of the season will take place in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening when Artur Schnabel and Bronislaw Huberman make their first joint concert appearance in Boston.

The distinguished artists will be heard in the following sonatas for piano and violin: Sonata, C minor, Op. 30, No. 2 by Beethoven; Sonata, G major, Op. 78 by Brahms; Sonata B flat major (KCC. 378) by Mozart; Fantasie, C major, Op. 159 by Schubert.

* * *

THE STRADIVARIUS Quartet assisted by the pianist-composer, Leo Ornstein, will make its single Boston concert appearance this season in Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, March 31.

* * *

ANNOUNCEMENT is made today of the first Boston violoncello recital by Gerald Warburg, in Jordan Hall, on Tuesday evening, April 13.

* * *

TRUDI SCHOOP will present her much discussed new ballet, "Blond Marie," when she brings her Comic Ballet to Symphony Hall for two performances, April 16 and 17.

Miss Schoop, who is now on her second tour of America, has with her a company of twenty-two men and women dancers, all of whom appear in the new ballet. The latter is described as a dance comedy in eight scenes with music by Paul Schoop and costumes designed by Prof. Oscar Schlemmer.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF.
UNION
MAR 10 1937

Visits Here

Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, national head of the federal music project, who was in San Diego yesterday.

NIKOLAI SOKOLOFF, WPA MUSIC HEAD, LAUDS S. D. UNITS

Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, native of Russia who founded the Cleveland Symphony orchestra, and national director in Washington, D. C., of the WPA federal music project since July, 1935, paid a surprise visit to the San Diego project yesterday.

After Charles H. Marsh, district supervisor, had arranged for him to hear the orchestra, concert band and choral units of the local project, the eminent violinist and conductor said: "It is remarkable. San Diego has wonderful musicians and you are fortunate in the able conductors here. It must be the climate and great beauty of this city that attracts musicians who would otherwise not care to leave New York."

State Head Here

With Dr. Sokoloff was Miss Harle Jervis, state director.

The national director, born in Russia in 1886, was playing a first violin in the Boston Symphony orchestra when he was 17. In 1916, he conducted the Philharmonic orchestra, San Francisco. He founded the Cleveland Symphony orchestra in 1918 and conducted it until 1933. Called to Washington to head the federal music project in 1935, the director took with him to his gigantic task, of putting thousands of unemployed musicians in America to work, certain ideals. These have been incorporated into the project and are functioning successfully.

Those ideals, he said, include:

Music and musicians are to be considered without prejudice. Regardless of age, sex, color, religious creed or race, there must be no discrimination within the federal project, if the person's musicianship fulfills requirements.

America must have an opportunity to hear the best music, not merely in the great cities, but throughout the nation.

The American composer or artist, not on relief, must receive an opportunity for a hearing.

The official returned with Miss Jervis last night to Los Angeles. He left New York by plane Friday afternoon and said he expects to be at his desk in Washington March 24.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 17 1937

Even the usually very accurate New York Times in its obituary of Charles A. Ellis gives us an amusing line on "George H. Enschel" as early director and conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Remember when Henschel was a name to conjure with in American music?

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
MAR 15 1937

PADEREWSKI'S TEACHER DIES

BOSTON, March 15 (INS)—Teacher and advisor of Paderewski, Melba and Rachmaninoff, Charles A. Ellis, 81, who created the first Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881, was dead today. Funeral services were scheduled tomorrow afternoon at Forest Hills Chapel.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER
MAR 14 1937

MUSICIAN'S DREAM IS COMING TRUE

American Festival of Genuine Artistic Quality Finally Near Completion

NEW YORK, March 13.—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg," or the "Bayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparilg himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat weird violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mitsakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a sumemr music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorman Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood" a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of muisc have grown up" says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to meka the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

LEWISTON, ME.
JOURNAL
MAR 15 1937

CHARLES ELLIS, MANAGER OF OPERA STARS, DIES

BOSTON, March 15-AP-Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra died Sunday at a local hotel. He managed among others, Paderewski, Farrar, Kreisler and Rachmaninoff.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
MAR 15 1937

Charles A. Ellis.

BOSTON, March 14 (AP).—Charles A. Ellis, 81, manager of famous opera stars and the first manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died today at a local hotel.

Among the opera stars he managed for a time were Ignace Paderewski, Geraldine Farrar, Fritz Kreisler and Rachmaninoff.

Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" Given for Pension Fund

Keith Falkner, baritone soloist, who will take part in the single performance of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," which will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and evening.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAR 1 6 1937

LAST HALF OR BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEES

Boston, March 15—The concert tomorrow afternoon at Symphony hall by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony orchestra begins the last half of the six Tuesday matinees. Residents of this district are included among the many commuters who are drawn to this series by the late starting-time of 3, and the special "plot" which Koussevitzky devises for the programs for each year—this season being devoted to composers of the great romantic school.

The forthcoming program presents: Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, No 1; Liszt's "Faust symphony," 2d movement, "Gretchen"; and Brahms's 4th symphony.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 1 6 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY TODAY

The concert this afternoon at Symphony hall, Boston, by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra, begins the last half of the six Tuesday matinees. Residents of this district are included among the many commuters who are drawn to this series by the late starting-time of 3 o'clock, and the special "plot" which Koussevitzky devises for the programs of each year—this season being devoted to composers of the Great Romantic School. The forthcoming program presents Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, No. 1; Liszt's "Faust Symphony," Second Movement, "Gretchen;" and Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

7 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS

Charles A. Ellis, 81, long an outstanding figure in American musical affairs, died at his home in Boston, March 14. He is perhaps best known as the organizer of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Back in 1881, on the order of the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson to 'go out and get an orchestra,' he recruited 75 men under the direction of George Henschel, its first leader. Later he handled the concert tours of many artists, including Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, Rachmaninoff, Geraldine Farrar and many others of equal standing. He directed the fortunes of the orchestra until 1918.

Following his resignation in that capacity he formed an opera company with Dr. Damrosch, which made a successful tour of the country.

ST. MATTHEW PASSION ON GOOD FRIDAY

Bach's setting of the Passion According to St. Matthew will be performed next Friday (Good Friday) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, with the assistance of a large chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth, and a notable list of soloists. There is to be but one performance of the work, and this, on account of its length, is to be divided into two parts—the first, from 4:30 to 6, and the second, from 8:15 to 9:45.

The St. Matthew Passion was revived by this orchestra last spring after a long neglect of what is universally considered one of Bach's most poignant and moving works. The story of the arrest, trial and crucification of Christ is told by means of recitatives for the tenor part of the Evangelist, with occasional choral interjections to signify the voice of the populace. The arias and the more elaborate choruses are brought in as a sort of emotional commentary. Meditative chorales, quiet expressions of faith, are likewise introduced. The soprano and contralto solos will be taken by Jeanette Vreeland and Kathryn Meisle, who were likewise the soloists of last year. Keith Falkner will again sing the part of Christ. The tenor part of the Evangelist will be sung by John Priebe, and incidental bass parts by Fritz Lechner. Messrs. Priebe and Lechner, both singers of wide experience and high standing, are as yet unfamiliar to Boston audiences. Dr. V. Ernst Wolff will play the harpsichord part in the accompaniment to the recitatives.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

MAR 1 8 1937

NEW ENGLAND

$15,000 for Geraldine Farrar

BOSTON.—The will of Charles Adams Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died March 14, filed in Suffolk Probate Court, bequeathed $15,000 to Geraldine Farrar, opera singer, now in retirement at Ridgefield, Conn.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 1 8 1937

$15,000 TO MISS FARRAR

BOSTON, March 18 (AP)—The will of Charles Adams Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died Sunday, left $15,000 to Geraldine Farrar, opera singer now in retirement at Ridgefield, Conn.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

MAR 1 6 1937

Koussevitzky's Fond Dream Of Festival Coming True

BY JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK, March 15 (AP).—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "The American Salzburg" or the "Brayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the Old World.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat weird violin concerto to New York, "that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakably conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5.000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or, at any rate, seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you won't need a tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

MAR 1 8 193

Famous Artist Does Sketches Of Personnel

Serge Koussevitzky Described as 'Lamp of Orchestral Music'

The Boston Symphony Orchestra that will play here on March 30 in the Rutgers University gymnasium at 8:15 o'clock in the regular concert series has for more than half a century been, like the Boston Latin School and Harvard University, one of the institutions which give unique distinction to the city. In personnel the orchestra is a preliminary sketch of an ideal international society.

Gerome Brush, brilliant etcher, has done a volume of charcoal drawings of the orchestra with paragraph biographies of its members. The Boston Globe, following publication of the book, stated editorially, "Genial and witty, it is at the same time a sociological document. Thirty years ago the orchestra was an exotic hybrid; German, French and Italian grown under glass in Boston. Today the Europeans are still here and so may they always be, for it is a necessity of the art that it take the finest artist wherever they may be had, irrespective of race, nationality, politics, religion or class. Mr. Brush's sketches tell succinct life histories of artists from Boston, Lynn, Rockland, Bridgewater, Melrose, Revere, New Bedford, Vinal Haven, and even from farthest Ohio, who sit as peers with instrumentalists from Paris and Berlin."

"These charcoal sketches present 109 heads of men, reflective, scholarly, sensitive, fine-grained, every face mirroring the life of intellect and spirit lived by a master musician."

Of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Brush opposite a splendid charcoal sketch says, "Ruskin gave architecture seven lamps. The lamps of orchestral music, however, are numbered by the few great conductors living at the time. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is one of the greatest of these lamps. When he stands before his orchestra everyone seems to reflect the ever-burning light of his personality.

"The dress suit that fits so perfectly across the shoulders, the bent left elbow, the bird-like alertness, the Niagara crescendos—everybody liked him. He has been here 12 years—everybody loves him."

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
TIMES

MAR 1 4 1937

Koussevitzky Records Tschaikowsky Symphony

In keeping with the recurrent Russian influence in music, there is the recent recording by Serge Koussevitzky of the Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony for Victor. Koussevitzky grew up musically on Tschaikowsky. It may have been scores of Debussy, Faure, Ravel and D'Indy he took with him on his famous conducting journey down the Don but it was Tschaikowsky who provided his musical foundations. He seems able to conduct him with an ineradicable spontaneity and enthusiasm. The present records point out musical riches not heard before. After the amazing trumpeting of the brass section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there is music that carries something of Tschaikowsky's admiration for Wagner. I do not know of another conductor than Koussevitzky who brings this out. Most directors seize an irresistible opportunity to overdramatize.

NEWS

[illegible]

3/

Boston Symphony To Present Extraordinary Good Friday Program

A Good Friday observance giving every promise of most unusual impressiveness, although not in the form of a church service, will take place at Symphony Hall. This will be the presentation of the narrative of the Last Supper, and the betrayal, trial and crucifixion of Christ, in the form of what has been called "the richest and noblest example of devotional music in existence", namely, John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to Saint Matthew."

This extraordinary music, unsurpassed in the more than two centuries since its creation, will be performed by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, The Radcliffe Choral Society, and six notable soloists, all under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitsky. The Orchestra's Pension Fund will benefit.

On such a vast scale is the work that the performance will start at 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon of Good Friday (March 26) and will resume at 8.15 in the evening.

All the narrative and descriptive passages of the Gospel are sung by the tenor soloist (John Priebe), in impersonation of St. Matthew as chronicler of the events set forth. The words of Christ are sung by the baritone soloist (Keith Faulkner). To the bass (Fritz Lechner) fall the words of the remaining chief characters, such as Peter, Judas, The High Priest, and Pilate. Dialogue of the Disciples is given voice by the male chorus. The women's chorus represents the Angelic Choir, the Believers, or "Daughters of Zion," and joins with the men in the charales and in mob scenes. Jennette Vreeland and Kathryn Meisle will be soprano and contralto soloist, respectively. Dr. Ernst Wolff will accompany recitatives on the harpsichord.

ZIT'S
NEW YORK, N. Y.

[illegible] 1937

C. A. ELLIS, 81, manager of operatic singers and who was the first director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at the Ritz Carlton Hotel, Boston, on March 14.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 2 1 1937

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a Good Friday performance of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in Boston. The orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the following soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, Kathryn Meisle, Keith Falkner, John Priebe, Fritz Lechner and V. Ernst Wolff.

8 THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE ● March 21/37

KOUSSEVITZKY

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is internationally acknowledged one of the greatest conductors in the world today. Son of north Russia, born in Tver, July 26, 1874, he led a village orchestra before he was in his 'teens; studied the double-bass at the former St Petersburg Conservatory; became famous in Europe as a virtuoso of that enormous instrument. Early in his career as conductor, he took his own orchestra 2000 miles up the Volga River by steamboat, astonishing the natives with symphonic music. Leaving Russia after the Soviets had seized power, he established the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. London knew him in 1924, and in the Fall of that year he came to Boston. His present season here is his 13th, the longest unbroken term in the history of the Boston Symphony. Stickler for orchestral finesse and discipline, he is firm in a belief that audiences should hear unusual modern music whether or not he happens to like it himself. He always appears at rehearsal swathed against cold in a now famous dark blue cloak, which he also dons the moment he leaves the stage at concerts. He and his wife, Mme Nathalie Koussevitzky, applied for United States citizenship in Boston Oct 31, 1935. He has brought forward a goodly amount of new music by American composers, but maintains faith in the classic and romantic repertory. Critics have spoken especially of the gorgeous tone which he produces from his string choirs. He presents a marvelously graceful, well-tailored figure on the stage. He works himself mercilessly throughout the season, and cannot tolerate stupidity, carelessness or lack of effort from his men. A genuine leader, he does not hesitate to praise when some detail has been played especially well. He lives in Brookline. A Boston terrier named Droll is an important member of the menage.

Photos by M. Robert Rogers

"IT'S YOUR CUE." The conductor signals an entrance to the horns, perched high in the back row of the orchestra.

A CONDUCTOR'S gestures are to remind players of details worked out at rehearsals. Nor is this accomplished only with hands and arms. Facial expressions are sometimes more significant.

"SOFTER—MUCH SOFTER!" A conductor must listen every instant to preserve the nicest balance of tone. Dr Koussevitzky's ear is very, very sharp. The woodwinds are probably blowing a shade too loud.

MARCH 21, 1937

DOING three things at once: asking the strings to play more softly (left hand); beating time (right hand), and reading the score.

"LOUDER, PLEASE," addressed probably to the cellos.

CLOSELY WATCHING the score in an intricate passa Dr Koussevitzky beats time with his right hand, and wit left indicates—to a woodwind or brass—a precise entra

DR KOUSSEVITZKY is an extremely graceful conductor. See how delicately he holds his short baton. It's almost as much pleasure just to watch him as it is to listen.

March 21/37

KOUSSEVITZKY

DR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is internationally acknowledged one of the greatest conductors in the world today. Son of north Russia, born in Tver, July 26, 1874, he led a village orchestra before he was in his 'teens; studied the double-bass at the former St Petersburg Conservatory; became famous in Europe as a virtuoso of that enormous instrument. Early in his career as conductor, he took his own orchestra 2000 miles up the Volga River by steamboat, astonishing the natives with symphonic music. Leaving Russia after the Soviets had seized power, he established the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris London knew him in 1924, and in the Fall of that year he came to Boston. His present season here is his 13th, the longest unbroken term in the history of the Boston Symphony. Stickler for orchestral finesse and discipline, he is firm in a belief that audiences should hear unusual modern music whether or not he happens to like it himself. He always appears at rehearsal swathed against cold in a now famous dark blue cloak, which he also dons the moment he leaves the stage at concerts. He and his wife, Mme Nathalie Koussevitzky, applied for United States citizenship in Boston Oct 31, 1935. He has brought forward a goodly amount of new music by American composers, but maintains faith in the classic and romantic repertory. Critics have spoken especially of the gorgeous tone which he produces from his string choirs. He presents a marvelously graceful, well-tailored figure on the stage. He works himself mercilessly throughout the season, and cannot tolerate stupidity, carelessness or lack of effort from his men. A genuine leader, he does not hesitate to praise when some detail has been played especially well. He lives in Brookline. A Boston terrier named Droll is an important member of the menage.

Photos by M. Robert Rogers

"IT'S YOUR CUE." The conductor signals an entrance to the horns, perched high in the back row of the orchestra.

A CONDUCTOR'S gestures are to remind players of details worked out at rehearsals. Nor is this accomplished only with hands and arms. Facial expressions are sometimes more significant.

"SOFTER—MUCH SOFTER!" A conductor must listen every instant to preserve the nicest balance of tone. Dr Koussevitzky's ear is very, very sharp. The woodwinds are probably blowing a shade too loud.

MARCH 21, 1937

"LOUDER, PLEASE," addressed probably to the cellos.

CLOSELY WATCHING the score in an intricate pass
Dr Koussevitzky beats time with his right hand, and wit left indicates—to a woodwind or brass—a precise entra

DOING three things at once: asking the strings to play more softly (left hand); beating time (right hand), and reading the score.

DR KOUSSEVITZKY is an extremely graceful conductor. See how delicately he holds his short baton. It's almost as much pleasure just to watch him as it is to listen.

9

BOSTON'S great conductor knows most of his scores by heart, but he does not trust entirely to memory. It is a mark of his meticulous musicianship that he consults the score from time to time to insure exactitude of directing.

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE
[illegible]

MUSICAL FESTIVAL NEARING REALITY

Gift Of Estate In Massachusetts And Last Summer's Success Spurs Musician Onward

New York (AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "The American Salzburg," or the "Brayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat wierd violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

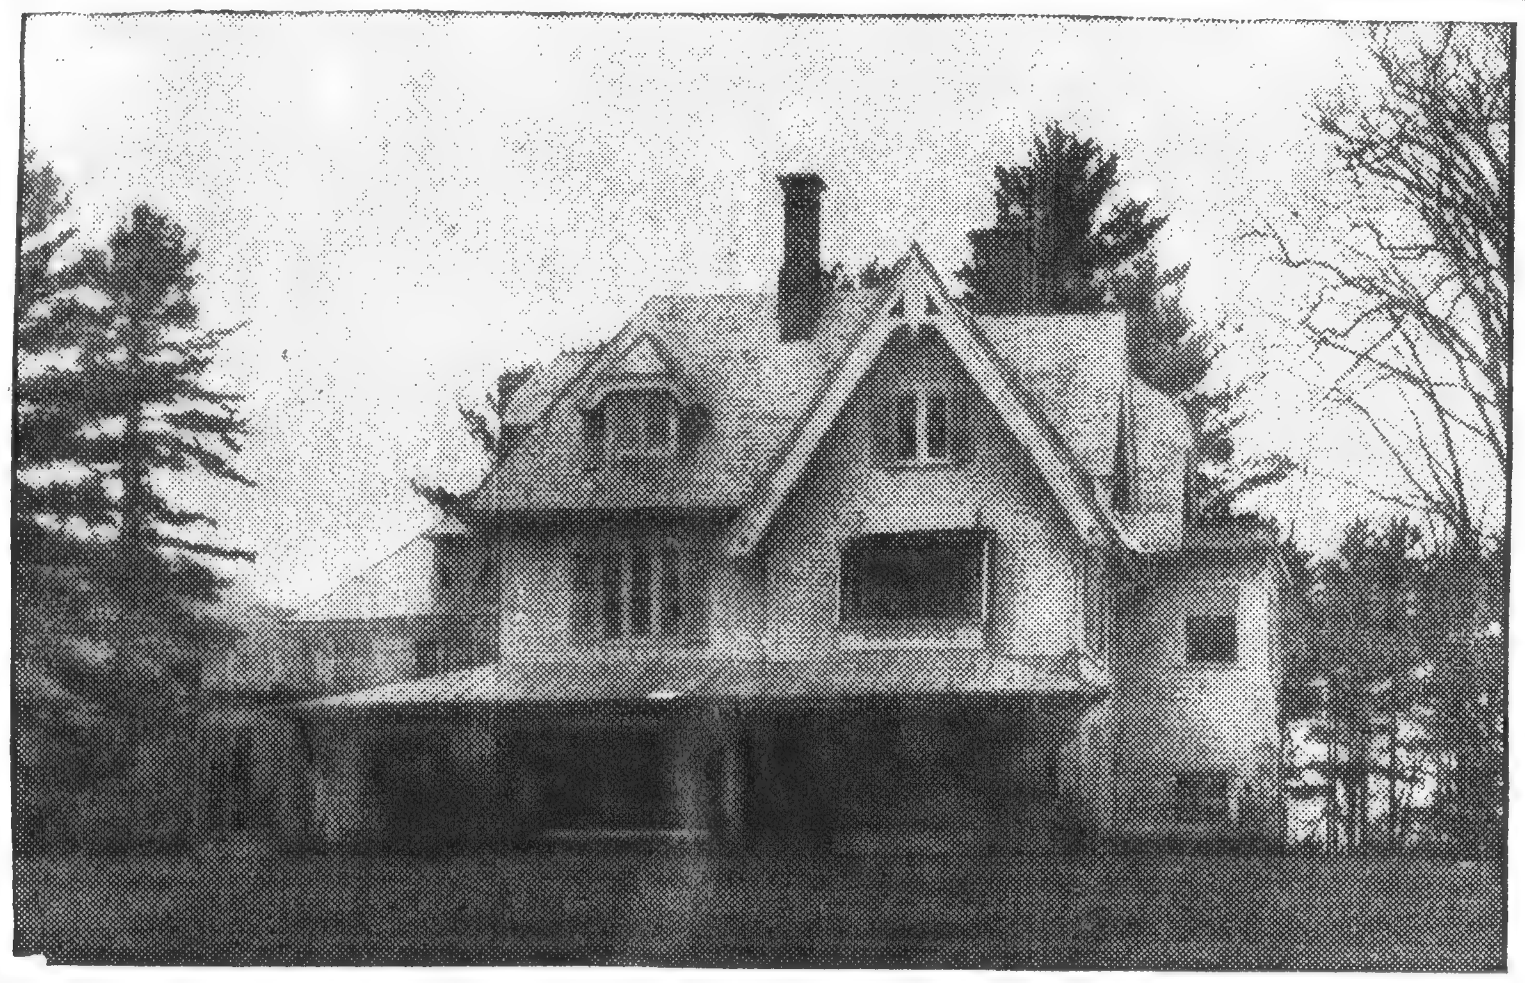
Dr. Koussevitzky means you wont need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAR 18 1937

BARRE, VT.
TIMES
MAR 23 1937

Famed Estate Is New Summer Home For Symphony

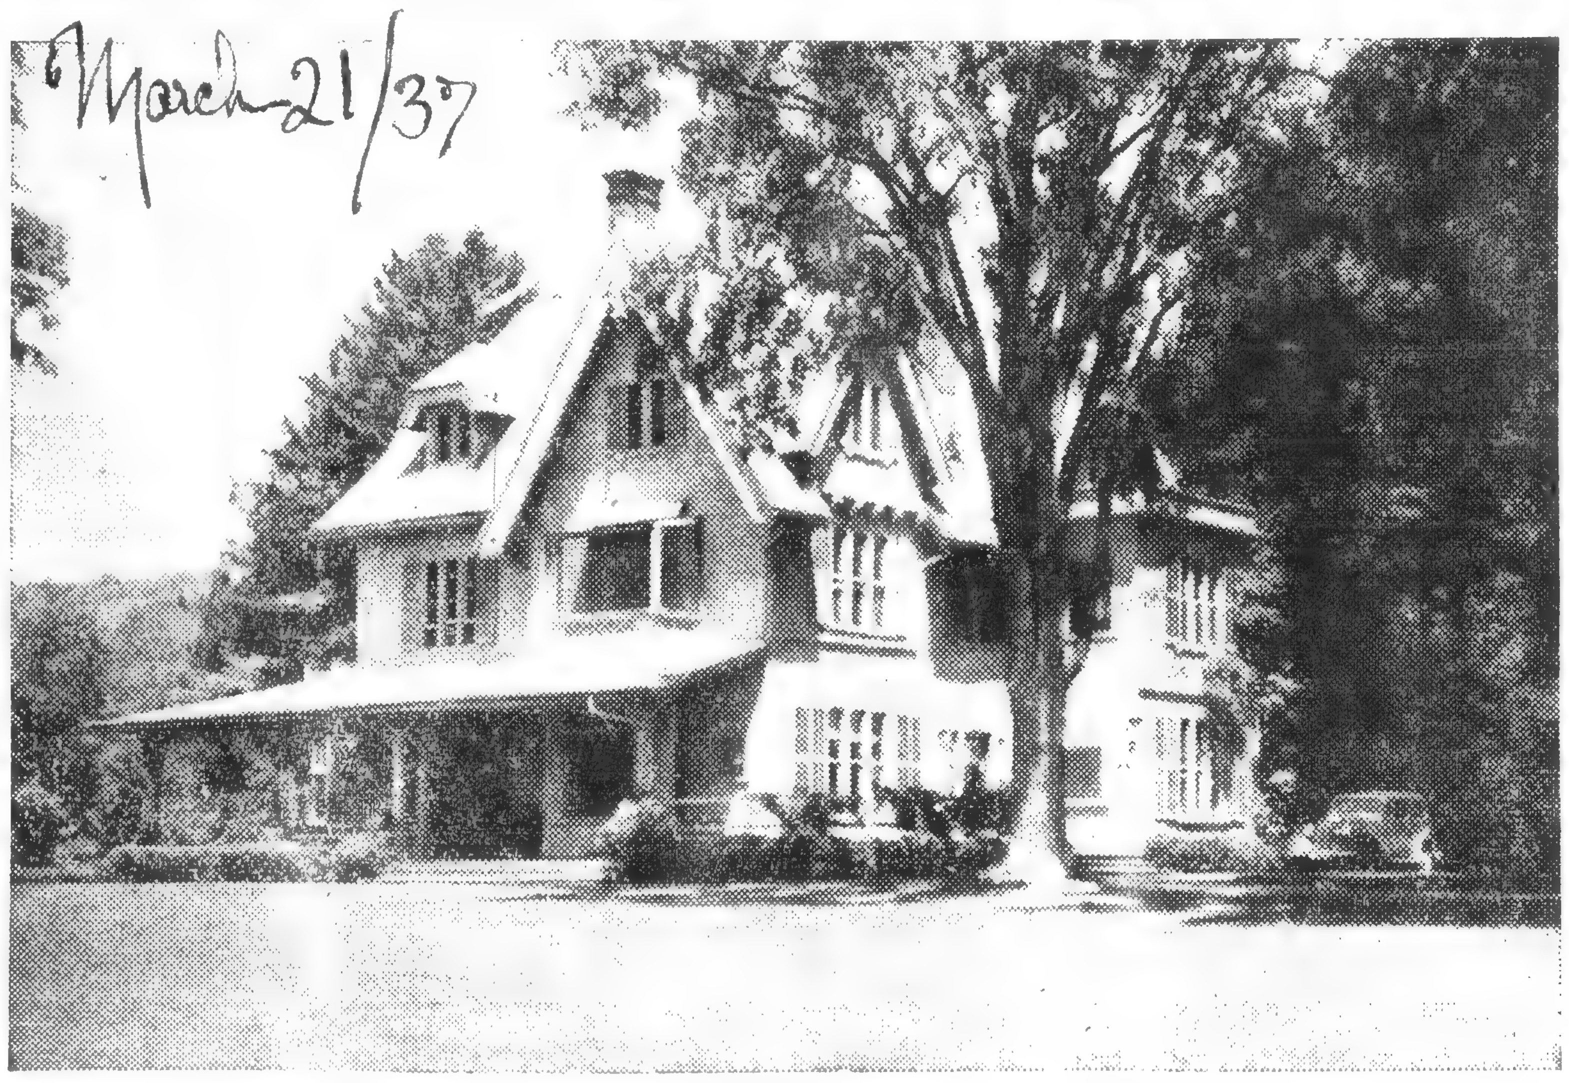
Famed Estate Is New Summer Home For Symphony



On this Berkshire estate near Stockbridge, Mass., where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "Tanglewood Tales", the Boston Symphony Orchestra will in the future conduct its summer festival. The 210-acre estate, called "Tanglewood", has been accepted by trustees of the orchestra as a gift. (AP)

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY UNION AND REPUBLICAN. SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

March 21/37



PRESENT HOUSE WILL BE GENERAL HEADQUARTERS

the opportunity to double the rapturous delights that music induces as the listening eye wanders toward the hills and the lake of which Hawthorne wrote: "It gleamed in glassy tranquility without the trace of a winged breeze on any part of its bosom."

ern dishes are taboo. On a warm day, a door to the right of the fireplace will stand open, giving a glimpse of one of the best architectural features of the house. The door stands open upon a flagstone patio with low-arched roof—a sheltered corner in winter, and in summer a delightful resting place, with its wide view over fields and orchards. The patio also forms the entrance to the kitchen, the back ell of the house.

Smaller than the other rooms, th kitchen space is largely occupied by he field stone chimney that juts ou lmost to the center, and forms nearl he entire wall. A huge Dutch ove till in use, is large enough for the ooking of an old-time Thanksgiving r Christmas dinner, with the piece de resistance of roast suckling pig, and several turkeys on the side.

A Pennsylvania Dutch cupboard contains on its glass shelves the "everyday" dishes—such as collectors travel many miles to acquire. A set of milk-glass plates and goblets, Majolica ware, and fine old Staffordshire pieces.

Throughout the house, doors are hung on hand-forged hinges, both butterfly and heart-and-arrow shapes, with hand-forged nails; the frames and panels put together with wooden pegs. Probably the forging was done in the cellar smithy at a time when the ring of the anvil long antedated the ring of the house telephone.

Oaken beams, rafters and floors, darkly seasoned with age, give the rooms that ancient character so markedly different from flat and characterless walls and ceilings. Upstairs, too, the solidity of the structure is seen in the great timbers of the roofing, and in the big stone fireplace of the main chamber. The attic, the odd "jogs," corners, and passage ways both upstairs and down, must have been a delight to generations of children for playing hide-and-seek.

Bishopgate is a charming old country home. But it is very much more than that. Authentically restored, it is one of the best examples of early 18th century architecture in New England. Unspoiled by any touch of "modernizing" it retains and preserves that aspect and atmosphere of Colonial times that we associate with far-off days of America's stirring and romantic past.

YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 2[illegible] 1937

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, will conduct his Third symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this Friday and Saturday, in Boston. The work received its première in Rochester, N. Y., earlier this season.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
MAR 20 1937

Famed Estate Home For Symphony

with pictures like above.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
MAR 19 1937

SIX CONCERTS ON SCHEDULE FOR FESTIVAL

Director of Berkshire Enterprise States His Objectives

New York—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg," or the "Beyreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Doctor Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat wierd violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Doctor Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Doctor Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music grow up," says Doctor Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Doctor Koussevitsky, "quite free from all commercial aspects." This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Doctor Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 21 [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The matinee of the twentieth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall will be given next Thursday at 2:30, instead of Friday, in order that it may not fall upon Good Friday. Serge Koussevitzky announces the following programs for the concerts of Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major for solo Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, K. 543; and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major. The solo parts in the andenburg Concerto will be taken Messers. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet Mager. The Symphony of Beeven has not been performed in series of concerts for a number ears.

9

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
MAR 18 1937

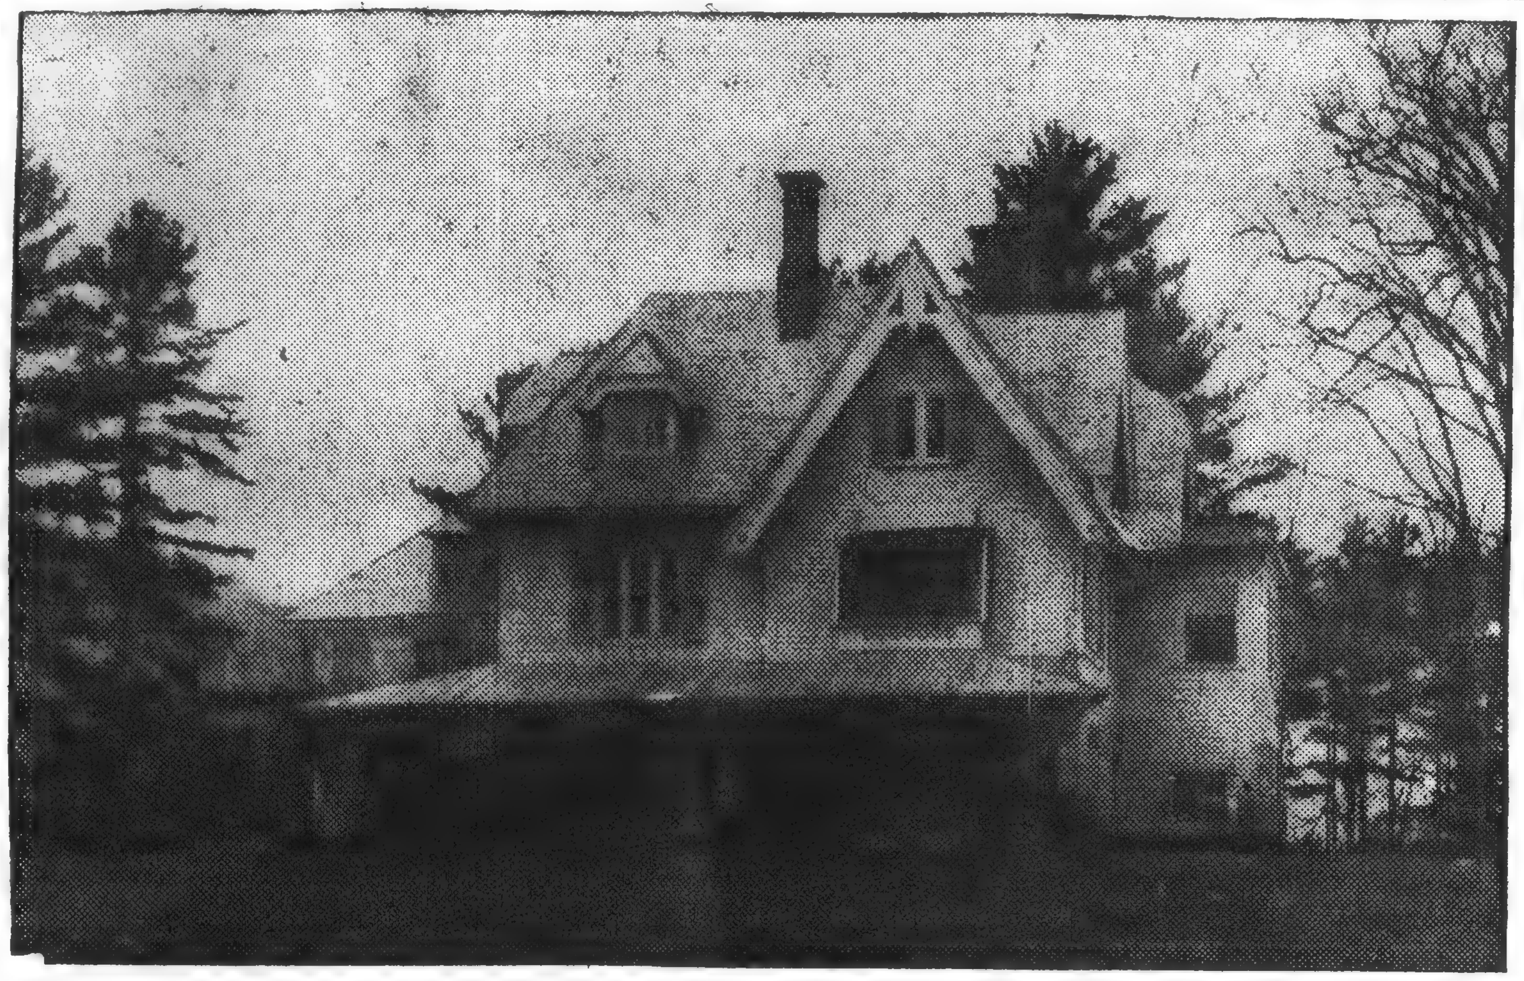
BARRE, VT.
TIMES
MAR 23 1937

Famed Estate Is New Summer Home For Symphony

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
MAR 19 1937

BOSTON'S great conductor knows most of his scores by heart, but he does not trust entirely to memory. It is a mark of his meticulous musicianship that he consults the score from time to time to insure exactitude of directing.

Famed Estate Is New Summer Home For Symphony



On this Berkshire estate near Stockbridge, Mass., where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "Tanglewood Tales", the Boston Symphony Orchestra will in the future conduct its summer festival. The 210-acre estate, called "Tanglewood", has been accepted by trustees of the orchestra as a gift. (AP)

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY UNION AND REPUBLICAN. SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

March 21/37

PRESENT HOUSE WILL BE GENERAL HEADQUARTERS

the opportunity to double the rapturous delights that music induces as the listening eye wanders toward the hills and the lake of which Hawthorne wrote: "It gleamed in glassy tranquility without the trace of a winged breeze on any part of its bosom."

ern dishes are taboo. On a warm day, a door to the right of the fireplace will stand open, giving a glimpse of one of the best architectural features of the house. The door stands open upon a flagstone patio with low-arched roof—a sheltered corner in winter, and in summer a delightful resting place, with its wide view over fields and orchards. The patio also forms the entrance to the kitchen, the back ell of the house.

Smaller than the other rooms, the kitchen space is largely occupied by he field stone chimney that juts out lmost to the center, and forms nearly he entire wall. A huge Dutch oven, till in use, is large enough for the ooking of an old-time Thanksgiving r Christmas dinner, with the piece de resistance of roast suckling pig, and several turkeys on the side.

A Pennsylvania Dutch cupboard contains on its glass shelves the "everyday" dishes—such as collectors travel many miles to acquire. A set of milk-glass plates and goblets, Majolica ware, and fine old Staffordshire pieces.

Throughout the house, doors are hung on hand-forged hinges, both butterfly and heart-and-arrow shapes, with hand-forged nails; the frames and panels put together with wooden pegs. Probably the forging was done in the cellar smithy at a time when the ring of the anvil long antedated the ring of the house telephone.

Oaken beams, rafters and floors, darkly seasoned with age, give the rooms that ancient character so markedly different from flat and characterless walls and ceilings. Upstairs, too, the solidity of the structure is seen in the great timbers of the roofing, and in the big stone fireplace of the main chamber. The attic, the odd "jogs," corners, and passage ways both upstairs and down, must have been a delight to generations of children for playing hide-and-seek.

Bishopgate is a charming old country home. But it is very much more than that. Authentically restored, it is one of the best examples of early 18th century architecture in New England. Unspoiled by any touch of "modernizing" it retains and preserves that aspect and atmosphere of Colonial times that we associate with far-off days of America's stirring and romantic past.

SIX CONCERTS ON SCHEDULE FOR FESTIVAL

Director of Berkshire Enterprise States His Objectives

New York—(AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg," or the "Beyreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Doctor Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat wierd violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Doctor Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Doctor Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music grow up," says Doctor Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Doctor Koussevitsky, "quite free from all commercial aspects." This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Doctor Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE
MAR 19 1937

MUSICAL FESTIVAL NEARING REALITY

Gift Of Estate In Massachusetts And Last Summer's Success Spurs Musician Onward

New York (AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "The American Salzburg," or the "Brayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, while preparing himself for the ordeal of introducing the late Alban Berg's somewhat wierd violin concerto to New York," that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe, and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, and even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you wont need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 21 1937

Nicolai Berezowsky, composer and violinist, will conduct his Third symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this Friday and Saturday, in Boston. The work received its première in Rochester, N. Y., earlier this season.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL
MAR 20 1937

Famed Estate Home For Symphony

with picture like above

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 21 1937

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

The matinee of the twentieth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall will be given next Thursday at 2:30, instead of Friday, in order that it may not fall upon Good Friday. Serge Koussevitzky announces the following programs for the concerts of Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening: Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major for solo Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, K. 543; and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major. The solo parts in the ndenburg Concerto will be taken Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet Mager. The Symphony of Beeven has not been performed in series of concerts for a number ears.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 2 1 1937

Tanglewood in the Berkshires Future Setting for All-American Festival

(Photo by Bachrach)

National Music Center Benefiting New England Visioned as Possibility

By MADELINE BALL

CORDS ARE struck for a great American festival to be held annually in the Berkshire hills. The gift of Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra for summer headquarters and to the Berkshire Symphonic festival for a permanent home forecasts what, if the visions of the [illegible] reali[illegible]

TANGLEWOOD VISTA

wood, across whose 210 acres runs the boundary line of Lenox and Stockbridge; to adapt hotels and boarding houses to accommodate the thousands who will come hither for the event; such is the scale of planning of the Berkshire Symphonic festival.

Music Lovers Tuning In

Already music [illegible]

members. The non-profit making nature of the organization enables season tickets to be offered at such low prices that it is expected that the average of 5000 attendance at last year's three concerts will be surpassed in the six concerts to be given this summer. Membership, [illegible] selection of [illegible] until May 1 for tickets [illegible] three or six [illegible] the gardens, the moonlight filtering through the tree tops, a panorama, away and beyond, of one of the most beautiful areas in the Berkshires, looking toward Stockbridge Bowl and Mt Everett, second highest peak in the state.

DR KOUSSEVITZKY CHARMED WITH SYMPHONY'S NEW SUMMER HOME

Three sites have been suggested for the [illegible] one near the east line of [illegible] property about the center of the gentle slope, another [illegible] the house close to the [illegible] locations for the new building, detailed plans for which will adapt it to the setting. "Wonderful," he exclaimed when his eyes took in the broad expanse of the estate made famous for Nathaniel Hawthorne's short residence of two years where in a little red cottage near the [illegible] since [illegible] "The House of Seven Gables" and "Tanglewood Tales." "We make beautiful [illegible]," he promised [illegible] probably, 75 years ago. What was formerly a tennis court has been converted into a rose garden entrance to which is through a concrete arch and ornamental iron gate which came from a garden in Italy. Bordering the Hawthorne street side of the property stands a privet hedge 10 to 12 feet high, interspersed with hemlock.

[illegible] grounds run down to the shore [illegible] lake, by whose waters [illegible] has had the [illegible] summer tourist trade and the festival influx would make an almost year-round proposition.

Within 50 miles of the festival center conditions would feel the influence; business in shops, gas stations, food stores, transportation, employment in general would pick up, Miss Smith paints a picture that stirs the imagination. Springfield and other cities could establish inexpensive bus lines to accommodate would-be festival [illegible]

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
MAR 2 1 1937

Old World Charm In Situation

Project Brought Nearer by Home for Boston Symphony

By JOHN SELBY

NEW YORK, March 20 (AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most-cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

E. T. L.
(Like article on preceding pages.)

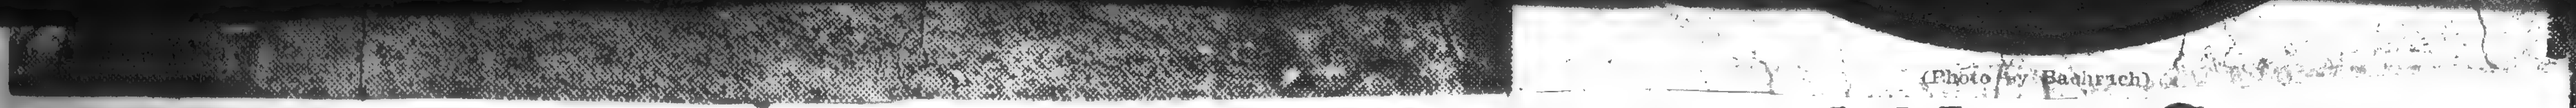
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
MAR 2 4 1937

Koussevitzky Would Increase Festival Scope

Schedule Six Concerts Next August in Berkshires; Gift of Estate

By JOHN SELBY

New York, March 24 (AP).—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American Music Festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.



(Photo by Bachrach)

National Music Center Benefiting New England Visioned as Possibility

tival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

By MADELINE BALL

CORDS ARE struck for a great American festival to be held annually in the Berkshire hills. The gift of Tanglewood to the Boston Symphony orchestra for summer headquarters and to the Berkshire Symphonic festival for a permanent home forecasts what, if the visions of the sponsors become reality, may develop into a national summer music center; a focus of symphonic activity that will tempt erstwhile travelers to European festivals to tarry in New England; that will attract visitors from all over the country to plan a New England trip during summer festival weeks; that will radiate overtones of business activity around a 100-mile circle from the Berkshire hills.

To develop a music festival that will be distinctly American; to broaden its scope, for a festival grows with the years, to include in the future other forms of music beside the symphony; perhaps, for instance, to develop an all New England chorus; to encourage town and city planning in the vicinity and within a 50-mile radius of Tanglewood, across whose 210 acres runs the boundary line of Lenox and Stockbridge; to adapt hotels and boarding houses to accommodate the thousands who will come hither for the event; such is the scale of planning of the Berkshire Symphonic festival.

TANGLEWOOD VISTA

Music Lovers Tuning In

Already music lovers are tuning in to the general scheme. Options are reported to have been taken for the coming summer on several homes in Berkshire in anticipation of the festival. Three pieces of property are said to have been sold mainly because of the forthcoming permanent location of the festival in the hills. One party has canceled plans for summering in Europe, intending to take in one of the festivals on the Continent, and decided, instead, to come to the Berkshires for the first two weeks of August to hear the Boston Symphony's two series of concerts which will be given on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday of the two weekends of the 5th to 8th and 12th to 15th. Over 40 of the 80 boxes that will be available are already sold. Literature sent out to old subscribers has already brought in 500 sustaining members. The non-profit making nature of the organization enables season tickets to be offered at such low prices that it is expected that the average of 5000 attendance at last year's three concerts will be surpassed in the six concerts to be given this summer. Membership, including the privilege of selection of seats, is open until May 1 for tickets to either three or six concerts, after which date they will be offered at a slightly higher price.

"Wonderful," Says Koussevitzky

Dr Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the orchestra during the festival, came to the Berkshires last weekend with Madame Koussevitzky and members of the orchestra board of trustees. They plowed through the snow around Tanglewood on Monday morning, viewing possible sites for the erection of what the French would call a "baraque," a convertible concert hall seating 5000, with a permanent roof and sides that open so that in good weather the music will be practically outdoors—the delight of orchestral harmony enhanced by the soughing of the wind through the aged hemlocks, the play of the sunlight on the gardens, the moonlight filtering through the tree tops, a panorama, away and beyond, of one of the most beautiful areas in the Berkshires, looking toward Stockbridge Bowl and Mt Everett, second highest peak in the state.

(Herbert Studio)

THE SPRING FLOWER SHOW

DR KOUSSEVITZKY CHARMED WITH SYMPHONY'S NEW SUMMER HOME

Three sites have been suggested for the concert hall: one near the east line of the property about the center of the gentle slope, another just north of the house close to the formal garden, a third, the open field east of the house by the Hawthorne street entrance. A meeting will be held the first part of April to settle on location and decide on building plans.

Dr Koussevitzky appeared entranced with each of the possible locations for the new building, detailed plans for which will adapt it to the setting. "Wonderful," he exclaimed when his eyes took in the broad expanse of the estate made famous for Nathaniel Hawthorne's short residence of two years where in a little red cottage near the lake, since burned, he wrote "The House of Seven Gables" and "Tanglewood Tales." "We make beautiful music here," he promised. "Festivals of music grow on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of the Berkshires in the summer time. While symphonic music will be largely the basis of the festival, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of other forms of music with the orchestra. An effort will be made to make the festival fit the interests and desires of American music lovers."

FORMAL GARDEN WILL

It was the promise of more adequate concert quarters than last year's tent on the Emerson estate at Holmwood, where three memorable programs were given, that induced the orchestra to schedule the coming six concerts. Interested patrons—and there are many enthusiasts of the project—are sought as subscribers to a building fund for the new structure which it is important to get under construction this spring.

Old Buildings Will be Used

Use will be found for the present buildings of the Tanglewood estate. In the house, of the typical valley-roof architecture of the post-Civil war period, will be arranged a suite of rest rooms for Dr Koussevitzky; also here will probably be placed the press rooms. The garage can be used temporarily by orchestra members as a tuning room and general lounge. Its seven rooms and hay loft adapt it to general utility purposes.

POSSIBLE SITE FOR CONCERT HALL LOOKS TOWARD STOCKBRIDGE BOWL

BE LEFT UNTOUCHED

Tanglewood as an estate was assembled in 1849 when William Aspinwall Tappan, wealthy Boston banker and merchant, bought several pieces of property. It is the oldest estate in Berkshire with the exception of its adjoining neighbor, the William Norton Bullard place called Highwood. Distinctive features of the landscaping, include the formal garden west of the house with its two richly decorated fountains. The grounds are entered from the West-street side through an avenue of cathedral pines removed from nearby forests and planted, probably, 75 years ago. What was formerly a tennis court has been converted into a rose garden entrance to which is through a concrete arch and ornamental iron gate which came from a garden in Italy. Bordering the Hawthorne street side of the property stands a privet hedge 10 to 12 feet high, interspersed with hemlock.

The grounds run down to the shore of Mahkeenac lake, by whose waters the Lenox brotherhood has had the privilege of establishing its summer community center. Here by the lake stands what is believed to be the largest birch in Berkshire. Ten feet, six inches in diameter, it grows up through what was an old Indian fireplace when Stockbridge Indians held camp here by the water's edge under the leadership of Chief Konkapot.

One can picture social life of Lenox and Stockbridge centering at Tanglewood in the gay nineties led by Tappan's two daughters, Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan now of Brookline and one of the two donors of the estate, and her sister, who became Mrs Richard C. Rixey, and whose daughter, Rosamond, is the present Mrs Gorham Brooks, codonor of the estate with her aunt, whose love of music and interest in Berkshire led to the presentation.

Three Years' Prelude

Symphony at Tanglewood will echo in an environment well accustomed to art and culture and rich in tradition, a fitting setting for an American festival center. Its prelude was sounded three years ago, when in 1934 the Boston Symphony orchestra played its first series of summer concerts in the Berkshires on the Hanna estate under the leadership of Henry Hadley. Repetition followed the next year. Last year when Dr Koussevitzky led the orchestra at Holmwood, enthusiasm leaped to the unexpected hights that resulted in the formulation of plans for permanence.

Visit Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., and you get a vision of the possibilities that open ahead in the creation of an American festival in New England. Miss Smith, dynamic, idealistic and practical, divides her time between her home in New York city and her farm in Glendale, a few miles from Tanglewood. She foresees the festival national in character but with definite and beneficial local repercussions. Why not the intelligent planning that will embrace a larger compass than the summer music fest? Why not enlarge the plans for housing, feeding and transporting the thousands who will come to the festival to include inducements to make the Berkshires the focal point for fall sight seeing of the gorgeous coloring of the hills' autumn foliage? This, with winter skiing (in any normal winter), with summer tourist trade and the festival influx would make an almost year-round proposition.

Within 50 miles of the festival center conditions would feel the influence; business in shops, gas stations, food stores, transportation, employment in general would pick up. Miss Smith paints a picture that stirs the imagination. Springfield and other cities could establish inexpensive bus lines to accommodate would-be festival goers who have no automobiles. New roads might be built connecting remoter regions by direct route. Extensive plans could be worked out to provide refreshment to crowds. Make it possible for families and groups to go easily to the festival. Let them combine music with a day's outing in the hills, with rest, relaxation, exploration as moods prefer.

With the increasing use of airplanes even those living at more than driving distance from Tanglewood can commute to the concerts if foreseeing business heads will make provision. Day and night, literally, during the press of festival business in the past three years, has Miss Smith worked, together with others of the trustees, to put the thing across. It has been no easy task to complete the prelude so successfully as to lead to present plans of permanence. But she points out that the trustees are merely the leaders who present an opportunity.

Ultimate success now lies with the public, not only the confirmed symphony goers, but the hundreds whose only acquaintance with symphony has been through the radio and victrola and who now have ahead of them the chance to enjoy, informally, the symphony as a living personality, amid the harmonizing environment of Nature. Ahead lies the opportunity to double the rapturous delights that music induces as the listening eye wanders toward the hills and the lake of which Hawthorne wrote: "It gleamed in glassy tranquility without the trace of a winged breeze on any part of its bosom."

12

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 2 1 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS

First Manager of Boston Symphony and His Contribution to Music

By OLIN DOWNES

A FEW close friends attended the funeral services of Charles A. Ellis, the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last Wednesday in the Forest Hills Cemetery near Boston.

The services were as simple and devoid of ostentation as the man who was leaving us. By an oversight on the part of an old friend (not a musician) of Ellis, the services had been scheduled at an hour when the orchestra which he as an executive had established was performing in Symphony Hall. The present manager of that orchestra, George E. Judd, who in the early stages of his career had acted with Ellis in a secretarial capacity, and others of the staff who had worked with him were present; also two members of the orchestra, the older generation, retired, in the person of Daniel Kuntz, and the younger Arthur Fiedler, were there; also a niece of Colonel Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. H. Graham Hawkins; and Geraldine Farrar, who was often with him in his last days, and to whom he had been so true a friend, and a handful of others whose presence connoted intimate personal or professional associations.

* * *

As it developed, the occasion was probably precisely what Charles Ellis would have wished. He was the simplest man in the world, and one of the ablest. Extremely popular and respected in his days of activity, his acquaintances on both sides of the water were numerous, and his friendships stanch as steel. He detested talk of his personal activities and it was impossible to fulsomely flatter him. But he was a prince of companions when he chose to be, and in the best sense of the word a gentleman of Boston, delightful and assured, a man of the world, at home in every city, at ease and on equal terms, simple as his talk and manners were, with leaders in every field of thought or activity.

He was utterly true to his place and his period. Traditions of simplicity, honor, courtliness, hospitality, were typical of his breeding and generation. He abhorred publicity about himself. His conception of power was that of responsibility. Withal, Charles Ellis was exceptionally interested in the passing show, and especially in the personal activities and interests of his friends. He chose to resign from the Boston Symphony at the same time that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, its founder, took leave of its affairs, in the Spring of 1918, and following the catastrophic events of the World War, which included the arrest and incarceration of the conductor to whom both men were greatly devoted and whom they profoundly admired, Dr. Karl Muck, their leader of many years.

Very characteristically, Charles Ellis stood publicly and prominently by the side of Dr. Muck through all of his last tragic days in this country. Others may have differed with this attitude as strongly as Ellis entertained it. That made no difference whatever to him, the truest of friends. Ellis was more than unpopular, he was under a cloud, and lost many friends and much influence by the stand he took at the time. He never flinched, and would not have flinched under torture in his fidelity to one in whose character, motives and art he had complete faith. There never was a truer man or friend, and now that the passions of that war period are past the only memory of the affair, where Charles Ellis is concerned, is honor to him who never hesitated, at any juncture in life, to stand up and be counted.

* * *

It was not for nothing, when Mr. Ellis was offered the directorship of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at a salary just fifteen times the pittance which was all that he would accept for his management of the Boston Symphony, that Colonel Higginson said, "Charley, I can't run the orchestra without you," and "Charley" stayed. Higginson's shrewdness and wisdom in this appointment was proved a thousandfold in the years of Ellis's service.

* * *

Ellis, when the Boston Symphony was founded in 1881, was a business associate of Higginson. In the first three years of the orchestra's existence the manager worked by day in the Calumet and Hecla Company and by night and in odd hours conducted the affairs of the orchestra. His principal support for a time was probably his business activities and private means.

His salary from the Boston Symphony was about enough to pay his traveling expenses, and he would not accept more. Later on he became manager of a few of the greatest artists before the public—at one time of Nordica; then, in the Nineties, of Melba; at about the turn of the century, until his entrance into Polish politics, of Paderewski, who at the time of this writing, is dangerously ill at Morges; after the first months of the World War of Fritz Kreisler, following the latter's retirement, wounded, from the trenches; for a short period, of Mme. Olga Samaroff; from 1916 to 1918, of Rachmaninoff, returned to America for his second visit.

In opera Ellis was active first in a joint company with Dr. Walter Damrosch, later with his own company, of which Nellie Melba was a bright star. She shone, among other rôles, in a then highly novel and provocative music drama called "La Bohème," by a young and rising composer named Puccini. There were such voices and composers. Ellis's last operatic venture, a very successful one, was a tour that he arranged with Geraldine Farrar in "Carmen," and Marie Rappold in "Faust," in the West, in 1915.

He was sought after as manager by most artists of note before the public, for his acumen, far-sightedness, fair dealing and courtesy were proverbial. He had hardly to raise a finger to secure the cooperation of any artist, but he had to be, and he was, firm in refusing many who sought his services. All this, however, was secondary and incidental to that which lay deepest in his heart: fidelity to the institution conceived and brought into being by his friend and employer, Henry L. Higginson—namely, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Ellis's services in the development of that organization can hardly be realized by the rising generation of today, but they lie almost at the root of the growth and the increasing numbers, in the last fifty years, of American orchestras. This is said with full acknowledgment of the priority in the field of New York's Philharmonic Society, of Leopold Damrosch, of Theodore Thomas. They broke the ground and tilled the early soil. They instituted the first conceptions of great symphonic music and great symphonic performances in America. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra was able to take a unique position and exert a unique influence because of the special conditions under which it flourished.

It was permitted to work unremittingly and without interruption by accidents of fortune because of the generosity of Higginson, a real son of New England, who believed in the ideal of the orchestra as he believed in his life, and paid the bills, whatever they were, until the orchestra reached a height that for many years was not attained by any other body in America. There was a perfect balance between artistic objectives which admitted of no compromise, and Ellis's business management, watchful, conservative, and practical, but always subservient to the purposes and requirements of the director of the music.

Today, when other orchestral managements are emulating the example, at least where musical objectives are concerned, of the Boston Symphony, this is an old story. But without the lines of Ellis and Higginson, symphonic standards in this country could not be what they are, and America would not have taken so soon a position in this field which places it in the forefront of every nation of the world where symphonic performance and repertory are concerned. It was with the example of the Boston Symphony in view that other symphony orchestras grew in numbers, and constantly heightened their standards.

The events of the war and the Muck affair, as they affected the Boston Symphony organization, so embittered and discouraged both Ellis and Higginson that they simultaneously relinquished all direct interest in the orchestra's affairs. Probably they despaired of its future. Happily, they were wrong. Happily, they had built so firmly and so much better than even they knew that the institution they had established proved indestructible in the hands of those who had become inculcated with Higginson's and Ellis's ideals. The two managers, William H. Brennan, and George E. Judd, who worked with Ellis, have carried on what he began. The Boston Orchestra has not lost a jot or a tittle of its reputation or its standards. Dr. Koussevitzky's musical organization was born of these ideals and right worthily does it maintain them.

More than Charles Ellis could ever say for himself, more than he would have said under any circumstances, more than he could have known, do these facts say for him. There is pathos but also a glorious affirmation of his life achievement in the last words which escaped his lips when he lay half conscious on his deathbed. They were words of service, and to those who heard the years must have swept back before them. He said, "I must make certain that the music is all ready for the concert."

* * *

The program book of the Boston Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon contained this brief and just tribute:

"CHARLES ADAMS ELLIS
1856-1937

"Charles A. Ellis was chosen by Henry L. Higginson to be the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which position he held without interruption until Mr. Higginson's retirement in 1918, when Mr. Ellis also preferred to retire.

"For himself he asked nothing; for those with whom and for whom he labored he asked everything. Always self-effacing, he habitually minimized his own share in the success of any enterprise, and those who attempted to describe his place in the undertaking were baffled and misled by his reluctance to admit or discuss his own important contribution.

"His clear vision was never marred by jealousy or desire for gain. His courtesy was never failing. Of his constancy and loyalty volumes could be written. Few knew the many sacrifices which he made for the institution to which he was utterly devoted.

"In the founding and organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in making it the perfect instrument which it became, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Higginson worked side by side, in complete understanding and accord. The original idea, the faith in that idea, was entrusted for execution to one in whom there was 'no variableness, neither shadow of turning.'"

LITERARY DIGEST
NEW YORK
MAR 2 0 1937

Music

MAESTRO CAPTURED:

Woman in Coup Signs Greek Conductor for Minneapolis

A little gray lady rode out of the West and carried Dimitri Mitropoulos back to Minneapolis.

Thereby twinkly-eyed Mrs. Carlyle Scott caused great consternation among Eastern concert managers. With much guile, they were attempting to sign Mitropoulos to contracts binding him to conduct the larger, tho little more distinguished, orchestras of the East. Mrs. Scott, Manager of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and beloved of its patrons, got Mitropoulos from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Greek conductor from Athens at the beginning of last season. In his two weeks' stay, Mitropoulos became so popular with Bostonians that he was offered the job of head conductor upon Koussevitzky's projected retirement two years from now. Mitropoulos accepted the appointment and prepared to spend the intervening years guest conducting in the U. S. He also had his own Athens Orchestra of the Conservatory to run and an engagement in Monte Carlo to fill.

Guest Conductors—Then Eugene Ormandy resigned from his conductorship of the Minneapolis Symphony to take over the more lucrative post with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Casting about for some means of replacing Ormandy, the Board of Directors of the Orchestral Association of Minneapolis decided to inaugurate a series of guest conductors.

Mrs. Scott was confronted with the task and persuaded George Judd, Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to share Mitropoulos. In Minneapolis, the Greek conductor conquered immediately.

His platform manner is completely individual. Thin, bald and ascetic-looking, Mitropoulos conducts without score or baton. He quivers with intensity at a difficult passage. When the music demands it, he is soothingly quiet. The men who work under him say his eyes are almost hypnotic as he conducts.

In both Boston and Minneapolis, Mitropoulos conducted a Respighi toccata for piano and orchestra. Playing the piano part himself, he caused The Musical Courier's Minneapolis correspondent to comment that "as soloist and conductor he makes an excellent one-man band."

Only forty-one years old and a bachelor, Mitropoulos is shy and dignified offstage. Even so, he won the love of cameramen and newspaper men by his willingness to fall in with publicity stunts.

Elated by Mitropoulos's immediate success, Mrs. Scott fairly flew back to Boston with a proposition. Would the Boston Orchestra be willing for Mitropoulos to be head conductor of the Minneapolis Orchestra for the next two years? The Boston Orchestra was delighted.

Contract—With Mitropoulos's name on a contract, Mrs. Scott announced that he would begin his first full season on January 1, 1938. Duties in Athens would prevent him from conducting for more than eighteen weeks. A similar arrangement will prevail in 1939. Then he will go to Boston.

Meanwhile, Minneapolis and St. Paul remembered that this was not Mrs. Scott's first coup. A former concert violinist, she is the wife of the head of the Department of Music at the University of Minnesota. In addition to her duties as Manager of the orchestra, Mrs. Scott is Manager of the University Artists Course.

In 1930, Henry Vanbruggher, then conductor of the Minneapolis Orchestra, collapsed on the stage while preparing for the first concert of the season. Mrs. Scott promptly produced Eugene Ormandy. He has since proved the quality she was so early to recognize.

Now, with Dimitri Mitropoulos safe, Mrs. Scott may have another sensation in store. To assist Mitropoulos, she has signed Daniele Amfitheatroff, Russian composer-conductor now living in Italy. Amfitheatroff, a pupil of Respighi, will introduce many of his own compositions to the United States while on tour with the Minneapolis Symphony next season.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
MAR 2 1 1937

Manhattan Musical Events

Serge Koussevitzky Offers A Novelty And Some Revivals In Two Programs By The Boston

Rodzinsky Plays Miaskovsky's Sixth "La Boheme" At The Opera. Werrenrath Sings

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY offered a novelty and some revivals on his two recent programs with the Boston Symphony. The first of these was a Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Alban Berg in which Louis Krasner played the solo part. The work was composed in 1935 at the suggestion of Mr. Krasner and in memory of Manon Gropius whose mother had been the widow of Gustav Mahler. The girl died about that time after a long and agonizing illness which she bore with great fortitude.

Berg's concerto is, in a sense, a requiem. Unfortunately, it is not as great in accomplishment as in intention. It has a direct simplicity but it is the simplicity assumed by a mind that had reveled in the ugliness of "Wozzeck" and the nastiness of "Lulu." It does not, on the whole, seem an important contribution to violin literature nor yet worthy of the large amount of controversy it has stirred up in Europe.

OTHER OFFERINGS

On the other program, he gave Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse," heard some seven or eight years ago, and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." The Liadoff work has become dated. Wagner and Liszt burst forth triumphant from its pages. The composer might have meditated on the fact that one of the charms of the great work from which his title derived is in its orginality expression.

There may be some reason for playing Prokofieff. Possibly it is to make clear how much better so many other contemporary composers are. The suite in question seems scarcely worth the trouble of playing it.

MIASKOVSKY SYMPHONY

Rodzinsky, with the Philharmonic played the sixth symphony of Miaskovsky which he introduced here when guesting with the Philadelphia Orchestra eleven years ago. The composer, now in his middle fifties, has written sixteen symphonies!

The present one is frankly propaganda and as usual, when music is removed from its proper sphere, it suffers. The work is noisy, in places unfocused and has an irritating quality of non-consecutiveness. It may symbolize the Russian Revolution of 1917 as it is said to do. And yet, one cannot entirely dismiss it from one's musical consciousness. It will hardly rival the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" however, in the affections of the average concertgoer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 2 1 1937

CHARLES A. ELLIS

First Manager of Boston Symphony and His Contribution to Music

By OLIN DOWNES

A FEW close friends attended the funeral services of Charles A. Ellis, the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last Wednesday in the Forest Hills Cemetery near Boston.

The services were as simple and devoid of ostentation as the man who was leaving us. By an oversight on the part of an old friend (not a musician) of Ellis, the services had been scheduled at an hour when the orchestra which he as an executive had established was performing in Symphony Hall. The present manager of that orchestra, George E. Judd, who in the early stages of his career had acted with Ellis in a secretarial capacity, and others of the staff who had worked with him were present; also two members of the orchestra, the older generation, retired, in the person of Daniel Kuntz, and the younger Arthur Fiedler, were there; also a niece of Colonel Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. H. Graham Hawkins; and Geraldine Farrar, who was often with him in his last days, and to whom he had been so true a friend, and a handful of others whose presence connoted intimate personal or professional associations.

* * *

As it developed, the occasion was probably precisely what Charles Ellis would have wished. He was the simplest man in the world, and one of the ablest. Extremely popular and respected in his days of activity, his acquaintances on both sides of the water were numerous, and his friendships stanch as steel. He detested talk of his personal activities and it was impossible to fulsomely flatter him. But he was a prince of companions when he chose to be, and in the best sense of the word a gentleman of Boston, delightful and assured, a man of the world, at home in every city, at ease and on equal terms, simple as his talk and manners were, with leaders in every field of thought or activity.

He was utterly true to his place and his period. Traditions of simplicity, honor, courtliness, hospitality, were typical of his breeding and generation. He abhorred publicity about himself. His conception of power was that of responsibility. Withal, Charles Ellis was exceptionally interested in the passing show, and especially in the personal activities and interests of his friends. He chose to resign from the Boston Symphony at the same time that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, its founder, took leave of its affairs, in the Spring of 1918, and following the catastrophic events of the World War, which included the arrest and incarceration of the conductor to whom both men were greatly devoted and whom they profoundly admired, Dr. Karl Muck, their leader of many years.

Very characteristically, Charles Ellis stood publicly and prominently by the side of Dr. Muck through all of his last tragic days in this country. Others may have differed with this attitude as strongly as Ellis entertained it. That made no difference whatever to him, the truest of friends. Ellis was more than unpopular, he was under a cloud, and lost many friends and much influence by the stand he took at the time. He never flinched, and would not have flinched under torture in his fidelity to one in whose character, motives and art he had complete faith. There never was a truer man or friend, and now that the passions of that war period are past the only memory of the affair, where Charles Ellis is concerned, is honor to him who never hesitated, at any juncture in life, to stand up and be counted.

* * *

It was not for nothing, when Mr. Ellis was offered the directorship of the Metropolitan Opera Company, at a salary just fifteen times the pittance which was all that he would accept for his management of the Boston Symphony, that Colonel Higginson said, "Charley, I can't run the orchestra without you," and "Charley" stayed. Higginson's shrewdness and wisdom in this appointment was proved a thousandfold in the years of Ellis's service.

* * *

Ellis, when the Boston Symphony was founded in 1881, was a business associate of Higginson. In the first three years of the orchestra's existence the manager worked by day in the Calumet and Hecla Company and by night and in odd hours conducted the affairs of the orchestra. His principal support for a time was probably his business activities and private means.

His salary from the Boston Symphony was about enough to pay his traveling expenses, and he would not accept more. Later on he became manager of a few of the greatest artists before the public—at one time of Nordica; then, in the Nineties, of Melba; at about the turn of the century, until his entrance into Polish politics, of Paderewski, who at the time of this writing, is dangerously ill at Morges; after the first months of the World War of Fritz Kreisler, following the latter's retirement, wounded, from the trenches; for a short period, of Mme. Olga Samaroff; from 1916 to 1918, of Rachmaninoff, returned to America for his second visit.

In opera Ellis was active first in a joint company with Dr. Walter Damrosch, later with his own company, of which Nellie Melba was a bright star. She shone, among other rôles, in a then highly novel and provocative music drama called "La Bohème," by a young and rising composer named Puccini. There were such voices and composers. Ellis's last operatic venture, a very successful one, was a tour that he arranged with Geraldine Farrar in "Carmen," and Marie Rappold in "Faust," in the West, in 1915.

He was sought after as manager by most artists of note before the public, for his acumen, far-sightedness, fair dealing and courtesy were proverbial. He had hardly to raise a finger to secure the cooperation of any artist, but he had to be, and he was, firm in refusing many who sought his services. All this, however, was secondary and incidental to that which lay deepest in his heart: fidelity to the institution conceived and brought into being by his friend and employer, Henry L. Higginson—namely, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Ellis's services in the development of that organization can hardly be realized by the rising generation of today, but they lie almost at the root of the growth and the increasing numbers, in the last fifty years, of American orchestras. This is said with full acknowledgment of the priority in the field of New York's Philharmonic Society, of Leopold Damrosch, of Theodore Thomas. They broke the ground and tilled the early soil. They instituted the first conceptions of great symphonic music and great symphonic performances in America. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra was able to take a unique position and exert a unique influence because of the special conditions under which it flourished.

It was permitted to work unremittingly and without interruption by accidents of fortune because of the generosity of Higginson, a real son of New England, who believed in the ideal of the orchestra as he believed in his life, and paid the bills, whatever they were, until the orchestra reached a height that for many years was not attained by any other body in America. There was a perfect balance between artistic objectives which admitted of no compromise, and Ellis's business management, watchful, conservative, and practical, but always subservient to the purposes and requirements of the director of the music.

Today, when other orchestral managements are emulating the example, at least where musical objectives are concerned, of the Boston Symphony, this is an old story. But without the lines of Ellis and Higginson, symphonic standards in this country could not be what they are, and America would not have taken so soon a position in this field which places it in the forefront of every nation of the world where symphonic performance and repertory are concerned. It was with the example of the Boston Symphony in view that other symphony orchestras grew in numbers, and constantly heightened their standards.

The events of the war and the Muck affair, as they affected the Boston Symphony organization, so embittered and discouraged both Ellis and Higginson that they simultaneously relinquished all direct interest in the orchestra's affairs. Probably they despaired of its future. Happily, they were wrong. Happily, they had built so firmly and so much better than even they knew that the institution they had established proved indestructible in the hands of those who had become inculcated with Higginson's and Ellis's ideals. The two managers, William H. Brennan, and George E. Judd, who worked with Ellis, have carried on what he began. The Boston Orchestra has not lost a jot or a tittle of its reputation or its standards. Dr. Koussevitzky's musical organization was born of these ideals and right worthily does it maintain them.

More than Charles Ellis could ever say for himself, more than he would have said under any circumstances, more than he could have known, do these facts say for him. There is pathos but also a glorious affirmation of his life achievement in the last words which escaped his lips when he lay half conscious on his deathbed. They were words of service, and to those who heard the years must have swept back before them. He said, "I must make certain that the music is all ready for the concert."

* * *

The program book of the Boston Symphony concerts of last night and Friday afternoon contained this brief and just tribute:

"CHARLES ADAMS ELLIS
1856-1937

"Charles A. Ellis was chosen by Henry L. Higginson to be the first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which position he held without interruption until Mr. Higginson's retirement in 1918, when Mr. Ellis also preferred to retire.

"For himself he asked nothing; for those with whom and for whom he labored he asked everything. Always self-effacing, he habitually minimized his own share in the success of any enterprise, and those who attempted to describe his place in the undertaking were baffled and misled by his reluctance to admit or discuss his own important contribution.

"His clear vision was never marred by jealousy or desire for gain. His courtesy was never failing. Of his constancy and loyalty volumes could be written. Few knew the many sacrifices which he made for the institution to which he was utterly devoted.

"In the founding and organization of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in making it the perfect instrument which it became, Mr. Ellis and Mr. Higginson worked side by side, in complete understanding and accord. The original idea, the faith in that idea, was entrusted for execution to one in whom there was 'no variableness, neither shadow of turning.'"

LITERARY DIGEST
NEW YORK
MAR 2 0 1937

Music

MAESTRO CAPTURED:

Woman in Coup Signs Greek Conductor for Minneapolis

A little gray lady rode out of the West and carried Dimitri Mitropoulos back to Minneapolis.

Thereby twinkly-eyed Mrs. Carlyle Scott caused great consternation among Eastern concert managers. With much guile, they were attempting to sign Mitropoulos to contracts binding him to conduct the larger, tho little more distinguished, orchestras of the East. Mrs. Scott, Manager of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and beloved of its patrons, got Mitropoulos from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky brought the Greek conductor from Athens at the beginning of last season. In his two weeks' stay, Mitropoulos became so popular with Bostonians that he was offered the job of head conductor upon Koussevitzky's projected retirement two years from now. Mitropoulos accepted the appointment and prepared to spend the intervening years guest conducting in the U. S. He also had his own Athens Orchestra of the Conservatory to run and an engagement in Monte Carlo to fill.

Guest Conductors—Then Eugene Ormandy resigned from his conductorship of the Minneapolis Symphony to take over the more lucrative post with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Casting about for some means of replacing Ormandy, the Board of Directors of the Orchestral Association of Minneapolis decided to inaugurate a series of guest conductors.

Mrs. Scott was confronted with the task and persuaded George Judd, Manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to share Mitropoulos. In Minneapolis, the Greek conductor conquered immediately.

His platform manner is completely individual. Thin, bald and ascetic-looking, Mitropoulos conducts without score or baton. He quivers with intensity at a difficult passage. When the music demands it, he is soothingly quiet. The men who work under him say his eyes are almost hypnotic as he conducts.

In both Boston and Minneapolis, Mitropoulos conducted a Respighi toccata for piano and orchestra. Playing the piano part himself, he caused The Musical Courier's Minneapolis correspondent to comment that "as soloist and conductor he makes an excellent one-man band."

Only forty-one years old and a bachelor, Mitropoulos is shy and dignified offstage. Even so, he won the love of cameramen and newspaper men by his willingness to fall in with publicity stunts.

Elated by Mitropoulos's immediate success, Mrs. Scott fairly flew back to Boston with a proposition. Would the Boston Orchestra be willing for Mitropoulos to be head conductor of the Minneapolis Orchestra for the next two years? The Boston Orchestra was delighted.

Contract—With Mitropoulos's name on a contract, Mrs. Scott announced that he would begin his first full season on January 1, 1938. Duties in Athens would prevent him from conducting for more than eighteen weeks. A similar arrangement will prevail in 1939. Then he will go to Boston.

Meanwhile, Minneapolis and St. Paul remembered that this was not Mrs. Scott's first coup. A former concert violinist, she is the wife of the head of the Department of Music at the University of Minnesota. In addition to her duties as Manager of the orchestra, Mrs. Scott is Manager of the University Artists Course.

In 1930, Henry Vanbrugghen, then conductor of the Minneapolis Orchestra, collapsed on the stage while preparing for the first concert of the season. Mrs. Scott promptly produced Eugene Ormandy. He has since proved the quality she was so early to recognize.

Now, with Dimitri Mitropoulos safe, Mrs. Scott may have another sensation in store. To assist Mitropoulos, she has signed Daniele Amfitheatroff, Russian composer-conductor now living in Italy. Amfitheatroff, a pupil of Respighi, will introduce many of his own compositions to the United States while on tour with the Minneapolis Symphony next season.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
MAR 2 1 1937

Manhattan Musical Events

Serge Koussevitzky Offers A Novelty And Some Revivals In Two Programs By The Boston

Rodzinsky Plays Miaskovsky's Sixth "La Boheme" At The Opera. Werrenrath Sings

By JOHN ALAN HAUGHTON

NEW YORK.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY offered a novelty and some revivals on his two recent programs with the Boston Symphony. The first of these was a Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Alban Berg in which Louis Krasner played the solo part. The work was composed in 1935 at the suggestion of Mr. Krasner and in memory of Manon Gropius whose mother had been the widow of Gustav Mahler. The girl died about that time after a long and agonizing illness which she bore with great fortitude.

Berg's concerto is, in a sense, a requiem. Unfortunately, it is not as great in accomplishment as in intention. It has a direct simplicity but it is the simplicity assumed by a mind that had reveled in the ugliness of "Wozzeck" and the nastiness of "Lulu." It does not, on the whole, seem an important contribution to violin literature nor yet worthy of the large amount of controversy it has stirred up in Europe.

OTHER OFFERINGS

On the other program, he gave Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse," heard some seven or eight years ago, and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." The Liadoff work has become dated. Wagner and Liszt burst forth triumphant from its pages. The composer might have meditated on the fact that one of the charms of the great work from which his title derived is in its orginality expression.

There may be some reason for playing Prokofieff. Possibly it is to make clear how much better so many other contemporary composers are. The suite in question seems scarcely worth the trouble of playing it.

MIASKOVSKY SYMPHONY

Rodzinsky, with the Philharmonic, played the sixth symphony of Miaskovsky which he introduced here when guesting with the Philadelphia Orchestra eleven years ago. The composer, now in his middle fifties, has written sixteen symphonies!

The present one is frankly propaganda and as usual, when music is removed from its proper sphere, it suffers. The work is noisy, in places unfocused and has an irritating quality of non-consecutiveness. It may symbolize the Russian Revolution of 1917 as it is said to do. And yet, one cannot entirely dismiss it from one's musical consciousness. It will hardly rival the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" however, in the affections of the average concertgoer.

13

Boston Herald, Mar. 22/37 (Country ed)

Boston Symphony Will Present 'St. Matthew Passion' on Friday

The "St. Matthew Passion" by John Sebastian Bach will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting Good Friday afternoon and continuing through the evening. The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe College Choral Society and six soloists under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will assist. The proceeds will go to the pension fund of the orchestra.

Patrons of the current concerts at Symphony Hall are admiring a pastel of the east window of Princeton University chapel, designed by Charles J. Connick, Boston craftsman in stained glass, and which pictures "The Last Supper." It is nine feet square and is in the Huntington avenue lobby of the hall.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS
MAR 24 1937

It will be learned with interest that Miss Mabel Evans, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Hugh I. Evans of Sawmill rd., will sing with the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe on Good Friday at Symphony hall in Boston, Mass. She will sing in St. Mathaus Passion (Bach) with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Evans, who is a student at Radcliffe, will also sing in New York Radcliffe concert Saturday, April 3, and plans to spend her Easter vacation in that city and in New Haven, Conn.

Hugh I. Evans, jr., who is a student at Princeton, is a member of the Princeton Glee club. He has been selected as one of the members to sing on Good Friday at Kees Gardens, on Long Island, in Brahm's "Requiem."

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 21 1937

MUSIC

Bach's "Passion" Greatest Composition Says Koussevitzky

Boston, March 20.—(AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the past few days, and now believes that the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore had accorded that honor to Beethoven's ninth symphony, with its massive choral passages.

Studied For Concert.

But, he says, renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present next Friday—Good Friday—with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs in symphony hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

"Because the Matthew Passion is the most formidable, the deepest, the great composition in all musical literature."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked if this composition, written in 1729, came as as harp contrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances a week ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

Bach Most Modern.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technique is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years, I suppose it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes, the oratorio will be presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It will start at 4 p. m. with an intermission for dinner about 6 p. m.

Roxbury Citizen

To Give "Passion" On Good Friday

Two of New England's most famous choruses, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, will join with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in giving Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" on Good Friday, March 26. The concert will be given for the benefit of the Orchestra's pension fund.

"The Passion," which is rarely performed, was given for the first time in many years last Spring by the two choruses and the Orchestra. Both the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society are directed by G. Wallace Woodworth who has been drilling the two groups in the difficult piece of music all Winter.

Lead in St. Matthew Passion Sung by British Baritone

Monitor — March 24/37

Although probably as well known in his own country as Lawrence Tibbett is here, Keith Falkner, English bass baritone never has appeared in opera, has just made his first movie and until two or three years ago gave only occasional solo recitals.

Why, then, his renown?

The answer lies in oratorio. For Mr. Falkner is one of England's outstanding oratorio soloists. On the island where every town has a choir which gives two large concerts a year—always one oratorio—success either as a concert or operatic singer comes only after a reputation has been established in the oratorio field. A singer's first engagements are as soloist with such groups.

Reputation Established

Mr. Falkner has established that reputation—so well and widely in fact, that for the past six years he has been coming to the United States to appear as soloist with choral societies and to give concerts. On Friday, he will sing the role of Jesus in Johann Sebastian Bach's "The St. Matthew Passion," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Other soloists are Jeanette Vreeland, well known concert soprano; Kathryn Meisle, Metropolitan Opera contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass. Special solo instruments for the performance are a harpsichord and a viola da gamba.

Mr. Falkner made his first Boston appearance three years ago after Myra Hess, English pianist, urged Dr. Koussevitzky to hear the baritone. Mr. Falkner was in another part of the United States when he received a wire to come immediately to Boston. He did so, and was engaged to sing in the St. John Passion.

Boy Soprano

Mr. Falkner began his musical career at the age of nine by attending New College choir school at Oxford. It is a foundation started in Queen Elizabeth's time, which provides a choir for the Oxford church services. At that time young Falkner was a boy soprano.

"We sang a service a day and received a scholarship in return," he says. "One of the most important parts of the training was to learn to read perfectly at sight."

The choir had only a short rehearsal before services, and the unfortunate child who couldn't read his music was punished severely—in the old-fashioned way.

War Interrupts Career

At 14, Mr. Falkner's voice plummeted down to bass depths. He had stopped musical training, was attending the Perse School in Cambridge, Eng., and was singing in the local choir. Then war came along and although only 17, he joined the naval air force. After demobilization, Sir Hugh Allen, director of the Royal College of Music in London, urged the young man to enter the college. After six years' study, he was engaged in 1925 to sing Parry's "Job" at the Three Choirs Festival in Gloucester, Eng. There followed an increasing number of engagements in Manchester and Liverpool, Eng., Glasgow, Scotland; Dublin, Ireland; London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin and many other towns and cities. In 1929, he made his American début at Town Hall, New York.

"I only stayed five days that time because I was in a hurry to get back to London to be married," he said.

Italians Have Name

Mr. Falkner hesitated when asked whether he preferred being called a bass baritone or a baritone bass.

"There really isn't any word in English which is quite accurate," he said finally. "I am what the Italians call a basso cantante, which is lighter than a basso profundo."

The singer has just finished making "Mayfair Melody," a Warner Brothers English film, in which he plays the rôle of a mechanic who is "discovered" by the boss's daughter. He is under contract to make three more pictures, finds it "terribly hard work, but an enjoyable relief from singing 12 or 14 performances of the 'Messiah' as I do at Christmas time." Besides film ventures, he is paying more attention to solo concert work, with an emphasis on Lieder singing.

In Two Sections

Mr. Falkner declares the St. Matthew Passion moves him more than any others of the 50 or 60 large sacred works in which he participates. Dr. Koussevitzky recently was quoted as saying that in this Passion "Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions or to win favors . . . and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

Because of its length, the work will be given on Friday in two sections—the first in the afternoon and the second in the evening.

"What makes it so remarkable to me is that I can never do it quite perfectly," says Mr. Falkner. "There is always something unachieved. I have sung it at least 50 times in 10 different versions."

The soloist has the build of a Minnesota fullback, weighs "12 stone"—which would be just 196 pounds in America—is a cricket player, rows, plays squash and field hockey. He is married and has a daughter of 19 months.

Artists Coming to Boston

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. V. Ernst Wolff Keith Falkner

Harpsichord Soloist and Baritone, Who Will Appear in St. Matthew Passion, Scheduled at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday

---

Globe Mar 25/37

Conductor

Symphony's beloved director, Dr Koussevitzky, will again conduct the orchestra and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club in "The Passion of Our Lord, according to St Mathew," by Bach, at Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening for the benefit of the pension fund.

Lowell Courier-Citizen March 24/37

Boston Programs.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with soloists and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses is to present the St. Matthew Passion music of Bach on Friday afternoon and evening, as set forth elsewhere in this column, it should be noticed that the matinee program will be given tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon. It will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D.

That was a striking juxtaposition on the regular symphony programs last week when Dr. Koussevitzky followed up the naive and polite Surprise Symphony of Haydn with the first Boston performance of the new Third Symphony of the modernist, Nicolai Berezowsky. The one was all grace and clarity. The other turbulent, turgid and angular, yet with some striking effects in the way of building up a climax. On the whole it was more easy to appreciate than a previous symphony by the same composer. The second half of the program, devoted to compositions by Sibelius was notable for a perfectly thrilling interpretation of the familiar tone poem "Finlandia." This has been heard so often in performances by amateurs and by professional groups which are not of the first rank that it was a revelation to hear it played by an orchestra of virtuosi. It was the finest interpretation of this work that we remember to have heard.

This evening in Jordan hall there will be a notable sonata program by Arthur Schnabel, the eminent Austrian pianist and Bronislaw Huberman, the widely known Polish violinist. The program will include sonatas for the two instruments by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Schubert.

On Wednesday evening of next week the Stradivarius quartet will be heard in Jordan hall. In the program also will be Leo Ornstein, whose quintet for piano and strings is to be one of the features of the program.

Bach's Passion Music.

Lenten traditions dating back fifteen hundred years are embodied in John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," which will be presented in Boston on Good Friday at Symphony hall. The performance, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will combine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the three hundred voices of the joined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and six notable soloists. On such a scale is the work, that it will require the afternoon and evening to complete one performance.

Koussevitzky says of the "Matthew Passion:" "In this marvellous work, Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions, or to win favor. He simply wrote from the depths of his heart and soul, and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

The words of Christ will be sung by Keith Falkner, eminent young English bass-baritone. He was a Royal Naval Air Service pilot in the World war, and also has made his mark in cricket and hockey. Other soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass.

The afternoon performance will begin at 4.30 and after an intermission for dinner or supper the presentation will be resumed at 8.15.

—Boston News—

What's (

George Demetrios's Sculptures

In the foyer of Symphony Hall there have been placed on display several sculptures by George Demetrios, known in Boston as sculptor and draughtsman. The pieces are well placed far enough from the sonal portraiture and he holds forth energetically, modeling forms so that they are the expressive instrument of powerful feeling or tensed in vigorous action. For sculptors it is a treat to work in fuller, freer range, giving full play to muscle, setting up a pattern of thrusts and counter thrusts, and investing the figure with a gigantic strength. In one Mr. Demetrios relates physical strength, in another he expresses a heightened feeling experienced by a person after listening to a symphonic composition.

Mr. Demetrios's drawings of the figure, done with a few salient strokes, are shown besides. In these he seems desirous of attaining a concise portrayal which records movement and vitality in a few calligraphic strokes.

D. A.

Trav Mar 25

Soprano

Jeannette Vreeland, who will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow in Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

13

Boston Herald, Mar. 22/37 (Curtis-ed)

Boston Symphony Will Present 'St. Matthew Passion' on Friday

The "St. Matthew Passion" by John Sebastian Bach will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, starting Good Friday afternoon and continuing through the evening. The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe College Choral Society and six soloists under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky will assist. The proceeds will go to the pension fund of the orchestra.

Patrons of the current concerts at Symphony Hall are admiring a pastel of the east window of Princeton University chapel, designed by Charles J. Connick, Boston craftsman in stained glass, and which pictures "The Last Supper." It is nine feet square and is in the Huntington avenue lobby of the hall.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 21 1937

MUSIC

Bach's "Passion" Greatest Composition Says Koussevitzky

Boston, March 20.—(AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the past few days, and now believes that the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore had accorded that honor to Beethoven's ninth symphony, with its massive choral passages.

Studied For Concert.

But, he says, renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present next Friday—Good Friday—with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs in symphony hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

"Because the Matthew Passion is the most formidable, the deepest, the great composition in all musical literature."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked if this composition, written in 1729, came as as harp contrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances a week ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

Bach Most Modern.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technique is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years, I suppose it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes, the oratorio will be presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It will start at 4 p. m. with an intermission for dinner about 6 p. m.

Trav. Mar. 25

Soprano

Jeannette Vreeland, who will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow in Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

DAYTON, O.
NEWS
MAR 24 1937

It will be learned with interest that Miss Mabel Evans, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Hugh I. Evans of Sawmill rd., will sing with the chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe on Good Friday at Symphony hall in Boston, Mass. She will sing in St. Mathaus Passion (Bach) with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Evans, who is a student at Radcliffe, will also sing in New York Radcliffe concert Saturday, April 3, and plans to spend her Easter vacation in that city and in New Haven, Conn.

Hugh I. Evans, jr., who is a student at Princeton, is a member of the Princeton Glee club. He has been selected as one of the members to sing on Good Friday at Kees Gardens, on Long Island, in Brahm's "Requiem."

Roxbury Citizen

To Give "Passion" On Good Friday

Two of New England's most famous choruses, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, will join with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky in giving Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" on Good Friday, March 26. The concert will be given for the benefit of the Orchestra's pension fund.

"The Passion," which is rarely performed, was given for the first time in many years last Spring by the two choruses and the Orchestra. Both the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society are directed by G. Wallace Woodworth who has been drilling the two groups in the difficult piece of music all Winter.

Artists Coming to Boston

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. V. Ernst Wolff Keith Falkner

Harpsichord Soloist and Baritone, Who Will Appear in St. Matthew Passion, Scheduled at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday

---

Lead in St. Matthew Passion Sung by British Baritone

Monitor March 24/37

Although probably as well known in his own country as Lawrence Tibbett is here, Keith Falkner, English bass baritone never has appeared in opera, has just made his first movie and until two or three years ago gave only occasional solo recitals.

Why, then, his renown?

The answer lies in oratorio. For Mr. Falkner is one of England's outstanding oratorio soloists. On the island where every town has a choir which gives two large concerts a year—always one oratorio—success either as a concert or operatic singer comes only after a reputation has been established in the oratorio field. A singer's first engagements are as soloist with such groups.

Reputation Established

Mr. Falkner has established that reputation—so well and widely in fact, that for the past six years he has been coming to the United States to appear as soloist with choral societies and to give concerts. On Friday, he will sing the role of Jesus in Johann Sebastian Bach's "The St. Matthew Passion," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society under direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Other soloists are Jeanette Vreeland, well known concert soprano; Kathryn Meisle, Metropolitan Opera contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass. Special solo instruments for the performance are a harpsichord and a viola da gamba.

Mr. Falkner made his first Boston appearance three years ago after Myra Hess, English pianist, urged Dr. Koussevitzky to hear the baritone. Mr. Falkner was in another part of the United States when he received a wire to come immediately to Boston. He did so, and was engaged to sing in the St. John Passion.

Boy Soprano

Mr. Falkner began his musical career at the age of nine by attending New College choir school at Oxford. It is a foundation started in Queen Elizabeth's time, which provides a choir for the Oxford church services. At that time young Falkner was a boy soprano.

"We sang a service a day and received a scholarship in return," he says. "One of the most important parts of the training was to learn to read perfectly at sight."

The choir had only a short rehearsal before services, and the unfortunate child who couldn't read his music was punished severely—in the old-fashioned way.

War Interrupts Career

At 14, Mr. Falkner's voice plummeted down to bass depths. He had stopped musical training, was attending the Perse School in Cambridge, Eng., and was singing in the local choir. Then war came along and although only 17, he joined the naval air force. After demobilization, Sir Hugh Allen, director of the Royal College of Music in London, urged the young man to enter the college. After six years' study, he was engaged in 1925 to sing Parry's "Job" at the Three Choirs Festival in Gloucester, Eng. There followed an increasing number of engagements in Manchester and Liverpool, Eng., Glasgow, Scotland; Dublin, Ireland; London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin and many other towns and cities. In 1929, he made his American début at Town Hall, New York.

"I only stayed five days that time because I was in a hurry to get back to London to be married," he said.

Italians Have Name

Mr. Falkner hesitated when asked whether he preferred being called a bass baritone or a baritone bass.

"There really isn't any word in English which is quite accurate," he said finally. "I am what the Italians call a basso cantante, which is lighter than a basso profundo."

The singer has just finished making "Mayfair Melody," a Warner Brothers English film, in which he plays the rôle of a mechanic who is "discovered" by the boss's daughter. He is under contract to make three more pictures, finds it "terribly hard work, but an enjoyable relief from singing 12 or 14 performances of the 'Messiah' as I do at Christmas time." Besides film ventures, he is paying more attention to solo concert work, with an emphasis on Lieder singing.

In Two Sections

Mr. Falkner declares the St. Matthew Passion moves him more than any others of the 50 or 60 large sacred works in which he participates. Dr. Koussevitzky recently was quoted as saying that in this Passion "Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions or to win favors . . . and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

Because of its length, the work will be given on Friday in two sections—the first in the afternoon and the second in the evening.

"What makes it so remarkable to me is that I can never do it quite perfectly," says Mr. Falkner. "There is always something unachieved. I have sung it at least 50 times in 10 different versions."

The soloist has the build of a Minnesota fullback, weighs "12 stone"—which would be just 196 pounds in America—is a cricket player, rows, plays squash and field hockey. He is married and has a daughter of 19 months.

Conductor

Globe Mar 25/37

Symphony's beloved director, Dr Koussevitzky, will again conduct the orchestra and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club in "The Passion of Our Lord, according to St Mathew," by Bach, at Symphony Hall this afternoon and evening for the benefit of the pension fund.

Lowell Courier Citizen March 24/37

Boston Programs.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with soloists and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses is to present the St. Matthew Passion music of Bach on Friday afternoon and evening, as set forth elsewhere in this column, it should be noticed that the matinee program will be given tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon. It will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D.

That was a striking juxtaposition on the regular symphony programs last week when Dr. Koussevitzky followed up the naive and polite Surprise Symphony of Haydn with the first Boston performance of the new Third Symphony of the modernist, Nicolai Berezowsky. The one was all grace and clarity. The other turbulent, turgid and angular, yet with some striking effects in the way of building up a climax. On the whole it was more easy to appreciate than a previous symphony by the same composer. The second half of the program, devoted to compositions by Sibelius was notable for a perfectly thrilling interpretation of the familiar tone poem "Finlandia." This has been heard so often in performances by amateurs and by professional groups which are not of the first rank that it was a revelation to hear it played by an orchestra of virtuosi. It was the finest interpretation of this work that we remember to have heard.

This evening in Jordan hall there will be a notable sonata program by Arthur Schnabel, the eminent Austrian pianist and Bronislaw Huberman, the widely known Polish violinist. The program will include sonatas for the two instruments by Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart and Schubert.

On Wednesday evening of next week the Stradivarius quartet will be heard in Jordan hall. In the program also will be Leo Ornstein, whose quintet for piano and strings is to be one of the features of the program.

Bach's Passion Music.

Lenten traditions dating back fifteen hundred years are embodied in John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," which will be presented in Boston on Good Friday at Symphony hall. The performance, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will combine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the three hundred voices of the joined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and six notable soloists. On such a scale is the work, that it will require the afternoon and evening to complete one performance.

Koussevitzky says of the "Matthew Passion:" "In this marvellous work, Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions, or to win favor. He simply wrote from the depths of his heart and soul, and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

The words of Christ will be sung by Keith Falkner, eminent young English bass-baritone. He was a Royal Naval Air Service pilot in the World war, and also has made his mark in cricket and hockey. Other soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass.

The afternoon performance will begin at 4.30 and after an intermission for dinner or supper the presentation will be resumed at 8.15.

—Boston News—

What's (

George Demetrios's Sculptures

In the foyer of Symphony Hall there have been placed on display several sculptures by George Demetrios, known in Boston as sculptor and draughtsman. The pieces are well placed, far enough from the walls so that the spectator may walk around them and study their qualities from every point of vantage.

Mr. Demetrios has succeeded in having most of his sculptures rendered in bronze, thus giving us the advantage of modeling in terms of the material for which it was intended. There are two or three figure pieces and several portraits. The latter prove particularly interesting for the types who have posed as models; some are Finnish, some native New Englanders. Mr. Demetrios when he chooses can be unrelentingly detailed in his modeling, translating feature for feature, trait for trait, so that the model is there in complete resemblance.

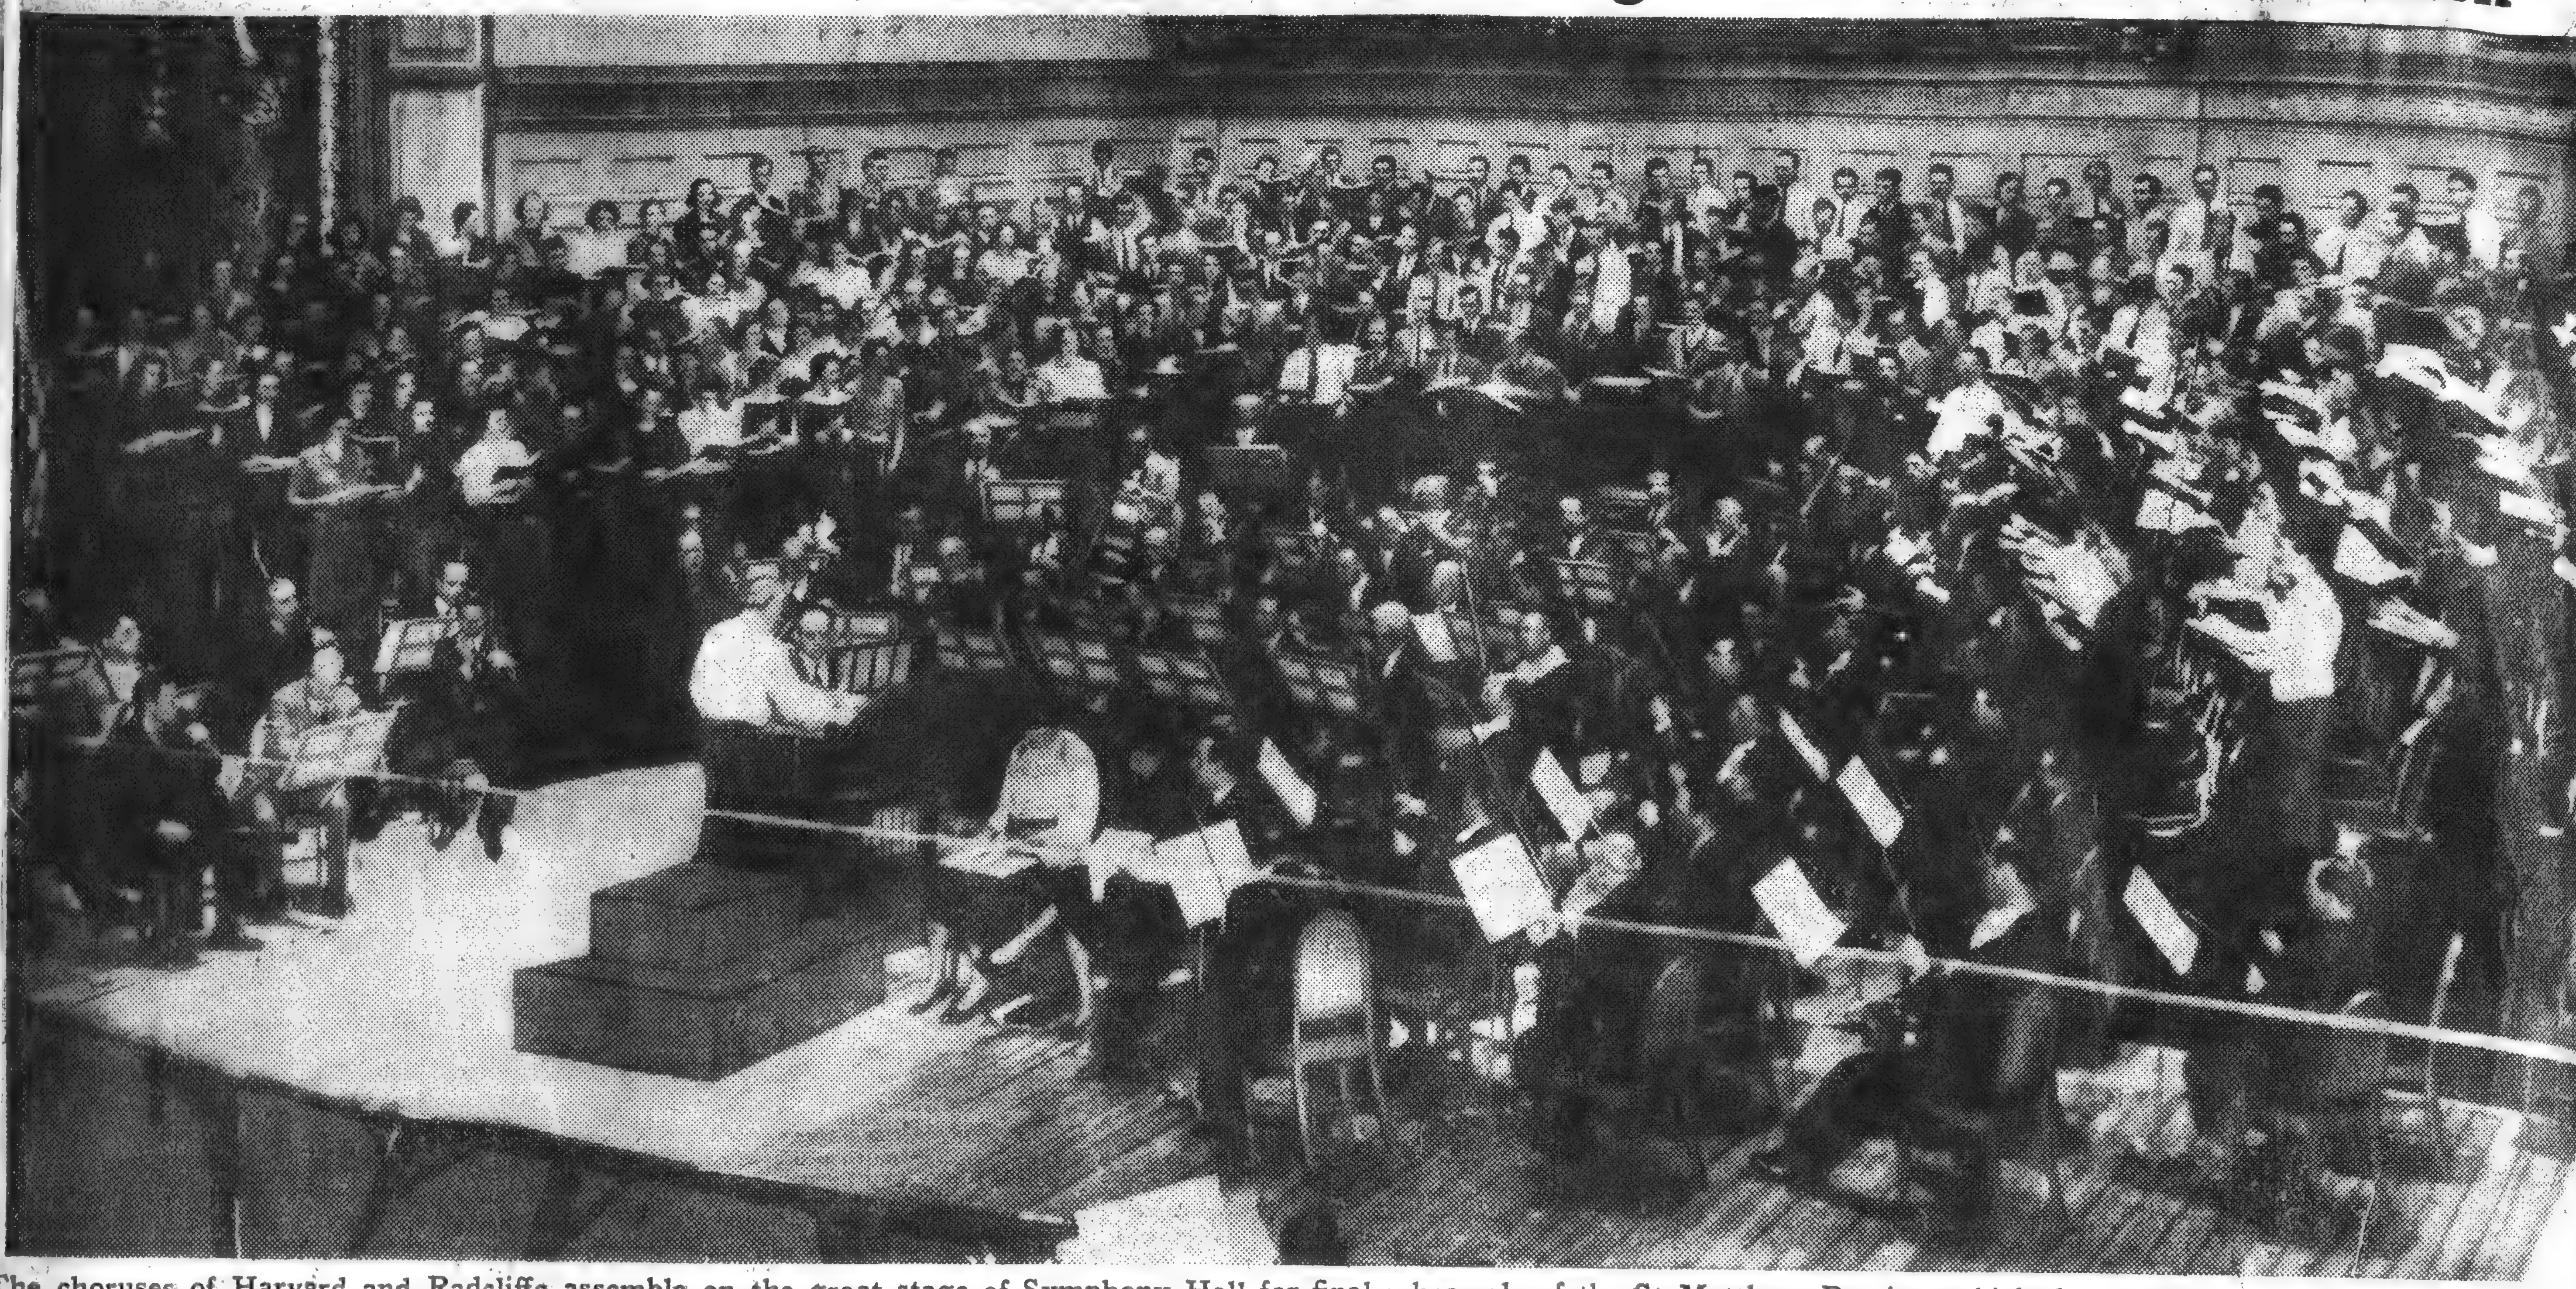
But the feeling for the decorative is ever with him, and even when he is being painstakingly naturalistic, he holds to a strict symmetry in posture, or dispenses the features in orderly array, so that a pattern is imposed without depriving the image of its naturalistic aspect. The tendency to dispose the strands of hair in terms of regulated rows of incised lines is a question of taste which some may dispute. For this spectator that practice seemed to interfere somewhat with the full plastic feeling of the head. In a delightful portrayal of a small girl, entitled "Finnish Child," he seemed at his best, because the hair was modeled in a general mass, which harmonized with the shape of the skull and maintained the plastic continuity.

In figures Mr. Demetrios is released from the restraints of personal portraiture and he holds forth energetically, modeling forms so that they are the expressive instrument of powerful feeling or tensed in vigorous action. For sculptors it is a treat to work in fuller, freer range, giving full play to muscle, setting up a pattern of thrusts and counter thrusts, and investing the figure with a gigantic strength. In one Mr. Demetrios relates physical strength, in another he expresses a heightened feeling experienced by a person after listening to a symphonic composition.

Mr. Demetrios's drawings of the figure, done with a few salient strokes, are shown besides. In these he seems desirous of attaining a concise portrayal which records movement and vitality in a few calligraphic strokes.

D. A.

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses Rehearsing For St Matthew Passion



The choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe assemble on the great stage of Symphony Hall for final rehearsals of the St Matthew Passion, which they will present tomorrow, beginning at 4:30 o'clock. In a moment Dr Koussevitzky (center, foreground) will lift his hand and the beautiful opening chorus of Bach's immortal Passion will rise from 500 throats.

MANY MUSIC LOVERS PLANNING TO ATTEND ST MATTHEW PASSION

Masquers' Guild Presents Two Plays—Many From Greater Boston Visiting New York

One of the most anticipated musical occasions of the Easter season has been the presentation of the St Matthew Passion by the combined choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe, accompanied by the Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr Koussevitzky, and tomorrow will find a notable audience at Symphony Hall for this event.

Weeks of Cambridge rehearsals have preceded the final rehearsals at Symphony Hall, where the hundreds in the two choruses assembled last evening to sing with the Symphony Orchestra. Promptly at 7 they began to fill the great stage, coming in from early suppers together, their books under sweatered arms or in swinging green bags.

Mrs F. Murray Forbes Jr (Elizabeth Livermore) was among the many coming in to rehearse with Dr Koussevitzky, and Miss Norma and Miss Carola Nasmith, Miss Kate-Alden Gandy, a soft cardigan buttoned over her dark skirt, and Miss Helen Young, also in the classic sweater and skirt; Miss Esther Schell and Miss Eleanor Blackall, Miss Helen Cunningham, Miss Susan Watkins, Miss Edith C. H. Brown, Miss Harriett Taylor, Miss Jane Bennett, Miss Marion Evans, Miss Jeannette Eyre, Miss Henrietta Safford, Miss Anne Hewitt, Miss Katharine Johnson, Miss Priscilla Nye, Miss Katherine Hall, Miss Janet Hayes, Miss Margery Graham Poole, Miss Joan Phillips, Miss Elinor Baker, Miss Margaret Brooks, and Miss Margaret Seymour Richardson.

Arriving with Marshall Swan were William Austin and Robert Praerio and Roderick Peattie and William Parker, James A. E. Wood and F. Gorham Brigham Jr, Peter C. Brooks, Howard Lane Blackwell, William B. Miller, Henry O. Marcy, Richard Pheasant, John W. Brainerd, Robert C. Cochrane Jr, Benjamin Finck, Frederick Tolles, John Seegar, James L. Morrison, Francis G. Barnum Jr, J. K. Moulton, and Joel C. Goldthwait.

A few of the hundreds of reservations for tomorrow, when the concert will begin at 4:30 o'clock, with an intermission of two hours at 6, continuing at 8, are those of Mrs Hamilton Osgood, Mrs Julian L. Coolidge, Mrs George A. Pierce, Howard Palmer of Eliot House, Mrs Warren M. Wright, Mrs William K. Jackson, Mr Carleton Ellison, Mrs Ward Shepard, Miss Katharine Richardson, Mrs William B. Scoville, who will have two guests with her, Bernard Jones, Mrs Frederick Taylor, Miss Elizabeth Robinson, H. H. Richardson, Mrs James Woods, Mrs Charles Stevenson, Mrs George Nasmith, Miss Helen Whittemore, Northrup Brown, Mrs F. W. Denio and Miss Priscilla Hall.

Also Mrs Henry Cabot, who will have two guests, Mrs Henry K. Cummings, Frederick Winkler Jr of Lowell House, Laurence Fenninger Jr, Ernest Sachs Jr of Winthrop House, Mrs William C. Greene, Mrs C. Mason-Wilson of Providence, Miss Ruth Allen, Mrs Reginald Smith, T. L. Perry Jr of Lowell House, Ben Bart Jr of Eliot House, David Pinckney, Mrs Phillips Green of New Haven, Mrs Talcott Parsons, Miss Helen Cunningham, for three, Mrs C. G. St. John Jr, Miss Lydia Banning of New York, Miss Virginia Scott, Prof F. W. Taussig, for three, James Laughlin 2d, Mrs Marshal [illegible], Mrs David Reisman Jr, and John Brewer.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

MAR 25 1937

TRANSFER OF TANGLEWOOD RECORDED

Miss Tappan Transfers Half Interest in Festival Site

A definite step was taken today in the transfer of Tanglewood, estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, given to the trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra for permanent use of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Judge Charles L. Hibbard, acting for Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, recorded the transfer of Miss Tappan's undivided one-half interest in the 210-acre estate. The other half interest is owned by Mrs. Gorham Brooks, niece of Miss Tappan.

Both women reside in Brookline.

Boston to Hear Sacred Opera in Bach's Setting of Passion

St. Matthew's Version of Christ's Suffering Will Be Sung at Symphony Hall Friday

Trans. March 24/37

By Redfern Mason

The story of Christ's Passion was sung in the mass in Holy Week as long ago as the eleventh or twelfth century, perhaps earlier. It was a simple tonal recitation, in which the celebrant and his assistants participated. With the passing of time musicians took up the theme and, during the Reformation, Luther's friend and musical adviser, Johannes Walther, compiled a setting.

The subject appealed intensely to the German people and Heinrich Schutz, profiting by the example of Italian composers like Carissimi, composed a dramatic setting, the beauty and sincerity of which are felt today.

But the greatest of all the settings of this grandest of all themes are those of Johann Sebastian Bach, from whom we have two versions, the St. John and the St. Matthew. The latter is "Summum opus summi viri," the greatest work of the greatest man, and this work it is which will be sung on Good Friday in Symphony Hall.

The performance will not be a concert; it will be a religious rite, a rite appealing to all Christians, whether Catholic or Protestant, for in this colossal composition Bach's genius transcends sectarianism.

Audience Should Take Part

In point of fact, the audience is expected to join in the chorales and, when the work is given in Bethlehem, Pa., they always do so.

Bach was steeped in the Scriptures and, in the best sense of the word, he was a poet. For he extracted from the libretti supplied him by his friend, Picander, the pith and essence of Christian thought and feeling.

The story is told in plain but expressive recitative by the Evangelist, who sings tenor, while the part of the Christ is entrusted to a bass soloist and, while the words of the Savior is being sung there is a soft murmur of strings, except in the most poignant moments of the recital, when the one lone voice is heard.

From the plotting together of the priests to put Jesus to death to the time of his enombment voice and instrument, soloists and chorus, tell the solemn story.

In the great exordium we see in imagination the people gathered together in the streets of Jerusalem and, in dolorous antiphonies the story is told by two choruses. "Behold the Bridegroom" chants the one body of singers. "How" cry the daughters of Zion. "So like a lamb," comes the reply. "See it," comes the cry. "What?" interrogate the listeners. "His love untold" is the answer. "Look" insists the first chorus; "Look on Him betrayed and sold upon the cruel cross for our offense."

This bare recital can give no idea of the unfolding of this sublime choral prelude. The listener feels that he is taking part in a world tragedy; he senses the tumult in the streets, the soul-searching and the anguish.

The Death of Jesus

The Evangelist tells how the Christ is to be delivered up to be crucified and the faithful express their grief in the chorale "O blessed Jesu, how hast Thou offended?"

With the conspiracy of the Jewish elders the sinister element of the drama enters. The death of Jesus is resolved upon. The incident is brief. It is followed by the beautiful episode of the anointing of Christ by Mary of Magdala, the shocked protest of the apostles against the waste, and the words of Jesus that Mary has anointed him for His burial.

Music of meditation comments on the incident. Bach follows this procedure throughout the Passion. Everything that happens is made subjective to the dividual. The compact of Judas with the chief priests to betray his Master, illustrates this practice eloquently in the poignant aria for soprano, "Only bleed, thou dearest heart." The opening phrase is a veritable motif, in the Wagnerian sense of the word.

In the scene of the Last Supper, when Christ foretells how one of them will betray Him, the apostles cry out "Is it I?" "Never will my heart refuse Thee," sings the soprano and all join in the "Passion chorale," a hymn that is sung no fewer than five times in the course of the performance. In all hymnology there is nothing finer than this chant.

The Evangelist tells of the watch by night on the Mount of Olives and the agony of Gethsemane. Especially beautiful is the bass recitative in which Christ is portrayed bending before the will of the Father. With a guileless realism that is characteristic of him, Bach writes accompanying chords in falling arpeggios.

The taking of Jesus is told in accents of protest and grief. Then follows a storm of the elements, told in a double chorus, with sharp, barbed phrases and a thunderous rolling bass. The first part of the Passion ends in a chorus that is a masterpiece, not merely of polyphonic art, but of emotional expression. It is "O man, bewail thy heavy sins," and Bach wrote it originally for his Passion According to St. John. But, probably feeling that the St. Matthew was his definitive utterance on the divine tragery, he transferred it to its present place. It is a chorus of weeping, realistic as anything that Wagner has done. It is tears of repentance for all humanity.

The second part of the Passion music carries the action from the bringing of Christ before Caiaphas and his trial by Pilate to the crucifixion and burial. It opens with a beautiful aria for alto, "Ah! now is my Savior gone," in which the chorus interrupts with words of commiseration. As Bach wrote it the song is accompanied by flute and oboe d'amore, the latter pitched a third lower than the modern instrument, but today, as in the case of the oboe da caccia and the viola da gamba, adaptations have to be made. The accompaniment is uniformly contrapuntal and, of old, Bach sat at the organ and improvised on the figured bass.

The false witnesses testify before Caiphas and tell how Christ said He would destroy the temple and raise it up again in three days. "He is guilty of blasphemy," cries the high priest and the multitude exclaim, "He is guilty of death." They spit upon and smite Him and bid Him tell who are his smiters.

But the pitiful believers intone the chorale, "O Lord, who dares to smite Thee?"

The denial of Peter is related and when the Evangelist tells of the cock crow, he does so in a bit of melodic realism that today will raise a smile. We react differently from the folk of 1729, when the Passion was first sung in the Thomaskirche, probably with a chorus of twenty and an orchestra of a score and a half.

Repentance of Peter

The repentance of Peter is a point which Bach would not miss. The apostle had trusted to his poor unaided humanity and had sinned. With the violin discoursing an obbligato that is a treasure of the musical art, is sung the aria, "O pardon me my God." When I first heard that solo Joseph Joachim was the violinist and the memory of his devoutly beautiful playing is an abiding memory.

Continued on next page

Cont. from Trans.

15

The chorale, "Though my feet from Thee have wandered, yet my heart is Thine again," brings the lesson home to all. The thought of man's sinfulness and need for contrition is indeed always in the composer's mind. Into the mouth of Judas he puts the affecting air, "Give me back my dearest Master," and here again there is an inspired violin accompaniment, a very luxury of woe in tone.

The silence of Christ before the Roman governor, the message of Pilate's wife, lead up to the question to the mob whom they will choose to be released, Christ or Barabbas. "Barabbas," comes the ferocious cry from the mob, with startling vehemence. "Let Him be Crucified," they rage and the notes, barbed like arrows, form a musical cross, are another touch of Bach's childlike literalism.

From hatred the emotion swings to compassion. The disciples and the faithful sing the Passion chorale, this time to the words, "O Thou with hate surrounded."

And the story follows the way of the cross to the bass aria, "Come blessed cross," the motif of which is again cruciform.

The savage multitude taunt the sacred victim: "Thou that destroyest the temple of God and buildest in three days, save Thyself." "He saved others," cry the priests; "Himself he cannot save."

And the pathos of it all is voiced in the mournful recitative, "Unhappy Golgotha," to the strains of 'cello and organ. Darkness covers the land and Christ exclaims, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Here the strings that accompany the Christ recitative are silent. Only the organ is heard.

Again the Passion chorale. After the passing of the Savior there is the protest of Nature, the rending of the veil of the temple, only the organ for accompaniment. One wonders what Bach did with that figured bass, how he amplified it.

After the uproar in earth and sky the music strikes a note of peace. It was at evening that the dove brought the olive branch to the ark.

The burial of the body by Joseph of Arimathea is told and the concluding chorus is like the processional filing off of all human kind.

Bach wrote the St. Matthew Passion as a disciple, a devout and humble Christian. What he has written is sacred opera.

In the World of Music

Trans. Mar. 26/37

Koussevitzky and Symphony a Glorious Concert

By Redfern Mason

The Boston Symphony audience was deeply stirred. For yesterday afternoon's concert was one to be marked "with a white stone." Bach began it with the spirited Second Brandenburg Concerto; the Mozart E-flat Symphony carried us to the top-gallant of our joy, and Beethoven's Second Symphony, the one in which he begins to unfold his pinions as a master in his own right, brought the program to an inspiring conclusion.

Serge Koussevitzky was in his element. He has a gift of reserve which commends him to orthodox Bostonians; but he combines it with a perennial youthfulness that enables him to grapple with a classic as if, for the first time in his life, he was sensing its beauty and rejoicing in the opportunity to share his enthusiasm with the public.

When one thinks of the frozen academicism of the attitude of a past generation towards Johann Sebastian, Koussevitzky's joyous approach to the master comes almost like a revelation. The old cantor would have been beside himself with joy could he have heard those impeccable strings and reeds discourse his music. He might have arched his brows a little at that soprano trumpet; he might even have told us that the Cothen trumpets were better fitted for the work than ours are. But that is a matter on which we lack enlightenment.

The music remains in all its sprightliness, and our Boston instrumentalists can lend their fancy to polyphonic orchestration with a good heart. In Bach's time the orchestra sang chorally; the composer loved to balance the instrumental choirs antiphonally. Yet he knew the genius of flute and oboe and the imperfect brazen instruments of his day as well as he did the quality of the different registers of the organ.

The music dances along with something of the spirit of a kermesse in some old German town, a small town at that, for the strains have a rustic tang, at moments there is a touch of the Arcadian about them. So we blessed Georges Laurent, the flutist, and Fernand Gillet, the oboeist, and prayed that their tribe might increase. Nor were we less grateful to Richard Burgin and the fiddle clan, for they made the time pass happily. That Andante was sheer heartsease, a sort of lyrical baptism in the music of an age gone by.

And if the Bach did us good mentally and physically, the Mozart fells upon ears that drank it in with sheer beatitude. This is where the Boston Symphony cannot be surpassed by any orchestra on earth. They say that Mozart was in arrears with his rent when he wrote this music. If so, the high gods must have granted him the boon of blessed forgetfulness, for strains more radiantly happy have never been composed. And Koussevitzky understands them in the only way in which such music can be understood, by living the score in his own person and conveying his own rapture to those who are co-operating with him to make a masterpiece live in contemporary ears.

That stately exordium, aristocratic to the core; the Allegro moving "with light feet," as Nietzsche says beauty always must move; the Andante, limpid as a stream and profound as an ocean; the lordly Minuet, and the exuberant Finale; all these manifestations of the glory that is Mozart unfolded before our consciousness like the vision of a world happier than the world of living men.

Beethoven's Second Symphony rounded out the concert to a close. The "unco guid" of music sometimes affect to look down on this work. What a pity to be so wise that you cannot enjoy the prentice work of a genius! For, though Beethoven was still lapping the Mozartean milk when he wrote it, there are signs without number that here a hand was at work that by and by would create palaces of tone beyond the imagination of the great Amadeus. The Scherzo and the final Allegro are premonitions of the Beethoven that is to be.

It was worth while coming three thousand miles to hear this concert.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR
MAR 28 1937

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, played Bach's "St. Matthew's Passion" as its Good Friday treat for Boston.

Globe MUSIC Mar. 26/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The regular afternoon concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was set back to Thursday. There will be a special Good Friday presentation this afternoon and evening of "The Passion According to Saint Matthew" by Johann Sebastian Bach. The program for yesterday and tomorrow evening accordingly contained no new music, since orchestra and conductor have been busy preparing Bachs' great choral work.

Yet one item was almost a revival, for the Second Symphony of Beethoven has been played by this orchestra only twice in the last 18 years, most recently at a Tuesday concert in 1933. The afternoon began with the Second Brandenburg Concerto of Bach with the following as concertino: Richard Burgin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe, and Georges Mager, trumpet. The continuo was played upon a harpsichord by Dr V. Ernst Wolff, who will provide the harpsichord accompaniments to the recitative in today's performance of the "St Matthew Passion." The remaining number was Mozart's adorable Symphony in E-flat (K-543).

Dr Koussevitzky conducted three eloquent and polished performances, particularly in the case of Beethoven, whose Second Symphony, though strikingly original, suffers a bit from repetition. The texture of Mozart was beautifully clear, notably in the beginning of the menuet, where the inner voices sometimes obscure the upper strings.

The Second Symphony of Beethoven is not known, probably, to the general public so well as it ought to be. Chronologically it merits the qualification "early Beethoven", but that term is ambiguous where its substance and manner are concerned. Granting the occasional Haydnisms, the fact is plain that Beethoven, in his second symphonic essay, had begun to test his characteristic boldness of structure and phrase. The orchestra texture is considerably heavier than that of the First Symphony, the mood almost rhapsodic in portions of the first and last movements. There are passages which Mendelssohn might have written years later; indeed a thematic foreshadowing of the worthy Felix is perceptible in the opening allegro. Only the slow movement is a definite reversion to the rococo decoration of 18th Century andantes.

For Mozart and Bach Dr Kossevitzky reduced his numbers, according to wise custom. It was particularly enjoyable to hear the continuo of the Brandenburg Concerto taken by a harpsichord.

"The Passion according to Saint Matthew" will be given in two sections today, because of its length. The first section will begin at 4:30, the second at 8:15. The performance will benefit the pension fund of the orchestra. The choruses are to be the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which have been prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. The vocal soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; Keith Falkner, baritone, and Fritz Lechner, bass.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour for the last time this season. Two weeks hence there will be an all-Brahms program with Myra Hess as soloist in the B-flat Piano Concerto. This program, incidentally, will be in point of time an ob-

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Monitor Mar. 26/37

For the twentieth program of the Boston Symphony season Dr. Koussevitzky chose a list of works that might have graced one of this Tuesday afternoon historical concerts. It was made up of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major, Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543) and Beethoven's in D major. The first concert of this pair was set forward from today to yesterday, in order to make way for the performance this afternoon and evening of Bach's St. Matthew Passion, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund.

The solo parts in the Brandenburg Concerto were played by Richard Burgin, concertmaster; Georges Laurent, flutist; Fernand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpeter. In addition, there was a harpsichord continuo, provided by Dr. V. Ernst Wolff. This was the first time within recollection that the harpsichord had been employed in this work in Boston. Its use is justified by the score. On the other hand, it cannot be said to add much to a performance by a modern orchestra in a large hall. Apparently it was included in this instance because harpsichord and harpsichordist were on hand for today's concert—so why not use them?

The solo artists all performed with the virtuosity and the musicianship that is associated with their names. But even as played by Mr. Mager, the trumpet part in this work remains a problem child. Its range is much too high for the comfort of the listener as well as of the player, and the sharp tone inevitably overwhelms the gentler voices of the other solo instruments. Only in the slow movement, in which the trumpet is not used, can the full beauty of this lovely work be realized.

The Mozart and the Beethoven were brilliantly performed. There are good historical arguments for the makeup of this program. Bach, Mozart, Beethoven—with due emphasis upon their relationship as revealed in these compositions. But presumably the audiences of this series of concerts hardly need to be reminded of that relationship now. And viewed in the light of these times, this program, in spite of its theoretical variety and unity, lacks sufficient contrast and climax. A later symphony of Beethoven woul[illegible] have served better.

The fact is, we are getting a lit[illegible] concerned over Dr. Koussevitzk[illegible] programs. Formerly he could alm[illegible] always be depended upon for a st[illegible]ulating concert. He introduced [illegible] less novelties and revived w[illegible] rarely heard. It is true that m[illegible] of them were not very reward[illegible] but at least we heard them. L[illegible] year and this we have depen[illegible] mostly upon familiar works wh[illegible] indeed we want to hear over a[illegible] over, but not exclusively. The o[illegible] important novelty so far this yea[illegible] has been Berg's Violin Concerto.

You have seen what has been set before us this week. Next week the orchestra is away. The week after that an all-Brahms program is announced. No doubt preparation for the St. Matthew Passion has taken a great deal of the rehearsal time. No doubt, too, a great many people are enjoying the comfortable sense of leaning back to listen to familiar works. But that is not the way of progress. We can hear too much even of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms, if we hear nothing much else.

L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
MAR 27 1937

Symphony Closes Series.

The final broadcast from New York by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard Thursday from 8:45 to 9:30 p. m., over WJZ.

SYMPHONY IN EARLY BEETHOVEN

Post Mar. 27/37

Second, Not Heard Since 1919, Played With Full Power

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the Symphony Orchestra's performance of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion, in aid of its pension fund, this week's Friday matinee yielded both place and prestige, and ran its relatively brief and uneventful course yesterday afternoon. The programme, which seemed clearly to indicate that there were weightier matters a-brewing, was drawn from Bach, Mozart and Beethoven and will be repeated, as usual, Saturday evening.

NOT SINCE 1919

In a sense, for all its orthodox appearance, this programme was eventful, since Beethoven's Second Symphony, with which it concluded, had not been played at a regular Symphony concert since October, 1919—though it was naturally included in the programmes of the Beethoven Festival of 1927, and in 1933 it was heard at a Tuesday matinee. Just why Dr. Koussevitzky should have treated this charming work so shabbily is not easy to see, especially since he has shown a particular partiality for the First Symphony, which is even more pronouncedly "early and uncharacteristic" Beethoven.

Indeed, making the inevitable reservations, it is possible to prefer the "first period" Beethoven, who like Mozart and Haydn chiefly aimed to please, and the "third period" Beethoven, who was seer and prophet, to the dynamic Titanic, fist-shaking, thunderbolt-hurling Beethoven of the middle creative years. But, no doubt if the music of this best-known Beethoven were given the sort of rest which the Second Symphony has lately received, it too would fall as freshly upon our ears as did this symphony in D major yesterday.

Given Full Power

Quite approximately when the Second came to performance in the festival aforesaid, Dr. Koussevitzky, to contrast it with the "Eroica" and to emphasize its 18th century character saw fit to play it with a reduced body of strings. Yesterday, however, since it followed the E-flat major symphony of Mozart which, in its turn had followed the second "Brandenburg" Concerto of Bach, the conductor, according to his wont, gave us a steady cresendo of sonority, and the Symphony of Beethoven enjoyed the doubtful advantage of three more double basses and a proportionate increase in the other strings. Finished and sympathetic as the performance was, that of 1927 still lingers in the memory as the ideal presentation of the work Yesterday some of its native lightness and grace were sacrificed in favor of a weight and brilliance of tone better reserved for the symphonies which were yet to come. But this, of course, is quibbling.

Harpsichord Used

In the performance of the Brandenburg Concerto the soloists were, as in other recent performances, Mr. Burgin, violin, Mr. Laurent, flute, Mr. Gillet, oboe, and Mr. Mager, trumpet. Once more the last-named artist struggled with a part that in these days seems not to be humanly possible, if there is to be euphony as well as agility in its execution. Would it not be better to transpose the entire score downward, since the pitch in Bach's day was considerably lower than it is in our own? Yesterday the harpsichord, which will appear in today's performance of the Passion, was employed, and rightfully, as part of the orchestra and with Dr. Ernst Wolff as its player.

To come at last to Mozart, the Symphony in E-flat, which with two other masterpieces, the Symphonies in G-minor and C-major, were literally dashed-off with a deal of lesser music in a single summer, received a performance yesterday which must have both soothed and gladdened the ears of all who heard. It is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's great gifts, that he can make the familiar sound new, not by playing it differently but by playing it even better than before.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 27 1937

BROOKLYN ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Assisting on the program will be the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, with Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist. The program:

Symphony No. 94 in G major ("Surprise"), Haydn
A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures .... Liszt

---

MUSIC

Herald Mar. 26/37

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 20th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Bach
Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 in F major
Mozart
Symphony in E flat major (K. 543)
Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36

Let us hope that most persons realized the rare accomplishment in yesterday's performance of the Second Brandenburg Concerto. It was probably as authentic a performance as it is possible to hear. We heard the difficult trumpet part on the trumpet; the accompaniment, or continuo, was properly played on the harpsichord by Dr. V. Ernst Wolff, who is here for tomorrow's performance of the St. Matthew Passion), and Dr. Koussevitzky kept the orchestra very discreetly in balance with the solo instruments.

The trumpet solo has long been considered too hard for practical purposes in the concert hall. Some conductors, including Toscanini, allow the E flat clarinet in its place; but this instrument can hardly be said to carry out Bach's intentions. The concerto has been arranged by dividing the part for two trumpets. The notes lie too high for the ordinary trumpet, which is the seat of the trouble. In Bach's day a musician learned a special embouchure (position of the lips) for the soprano trumpet. Schweitzer states that a small F trumpet is manufactured in Mainz on which the part can be played "with a little practice." Presumably that is what Mr. Mager has done, and he deserves a great deal of credit for the authenticity of yesterday's performance.

There is reason in making a fuss about authenticity, for it is only under those circumstances and through an intelligent understanding of the music that we fully realize Bach's greatness. Arrangements, more often than not, do his ideas a disservice. They obscure points that he wished clear; they introduce climaxes where they were not intended. Perhaps there are times when a case can be made for transcriptions of Bach; but the scope of his own ideas is best understood in such a presentation as yesterday's. The soloists, Messrs. Burgin, Laurent, Gillet and Mager, merited and received a large measure of applause. For Dr. Koussevitzky it was a triumph of good judgment.

Mozart's joyous symphony was beautifully played, without the least excess and yet not lifelessly. We have heard this particular work many times in recent years, so that its beauties, often very subtle, ought now to be fully appreciated. The G minor has also been frequently played, but Dr. Koussevitzky has somehow neglected the C major, the so-called "Jupiter." Could he not be induced to revive it more often?

Beethoven's Second Symphony is a remarkable work, quite worthy to rank with those that are more regularly played. The originality of its expression and the fertility of its beauty were brought home to the audience in a splendid performance. Dr. Koussevitzky gave us a classical program yesterday in the best and most vital sense of the term.

This concert will be repeated Saturday night. Tonight Bach's St. Matthew Passion will be offered as the pension fund concert. The orchestra will be out of town next week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 27 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE THURSDAY AND SATURDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will give its last pair of concerts of the season at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, April 1 and 3.

Thursday's program consists of the Bach Third Brandenburg Concerto, the Sibelius Seventh Symphony in C major and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

Liszt's "Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures" will be the feature of the Saturday matinee concert. The work calls for a male chorus and tenor and is in three parts entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The conclusion introduces the voices singing the "Chorus Mysticus," which also concludes the second part of Goethe's "Faust." The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the orchestra; Rulon Y. Robinson will be tenor soloist. As an introductory number on this program, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn in G major.

16

Bach's Passion According to Saint Matthew Is Impressive

Trans.—Mar. 27/37

By Redfern Mason

The Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston Symphony combined their forces in a notable performance of the St. Matthew Passion, given yesterday afternoon and evening in Symphony Hall.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted: the choruses had been drilled by G. Wallace Woodworth; the principals were adequate and, in two instances, of outstanding excellence. As for the men of the Symphony, they gave themselves to their task with a seriousness of purpose that must have gratified their leader as much as it did the great audience.

But deepest of all is the impression made by the chorus. They were a little timorous in the great opening number; but they quickly acquired control of themselves, and in the great choral conclusion of the first part, "O man, bewail thy heavy sins," they rose nobly to the dignity of the great argument. And how great it is becomes plain when we reflect that, for Bach, the chorus in this mighty work, typifies, not a group, not a congregation or a people, but the whole of human kind. It is the sins of all humanity that they are bewailing, and in music so profoundly moving, that it seems for all places and all time.

They can be dramatic, too, these young people; one felt it keenly in those dialogues which Bach so ingeniously intersperses throughout the work to make the action more vivid and appealing. That thunder and lightning chorus, with its barbed themes and rumbling bass, was as spectacular in its way as anything in Wagner. The words "Crucify Him" cut like swords; the cry "Barabbas" was savage in its frenzy.

Apart from the polyphonic glories of the more elaborate numbers, what, I believe, moved the audience most deeply was those glorious chorales, especially the one best known by the words, "O Sacred Head now wounded," which is sung some five times during the unfolding of the story. Mr. Woodward has taught his neophytes more than choral technic; he has made them realize that, in singing this music, they are voicing the feelings of the faithful of all denominations.

And Mr. Koussevitzky gave to each chorale a relationship of its own to the episode of which it forms a part. It may voice confidence; it may breathe sorrow; it may be vibrant with hope. The singers manifestly knew the director's drift and they responded to it admirably.

You will go far, in this country or in Europe, and not find choralists more devout in the practice of the art of sacred song than are these young people of Harvard and Radcliffe.

Of the principals the one whose work went most intimately to the hearts of the listeners was Keith Falkner, who sang the part of the Christ. Bostonians who have had the good fortune to hear Charles Santley in the "Elijah" will appreciate the depth of my admiration when I say that Mr. Falkner has the utter sincerity, the complete selflessness of his predecessor. It was like hearing the words of the Scriptures uttered by an apostle.

Kathryn Meisle sang the alto solos. Her reading of the great aria "O pardon me, my God" was beautiful for its contrition and the lament, "Unhappy Golgotha," must have touched the heart of every hearer.

That good musician, Miss Jeanette Vreeland, was rather pallid in her interpretation of the soprano role; she did not seem to enter into the spirit of the words, or, at least, to go beneath the surface. Singers, like painters, have their good days and their days which are not so good.

The role of the Evangelist is an arduous one and John Priebe did it well. His narration of the story of the crucifixion went to the heart; but he did not always realize the same high level of performance. Fritz Lechner sang a number of small parts, including those of Judas and Pilate. In the former he succeeded in the difficult task of vicious characterization.

Richard Burgin played the obbligato to "Pardon me, my God" with a genuine eloquence, and the flute accompaniment to the aria, "From Love Unbounded," was of a soul-searching beauty. Then there were the innumerable interpolations of the harpsichord, played by Dr. V. Ernest Wolff. The piano is almost an "in-law" of the orchestra; but in the hands of Dr. Wolff, it is a member of the family.

One thing would have improved the performance: the participation of the audience in the chorales. It is done in Pennsylvania; it is done in Germany. Why don't the clergy let their congregations sing the grand old hymns? Then they would come to the "Passion" music prepared.

MUSIC

BACH'S ST. MATTHEW PASSION

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Herald Mar. 27/37

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave as its pension fund concert the St. Matthew Passion by J. S. Bach. The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, assisted and the following soloists: Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; Keith Falkner, bass; Fritz Lechner, bass; V. Ernst Wolff, harpsichord; Carl Weinrich, organ. There was a large audience present.

Bach's choral music is by now thoroughly familiar to Boston audiences. Furthermore it has become familiar in reasonably authentic terms, so that the dramatic qualities in the musical treatment of the text and the extraordinary beauty with which the music conveys the emotions of the Passion story can be properly appreciated. The early 19th century ignored Bach and later on adapted his music with a smug tolerance that gave him no credit for knowledge of the means of expression as well as the matter of his ideas. Last night's performance, fine as it was, did not wholly free itself from that sin.

Yet it was a noble performance and surpassed that of last year. The chief reason for this was that the important role of the Evangelist was taken by a new and exceedingly able singer, Mr. John Priebe. He sang the difficult recitatives with unfailing assurance, a clear diction and a sympathetic understanding. Thus the narrative was much more vital than was the case last year. Secondly Mr. Keith Falkner sang the music of Jesus with great beauty of tone and phrase and a simplicity that was far more eloquent than any straining after effect. Miss Vreeland and Miss Meisle also sang very well last night and contributed largely to the excellence of the performance.

On the other hand the large chorus is still an obstruction in the path of an authentic presentation of Bach's choral music. It was not that the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses did not sing well, for their admirable training and good sonority of tone were undeniable. But the massiveness of the tone almost always obscured the effect that Bach sought. For example in the double chorus before Peter's denial we are supposed to hear the high, mocking voices of the flutes. Neither here nor anywhere else, however, could we hear the orchestral effects that Bach intended. Large choruses are the custom in America, so that Dr. Koussevitzky can only be blamed for not being more scholastically venturesome.

There remains only to tie up the threads of this performance, which for its fine qualities will live long in the memory. Mr. Wolff was much more successful in his accompaniments to the recitative than last year, though there could still be more support for the singer as was Bach's own custom. The orchestral soloists, Messrs. Laurent, Zighera, Burgin, Speyer and others played with beautiful effect. It was especially good to hear the viola da gamba and the oboi d'amore. Mr. Lechner, the second bass soloist, was not up to the standard of the other singers, either vocally or for his English diction. This performance was throughout recorded for the phonograph. towards the success of which unusual enterprise the audience was most considerate by its behavior.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

"St Matthew Passion"

Globe Mar. 27/37

In some respects the performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's "The Passion According to Saint Matthew" yesterday afternoon and evening was the climax of the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great achievements there have been during the six months past, but none more exalted or rewarding, none exceeding this noble re-creation of a religious masterpiece.

The performance benefited the pension fund of the orchestra, and the assisting forces were as follows: The choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, both prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, who sang the part of the Evangelist; Keith Falkner, bass, who took the part of Christ, and Fritz Lechner, bass. The harpsichord accompaniments to recitatives were beautifully played by Dr V. Ernst Wolff. The organist was Carl Weinrich. Solo instrumental portions were taken by the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violins; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; Georges Laurent, flute; Louis Speyer and Henry Stanislaus, English horns, and Mr Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore. Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

It will be seen that most of the soloists were those who participated last year when the Boston Symphony revived the "St Matthew Passion" after the lapse of a number of seasons. Of the singers new to Boston, Mr Priebe excelled. Though a young artist, his voice is strong and resonant; he sang not only with style but with depth of feeling, and his enunciation of the English text was perfectly clear. Moreover the recitative of the Evangelist was treated with uncommon regard for accuracy of notes and their time values.

Mr Lechner possesses a robust voice, but one not always firmly placed. Yet he sang his arias with taste and style. One had remembered the superb work last year of Miss Meisle, Miss Vreeland, and Mr Falkner, and had accordingly looked forward to yesterday's performance with great anticipation. Each of them again revealed characteristic beauty of tone, in fact all the virtues of fine vocalism. Yet one flaw was common to all five soloists in slight degree—that of breathing before the end of long phrases.

The choral tone seemed more sonorous than last year. The Harvard and Radcliffe men and women also have gained in precision. The involved contrapuntal voices were brought out more clearly and with greater ease. As motivating force and guiding spirit to all, the conducting of Dr Koussevitzky once more wrought greatly.

It is not too much to hope, indeed to assume, that the Boston orchestra and these choruses have begun to make the "St Matthew Passion" as familiar to local music lovers as, a few years ago, they repeated Bach's B-minor Mass. If one may venture a disputable opinion, the cause of the "St Matthew Passion" is no less than that of the Mass, perhaps more, since the Passion may reasonably be considered a more personal and touching expression of religious devotion than the grand and monumental Mass. Each is, without saying, a great masterpiece, but the one touches the heart where the other may excite intellectual admiration for the stupendous genius of Bach.

Symphony Hall was virtually filled for the two sessions in which the Passion was presented. At the end there was unrestrained applause for all who took part. A leaflet in the program announced that the complete performance was being recorded for the gramophone, the first time this has ever been attempted.

C. W. D.

PERFORM MATTHEW PASSION

Post—Mar. 27/37

Symphony, Chorus and Soloists in Best Form

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The performance of Bach's Passion According to St. Matthew at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and evening served a threefold purpose; it honored the day with the music most appropriate to it, it served to swell the Symphony Orchestra's pension fund and it made opportunity for the first complete phonograph recording of the work. In this last connection it may be remarked that those who purchase the album of records will hear the Passion in its finest estate.

FAR FROM DULL

It sometimes seems that the most impressive music is never that which goes of itself and which no performance can injure, but that which if not done in exactly the right way can be distressfully dull. To this convenient generalizaton the St. Matthew Passion is no exception. Surely we have heard it when it dragged and irritated. The form in which it is cast became archaic years ago. Bach's contrapuntal accompanied to the airs and choruses, with its endless repetition of a rhythmic and melodic figure, varied though it be in harmony and pitch, can sometimes make us wait with what patience we can muster for the releasing final bar.

But enough of this: the performance of yesterday was distinctly not of this order. Instead it rose above outmoded conventions, outmoded style. It gave us the music as it came from the mind and heart of the composer, a testament of his faith, a revelation of the depths to which he was stirred, the heights to which he was lifted by the events that Good Friday would commemorate. It also brought home to us just what it meant for him to write a work of such complexity and magnitude, a work so crowded with significant detail, as part of his daily routine in Leipzic, as something to be given once and set aside. That such music should come into existence thus and then so narrowly escape oblivion is something the modern mind can but faintly grasp.

Needs a Dr. Koussevitzky

But performances such as this are not to be had for the asking. Many factors are necessary to their realization, and these were present yesterday and last evening—for the performance ran in two parts. First of all, there was need of a conductor who could bring to his task the fervor and devotion, the patience and the skill that were brought by Dr. Koussevitsky and which plainly infected everyone under him and associated with him.

There must be long and arduous training of the chorus, and this was effected by Wallace Woodworth as conductor of the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe upon whom Dr. Koussevitsky safely relies for these major choral undertakings. There must be competent soloists, who can feel and express their music as well as sing it beautifully, correctly, and these were also present in the respective persons of Jeannette Vreeland, Katherine Meisle, John Priebe, Keith Falkner and Fritz Lechner.

A Perfect Orchestra

That the orchestra was the Boston Symphony was sufficient guarantee that not only the instrumental ensemble, but the numerous solo and obbligato parts were in the best possible hands.

And there should be, and there was, an audience both large and devout—for such performances cannot be created for the the unresponsive and unheeding.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

MAR 28 1937

Harvard Glee Club Attraction At Symphony Concert on Friday

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport

The closing concert of the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will have as its feature one of the outstanding musical treats of the series, according to the announcement received from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. This concert, the last of five presented in the borough this Winter, will be given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday.

Miss Frances Coutts will be the hostess in the committee box at the concert. Other boxholders will be Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, and ,at the invitation of the Brooklyn committee, members of the staff at Fort Hamilton army post will occupy a box.

The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the presentation of the final concert. The feature of the evening will be the performance of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures" for orchestra, with male chorus nad tenor solo. This often has been named the master work of the composer.

Rulon Y. Robison will sing the tenor solo and the Harvard Glee Club the chorus.

As an introductory number on this program, Dr. Koussevitszky has selected the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn in G major.

The series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Mr. Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Assisting in the interest of the 51st season were Mrs. Blum as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 27 1937

Boston Symphony Picks Bach, Brahms, Sibelius

At the first of the last pair of concerts to be given in Carnegie Hall this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will present, on Thursday evening, Bach's third "Brandenburg" concerto for three string orchestras, the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and the First Symphony of Brahms.

For the Saturday matinee Mr. Koussevitzky has arranged a two-part program consisting of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" and the "Surprise" symphony of Haydn, in G major. For the Liszt work the orchestra will have the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

The same program is announced for the last concert by the orchestra in its Friday night series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, O.

MAR 27 1937

ELLIS—Charles A., 81, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 14 at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, Boston. In 1881 he formed the first Boston Symphony Orchestra with 75 musicians but resigned in 1918 to form an opera company with Walter Damrosch.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 27 1937

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its last pair of concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The program of Thursday will begin with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, for three string orchestras, and will also include the Seventh Symphony, in one movement, by Sibelius. The closing number will be the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitzky will present Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures," for orchestra with male chorus and tenor solo. The symphony is in three parts, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The conclusion introduces the voices singing the "Chorus Mysticus," which also concludes the second part of Goethe's "Faust." The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the orchestra. The tenor soloist will be Rulon Y. Robison. As an introductory number on this program Mr. Koussevitzky will perform the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn in G major.

ZIT'S
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 27 1937

Boston Symphony On NBC April 1st

Boston Symphonk Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will broadcast a concert from Carnegie Hall, for the program on Apr. 1, from 8:45 to 9:30 P. M., EST, over the NBC-Blue Network. Koussevitzky has programmed the seldom-played Symphony No. 3 in F Major, Opus 90, by Brahms. This concert will be the last in the current season of broadcasts by the Boston Symphony to be heard from Carnegie Hal.

17

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
MAR 28 1937

In the World of Music

The Boston Symphony Orchestra consludes its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music on Friday night when the Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor, will assist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will present the "Faust" symphony of Liszt with the club. The "Surprise" symphony of Haydn will be the program prelude.

On Wednesday night Edwin Strawbridge and Lisa Parnova will present a program of modern and classic ballet numbers. Their Ballet Intime of 10 dangers will assist. The program is under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute.

Mmes. Rothberg and Doe and Messrs. Maison, Schorr, Habich, Baromeo, Laufkoetter, Clemens, Bada, Altglass and others. Mr. Bodanzky will conduct.

Metropolitan Finale

With tonight's concert the Metropolitan opera season will be brought to an official conclusion, although several individual performances are to be given before the Spring season starts. On Tuesday night, "Meistersinger" will be sung for the German-American Charities, with

In tonight's program the participants include Mme. Kaskas, Mr. Cordon, Mr. Bentonelli, Mme. Browning, Mme. Bodanya, Mr. Bonelli, Mme. Castagna, Mr. Carron, Mme. Engelman, Mme. Sayao, Mme. Bampton, Mr. Morelli, Mme. Rethberg, Mme. Vettori and Mr. Paltrinieri. Mr. Palletier will conduct.

The summary of the season, as compiled by Frank Wenker, demonstrates the strength of the German wing. "Thistan" proved the most active work in the season's repertoire, having been given eight performances. In all there were 37 performances of Wagnerian opera with "Walkuere" heard six times.

Verdi works were given 18 hearings, "Aida" proving the most active with eight hearings. Only two Puccini operas were presented, "Boheme" twice and "Butterfly" three times. "Pagliacci" was heard five times, "Cavalleria" three and "Lucia" but once. "Gioconda," one of the season's revivals, was given twice, while "Fliegende Hollaender," the German revival, had four performances.

The French school was also active, seven works having been given. "Coq d'Or," a revival, was heard five times, while "Samson" was given four times and "Tales of Hoffmann" three times. Both of these were also revivals.

In the English section, Richard Hageman's "Caponsacchi," a novelty, was given two performances, while Cimarosa's "Clandestine Marriage," a novelty sung in English, had two hearings. "The Bartered Bride," also Anglicized, and a hit of the last Spring season, was heard only three times.

In all 33 operas were presented and three ballets, including the two novelties and seven revivals. Philadelphia has six pergormances to Brooklyn five, with performanees given also in Hartford, Newark and Baltimore. Boston, Cleveland and Rochester will also be visited.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 27 1937

SEASON'S LAST CONCERT

Dr. Serge Kossevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Concert will give his final concert of the current Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music, next Friday night. Assisting in the concert will be the Harvard University Glee Club, with G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor.

The first half of the program will be Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," No. 94 in G major. The second half will be Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in three character pictures after Goethe. The Harvard Glee Club, with Rulon Y. Robison its tenor soloist, will sing the three tone pictures with the accompaniment of the orchestra.

RUTGERS HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITSKY

Times 3/31/37

Doctorate of Music Bestowed on the Conductor After His Concert There

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30.—After a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here this evening, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music from Rutgers University.

The degree was conferred by Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, before an audience of 3,200 faculty members, their wives, students of Rutgers and New Jersey College for Women and other friends of the university. In conferring the award, Dr. Clothier said:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, we are doubly happy to have you with us, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra, but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has interpreted the great masterpieces to countless lovers of music. You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and esthetic inheritance. Since we cannot acknowledge these rich achievements of yours at our commencement exercises in June, we seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the university and of your associates in the orchestra, to pay our tribute to you."

This is the third successive year that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played for the Rutgers concert series, tonight's performance closing the present series of five programs. The series is under the direction of Professor Howard D. McKinney, head of the Rutgers Music Department.

The program consisted of the symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 by Mendelssohn; a Siegfried idyl by Wagner and the symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 by Tchaikovsky.

RUTGERS HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

Mar 31/37

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. Clothier, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston Symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University winter concert series.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
MAR 21 1937

* * *

An estate in the Massachusetts countryside has been offered as a gift to the Boston Symphony for the furtherance of summer music.

10

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
AMERICAN
MAR 21 1937

Boston Concert To Start at 4:30, Conclude at 10

BOSTON, March 20. (Universal).—Paralelling the stage's famed long-distance drama,

ETC. like above Right

What's Going On in

Monitor Mar. 31/37

The St. Matthew Passion

For the benefit of its pension fund and in observance of Good Friday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra repeated yesterday afternoon and last evening the performance of the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach which it had submitted a year ago.

Repeated is not quite the word, for this performance was really an improvement over last year's. The Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor) sang with quite extraordinary beauty of tone, precision, balance and expressiveness. The tenor, John Priebe, lent a new authority and poignancy to the words of the Evangelist. Fritz Lechner, bass, commanded a practiced routine if not a clear English diction.

The other vocal soloists were those of last year—Keith Falkner for the words of Jesus, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, and Kathryn Meisle, contralto. If anything, the work of them all seemed better than that of a year ago. And of course the orchestra and its solo voices were of the unsurpassed quality that we so readily take for granted. To Dr. Koussevitzky and to Mr. Woodworth must go cordial appreciation for the devotion and the artistic integrity which produced this result.

There are still reservations about details. The volume of choral tone is sometimes too big. The violent fortissimos on relatively unimportant choral utterances, such as "Not upon the Feast," are disturbing. And the absurdity of the translations of some parts of the text clashes with the beauty and dignity of the Biblical passages.

Yet in spite of these shortcomings, the performance as a whole and in most of its parts remained reverential and profoundly impressive. The large audience listened raptly and rewarded the artists with warm applause. A larger audience will be able to enjoy the St. Matthew Passion when the records made at yesterday's performance become available.

L. A. S.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Finnish Child

Bronze by George Demetrios, in a Display of His Works at Symphony Hall. The Exhibition Was Reviewed in These Columns on Tuesday

---

PHILIP HALE'S LIBRARY

Her. Mar 31/37

The exhibit by the Widener library of books from the collection of the late Philip Hale, music and dramatic critic of The Herald, includes various editions of Whitman [illegible] as it should be, for the "good gray poet" was dear to him. He quoted from Whitman continually, with no slighting of the stouter shocking passages, recommended him to friends, and gave them copies of "Leaves of Grass" as a mark of affection.

The devotion of Mr. Hale to Whitman is easily explained. Both loved men as men, whether they were pugilists, garbage collectors, professors or presidents of theological seminaries. Both had a preference for men who were not over-nice, and who paid scant attention to the little conventions of life.

One of the minor regrets of Mr. Hale was that he had never seen Walt Whitman, only Mrs. Whitman, his mother, being at the Brooklyn home the day Mr. Hale called. She said to him that she did not know whether her son was a great poet, but that nobody could have a boy who was more "clever"—meaning generous. Since that remark "clever" connoted Walt Whitman to Mr. Hale.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
MAR 21 1937

Boston Symphony To Present Noted Work by Bach

BOSTON, Mar. 20.—(US)—Paralleling the stage's famed long-distance drama, "Mourning Becomes Electra," the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present Bach's monumental "St. Matthew Passion" in a special symphony hall pension fund concert on Good Friday.

Assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, and a group of noted artists, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin the Bach program at 4:30 in the afternoon.

It will not conclude until after 10 p. m. Time out will be taken for dinner, just as in O'Neil's unique stage creation, and the second part of the concert will be resumed at 8:15 p. m. Just as in rehearsals the performers have to be served meals between notes.

A sell-out audience from all New England is indicated.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
MAR 20 1937

Music in Review

Berg's Violin Concerto Introduced By Bostonians—Notes On Other Activities Here and Abroad

BY HENRY PLEASANTS

EVER since the sudden and premature death of Alban Berg last year in Vienna, followers of contemporary music in this country have awaited with interest the first performances of the Viennese modernist's last completed work, the Violin Concerto. The piece was composed for Louis Krasner in memory of Manon Gropius, daughter of the widow of Gustav Mahler, who died in 1935 at the age of 18. Berg conceived the work as a threnody for his young friend.

The honor of introducing it in the United States fell to Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. With Mr. Krasner as ~~the soloist~~ they played it in Boston at the concerts of March 5 and 6, and a week later brought it to New York. In both cities the concerto was accorded the attention due the last work of a composer acknowledged to be one of the masters of his generation. The public and critical response was varied. In New York, W. J. Henderson reported in The Sun that "the audience bestowed upon it the resolute applause of perplexed minds and went forth into the corridors to submerge itself in speculation."

Mr. Henderson's own feeling as reflected in his review was hardly speculative. "If," he wrote, "it demonstrates a progress in the art, it is a progress from healthy, frank and candid expression of spontaneous ideas to artificial embalming of thought, laboriously conceived and developed, and already clouded with the shadow of decay." The New York reviewers generally agreed about the sincerity and the masterly workmanship disclosed in the concerto. And most of them concluded that the work is not up to the standard of some of Berg's earlier compositions

---

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAR 21 1937

To Present 5-Hr. Bach Program

BOSTON, March 20 (US)—Paralelling the stage's famed long-distance drama, "Mourning Becomes Electra," the Boston Symphony orchestra will present Bach's monumental "St. Matthew Passion" in a special Symphony hall pension fund concert on Good Friday.

Assisted by the Harvard Glee club, the Radcliffe Choral society, and a group of noted artists, the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin the Bach program at 5:30 in the afternoon It will not conclude until after 10 p. m. Time out will be taken for dinner, just as in O'Neil's unique stage creation, and the second part of the concert will be resumed at 8:15 p. m. Just as in rehearsals the performers have to be served meals between notes. A sell-out audience from all New England is indicated.

RODZINSKI TO LEAD 10 RADIO CONCERTS

Engaged for New N B C Symphony Orchestra in Series to Supplement Toscanini

Times 3/31/37

YEAR-ROUND BASIS SEEN

Ensemble of at Least 80 Men to Be Placed Under Contract for 52-Week Season

Artur Rodzinski has been engaged to conduct the NBC Symphony Orchestra in a series of ten radio concerts supplementary to the ten which will be directed by Arturo Toscanini late this year, it was announced yesterday by Lenox R. Lohr, president of the National Broadcasting Company. Both series will be included in a season expanded to fifty-two weeks. The appointment was made at the suggestion of Mr. Toscanini.

Mr. Rodzinski's concerts will be arranged to precede and follow those directed by Mr. Toscanini. The Polish conductor will supervise the selection of the personnel of the orchestra, which will be composed of a minimum of eighty members.

To be assured of the engagement of musicians of high calibre, NBC has expanded the season to fifty-two weeks, and will offer contracts for that period. Mr. Lohr stated that members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra would not be approached for engagement in the NBC orchestra.

Mr. Rodzinski's concerts, like those to be conducted by Mr. Toscanini, will be sustaining programs. The remaining thirty-two concerts, to be directed by guest conductors not yet announced, may be commercially sponsored, but the matter is still under consideration.

Dates for the concerts have not yet been selected, Mr. Lohr said, but Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings are possibilities. NBC wil ltry to fix all the concerts at the same day and hour of each week.

Mr. Rodzinski's duties with the NBC orchestra will not interfere with his conducting of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. His salary was not revealed, but Mr. Lohr said it would be comparable to his remunerations from other symphonic organizations.

At Salzburg, where he will open the annual music festival in July, Mr. Rodzinski will confer with Mr. Toscanini.

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the second Bach Brandenburg Concerto in F at its concert in Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening instead of the third Brandenburg Concerto, as originally announced.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
Mar REGISTER 31/37

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE BACH'S GREATEST WORK

BOSTON, March 20. — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the past few days, and now believes the St. Matthews Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston Symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore had accorded that honor to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with its massive choral passages.

But, he says, renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present next Friday—Good Friday—with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

"Because the Matthew Passion is the most formidable, the deepest, the greatest composition in all musical literature."

MOST MODERN COMPOSER

Doctor Koussevitzky was asked if this composition, written in 1729, came as a sharp contrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances a week ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technique is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years, I suppose it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes, the oratoric will be presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It will start at 4 P. M. with an intermission for dinner about 6 P. M.

18

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
MAR 21 1937

Radcliffe, Harvard Clubs Will Sing Bach

Boston Will Have Lengthy Performance Good Friday, Koussevitzky Directing

Symphony Director Selects St. Matthew Passion as Greatest in Music Literature

Boston, March 20 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the last few days, and now believes the St. Matthew passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "Greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston Symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore has accorded that honor to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with its massive choral passages.

He says renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present next Friday—Good Friday—with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

"Because the Matthew Passion is the most formidable, the deepest, the great composition in all musical literature."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked if this composition, written in 1729, came as a sharp contrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances a week ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technique is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years, I suppose, it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes, the Oratorio will be presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It will start at 4 P.M., with an intermission for dinner about 6 P.M.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

Olin Downes, famous New York music critic, has written an unusually fine tribute to the late Charles A. Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra whose burial took place in Boston last Wednesday. Mr. Ellis was the orchestra's manager from 1881 up until the retirement of Henry L. Higginson in 1918.

Mr. Downes writes: "He was utterly true to his place and his period. Traditions of simplicity, honor, courtliness, hospitality, were typical of his breeding and generation. He abhorred publicity about himself. His conception of power was that of responsibility. Withal, Charles Ellis was exceptionally interested in the passing show, and especially in the personal activities and interests of his friends. He chose to resign from the Boston Symphony at the same time that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, its founder, took leave of its affairs, in the spring of 1918, and following the catastrophic events of the World War, which included the arrest and incarceration of the conductor to whom both men were greatly devoted and whom they profoundly admired, Dr. Karl Muck, their leader of many years.

"Very characteristically, Charles Ellis stood publicly and prominently by the side of Dr. Muck thru all of his last tragic days in this country. Others may have differed with this attitude as strongly as Ellis entertained it. That made no difference whatever to him, the truest of friends. Ellis was more than unpopular, he was under a cloud, and lost many friends and much influence by the stand he took at the time. He never flinched, and would not have flinched under torture in his fidelity to one in whose character, motives and art he had complete faith. There never was a truer man or friend, and now that the passions of that war period are past the only memory of the affair, where Charles Ellis is concerned, is honor to him who never hesitated, at any conjuncture in life, to stand up and be counted."

EVANSTON, ILL.
NEWS INDEX

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS.

His name is Dimitri Mitropoulos.

That name doesn't mean much now to the average American. But to millions of lovers of the finest music, this may be the open sesame to great enjoyment in the future.

For this is the cognomen of that latest sensation in directors, a native of Athens. We have all known and admired the magnificent art of the matchless Toscanini. Now he is to come back, at least temporarily, when many of us believed his retirement was to be permanent.

Mitropoulos is the magnetic orchestra conductor who so charmed the cultured audiences of Boston in a few concerts that he was urged to become the permanent conductor of the orchestra when the renowned Serge Koussevitzky retires within two years.

That announcement may affect radio music fans all over the United States when this great master of music arrives to begin his contract. But there is a better phase to this news since an energetic woman manager of the Minneapolis symphony, Mrs. Carlyle Scott, has prevailed on Mitropoulos to conduct this famous orchestra for the two years preceding his engagement with the Boston symphony. Thus the genius of this fiery leader will enrich especially the Middle West for a time with his particular brand of art.

While we pay tribute to Dizzy Dean or the latest fight champion, or the great American basketball star, we might also pause for a moment to do honor to the Greek wielder of the baton. However, the baton is not required by this master. He is said to bring forth the greatest music by the witchery of his hypnotic eyes and the magic of his expressive fingers. This is news of the first order to music lovers of all America.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

Boston Programs.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with soloists and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses is to present the St. Matthew Passion music of Bach on Friday afternoon and evening, as set forth elsewhere in this column, it should be noticed that the matinee program will be given tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon. It will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D.

That was a striking juxtaposition on the regular symphony programs last week when Dr. Koussevitzky followed up the naive and polite Surprise Symphony of Haydn with the first Boston performance of the new Third Symphony of the modernist, Nicolai Berezowsky. The one was all grace and clarity. The other turbulent, turgid and angular, yet with some striking effects in the way of building up a climax. On the whole it was more easy to appreciate than a previous symphony by the same composer. The second half of the program, devoted to compositions by Sibelius was notable for a perfectly thrilling interpretation of the familiar tone poem "Finlandia." This has been heard so often in performances by amateurs and by professional groups which are not of the first rank that it was a revelation to hear it played by an orchestra of virtuosi. It was the finest interpretation of this work that we remember to have heard.

Bach's Passion Music.

Lenten traditions dating back fifteen hundred years are embodied in John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," which will be presented in Boston on Good Friday at Symphony hall. The performance, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will combine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the three hundred voices of the joined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and six notable soloists. On such a scale is the work, that it will require the afternoon and evening to complete one performance.

Koussevitzky says of the "Matthew Passion:" "In this marvellous work, Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions, or to win favor. He simply wrote from the depths of his heart and soul, and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

The words of Christ will be sung by Keith Falkner, eminent young English bass-baritone. He was a Royal Naval Air Service pilot in the World war, and also has made his mark in cricket and hockey. Other soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass.

The afternoon performance will begin at 4.30 and after an intermission for dinner or supper th

---

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

Boston Symphony Program For Tuesday is Announced

Mendelssohn, Wagner and Tschaikowsky Works Will Be Played; Final Concert in Rutgers Series for This Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will appear under the auspices of the department of music of Rutgers University in the final concert of the season next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in the Rutgers gymnasium.

The program for the last of the concert series was announced today as follows:

Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major, Italian, Ap. 90.

I Allegro Vivace; II, Andante con moto; III Con moto Moderato; IV Sattarello presto.

Wagner, A Siegrfried Idyl.

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor Op 3.

I Andante sostenuto Moderato conanima in Movemento di Valse; II Andantino in modo di canzona; III Scherzo pizzicato Ostinato: allegro; IV Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Group's 56th Year

The Boston Symphony is concluding its 56th year as one of the most famous orchestras in America or Europe. For the past 13 years Dr. Koussevitzky has been its leader, the longest tenure for any conductor. There has been no notable change in the personnel of 110 musicians of the orchestra since its appearance here last year.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson with 70 selected musicians. Today the orchestra is an institution in Boston.

Olin Downes in The New York Times last year voiced public opinion and drew attention to "Dr. Koussevitzky's originality and enterprise in program making, to his rare gifts as an interpreter, and to the qualities of the wonderful orchestra which he has not only developed technically to the fine edge of virtuosity, but endowed with a sensibility and a tone quality that would set the band apart from any other, whenever or wherever it played."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

The Harvard Glee Club

With the Boston Symphony in Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony at the Academy Friday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has issued the eighth symphony of Beethoven performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This shortest of Beethoven's symphonies, despite the high esteem in which it is held by discerning critics, is still the least frequently performed of the master's greater orchestral creations. All the efforts of the commentators have not sufficed to enkindle the affections of the majority of concertgoers for the four movements of this symphony in which Beethoven has accomplished the tonal sublimation of the elements of humor in incomparable fashion. As in Beethoven's own day, his admirers still prefer the seventh symphony, which along with its three dionysiac movements, reminds them in the pensive allegretto that Beethoven has not forgotten the sterner aspects of life.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation reflects the work's immanent qualities veraciously, the tonal texture is vibrant and translucent and the recording, mechanically considered, is first rate.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
MAR 28 1937

BOSTON BAND ENDS SEASON HERE APRIL 2

The closing concert of the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be held April 2 at the Academy of Music.

Joining the orchestra in the final of five concerts will be the Harvard Glee Club.

The series was presented under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The orchestra is conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

18

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
MAR 21 1937

Radcliffe, Harvard Clubs Will Sing Bach

Boston Will Have Lengthy Performance Good Friday, Koussevitzky Directing

Symphony Director Selects St. Matthew Passion as Greatest in Music Literature

Boston, March 20 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the last few days, and now believes the St. Matthew passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "Greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston Symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore has accorded that honor to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with its massive choral passages.

He says renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present next Friday—Good Friday—with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

"Because the Matthew Passion is, the most formidable, the deepest, the great composition in all musical literature."

Dr. Koussevitzky was asked if this composition, written in 1729, came as a sharp contrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances a week ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technique is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years, I suppose, it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes. the Oratorio will be presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It will start at 4 P.M., with an intermission for dinner about 6 P.M.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
MAR 23 1937

Olin Downes, famous New York music critic, has written an unusually fine tribute to the late Charles A. Ellis, first manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra whose burial took place in Boston last Wednesday. Mr. Ellis was the orchestra's manager from 1881 up until the retirement of Henry L. Higginson in 1918.

Mr. Downes writes: "He was utterly true to his place and his period. Traditions of simplicity, honor, courtliness, hospitality, were typical of his breeding and generation. He abhorred publicity about himself. His conception of power was that of responsibility. Withal, Charles Ellis was exceptionally interested in the passing show, and especially in the personal activities and interests of his friends. He chose to resign from the Boston Symphony at the same time that Colonel Henry L. Higginson, its founder, took leave of its affairs, in the spring of 1918, and following the catastrophic events of the World War, which included the arrest and incarceration of the conductor to whom both men were greatly devoted and whom they profoundly admired, Dr. Karl Muck, their leader of many years.

"Very characteristically, Charles Ellis stood publicly and prominently by the side of Dr. Muck thru all of his last tragic days in this country. Others may have differed with this attitude as strongly as Ellis entertained it. That made no difference whatever to him, the truest of friends. Ellis was more than unpopular, he was under a cloud, and lost many friends and much influence by the stand he took at the time. He never flinched, and would not have flinched under torture in his fidelity to one in whose character, motives and art he had complete faith. There never was a truer man or friend, and now that the passions of that war period are past the only memory of the affair, where Charles Ellis is concerned, is honor to him who never hesitated, at any conjuncture in life, to stand up and be counted."

EVANSTON, ILL.
NEWS INDEX
MAR 24 1937

DIMITRI MITROPOULOS.

His name is Dimitri Mitropoulos.

That name doesn't mean much now to the average American. But to millions of lovers of the finest music, this may be the open sesame to great enjoyment in the future.

For this is the cognomen of that latest sensation in directors, a native of Athens. We have all known and admired the magnificent art of the matchless Toscanini. Now he is to come back, at least temporarily, when many of us believed his retirement was to be permanent.

Mitropoulos is the magnetic orchestra conductor who so charmed the cultured audiences of Boston in a few concerts that he was urged to become the permanent conductor of the orchestra when the renowned Serge Koussevitzky retires within two years.

That announcement may affect radio music fans all over the United States when this great master of music arrives to begin his contract. But there is a better phase to this news since an energetic woman manager of the Minneapolis symphony, Mrs. Carlyle Scott, has prevailed on Mitropoulos to conduct this famous orchestra for the two years preceding his engagement with the Boston symphony. Thus the genius of this fiery leader will enrich especially the Middle West for a time with his particular brand of art.

While we pay tribute to Dizzy Dean or the latest fight champion, or the great American basketball star, we might also pause for a moment to do honor to the Greek wielder of the baton. However, the baton is not required by this master. He is said to bring forth the greatest music by the witchery of his hypnotic eyes and the magic of his expressive fingers. This is news of the first order to music lovers of all America.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
MAR 24 1937

Boston Programs.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with soloists and the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses is to present the St. Matthew Passion music of Bach on Friday afternoon and evening, as set forth elsewhere in this column, it should be noticed that the matinee program will be given tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon. It will include Bach's Brandenburg Concerto, No. 2 in F major; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D.

That was a striking juxtaposition on the regular symphony programs last week when Dr. Koussevitzky followed up the naive and polite Surprise Symphony of Haydn with the first Boston performance of the new Third Symphony of the modernist, Nicolai Berezowsky. The one was all grace and clarity. The other turbulent, turgid and angular, yet with some striking effects in the way of building up a climax. On the whole it was more easy to appreciate than a previous symphony by the same composer. The second half of the program, devoted to compositions by Sibelius was notable for a perfectly thrilling interpretation of the familiar tone poem "Finlandia." This has been heard so often in performances by amateurs and by professional groups which are not of the first rank that it was a revelation to hear it played by an orchestra of virtuosi. It was the finest interpretation of this work that we remember to have heard.

Bach's Passion Music.

Lenten traditions dating back fifteen hundred years are embodied in John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," which will be presented in Boston on Good Friday at Symphony hall. The performance, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will combine the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the three hundred voices of the joined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and six notable soloists. On such a scale is the work, that it will require the afternoon and evening to complete one performance.

Koussevitzky says of the "Matthew Passion:" "In this marvellous work, Bach wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions, or to win favor. He simply wrote from the depths of his heart and soul, and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

The words of Christ will be sung by Keith Falkner, eminent young English bass-baritone. He was a Royal Naval Air Service pilot in the World war, and also has made his mark in cricket and hockey. Other soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, and Fritz Lechner, bass.

The afternoon performance will begin at 4.30 and after an intermission for dinner or supper th

---

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 25 1937

Boston Symphony Program For Tuesday is Announced

Mendelssohn, Wagner and Tschaikowsky Works Will Be Played; Final Concert in Rutgers Series for This Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will appear under the auspices of the department of music of Rutgers University in the final concert of the season next Tuesday evening at 8:15 o'clock in the Rutgers gymnasium.

The program for the last of the concert series was announced today as follows:

Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major, Italian, Ap. 90.

I Allegro Vivace; II, Andante con moto; III Con moto Moderato; IV Sattarello presto.

Wagner, A Siegrfried Idyl.

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor Op 3.

I Andante sostenuto Moderato conanima in Movemento di Valse; II Andantino in modo di canzona; III Scherzo pizzicato Ostinato: allegro; IV Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

Group's 56th Year

The Boston Symphony is concluding its 56th year as one of the most famous orchestras in America or Europe. For the past 13 years Dr. Koussevitzky has been its leader, the longest tenure for any conductor. There has been no notable change in the personnel of 110 musicians of the orchestra since its appearance here last year.

The orchestra was founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson with 70 selected musicians. Today the orchestra is an institution in Boston.

Olin Downes in The New York Times last year voiced public opinion and drew attention to "Dr. Koussevitzky's originality and enterprise in program making, to his rare gifts as an interpreter, and to the qualities of the wonderful orchestra which he has not only developed technically to the fine edge of virtuosity, but endowed with a sensibility and a tone quality that would set the band apart from any other, whenever or wherever it played."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 28 1937

The Harvard Glee Club

With the Boston Symphony in Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony at the Academy Friday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 28 1937

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has issued the eighth symphony of Beethoven performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Kousse~~vitzky.~~ This shortest of Beethoven's symphonies, despite the high esteem in which it is held by discerning critics, is still the least frequently performed of the master's greater orchestral creations. All the efforts of the commentators have not sufficed to enkindle the affections of the majority of concertgoers for the four movements of this symphony in which Beethoven has accomplished the tonal sublimation of the elements of humor in incomparable fashion. As in Beethoven's own day, his admirers still prefer the seventh symphony, which along with its three dionysiac movements, reminds them in the pensive allegretto that Beethoven has not forgotten the sterner aspects of life.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation reflects the work's immanent qualities veraciously, the tonal texture is vibrant and translucent and the recording, mechanically considered, is first rate.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
MAR 28 1937

BOSTON BAND ENDS SEASON HERE APRIL 2

The closing concert of the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be held April 2 at the Academy of Music.

Joining the orchestra in the final of five concerts will be the Harvard Glee Club.

The series was presented under auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The orchestra is conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 28 1937

HARVARD GLEE CLUB TO SING IN CONCERT

To Assist Boston Symphony in Its Closing Appearance at Academy Friday Night

LIBRARY AIDED BY GIFTS

Collections Added to Shelves of School Settlement—Museum Concert Today

The Harvard Glee Club will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the presentation of Franz Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures," the closing concert of the orchestra's fifty-first Brooklyn season, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

The symphony is in three parts, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The movement marked "Andante mistico" will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club, with Rulon Y. Robison as tenor soloist. The program will open with Haydn's Surprise Symphony in G major.

The series of five concerts has been under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, headed by R. Huntington Woodman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Miss Frances Coutts will be hostess in the committee box at the concert. The boxholders will include Mr. and Mrs. Van Sinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy and members of the staff at Fort Hamilton.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum has served as chairman of the boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership, and Miss Virginia Marvin, junior league committee.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

MAR 28 1937

Bach's 'Passion' Held Greatest

BOSTON — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about face during the last few days and now believes the "St. Matthew Passion" of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston Symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore has accorded that honor to Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with its massive choral passages.

Renewed close study of the Bach score, which he presented Good Friday with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall, has caused him to change his mind, he said.

"You observe I repeated the 'Matthew Passion' after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask," he said. "Because the 'Matthew Passion' is the most formidable, the deepest, the great composition in all musical literature."

Koussevitzky was asked if that composition, written in 1729, came as a sharp cantrast after the modern violin concerto of the late Alban Berg, written only two years ago and given its first American performances two weeks ago here and in New York by the Boston Symphony.

"On the contrary," the conductor replied vehemently, "I find Bach the most modern of composers. His technic is unsurpassed. His harmonic development is such that after a thousand years I suppose it still will be modern. The source of all modern music is Bach."

Based on classical religious themes, the oratorio was presented in two sections lasting nearly six hours. It began at 4 p. m., with an intermission for dinner about 6 p. m.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 28 1937

Final Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra Season to Be Friday

Miss Frances Coutts will be hostess in the committee box at the closing concert of the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday at the Academy of Music. Other boxholders will be Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, and, at the invitation of the Brooklyn Committee, members of the staff at Fort Hamilton Army Post will occupy a box.

The Harvard Glee Club will join forces with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the presentation of the final concert. The feature of the evening will be the performance of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures," for orchestra with male chorus and tenor solo. This often has been named the masterwork of the composer.

The symphony is in three parts, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The conclusion introduces the voices singing the "Chorus Mysticus," which also concludes the second part of Goethe's "Faust." Rulon Y. Robison will sing the tenor solo and the Harvard Glee Club the chorus.

The three movements are integrated by the recurrence in the second and third parts of the principal Faust motives; in the second part these motives are blended with the music of Gretchen, and in the third part they are twisted and derided by te mockery of Mephistopheles.

As an introductory number on this program, Dr. Kousevitzky has selected the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn in G major.

The series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn is given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Mr. Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

Assisting in the interest of the 51st season were Mrs. Blum as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 29 1937

Boston Symphony to End Season Here Friday Night; Harvard Glee Club to Be Heard

The Harvard Glee Club will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final concert of the orchestra's fifty-first borough season on Friday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The singers will be heard in Liszt's "Faust Symphony" for orchestra, male chorus and tenor solo. Rulon Y. Robison will be the soloist. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor will open the program with Haydn's "Suhprise" Symphony in G Major.

Miss Frances Coutts will be the hostess in the committee box. Other box holders will be Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mr. and Mrs Robert E. Blum, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., the Associate Alumni of Adelphi Academy of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president; Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives. At the invitation of the Brooklyn Committee, members of the staff at Fort Hamilton Army Post also will occupy a box.

The concerts have been given here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman is chairman and the Brooklyn Committee of which Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Others assisting were: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, as chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

MAR 28 1937

Koussevitzky May Establish American Music Festival

NEW YORK, March 27 (AP)—One of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished dreams, an American music festival of genuine artistic quality, is becoming concrete.

But it will not be "the American Salzburg," or the "Brayreuth of the Berkshires," even though the situation has all the charm of the old world.

"I should like to make it clear," says Dr. Koussevitzky, that the comparisons between this festival and other musical festivals in Europe or elsewhere are mistakenly conceived."

Wider Scope

What Dr. Koussevitzky wants is to establish a summer music festival of "a greater and wider scope" than hitherto known in the United States. The project has been brought much nearer by two things.

One is Mrs. Gorham Brooks' gift of "Tanglewood," a lovely old estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston symphony. The other is the astounding success of last summer's festival, for which Dr. Koussevitzky returned from Europe; and at which he led the full personnel of his famous orchestra.

There were only three of these concerts; next August there will be six.

Festivals Grown Up

"Festivals of music have grown up," says Dr. Koussevitzky, "for various purposes and on a scale commensurate with their surroundings. The success of the festival last summer was evidence enough that the need had come for music of the finest sort in the heart of New England in the summer season.

"While symphonic music will be largely the basis of these festivals, we may look forward within a year or two to the presentation of some of the great choral works, and, in concert form, some of the more significant operas."

Plans Considered

The venture will try to keep apace with the growth of interest and desire; plans are being based on figures which have a tendency to run away, however. Last summer the average audience was 5,000. The full personnel of the orchestra will be used again this summer.

An effort to make the festival fit the "interests and desires" of American music lovers will be made, even that is not quite all the story.

The festival will be, says Dr. Koussevitzky, "quite free from all commercial aspects."

This is a direct answer to certain European festivals, where artistic considerations have been submerged, or at any rate seriously threatened, by eagerness for tourist money.

Dr. Koussevitzky means you won't need a Tyrolean costume for the Berkshire festival next summer.

ITHACA, N. Y.
JOURNAL-NEWS

MAR 29 1937

'Music Hath Charms'

Music lovers will be delighted to find the new Victor records at Lent's Music Store, 116 North Aurora Street. We were thrilled especially by Symphony No. 8 in F Major (Beethoven, Op. 93) made less than two months ago by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. You'll find the work brilliant and sprightly, giving a wonderful opportunity to the superb string choirs of this great orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky has expressed the opinion, with which we heartily agree, that in this recording Higher Fidelity records touch a new peak of excellence. This splendid orchestra, with the advantage of an extraordinarily fine concert hall and recording by expert technicians, has produced a success which we believe well worth its price of $6.50.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

MAR 30 1937

Boston Symphony Closing Rutgers Winter Concerts

Special to Newark News.

NEW BRUNSWICK—The 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the Rutgers University Winter concert series in the gymnasium tonight. Professor Howard D. McKinney, director of music at Rutgers, said today the Boston group has been engaged to play the concluding concert in next year's concert series also.

Tonight's performance will mark the third appearance of the Boston orchestra at Rutgers campus. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. The program will include works of Mendelssohn, Wagner and Tchaikowsky.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 28 1937

LENTEN traditions dating back 1500 years are embodied in John Sebastian Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew," which was presented in Boston on Good Friday in Symphony Hall. The performance, which was conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, combined the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the 300 voices of the joined Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society and six notable soloists. The work is of such magnitude that it required the afternoon and evening to complete one performance.

The basis of the work, called "the richest and noblest example of devotional music in existence," is the 26th and 27th chapters of the St. Matthew Gospel. Every word of the narrative of the Last Supper, Christ's capture and crucifixion is set to music. Bach provided both solo and choral treatment of devotional poems commenting on the tragic episodes described by St. Matthew. The Lutheran chorales that form an important feature of the work were given superlatively beautiful harmonizations by Bach, "who wrote music in 1729 that defies time. He did not write to conform to passing fashions, but from the depths of his heart and soul and that is why this music lives and strikes direct to our hearts and souls today."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

Boston Symphony Plays for Forum Wednesday Night

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its only Philadelphia concert of the season on Wednesday evening in the Academy of Music, for the members of the Philadelphia Forum.

The program will consist of three numbers, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony (in A, Opus 90) and the symphonic fantasia by Sibelius, "Pohjola's Daurhter" (Opus 49), comprising the first half of the concert. The second half will be devoted to Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor (Opus 36).

Last season the Boston Symphony made its first appearance here in a number of years, in a concert for the Forum. Dr. Koussevitzky at that time presented a program comprised of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Bostonians' Last Visit

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its last visit of the season to Carnegie Hall this week. Serge Koussevitzky's program for Thursday night, April 1, includes two symphonies, the seventh of Sibelius and the first of Brahms. On Saturday afternoon Haydn's "Surprise" symphony will preface the "Faust" symphony in Liszt.

In the Liszt work the final chorus will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club with Rulon Y. Robison as the solo tenor.

N.Y. Tribune Mar. 27/37

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press
MAR 28 1937

Koussevitzky Hails Bach as 'Tops' in Music

Boston—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has turned an about-face during the last few days, and now believes the St. Matthew Passion of Johann Sebastian Bach is the "greatest composition in all musical literature."

The famous Boston Symphony conductor, who has been poring over all kinds of musical manuscripts for nearly half a century, heretofore has accorded that honor to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, with its massive choral passages.

But, he says, renewed close study of the Bach score, which he will present Friday — Good Friday — with the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall has caused him to change his mind.

"You observe I am repeating the Matthew Passion after two performances last season. Now, why, please ask.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
MAR 30 1937

Dr. Koussevitzky Here Tonight at Rutgers Concert

Last of College Series at 8:15 o'Clock in Gymnasium

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will appear in concert tonight at the Rutgers University gymnasium in the regular concert series of the university's music department. The program will begin at 8:15 o'clock.

The conditions now surrounding the Boston Symphony are far different from what they were in its earlier days when an orchestra of any sort was a rarity in this country, and a permanently established orchestra capable of doing full justice to a symphony of Mozart or Beethoven was otherwise unknown. For a performance of the quality which great music exacts there was no alternative but to turn to Boston, where an orchestra comparable to the best in Europe was nurtured and prized.

It is the general opinion wherever the orchestra plays that the 108 musicians of its personnel individuality or as a drilled ensemble, are scarcely to be matched in any city of the world; that the conductor's brilliant command, his revivifying and searching imagination, which is the very life of the orchestra which he directs, are quite without parallel.

PROGRAMS OF T

Season's Final Visit of Bosto Form—Ensei

Times - Mar. 28/37

THE Boston Symphony will give its last pair of concerts of the season at Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the matinee performance the orchestra will be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison, tenor.

This afternoon the Philharmonic-Symphony will present the third act of "Parsifal" in concert form, with Paul Althouse, Julius Huehn and Emanuel List. Other features on the orchestra's programs this week will be a concert version of Karol Szymanowski's ballet-pantomime "Harnasie," sung in Polish; Myra Hess as piano soloist in the Brahms Concerto No. 2, and the first New York performance of Ernest Bloch's "Voice in the Wilderness," with Joseph Schuster as solo 'cellist.

20 3 - 31/37 Rutgers University, New Brunswick,

Doctorate Awarded to Dr. Koussevitzky In Recognition of Musical Achievements

President Clothier Presented Doctor of Music Degree To Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra At Final Concert, Last Evening

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was awarded a degree of Doctor of Music by the University, following the concert by the orchestra in the gymnasium, last night. The presentation of the award was made by President Robert C. Clothier in recognition of Dr. Koussevitzky's great contributions to the aesthetic and cultural background of civilization by his interpretations of musical masterpieces.

Recipient of Honorary Degree At Symphony Concert Last Night

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky

In presenting the degree, President Clothier stated, "And so, Dr. Goussevitzky, we are doubly happy to have you with us this evening—not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under inspiration of your genius—but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the University one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has interpreted the great masterpieces to countless lovers of music.

"You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance. Since we cannot acknowledge these rich achievements of yours at our Commencement Exercises in June, we seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the University and of your associates in the orchestra to pay our tribute to you.

"In testimony of our regard and appreciation, it is my privilege, at the direction of the Trustees of the University, to confer upon you, honoris causa, the degree of Doctor of Music."

Has Led Musical Career

Dr. Koussevitzky, a Russian by birth, was graduated from the Conservatory of Moscow as a Master of Free Arts, in 1894, after having been interested in the subject of music since his childhood. He served as professor at the Conservatory, and as soloist in the Imperial Theatre Orchestra until 1910 when he founded the Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra.

This organization, composed of 85 musicians, met with immediate popular approval and was the start of Dr. Koussevitzky's rise to fame. In 1920, he founded the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, and four years later was made conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which capacity he has remained.

He has been honored by leading nations of Europe and by the United States; and in addition to his work as conductor, he has been the author of many pieces for double bass and piano, and transcriptions from classical works.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 31 1937

RUTGERS HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITSKY

Doctorate of Music Bestowed on the Conductor After His Concert There

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30.—After a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here this evening, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music from Rutgers University.

The degree was conferred by Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, before an audience of 3,200 faculty members, their wives, students of Rutgers and New Jersey College for Women and other friends of the university. In conferring the award, Dr. Clothier said:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, we are doubly happy to have you with us, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra, but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has interpreted the great masterpieces to countless lovers of music. You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and esthetic inheritance. Since we cannot acknowledge these rich achievements of yours at our commencement exercises in June, we seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the university and of your associates in the orchestra, to pay our tribute to you."

This is the third successive year that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played for the Rutgers concert series, tonight's performance closing the present series of five programs. The series is under the direction of Professor Howard D. McKinney, head of the Rutgers Music Department.

The program consisted of the symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 by Mendelssohn; a Siegfried idyl by Wagner and the symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 by Tchaikovsky.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL
MAR 31 1937

Honorary Degree For Koussevitzky

New Brunswick, N. J., March 30.—(AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Or. Robert C. Clothier, University president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and one who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University winter concert series.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
[illegible] 31 1937

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky Is Honored by Rutgers

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAR 31 1937

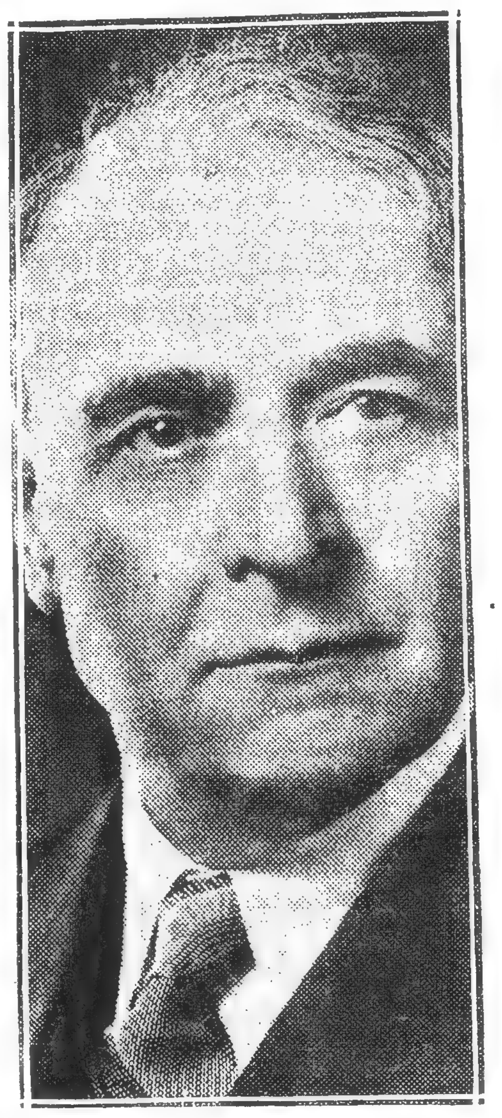
Degree Given Conductor of the Boston Symphony

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30—(A. P.)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 31 1937

Koussevitsky to Lead Boston Symphony Here

Famous Orchestra Will Present Civic Music Association Concert April 14 at Auditorium



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Serge Koussevitsky will bring his famous Boston Symphony orchestra here for a Worcester Civic Association concert in the Auditorium Wednesday night April 14. The noted conductor will present two compositions, Franck's "Symphony in D Minor" and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Head of the internationally known group of musicians since 1924, Conductor Koussevitsky has developed the orchestra into one distinction. He has conducted it longer than any other person.

The organization is more than a half century old. It was founded in 1881 in Boston by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, whose dream it was to establish in America an orchestra such as he had heard as a student in Vienna. From his private fortune, built through a lifetime of work, he engaged the finest musicians he could find in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. He gave the conductor full artistic freedom, and the result is the orchestra of today, one which demands and obtains the attention of the musical world.

The concert in the Auditorium promises to be one of the highlights of Worcester's musical season. The program follows:

Franck .... Symphony in D minor
- I. Lento. Allegro non troppo
- II. Allegretto
- III. Allegro non troppo

Intermission

Rimsky-Korsakov .... Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night,") Op. 35
- 1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship
- II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince
- III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess
- IV. Festival at Baghdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1937

Rutgers Honors Koussevitzky

Special to the Herald Tribune

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music tonight from Rutgers University, at the conclusion of a concert by his orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium. Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, in conferring the degree, welcomed "into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music," and told the conductor: "You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and esthetic inheritance."

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

Conductor of Symphony Gets Degree at Rutgers

(Special to the Times.)

NEW BRUNSWICK, March 31.—Just after the Boston Symphony had rendered a stirring concert to climax the Rutgers Winter concert series last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra for 13 years, received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music from the university.

Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of Rutgers, conferred the degree upon Dr. Koussevitzky as a surprise to all the 3,500 music lovers present.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 3[illegible]

Boston Symphony ~~At~~ Rutgers Tonight

NEW BRUNSWICK, March 30.—Climaxing the Rutgers University Winter concert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the Rutgers gymnasium tonight in a concert beginning at 8:15.

According to announcement today by Professor Howard D. McKinney, Rutgers director of music, the Boston symphonic group has been engaged to play the concluding concert in next year's concert series also.

Tonight's performance will mark the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Rutgers campus.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 31 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN DEGREE BY RUTGERS

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the orchestra was the third is as many years that the Boston Symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University Winter concert series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 1 - 1937

Philharmonic Plays Tribute to Szymanowski

Rodzinski Offers 'Harnasie,' Last Work of Composer Who Died on Monday

Chorus Sings It in Polish

Bach Transcription and Brahms on Program

By Francis D. Perkins

The last major work of Karol Szymanowski, "Harnasie," Op. 55, for orchestra, chorus and tenor solo, was performed for the first time here by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski's direction last night in Carnegie Hall, where black-bordered inserts in the program books gave news of the untimely death of Poland's best known contemporary composer last Monday, and asked the audience to regard the performance as "a tribute to the memory of a gifted and lamented artist."

"Harnasie" was sung in Polish by the choristers of the "Art of Musical Russia" group with Ivan Ivantzoff, who has often been in its operatic productions, as the solo tenor. Leo Weiner's now familiar transcription of Bach's toccata, adagio and fugue in C major opened the program, and its latter half was devoted to Brahms's piano concerto in B flat major, with Myra Hess as the soloist.

Cont. above right

Introduced Last Spring

The Szymanowski work was originally presented as a ballet pantomime last spring at the Paris Opera. In concert form, it was introduced to America under Dr. Rodzinski in the Cleveland Orchestra's concerts of February 4 and 6, when, coincidentally, Miss Hess was the soloist in the same concerto in which she delighted yesterday's listeners. The title according to Mr. Gilman's notes for this performance and those of Arthur Loesser for the Cleveland concerts, designates a group of mountaineers in the Tatra region of southern Poland, where Szymanowski spent many of his last years. While brigandage was among their occasional occupations, they were also given to artistic self-expression, especially in music, and "Harnasie" is described as a portrayal of their songs, dances, costumes and ceremonies, strung on a rather slender thread of plot. For the American concert performances, the musical episodes in the scenario were slightly rearranged in order.

Vigor of Dances Communicated

Of the Harnasiesque costumes and ceremonies, a performance of the work in concert form could hardly give an account, but it did give a communicative idea of some of the songs and dances in vigorous, zestful rhythms which accorded with the description of the mountaineers appended in the notes. There were contrasted episodes, such as the opening "Pastorale" and poetic closing song of the mountaineer chief to his captured bride, but the exultant, emphatic and swift-moving choruses probably made the strongest impression on those hearing the music for the first time.

Relatively few orchestral works of Szymanowski have been played here—the Philadelphia Orchestra introduced the first violin concerto in 1924 and the Boston Symphony gave the second concerto two years ago; the third symphony, "Song of the Night," was played by the Philharmonic in 1926—so that it might be injudicious to venture a definite opinion as to how far "Harnasie" expressed his musical individuality. For much of the work the folk flavor is the most prominent, and Szymanowski's treatment of the tunes is wisely unsophisticated, designed so as to emphasize their elan and local color. The nature of the tunes probably is mainly responsible for some hints of Stravinsky. The opening section has a certain dissonant and imaginative delicacy, and in the last section or two of the work there was much beauty in the composer's use of his polytonal harmonies in his melodies.

Memorial Limits Applause

The progress of the episodes was not always exactly clear, and this may have been one factor in the reserved nature of the applause—while the consideration that this performance was of a memorial nature probably also played a part in the rather short extent of the plaudits. The spirited performance, in which the chorus sang with convincing momentum and gusto, deserved praise; Mr. Ivantzoff sang artistically in his solos.

Mill Hess displayed her well known and consummate technical skill and tasteful musicianship in the concerto, interpreted by both the soloist and the orchestra with due mass and eloquence. In the first pages of the finale, the tempo seemed slightly deliberate, while the poetic reading of the andante by the pianist and by Joseph Schuster, the solo cellist, was a feature to be recalled with reminiscent pleasure. The Bach toccata and fugue received a brilliant and sonorous performance—a little too consistently so, according to some listeners—as a prelude to the later events of the evening. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, when Count George Potocki, the Polish Ambassador, will make a special trip here to hear his compatriot's music.

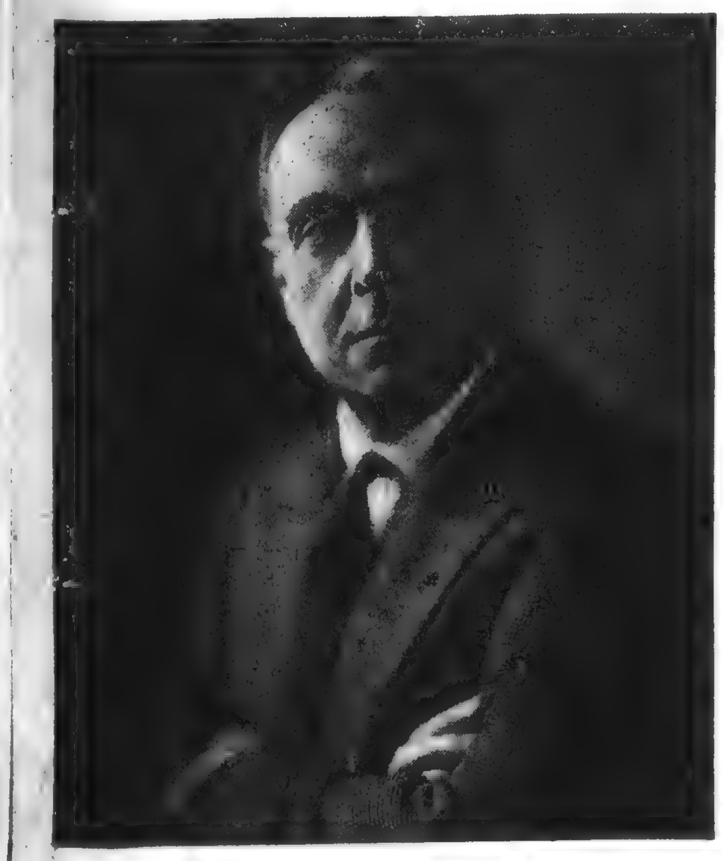
Mar. 31/37 Rutgers University, New Brunswick,

Doctorate Awarded to Dr. Koussevitzky In Recognition of Musical Achievements

President Clothier Presented Doctor of Music Degree To Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra At Final Concert, Last Evening

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was awarded a degree of Doctor of Music by the University, following the concert by the orchestra in the gymnasium, last night. The presentation of the award was made by President Robert C. Clothier in recognition of Dr. Koussevitzky's great contributions to the aesthetic and cultural background of civilization by his interpretations of musical masterpieces.

Recipient of Honorary Degree At Symphony Concert Last Night



Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky

In presenting the degree, President Clothier stated, "And so, Dr. Goussevitzky, we are doubly happy to have you with us this evening—not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under inspiration of your genius—but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the University one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has interpreted the great masterpieces to countless lovers of music.

"You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance. Since we cannot acknowledge these rich achievements of yours at our Commencement Exercises in June, we seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the University and of your associates in the orchestra to pay our tribute to you.

"In testimony of our regard and appreciation, it is my privilege, at the direction of the Trustees of the University, to confer upon you, honoris causa, the degree of Doctor of Music."

Has Led Musical Career

Dr. Koussevitzky, a Russian by birth, was graduated from the Conservatory of Moscow as a Master of Free Arts, in 1894, after having been interested in the subject of music since his childhood. He served as professor at the Conservatory, and as soloist in the Imperial Theatre Orchestra until 1910 when he founded the Koussevitzky Symphony Orchestra.

This organization, composed of 85 musicians, met with immediate popular approval and was the start of Dr. Koussevitzky's rise to fame. In 1920, he founded the Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, and four years later was made conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which capacity he has remained.

He has been honored by leading nations of Europe and by the United States; and in addition to his work as conductor, he has been the author of many pieces for double bass and piano, and transcriptions from classical works.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 31 1937

RUTGERS HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITSKY

Doctorate of Music Bestowed on the Conductor After His Concert There

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30.—After a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here this evening, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music from Rutgers University.

The degree was conferred by Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, before an audience of 3,200 faculty members, their wives, students of Rutgers and New Jersey College for Women and other friends of the university. In conferring the award, Dr. Clothier said:

"Dr. Koussevitzky, we are doubly happy to have you with us, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra, but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has interpreted the great masterpieces to countless lovers of music. You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and esthetic inheritance. Since we cannot acknowledge these rich achievements of yours at our commencement exercises in June, we seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the university and of your associates in the orchestra, to pay our tribute to you."

This is the third successive year that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has played for the Rutgers concert series, tonight's performance closing the present series of five programs. The series is under the direction of Professor Howard D. McKinney, head of the Rutgers Music Department.

The program consisted of the symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 by Mendelssohn; a Siegfried idyl by Wagner and the symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36 by Tchaikovsky.

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL
MAR 31 1937

Honorary Degree For Koussevitzky

New Brunswick, N. J., March 30.—(AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Or. Robert C. Clothier, University president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and one who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University winter concert series.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 31 1937

Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky Is Honored by Rutgers

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
MAR 31 1937

Degree Given Conductor of the Boston Symphony

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30—(A. P.)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 31 1937

Koussevitsky to Lead Boston Symphony Here

Famous Orchestra Will Present Civic Music Association Concert April 14 at Auditorium

Serge Koussevitsky will bring his famous Boston Symphony orchestra here for a Worcester Civic Association concert in the Auditorium Wednesday night April 14. The noted conductor will present two compositions, Franck's "Symphony in D Minor" and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Head of the internationally known group of musicians since 1924, Conductor Koussevitsky has developed the orchestra into one distinction. He has conducted it longer than any other person.

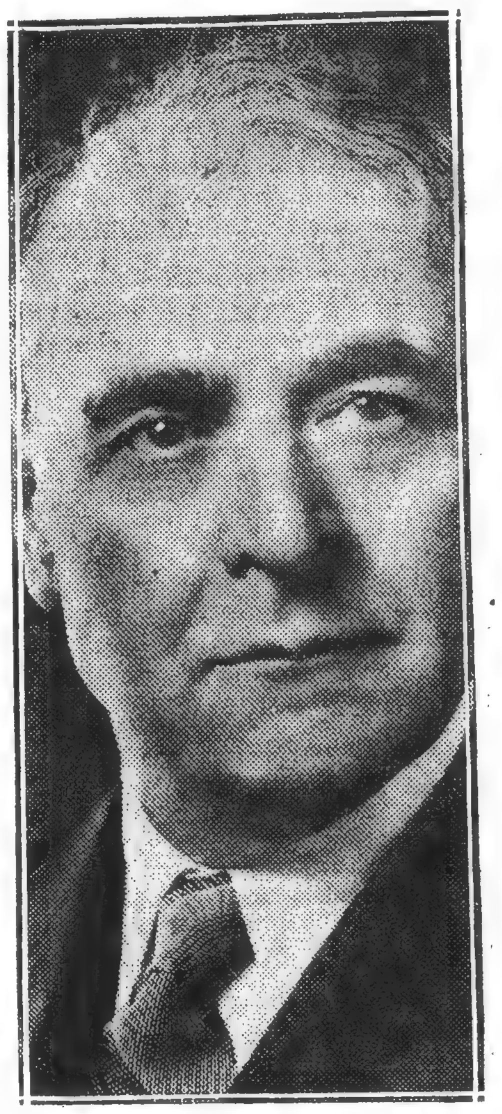
The organization is more than a half century old. It was founded in 1881 in Boston by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, whose dream it was to establish in America an orchestra such as he had heard as a student in Vienna. From his private fortune, built through a lifetime of work, he engaged the finest musicians he could find in Europe and brought to this country a succession of the greatest conductors of their time. He set a new precedent by exacting of the musicians entire devotion of their talents to the orchestra. He gave the conductor full artistic freedom, and the result is the orchestra of today, one which demands and obtains the attention of the musical world.

The concert in the Auditorium promises to be one of the highlights of Worcester's musical season. The program follows:

Franck .... Symphony in D minor
I. Lento. Allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo

Intermission

Rimsky-Korsakov .... Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night,") Op. 35
1. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship
II. The Story of the Kalandar Prince
III. The Young Prince and the Young Princess
IV. Festival at Baghdad. The Sea. The Ship goes to Pieces on a Rock surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.



SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 31 1937

Rutgers Honors Koussevitzky

Special to the Herald Tribune

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30.—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, received an honorary degree of Doctor of Music tonight from Rutgers University, at the conclusion of a concert by his orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium. Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of the university, in conferring the degree, welcomed "into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music." and told the conductor: "You have contributed in great measure to our cultural and esthetic inheritance."

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 31 1937

Conductor of Symphony Gets Degree at Rutgers

(Special to the Times.)

NEW BRUNSWICK, March 31.—Just after the Boston Symphony had rendered a stirring concert to climax the Rutgers Winter concert series last night, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra for 13 years, received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music from the university.

Dr. Robert C. Clothier, president of Rutgers, conferred the degree upon Dr. Koussevitzky as a surprise to all the 3,500 music lovers present.

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES
MAR 30 1937

Boston Symphony At Rutgers Tonight

NEW BRUNSWICK, March 30.—Climaxing the Rutgers University Winter concert series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in the Rutgers gymnasium tonight in a concert beginning at 8:15.

According to announcement today by Professor Howard D. McKinney, Rutgers director of music, the Boston symphonic group has been engaged to play the concluding concert in next year's concert series also.

Tonight's performance will mark the third appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Rutgers campus.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 1 - 1937

Philharmonic Plays Tribute to Szymanowski

Rodzinski Offers 'Harnasie,' Last Work of Composer Who Died on Monday

Chorus Sings It in Polish

Bach Transcription and Brahms on Program

By Francis D. Perkins

The last major work of Karol Szymanowski, "Harnasie," Op. 55, for orchestra, chorus and tenor solo, was performed for the first time here by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski's direction last night in Carnegie Hall, where black-bordered inserts in the program books gave news of the untimely death of Poland's best known contemporary composer last Monday, and asked the audience to regard the performance as "a tribute to the memory of a gifted and lamented artist."

"Harnasie" was sung in Polish by the choristers of the "Art of Musical Russia" group with Ivan Ivantzoff, who has often been in its operatic productions, as the solo tenor. Leo Weiner's now familiar transcription of Bach's toccata, adagio and fugue in C major opened the program, and its latter half was devoted to Brahms's piano concerto in B flat major, with Myra Hess as the soloist.

Cont. above right

Introduced Last Spring

The Szymanowski work was originally presented as a ballet pantomime last spring at the Paris Opera. In concert form, it was introduced to America under Dr. Rodzinski in the Cleveland Orchestra's concerts of February 4 and 6, when, coincidentally, Miss Hess was the soloist in the same concerto in which she delighted yesterday's listeners. The title according to Mr. Gilman's notes for this performance and those of Arthur Loesser for the Cleveland concerts, designates a group of mountaineers in the Tatra region of southern Poland, where Szymanowski spent many of his last years. While brigandage was among their occasional occupations, they were also given to artistic self-expression, especially in music, and "Harnasie" is described as a portrayal of their songs, dances, costumes and ceremonies, strung on a rather slender thread of plot. For the American concert performances, the musical episodes in the scenario were slightly rearranged in order.

Vigor of Dances Communicated

Of the Harnasiesque costumes and ceremonies, a performance of the work in concert form could hardly give an account, but it did give a communicative idea of some of the songs and dances in vigorous, zestful rhythms which accorded with the description of the mountaineers appended in the notes. There were contrasted episodes, such as the opening "Pastorale" and poetic closing song of the mountaineer chief to his captured bride, but the exultant, emphatic and swift-moving choruses probably made the strongest impression on those hearing the music for the first time.

Relatively few orchestral works of Szymanowski have been played here—the Philadelphia Orchestra introduced the first violin concerto in 1924 and the Boston Symphony gave the second concerto two years ago; the third symphony, "Song of the Night," was played by the Philharmonic in 1926—so that it might be injudicious to venture a definite opinion as to how far "Harnasie" expressed his musical individuality. For much of the work the folk flavor is the most prominent, and Szymanowski's treatment of the tunes is wisely unsophisticated, designed so as to emphasize their elan and local color. The nature of the tunes probably is mainly responsible for some hints of Stravinsky. The opening section has a certain dissonant and imaginative delicacy, and in the last section or two of the work there was much beauty in the composer's use of his polytonal harmonies in his melodies.

Memorial Limits Applause

The progress of the episodes was not always exactly clear, and this may have been one factor in the reserved nature of the applause—while the consideration that this performance was of a memorial nature probably also played a part in the rather short extent of the plaudits. The spirited performance, in which the chorus sang with convincing momentum and gusto, deserved praise; Mr. Ivantzoff sang artistically in his solos.

Mill Hess displayed her well known and consummate technical skill and tasteful musicianship in the concerto, interpreted by both the soloist and the orchestra with due mass and eloquence. In the first pages of the finale, the tempo seemed slightly deliberate, while the poetic reading of the andante by the pianist and by Joseph Schuster, the solo cellist, was a feature to be recalled with reminiscent pleasure. The Bach toccata and fugue received a brilliant and sonorous performance—a little too consistently so, according to some listeners—as a prelude to the later events of the evening. The same program will be repeated tomorrow afternoon, when Count George Potocki, the Polish Ambassador, will make a special trip here to hear his compatriot's music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 31 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN DEGREE BY RUTGERS

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the orchestra was the third is as many years that the Boston Symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University Winter concert series.

21

MUSIC—Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ledger – Philadelphia – April 1/37

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave its annual Philadelphia concert last evening in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. A capacity audience was present and received conductor and orchestra most enthusiastically.

The organization showed itself to be a group of virtuoso players and is very highly disciplined. The tone is of admirable quality in all the choirs of the orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitzky was able to produce either an almost incredibly soft pianissimo or an exceedingly loud fortissimo by the slightest gesture. Occasionally, especially in parts of the finale of the Tschaikovsky symphony, the tone of the brass instruments sounded rather forced, but generally it was mellow and rich.

The conductor had his orchestra perfectly in hand throughout the program. He is economical of gesture, producing his effects often with a slight wave of the hand and after setting the pace of a movement sometimes allowed many measures to pass without beating the time, using his hands for the indication of the dynamics and other tonal details.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, which has nothing Italian about it except the Saltarello, which is the finale of the work, and even this is considerably Germanized. The first movement, Allegro vivace, was taken at a very rapid pace, calling for a lot of virtuoso work in the orchestra, especially in the strings, all of which was cleanly executed. The slow movement, a German one without any question, was played with excellent tone quality, as was also the scherzo with its beautiful trio for the horns. The finale was again taken very rapidly, although not too fast, and closed the symphony brilliantly.

The second number was "Pohjola's Daughter," a "symphonic fantasia" by Sibelius. It is plainly program music from beginning to end and is one of the later settings of the composer from the Kalevala, the mythical folk epic of Finland, being composed immediately after the second symphony. The orchestration is exceedingly rich for the Sibelius of that period (1906), when his tendency toward economy in instrumentation began. The story is too long to be even outlined, but it concerns the flirtatious daughter of Pohjola (the North), whose actions ultimately displease the hero, Kullervo, who lets loose wolves and bears to devour her.

The work was beautifully played, and Dr. Koussevitzky brought out the gorgeous orchestral coloring admirably, both in the solemn opening with its violoncello solo against dark-colored harmonics, through the "rainbow music," to the exceedingly somber close. It is one of the composer's finest works in the use of varied orchestral color.

The feature of the concert, however, was Tschaikovsky's F minor symphony, of which Dr. Koussevitzky gave a splendid reading. He was especially careful to maintain the balance of the themes against each other in every movement and emphasized the "motto subject," which opens the symphony and recurs in every movement thereafter, both alone and with elaborate accompaniment. The slow movement gave the players of the great solo instruments ample opportunity to exhibit their tonal command, and the pizzicato scherzo, which was performed with great clarity, scored its usual success. Conductor and orchestra were loudly applauded at the close of the concert.

Bulletin – Phila.
6 April 1/37

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert Under Forum Auspices

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its celebrated leader, Serge Koussevitzky, gave their only Philadelphia concert of the season in the Academy of Music, last night, under the auspices of The Forum. The visitors were welcomed by a large audience which lingered some time at the close of the program to applaud a brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor. Although the program included Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter," the Tchaikovsky symphony, with the spirit and tonal splender brought to it by the Bostonians eclipsed everything else.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was distinctly individual. Dynamics, tempi and balance of tone accorded to a scheme of his own making. If the performance was often on the noisy and theatrical side, it also carried an impressive sense of authority. The Fourth Symphony is a serviceable example of what Ernest Newman had in mind when he wrote that Tchaikovsky was "simply a man with intervals of neurasthenia, not a man with a philosophy of the cosmos."

Mr. Newman went on to observe that "He cries out as he does, not because he is sitting in judgment on the original plan of the universe, but because he is afraid to go home in the dark. What gives real artistic valor to his expression of the terrors that gibbered at him in the night when his nerves were on edge is that he really saw them very clearly and has limned them in such a way that each of us can recognize experiences of his own in them." Mr. Koussevitzky's frenzies in the first and last movements were convincing if accepted as an expression of terror by someone who was seeing things, and if the result was often bombastic and unconscionably loud, the fault may well be laid to Tchaikovsky, with Mr. Koussevitzky emerging with honors as an understanding interpreter, and the orchestra with due credit for its exceptional resources of tone and spirit.

The Tchaikovsky composition was not the evening's only orchestral rumpus, although it was the strongest in fibre and the largest in scale. From the ample literature of the early Sibelius Mr. Koussevitzky had resurrected "Pohjola's Daughter," one of the series of works based on the Finnish epic, "Kalevala." Before it began, a number of brass players who had been idle during the performance of Mendelssohn's gay "Italian" symphony, trooped on to the stage and prepared for the instrumental artillery. They were not long getting into action, "Pohjola's Daughter" has some of the sweep and the grandeur of Sibelius' "northern landscapes" and a convincing quality of bardic legend, but it all leads to overburdened climaxes and useless din. The Mendelssohn symphony was played with much insight into the amiable character of the composition. The spirit and pace given the salterello of the last movement was especially effective.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 2 - 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky, Et Al., Mix A Healthy Musical Dish

Bach, Sibelius and Brahms Stir Those Who "Happen to Like Superb Music"

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Bostonians were in town last night for their final pair of concerts of the season. For the Thursday subscribers there was Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, the seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Brahms's "First," rather a good program if—in the words of Marc Connelly—"you happen to like superb music."

The Second Brandenburg Concerto is so tough on the trumpet player that conductors sometimes give the part to a clarinet. The result in either case is hardly flattering to the ear. What prompted Bach to write for the trumpet (and for the oboe, too), as if he were writing for the violin it is impossible to say. The Concertos were his first attempts at instrumental music of an extended order and it may be that he took the opportunity to experiment. It is almost certain that he never heard his Brandenburg concertos performed, so he could not have known at first hand the ludicrous effect of the trumpet in the first and third movements of the Second Concerto. Last night the trumpet and the oboe sounded like the cackling of a couple of coloratura hens, though the oboe blew fewer off-color notes. It was even worse when Toscanini allotted the music to an E flat clarinet. Yet what is the perplexed conductor to do? The concerto is fine music which cries to be performed.

Dr. Koussevitzky next addressed himself to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, a work which no less an authority than Ernest Newman looks upon as embodying the very pith and marrow of the melancholy Finn's musical thought. It may be that the performance of the symphony last night was the last word in authenticity, for Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest pioneers, and remains the most steadfast interpreter, of the compositions of the master. It seemed again an engrossing saga in the gloomy splendor with which the fabulous Boston orchestra invested it, though only one who is absolutely saga-conscious can aspire to meet the work on its bardic plane. Not being so constituted this reviewer found only reasonable enjoyment in the music and was even disturbed to discover a downright sentimental tune running through it.

The playing of the orchestra was, as it has consistently been this season, an unmitigated delight, and the men and their leader were enthusiastically acclaimed after each of the three compositions on the program. On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will play Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Rulon Robison, tenor.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 1937

Music of t

By B. H. HA

Koussevitzky Leads Bosto tra in Works of Bach, Si

Some day that treatise on the ment they construct programs will be writter Mr. Koussevitzky arrived at the decisio this particular time was a performanc (there having been four performances of will then know also why he decided o Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, in preference to the Sixth which has not been played in New York at all. Until the treatise is written we shall have to be content with surmise—that conductors conduct over and over again what they conduct well, or that they conduct what other conductors conduct over and over again, in order to show how much better than the others they conduct it, and so on.

It is true that Mr. Koussevitzky makes a fine thing of Sibelius' Seventh; and he did so again last night, though this time the performance did not give the work quite the effect it has had on some previous occasions. It is also true that Mr. Koussevitzky's way with the first movement of Brahms' First—the directness and absence of overemphasis—is better than the way of many other conductors. Moreover, it is a good thing for the second movement for Mr. Koussevitzky to pass more swiftly than many conductors do over its sentimentality. But the last movement suffered from Mr. Koussevitzky's disobedience of Brahms' direction that it not be taken too fast.

The concert began with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 for solo trumpet, flute, oboe and violin, and string orchestra supplemented by harpsichord. The soloists were Georges Mager, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; and Richard Burgin, violin; and the harpsichord was played by Ernst Victor Wolff. The trumpet part, though notoriously difficult, is not impossible; but Mr. Mager had not mastered it. Nor was Mr. Burgin's playing impeccable in intonation. But the contributions of Messrs. Laurent and Gillet were beautiful in tone and excellent in style.

PRESS
Cranbury N. J.
MAR 26 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rutgers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will close the winter concert series sponsored by Rutgers University on Tuesday night at 8:30 o'clock in the Rutgers gymnasium. This will mark the fourth appearance of the world-famous symphonic group in the Rutgers concert series.

The program for the evening as announced by Dr. Koussevitsky is as follows:

Mendelssohn, Symphony in A major, "Italian" Op. I. Allegro vivace; II. Andante con moto; III. Con moto moderate; IV. Saltarello: presto. Wagner, A Siegfried Idyl. Intermission.

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36. I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato conanima in movemento di Valse; II. Andantino in modo di canzona; III. Scherzo pizzicate ostinate; Allegro; IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

One of the most recent developments in connection with the Boston Symphony, which has made musical history in the United States for more than half a century, was the summer festival which Dr. Koussevitsky and his colleages presented last year. It is Dr. Koussevitsky's desire to build this affair into an annual music festival greater in scope than anything similar in the United States, and comparable to the finest European concert series.

Mar 27/37 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

"St Matthew Passion"

In some respects the performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's "The Passion According to Saint Matthew" yesterday afternoon and evening was the climax of the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great achievements there have been during the six months past, but none more exalted or rewarding, none exceeding this noble re-creation of a religious masterpiece.

The performance benefited the pension fund of the orchestra, and the assisting forces were as follows: The choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, both prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, who sang the part of the Evangelist; Keith Falkner, bass, who took the part of Christ, and Fritz Lechner, bass. The harpsichord accompaniments to recitatives were beautifully played by Dr V. Ernst Wolff. The organist was Carl Weinrich. Solo instrumental portions were taken by the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violins; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; Georges Laurent, flute; Louis Speyer and Henry Stanislaus, English horns, and Mr Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore. Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

It will be seen that most of the soloists were those who participated last year when the Boston Symphony revived the "St Matthew Passion" after the lapse of a number of seasons. Of the singers new to Boston, Mr Priebe excelled. Though a young artist, his voice is strong and resonant; he sang not only with style but with depth of feeling, and his enunciation of the English text was perfectly clear. Moreover the recitative of the Evangelist was treated with uncommon regard for accuracy of notes and their time values.

Mr Lechner possesses a robust voice, but one not always firmly placed. Yet he sang his arias with taste and style. One had remembered the superb work last year of Miss Meisle, Miss Vreeland, and Mr Falkner, and had accordingly looked forward to yesterday's performance with great anticipation. Each of them again revealed characteristic beauty of tone, in fact all the virtues of fine vocalism. Yet one flaw was common to all five soloists in slight degree—that of breathing before the end of long phrases.

The choral tone seemed more sonorous than last year. The Harvard and Radcliffe men and women also have gained in precision. The involved contrapuntal voices were brought out more clearly and with greater ease. As motivating force and guiding spirit to all, the conducting of Dr Koussevitzky once more wrought greatly.

It is not too much to hope, indeed to assume, that the Boston orchestra and these choruses have begun to make the "St Matthew Passion" as familiar to local music lovers as, a few years ago, they repeated Bach's B-minor Mass. If one may venture a disputable opinion, the cause of the "St Matthew Passion" is no less than that of the Mass, perhaps more, since the Passion may reasonably be considered a more personal and touching expression of religious devotion than the grand and monumental Mass. Each is, without saying, a great masterpiece, but the one touches the heart where the other may excite intellectual admiration for the stupendous genius of Bach.

Symphony Hall was virtually filled for the two sessions in which the Passion was presented. At the end there was unrestrained applause for all who took part. A leaflet in the program announced that the complete performance was being recorded for the gramophone, the first time this has ever been attempted.

C. W. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
APR 2 - 1937

Music in Review

By Henriette Weber

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here this week for the last pair of concerts in New York this season. As is customary, the Bostonians will also play a third concert tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall will feature Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" with its three "character pictures." This is composed for orchestra, tenor solo and men's chorus. Participating will be the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison as soloist.

The program last evening was made up of old and modern masterpieces. It opened with the second of the Bach Brandenburg concertos, this one written for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet incidental solos with the usual foundation of strings. The harpsichord part was played by Ernst Victor Wolff who, since his arrival last year, has been called upon on more than one important occasion to lend his expert command of the pianos predecessor to an orchestral ensemble.

The precious art of the Bach period, so stylized yet so vital, made way for the modern outpourings of Sibelius in his Seventh Symphony, which is played without pause. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton the music unfolded in a steady stream of powerful expresion. The intricate design was cleared up by the Boston conductor's fine understanding, and the weaker spots where Sibelius appears to falter in his conception, were passed over to become less obvious than usual. A beautiful performance of Brahm's First Symphony closed the concert.

Many New Yorkers will make it a point to hear the Boston Orchestra this Summer when the fourth Berkshire Festival in August will take place in the lovely new home provided for the purpose, "Tanglewood," in the hills of Massachusetts. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, of New York, continues to be president of the festival. Other prominent men and women of this city are vitally interested in the enterprise which now is taking shape in a much more impressive way than ever before.

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky, Et Al., Mix A Healthy Musical Dish

Bach, Sibelius and Brahms Stir Those Who "Happen to Like Superb Music"

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Bostonians were in town last night for their final pair of concerts of the season. For the Thursday subscribers there was Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, the seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Brahms's "First," rather a good program if—in the words of Marc Connelly—"you happen to like superb music."

The Second Brandenburg Concerto is so tough on the trumpet player that conductors sometimes give the part to a clarinet. The result in either case is hardly flattering to the ear. What prompted Bach to write for the trumpet (and for the oboe, too), as if he were writing for the violin it is impossible to say. The Concertos were his first attempts at instrumental music of an extended order and it may be that he took the opportunity to experiment. It is almost certain that he never heard his Brandenburg concertos performed, so he could not have known at first hand the ludicrous effect of the trumpet in the first and third movements of the Second Concerto. Last night the trumpet and the oboe sounded like the cackling of a couple of coloratura hens, though the oboe blew fewer off-color notes. It was even worse when Toscanini allotted the music to an E flat clarinet. Yet what is the perplexed conductor to do? The concerto is fine music which cries to be performed.

Dr. Koussevitzky next addressed himself to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, a work which no less an authority than Ernest Newman looks upon as embodying the very pith and marrow of the melancholy Finn's musical thought. It may be that the performance of the symphony last night was the last word in authenticity, for Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest pioneers, and remains the most steadfast interpreter, of the compositions of the master. It seemed again an engrossing saga in the gloomy splendor with which the fabulous Boston orchestra invested it, though only one who is absolutely saga-conscious can aspire to meet the work on its bardic plane. Not being so constituted this reviewer found only reasonable enjoyment in the music and was even disturbed to discover a downright sentimental tune running through it.

The playing of the orchestra was, as it has consistently been this season, an unmitigated delight, and the men and their leader were enthusiastically acclaimed after each of the three compositions on the program. On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will play Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Rulon Robison, tenor.

21

MUSIC—Boston Symphony Orchestra

Ledger – Philadelphia – April 1/37

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, gave its annual Philadelphia concert last evening in the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. A capacity audience was present and received conductor and orchestra most enthusiastically.

The organization showed itself to be a group of virtuoso players and is very highly disciplined. The tone is of admirable quality in all the choirs of the orchestra, and Dr. Koussevitzky was able to produce either an almost incredibly soft pianissimo or an exceedingly loud fortissimo by the slightest gesture. Occasionally, especially in parts of the finale of the Tschaikovsky symphony, the tone of the brass instruments sounded rather forced, but generally it was mellow and rich.

The conductor had his orchestra perfectly in hand throughout the program. He is economical of gesture, producing his effects often with a slight wave of the hand and after setting the pace of a movement sometimes allowed many measures to pass without beating the time, using his hands for the indication of the dynamics and other tonal details.

The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, which has nothing Italian about it except the Saltarello, which is the finale of the work, and even this is considerably Germanized. The first movement, Allegro vivace, was taken at a very rapid pace, calling for a lot of virtuoso work in the orchestra, especially in the strings, all of which was cleanly executed. The slow movement, a German one without any question, was played with excellent tone quality, as was also the scherzo with its beautiful trio for the horns. The finale was again taken very rapidly, although not too fast, and closed the symphony brilliantly.

The second number was "Pohjola's Daughter," a "symphonic fantasia" by Sibelius. It is plainly program music from beginning to end and is one of the later settings of the composer from the Kalevala, the mythical folk epic of Finland, being composed immediately after the second symphony. The orchestration is exceedingly rich for the Sibelius of that period (1906), when his tendency toward economy in instrumentation began. The story is too long to be even outlined, but it concerns the flirtatious daughter of Pohjola (the North), whose actions ultimately displease the hero, Kullervo, who lets loose wolves and bears to devour her.

The work was beautifully played, and Dr. Koussevitzky brought out the gorgeous orchestral coloring admirably, both in the solemn opening with its violoncello solo against dark-colored harmonics, through the "rainbow music," to the exceedingly somber close. It is one of the composer's finest works in the use of varied orchestral color.

The feature of the concert, however, was Tschaikovsky's F minor symphony, of which Dr. Koussevitzky gave a splendid reading. He was especially careful to maintain the balance of the themes against each other in every movement and emphasized the "motto subject," which opens the symphony and recurs in every movement thereafter, both alone and with elaborate accompaniment. The slow movement gave the players of the great solo instruments ample opportunity to exhibit their tonal command, and the pizzicato scherzo, which was performed with great clarity, scored its usual success. Conductor and orchestra were loudly applauded at the close of the concert.

Bulletin – Phila.
6 April 1/37

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Conducts Concert Under Forum Auspices

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and its celebrated leader, Serge Koussevitzky, gave their only Philadelphia concert of the season in the Academy of Music, last night, under the auspices of The Forum. The visitors were welcomed by a large audience which lingered some time at the close of the program to applaud a brilliant performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, in F minor. Although the program included Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Sibelius' "Pohjola's Daughter," the Tchaikovsky symphony, with the spirit and tonal splender brought to it by the Bostonians eclipsed everything else.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was distinctly individual. Dynamics, tempi and balance of tone accorded to a scheme of his own making. If the performance was often on the noisy and theatrical side, it also carried an impressive sense of authority. The Fourth Symphony is a serviceable example of what Ernest Newman had in mind when he wrote that Tchaikovsky was "simply a man with intervals of neurasthenia, not a man with a philosophy of the cosmos."

Mr. Newman went on to observe that "He cries out as he does, not because he is sitting in judgment on the original plan of the universe, but because he is afraid to go home in the dark. What gives real artistic valor to his expression of the terrors that gibbered at him in the night when his nerves were on edge is that he really saw them very clearly and has limned them in such a way that each of us can recognize experiences of his own in them." Mr. Koussevitzky's frenzies in the first and last movements were convincing if accepted as an expression of terror by someone who was seeing things, and if the result was often bombastic and unconscionably loud, the fault may well be laid to Tchaikovsky, with Mr. Koussevitzky emerging with honors as an understanding interpreter, and the orchestra with due credit for its exceptional resources of tone and spirit.

The Tchaikovsky composition was not the evening's only orchestral rumpus, although it was the strongest in fibre and the largest in scale. From the ample literature of the early Sibelius Mr. Koussevitzky had resurrected "Pohjola's Daughter," one of the series of works based on the Finnish epic, "Kalevala." Before it began, a number of brass players who had been idle during the performance of Mendelssohn's gay "Italian" symphony, trooped on to the stage and prepared for the instrumental artillery. They were not long getting into action, "Pohjola's Daughter" has some of the sweep and the grandeur of Sibelius' "northern landscapes" and a convincing quality of bardic legend, but it all leads to overburdened climaxes and useless din. The Mendelssohn symphony was played with much insight into the amiable character of the composition. The spirit and pace given the salterello of the last movement was especially effective.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 2 - 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky, Et Al., Mix A Healthy Musical Dish

Bach, Sibelius and Brahms Stir Those Who "Happen to Like Superb Music"

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Bostonians were in town last night for their final pair of concerts of the season. For the Thursday subscribers there was Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, the seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Brahms's "First," rather a good program if—in the words of Marc Connelly—"you happen to like superb music."

The Second Brandenburg Concerto is so tough on the trumpet player that conductors sometimes give the part to a clarinet. The result in either case is hardly flattering to the ear. What prompted Bach to write for the trumpet (and for the oboe, too), as if he were writing for the violin it is impossible to say. The Concertos were his first attempts at instrumental music of an extended order and it may be that he took the opportunity to experiment. It is almost certain that he never heard his Brandenburg concertos performed, so he could not have known at first hand the ludicrous effect of the trumpet in the first and third movements of the Second Concerto. Last night the trumpet and the oboe sounded like the cackling of a couple of coloratura hens, though the oboe blew fewer off-color notes. It was even worse when Toscanini allotted the music to an E flat clarinet. Yet what is the perplexed conductor to do? The concerto is fine music which cries to be performed.

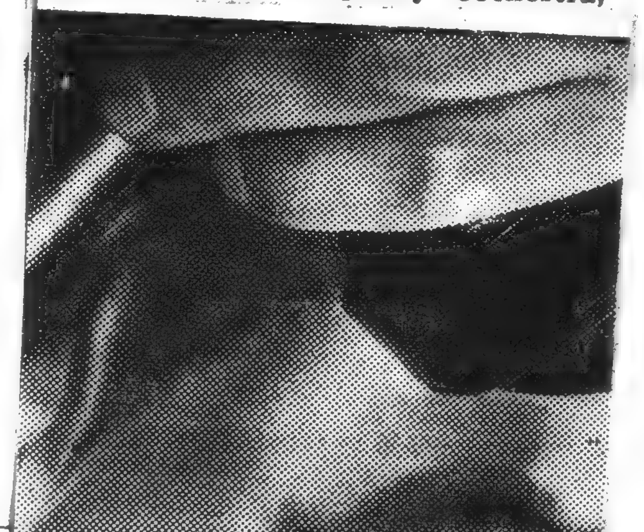
Dr. Koussevitzky next addressed himself to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, a work which no less an authority than Ernest Newman looks upon as embodying the very pith and marrow of the melancholy Finn's musical thought. It may be that the performance of the symphony last night was the last word in authenticity, for Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest pioneers, and remains the most steadfast interpreter, of the compositions of the master. It seemed again an engrossing saga in the gloomy splendor with which the fabulous Boston orchestra invested it, though only one who is absolutely saga-conscious can aspire to meet the work on its bardic plane. Not being so constituted this reviewer found only reasonable enjoyment in the music and was even disturbed to discover a downright sentimental tune running through it.

The playing of the orchestra was, as it has consistently been this season, an unmitigated delight, and the men and their leader were enthusiastically acclaimed after each of the three compositions on the program. On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will play Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Rulon Robison, tenor.

PRESS
Cranbury N. J.
MAR 26 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rutgers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra,



BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in Works of Bach, Sibelius and Brahms

Some day that treatise on the mental processes of conductors when they construct programs will be written, and then we will know how Mr. Koussevitzky arrived at the decision that what New York needed this particular time was a performance of Brahms' First Symphony (there having been four performances of the work in recent weeks). We will then know also why he decided on still another performance of Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, in preference to the Sixth which has not been played in New York at all. Until the treatise is written we shall have to be content with surmise—that conductors conduct over and over again what they conduct well, or that they conduct what other conductors conduct over and over again, in order to show how much better than the others they conduct it, and so on.

It is true that Mr. Koussevitzky makes a fine thing of Sibelius' Seventh; and he did so again last night, though this time the performance did not give the work quite the effect it has had on some previous occasions. It is also true that Mr. Koussevitzky's way with the first movement of Brahms' First—the directness and absence of overemphasis—is better than the way of many other conductors. Moreover, it is a good thing for the second movement for Mr. Koussevitzky to pass more swiftly than many conductors do over its sentimentality. But the last movement suffered from Mr. Koussevitzky's disobedience of Brahms' direction that it not be taken too fast.

The concert began with Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 for solo trumpet, flute, oboe and violin, and string orchestra supplemented by harpsichord. The soloists were Georges Mager, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; and Richard Burgin, violin; and the harpsichord was played by Ernst Victor Wolff. The trumpet part, though notoriously difficult, is not impossible; but Mr. Mager had not mastered it. Nor was Mr. Burgin's playing impeccable in intonation. But the contributions of Messrs. Laurent and Gillet were beautiful in tone and excellent in style.

Mar 27/37 MUSIC Globe

SYMPHONY HALL

"St Matthew Passion"

In some respects the performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's "The Passion According to Saint Matthew" yesterday afternoon and evening was the climax of the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Great achievements there have been during the six months past, but none more exalted or rewarding, none exceeding this noble re-creation of a religious masterpiece.

The performance benefited the pension fund of the orchestra, and the assisting forces were as follows: The choruses of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, both prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor, who sang the part of the Evangelist; Keith Falkner, bass, who took the part of Christ, and Fritz Lechner, bass. The harpsichord accompaniments to recitatives were beautifully played by Dr V. Ernst Wolff. The organist was Carl Weinrich. Solo instrumental portions were taken by the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violins; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; Georges Laurent, flute; Louis Speyer and Henry Stanislaus, English horns, and Mr Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboi d'amore. Dr Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

It will be seen that most of the soloists were those who participated last year when the Boston Symphony revived the "St Matthew Passion" after the lapse of a number of seasons. Of the singers new to Boston, Mr Priebe excelled. Though a young artist, his voice is strong and resonant; he sang not only with style but with depth of feeling, and his enunciation of the English text was perfectly clear. Moreover the recitative of the Evangelist was treated with uncommon regard for accuracy of notes and their time values.

Mr Lechner possesses a robust voice, but one not always firmly placed. Yet he sang his arias with taste and style. One had remembered the superb work last year of Miss Meisle, Miss Vreeland, and Mr Falkner, and had accordingly looked forward to yesterday's performance with great anticipation. Each of them again revealed characteristic beauty of tone, in fact all the virtues of fine vocalism. Yet one flaw was common to all five soloists in slight degree—that of breathing before the end of long phrases.

The choral tone seemed more sonorous than last year. The Harvard and Radcliffe men and women also have gained in precision. The involved contrapuntal voices were brought out more clearly and with greater ease. As motivating force and guiding spirit to all, the conducting of Dr Koussevitzky once more wrought greatly.

It is not too much to hope, indeed to assume, that the Boston orchestra and these choruses have begun to make the "St Matthew Passion" as familiar to local music lovers as, a few years ago, they repeated Bach's B-minor Mass. If one may venture a disputable opinion, the cause of the "St Matthew Passion" is no less than that of the Mass, perhaps more, since the Passion may reasonably be considered a more personal and touching expression of religious devotion than the grand and monumental Mass. Each is, without saying, a great masterpiece, but the one touches the heart where the other may excite intellectual admiration for the stupendous genius of Bach.

Symphony Hall was virtually filled for the two sessions in which the Passion was presented. At the end there was unrestrained applause for all who took part. A leaflet in the program announced that the complete performance was being recorded for the gramophone, the first time this has ever been attempted.

C. W. D.

WORDS AND MUSIC

Koussevitzky, Et Al., Mix A Healthy Musical Dish

Bach, Sibelius and Brahms Stir Those Who "Happen to Like Superb Music"

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and his Bostonians were in town last night for their final pair of concerts of the season. For the Thursday subscribers there was Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto, the seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Brahms's "First," rather a good program if—in the words of Marc Connelly—"you happen to like superb music."

The Second Brandenburg Concerto is so tough on the trumpet player that conductors sometimes give the part to a clarinet. The result in either case is hardly flattering to the ear. What prompted Bach to write for the trumpet (and for the oboe, too), as if he were writing for the violin it is impossible to say. The Concertos were his first attempts at instrumental music of an extended order and it may be that he took the opportunity to experiment. It is almost certain that he never heard his Brandenburg concertos performed, so he could not have known at first hand the ludicrous effect of the trumpet in the first and third movements of the Second Concerto. Last night the trumpet and the oboe sounded like the cackling of a couple of coloratura hens, though the oboe blew fewer off-color notes. It was even worse when Toscanini allotted the music to an E flat clarinet. Yet what is the perplexed conductor to do? The concerto is fine music which cries to be performed.

Dr. Koussevitzky next addressed himself to the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, a work which no less an authority than Ernest Newman looks upon as embodying the very pith and marrow of the melancholy Finn's musical thought. It may be that the performance of the symphony last night was the last word in authenticity, for Dr. Koussevitzky was one of the earliest pioneers, and remains the most steadfast interpreter, of the compositions of the master. It seemed again an engrossing saga in the gloomy splendor with which the fabulous Boston orchestra invested it, though only one who is absolutely saga-conscious can aspire to meet the work on its bardic plane. Not being so constituted this reviewer found only reasonable enjoyment in the music and was even disturbed to discover a downright sentimental tune running through it.

The playing of the orchestra was, as it has consistently been this season, an unmitigated delight, and the men and their leader were enthusiastically acclaimed after each of the three compositions on the program. On Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky will play Liszt's "A Faust Symphony," with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Rulon Robison, tenor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEW YORK JOURNAL
APR 2 - 1937

Music in Review

By Henriette Weber

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here this week for the last pair of concerts in New York this season. As is customary, the Bostonians will also play a third concert tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall will feature Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" with its three "character pictures." This is composed for orchestra, tenor solo and men's chorus. Participating will be the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison as soloist.

The program last evening was made up of old and modern masterpieces. It opened with the second of the Bach Brandenburg concertos, this one written for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet incidental solos with the usual foundation of strings. The harpsichord part was played by Ernst Victor Wolff who, since his arrival last year, has been called upon on more than one important occasion to lend his expert command of the pianos predecessor to an orchestral ensemble.

The precious art of the Bach period, so stylized yet so vital, made way for the modern outpourings of Sibelius in his Seventh Symphony, which is played without pause. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton the music unfolded in a steady stream of powerful expresion. The intricate design was cleared up by the Boston conductor's fine understanding, and the weaker spots where Sibelius appears to falter in his conception, were passed over to become less obvious than usual. A beautiful performance of Brahm's First Symphony closed the concert.

Many New Yorkers will make it a point to hear the Boston Orchestra this Summer when the fourth Berkshire Festival in August will take place in the lovely new home provided for the purpose, "Tanglewood," in the hills of Massachusetts. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, of New York, continues to be president of the festival. Other prominent men and women of this city are vitally interested in the enterprise which now is taking shape in a much more impressive way than ever before.

22 NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 2 - 1937

Koussevitzky Closes Evening Concerts Here

Boston Symphony Offers Works of Bach, Sibelius, Brahms at Carnegie Hall

Four Soloists Presented

Georges Mager, Trumpeter, Heard in FMajorConcerto

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The program began wtih Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major, which was played in place of the third concerto originally announced, and continued with the seventh symphony of Sibelius, Op. 105, concluding with the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Op. 68. The soloists in the Bach work were Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist; Ferdinand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpeter.

When Arturo Toscanini last directed the F major Brandenburg concerto here with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra he substituted an E flat clarinet for the trumpet because the first trumpet player of his orchestra held that it was impracticable to perform this part on a modern trumpet.

Schweitzer, in his monumental study on the interpretation of Bach's music, has said, however, that with a small trumpet Bach's trumpet parts present on insuperable obstacles to an expert performer. And those who have heard the recorded version of the F major concerto by the Busch Chamber Ensemble under Adolf Busch's direction, know that the trumpet part therein can be delivered with technical precision and tonal purity. Whether Mr. Mager, because of Mr. Koussevitzky's last-minute change of program, did not have sufficient time to master his portion of the score is not known, but he was obviously ill at ease and unable to give an accurate account of his difficult pages. In consequence, the two end movements of the concerto were seriously marred. The andante movement, in which only the strings, flute and oboe are called upon, was more felicitously set forth.

The seventh symphony of Sibelius is perhaps his greatest achievement. In its mastery of form and the pregnancy of its thematic material it is unsurpassed by any living composer. The individuality of the Finnish composer is to be felt in every measure of the score and his originality of utterance is indubitable. The English writer Cecil Grey's dictum that this symphony, which is in one movement, is the peer of the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony is a moot question. To compare composers whose ideational worlds are as antithetical as those of Beethoven and Sibelius seems, to say the least, futile. Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathy for Sibelius is well known and his interpretation, while not having all of its customary propulsive force, was telling, and, needless to say, the performance from the purely tonal aspect was superb.

It is difficult to write objectively of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the C minor symphony of Brahms, which he treated somewhat cavalierly. The closest approximation to the composer's intentions was achieved in the opening allegro movement. The remaining three movements were interpreted in a Tchaikovskian vein, which ill-became this intrinsically German work. The border line between sentiment and sentimentality was crossed with disturbing frequency in the andante sostenuto movement; the third movement, which Brahms marked "un poco allegretto e grazioso," sacrificed its immanent graciousness by being paced so vertiginously and the irregularity of the pacing of the closing movement was hardly conducive to a veracious realization of the music's content. The playing of the orchestra was, technically speaking, beyond cavil. The house was completely sold out and there were numerous standees and enthusiasm ran high.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 2 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BACH WORK

Third 'Brandenburg' Concerto Directed by Koussevitzky at Carnegie Hall

MAGER SOLO TRUMPETER

Sibelius's Seventh and First of Brahms Are Included in the Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was of superlative interest. The program and the performance enlisted the keenest interest and enthusiasm of the audience, and it may be said that the Boston Symphony Orchestra now draws the most distinguished body of music lovers that gather for symphonic performances in this city.

The orchestral works were the Bach Third "Brandenburg" concerto in G major; Sibelius's Seventh Symphony (in one movement), and Brahms's First Symphony.

The performance of Bach's concerto, one of the six written for the careless and inappreciative Margrave of Brandenburg, was given with the solo trumpet part played in the original register by an instrument especially furnished for the occasion. This was a G trumpet discovered by Mr. Mager last Summer in Paris, an instrument of very high range and the mechanism requisite for playing the part as Bach wrote it, instead of an octave lower on the ordinary trumpet of today.

Mr. Mager made no pretense of a perfect performance. By some in the audience it was claimed that a perfect performance of a florid part written so high was never possible. This does not square with the well-established historical facts.

Trumpeters of Bach's Day

There was much brilliant trumpet playing in Bach's day. For special purposes the trumpeters were divided on occasion in two groups. One took the lower, the other the extremely high range, which must always have necessitated special practice of its "embouchure." But the trumpeters appointed to do so did play such passages as the one that Bach scored and played them as written.

That the admirable solo trumpeter who undertook to do this last night could not compass perfection of each tone and interval is not to be wondered at. No one could do that today without months of special practice, which, in turn, would unfit him for other months for performance on the modern instrument.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work was his own in regard to certain details of phrasing. The performance was a very beautiful and spirited one, full of rhythmical life, of living tone and rhythm. The slow movement was especially notable because it was never dragged or sentimentalized.

The rapturous, cool beauty of the music was thus enabled to speak for itself, with the "impersonality," if the expression satisfies, but nevertheless the poetry and eloquence of the slow movement of Bach's day. But when we say "slow movement of Bach's day" there is danger of giving a wrong impression. Fo these "Brandenburg" concerto were anything but conventional.

Each a Special Experiment

Each one of them remains original, out of the ordinary, often audacious both in treatment and instrumentation; each is a special experiment, conducted with initiative and triumphant genius.

There was excellent contrast between this exhilarating music and the great symphony of Sibelius which followed. In material and in performance that score provided a memorable experience. It is unique in form and mood, for it is purest music and sheerest beauty. The impression is inexpressibly lofty and serene.

The first Sibelius symphonies are romantic, nationalistic; they include vigorous drama and nature-painting. They are saga-like outpourings of Sibelius's youth. But no young man ever did or ever could produce such a work as the Seventh. It is the evolution and alembication of all that has gone before. It has mysterious processes of development, an inexplicable logic only to be explained by laws of tone mastered through a lifetime, but also instinctively understood rather than consciously reasoned.

Simplest Elements Employed

If clouds moving, mingling, momentarily dissolving and passing into new forms in the sky could make musical sounds, we would hear them in this symphony. The simplest elements of the scale, the most elementary harmonic bodies, uniting and separating and uniting again in ways previously unconceived, make this score.

Not the least of its wonders is the subtlety of the rhythms, so varied, so propulsive yet inconspicuous in their workings. There seems in the music to be no regularity of pattern, yet there is unbroken sequence of thought. There is no precedent for the form.

Here is a symphony in a single movement, which follows no traditional design—which, one would say, rather than confining a composer's thought in any vise of form sets it absolutely free. But all is coherence and logic; all is poised, noble, immutable. There are no words for this freedom, this cohesion and irresistible mastery. Mighty artist!

It is hardly exaggeration to say that the glamorous and inspired revelation of this beauty was of a rank equal to the conception of the art work. The incomparable orchestra, the long and reverent study on the part of the interpreter of a work which remains, with all its wonder and attraction for us, far from obvious, brought a result to be regarded as one of the highest symphonic manifestations of many seasons.

Monument to Conductor

In part because the score becomes always clearer to us, but also, undoubtedly, because of the constant deepening and growth of Mr. Koussevitzky's art, his performance of the Sibelius Seventh symphony has become a monument to him and to its creator.

Much has been said of Sibelius's composition, which is not familiar to us. Incidentally, it is a work which merits much more than the me[illegible] and superficial treatment th[illegible] ow receives in the Boston Symphony program book. Elucidation of its nature, its history, its contents in some detail would be very helpful to the public, and presumably this is a purpose of program annotations. But, great as the work is, there is a composer named Johannes Brahms. He does not yield one whit to Sibelius as master of immortal music.

Played With Much Effect

The Brahms First symphony was played with overwhelming effect. Mr. Koussevitzky made some slight and perfectly logical alterations of tempo, not extreme changes, and nothing to impair the proportions of the composition. Otherwise he kept closely to the letter and superbly to the spirit of the score.

His principal alteration was in the comparatively fast tempo of the opening theme of the finale—the celebrated passage in which some of Brahms's commentators found a reference to Beethoven's Ninth symphony. This place could have been broader, had the conductor chosen, but the result was a remarkable justification of his procedure. It gave exceptional unity to the pronouncement of the first theme in its entirety, and indeed to the whole movement.

It is rare for this movement to proceed without a second's flagging from beginning to end, and for it unfailingly to gain in impetus and power. Seldom have we heard the rushing scale passages played with such impetuosity and significance.

The horn theme of the introduction was announced with a tone of haunting loveliness and the same thing may be said of dialoguing wind instruments in the andante. The slightly quicker tempi in the two preceding parts relieved the slow movement of the effect of excessive piousness which it can have when played too deliberately, and the same process gave the middle section of the third movement a touch of its inherent humor.

Mr. Koussevitzky showed again, in this performance, the independence of his thought, and the further fact that he is never content with one set of conclusions about music that he studies and conveys to the public. At the close of the performance there was a prolonged demonstration for conductor and orchestra.

Symphony Programs

D. News
April 3/37

An all-Brahms program will be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Myra Hess will be the distinguished soloist in the Second Piano Concerto in B-flat. The program will open with the "Academic Festival" Overture and close with the Symphony in D major.

The next-to-the-last program in the Tuesday afternoon series of Boston Symphony Concerts will be given next Tuesday at Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky will present music by Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov. From the former will come the Symphony in D minor, while the latter will contribute "Scheherazade."

N.Y. Herald Tribune
18 April 2/37

Koussevitzky Closes Evening Concerts Here

Boston Symphony Offers Works of Bach, Sibelius, Brahms at Carnegie Hall

Four Soloists Presented

Georges Mager, Trumpeter, Heard in FMajorConcerto

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night. The program, began wtih Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major, which was played in place of the third concerto originally announced, and continued with the seventh symphony of Sibelius, Op. 105, concluding with the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Op. 68. The soloists in the Bach work were Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist; Ferdinand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpeter.

When Arturo Toscanini last directed the F major Brandenburg concerto here with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra he substituted an E flat clarinet for the trumpet because the first trumpet player of his orchestra held that it was impracticable to perform this part on a modern trumpet.

Schweitzer, in his monumental study on the interpretation of Bach's music, has said, however, that with a small trumpet Bach's trumpet parts present on insuperable obstacles to an expert performer. And those who have heard the recorded version of the F major concerto by the Busch Chamber Ensemble under Adolf Busch's direction, know that the trumpet part therein can be delivered with technical precision and tonal purity. Whether Mr. Mager, because of Mr. Koussevitzky's last-minute change of program, did not have sufficient time to master his portion of the score is not known, but he was obviously ill at ease and unable to give an accurate account of his difficult pages. In consequence, the two end movements of the concerto were seriously marred. The andante movement, in which only the strings, flute and oboe are called upon, was more felicitously set forth.

The seventh symphony of Sibelius is perhaps his greatest achievement. In its mastery of form and the pregnancy of its thematic material it is unsurpassed by any living composer. The individuality of the Finnish composer is to be felt in every measure of the score and his originality of utterance is indubitable. The English writer Cecil Grey's dictum that this symphony, which is in one movement, is the peer of the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony is a moot question. To compare composers whose ideational worlds are as antithetical as those of Beethoven and Sibelius seems, to say the least, futile. Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathy for Sibelius is well known and his interpretation, while not having all of its customary propulsive force, was telling, and, needless to say, the performance from the purely tonal aspect was superb.

It is difficult to write objectively of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the C minor symphony of Brahms, which he treated somewhat cavalierly. The closest approximation to the composer's intentions was achieved in the opening allegro movement. The remaining three movements were interpreted in a Tchaikovskian vein, which ill-became this intrinsically German work. The border line between sentiment and sentimentality was crossed with disturbing frequency in the andante sostenuto movement; the third movement, which Brahms marked "un poco allegretto e grazioso," sacrificed its immanent graciousness by being paced so vertiginously and the irregularity of the pacing of the closing movement was hardly conducive to a veracious realization of the music's content. The playing of the orchestra was, technically speaking, beyond cavil. The house was completely sold out and there were numerous standees and enthusiasm ran high.

Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall.

N.Y. Telegram
April 2/37

The last evening concert of the local season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall before a numerous audience. The program's first number, Bach's second "Brandenburg" Concerto, was substituted for the originally scheduled "Brandenburg" Concerto. As for the rest of the program, it remained the same as announced, offering the seventh symphony of Sibelius and the first of Brahms.

Perhaps, the change may have had something to do with the decidedly below standard performance of the Bach. In any case, one listener can recall no instance in the record of his attendance at the Boston organization's concerts to compare with it.

Little was made of the work's inherent charms, the reading plodding along in measured tread, lacking vitalizing warmth and contrast. It may be this was directly traceable to the poor account by the trumpet player, George Mager, of the high register roulades assigned to him, though the others in the "concertino group," namely, Richard Burgin, violinist; George Laurent, flutist; Fernand Gillet, oboist, and Ernst Victor Wolff, harpsichordist, acquitted themselves acceptably enough.

There was more lift and life to the Sibelius, however, thanks to Mr. Koussevitzky's untiring efforts. Yet the Finnish composer's imaginative and altogether captivating creation has had a fuller expression on occasion.

This was distinctly an off night for the usually impeccable Bostonians, and the Brahms symphony, too, felt the influence—with trimmings. Its Andante sostenuto came off better than the other movements, it is true, the strings singing out in their accustomed manner brought out its melodiousness to a satisfying degree. But why the rush in the closing pages of the last movement?

Nevertheless, the large gathering applauded clamorously. R. C. B.

N.Y. Eve. Journal – April 2/37

Music in Re ew

By Henriette Web

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is here this week for the last pair of concerts in New York this season. As is customary, the Bostonians will also play a third concert tonight at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The Saturday afternoon concert in Carnegie Hall will feature Liszt's "A Faust Symphony" with its three "character pictures." This is composed for orchestra, tenor solo and men's chorus. Participating will be the Harvard Glee Club and Rulon Y. Robison as soloist

The program last evening was made up of old and modern masterpieces. It opened with the second of the Bach Brandenburg concertos, this one written for violin, oboe, flute and trumpet incidental solos with the usual foundation of strings. The harpsichord part was played by Ernst Victor Wolff who, since his arrival last year, has been called upon on more than one important occasion to lend his expert command of the pianos predecessor to an orchestral ensemble.

Sibelius Work Heard

The precious art of the Bach period, so stylized yet so vital, made way for the modern outpourings of Sibelius in his Seventh Symphony, which is played without pause. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton the music unfolded in a steady stream of powerful expresion. The intricate design was cleared up by the Boston conductor's fine understanding, and the weaker spots where Sibelius appears to falter in his conception, were passed over to become less obvious than usual. A beautiful performance of Brahm's First Symphony closed the concert.

Many New Yorkers will make it a point to hear the Boston Orchestra this Summer when the fourth Berkshire Festival in August will take place in the lovely new home provided for the purpose, "Tanglewood," in the hills of Massachusetts. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, of New York, continues to be president of the festival. Other prominent men and women of this city are vitally interested in the enterprise which now is taking shape in a much more impressive way than ever before.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SUN, FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 1937. N.Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BACH MUSIC

Georges Mager as Soloist Uses Special Trumpet.

In presenting the fifth and last evening concert of its fifty-first season in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, discoursed music by Bach, Sibelius and Brahms in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was one of capacity proportions, with standees at the back of the auditorium. Among these latter were discovered two visiting conductors. With only tomorrow afternoon's program remaining of the ten given annually in this series, the Bostonians were accorded a rousing final tribute by their evening subscribers, who remained to applaud long and heartily after a brilliant performance of Brahms's first symphony had swept the concert to a climactic conclusion.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble began an evening of notably fine playing with the second of Bach's Brandenburg concerti, that in F major, in which solo violin (Richard Burgin), flute (Georges Laurent), oboe (Fernand Gillet), trumpet (Georges Mager) and harpsichord (Ernst Victor Wolff) were called upon for virtuoso achievement of the inner group of voices, contrasted with the tutti of the Bachian small orchestra. The performance was a stimulating and admirably balanced one, with Mr. Mager performing prodigies of trumpet valor on a specially constructed instrument in G, said to be the only one of its kind, which he brought with him to these shores from Paris. Whether Bach had in mind a trumpet corresponding to this one, or whether—as the late Charles Sanford Terry contended—trumpet players of Bach's day achieved their altissimo effects by the simple device of changing to a different mouthpiece, remains a question for further patient research. Of last night's heroic effort to play the notes as written, it could not be said that the player came off unscathed in all that pertained to tonal quality and intervalic surety. But it was a striking performance none the less and one of special interest to those familiar with sundry transpositions and simplifications of the trumpet part.

The infrequently performed seventh symphony was the evening's measure of Sibelius. Since the projected but mysteriously withheld eighth is still something of conjecture, this work, now some thirteen years old, is the Finnish giant's last published and performed contribution to the world's masterpieces in symphonic form. As magnificently played last night, its entire duration was only nineteen minutes, much less than the time required for a single movement of one of the colossal Bruckner symphonies. Yet Sibelius, in compressing into one-movement form all of the essentials of an extended work, is here much less spare and laconic than he is in the four-movement fourth symphony, with which the tendency is to bracket the seventh, possibly because both have yet to win any such popular recognition as the first and second symphonies; or, in less degree, the fifth. Why the third and the sixth, particularly the latter, are so little known to this public is something that explanations do not quite explain, save on the basis that conductors, not the public, determine which symphonies of Sibelius are capable or worthy of assimilation.

Consistently in the van in performances of the Finnish master's works, Dr. Koussevitzky again proved himself a devout and thoroughly understanding interpreter, and the orchestra brought to the score the translucence of tone, the incisive but, where required, gracious attack, the sweep and the serenity to communicate richly and fully the beauties of a work that is at once a marvel of structural achievement and of high Olympian vision. All the Sibelius hallmarks, as made familiar by the earlier symphonies, are met with in this symphony, from the first characteristic ascending scale passage to the running basses and bardic brasses, but its spirit is much less that of struggle than of calm outlook on the heights.

Mellower than in the past, Dr. Koussevitzky's achievement of the Brahms C minor symphony was likewise something of superlatively good playing on the part of the orchestra. Details of accentuation within the phrase and of emphasis on subsidiary voices, particularly in the first movement, remained to evoke differences of opinion, but these were of scant effect upon the eloquence of the performance in its revelation of the larger and more essential Brahms. O. T.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Marian Anderson in Season's First Appearance —Boston Symphony Plays Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony at Ac song the lack of rhythmic defination in Mr. Vehanen's accompaniments was particularly noticeable.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky last night concluded its Brooklyn Academy series with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

If the "Faust" were performed as often as the B minor sonata or "Les Preludes," the name of Liszt might undergo a well-deserved change of conotation. For this symphony, which offers concrete evidence of Liszt's influence on Wagner, possesses in miniature the qualities (and the faults) that subsequently grew large in the music of the latter composer.

"Liszt did indeed develop his themes," writes John N. Burk in the program notes, "and with consummate resource, but it was a development by metamorphosis, in fidelity to his subject, a process far more suggestive of Wagner than Beethoven." In the intrinsic worth of some of the "Faust" themes and the resource of their development Liszt anticipated the wonders of Wagner—as he did also in his harmonies and motifs. But, "Liszt wrote," the notes continue, "that 'in program music the returns, alterations, modifications and modulations of motives are conditioned by their relation to a poetic idea,' that 'one theme does not link up with another in accordance with formal relationships,' and that 'all exclusively musical considerations, although they are by no means to be left out of account, must be subordinate to the actions of the literary subject'." And here Liszt anticipated the fault that grew large in Wagner.

That Liszt did not leave out of account exclusively musical considerations in the constructions of the "Faust" Symphony, is shown by the purely formal validity of most of the thematic development. Whereas Wagner, in "Die Walkuere," placed his genius at the mercy of an adolescent sense of theatre, turning superb leit-motifs on and off endlessly with the progress of an overgrown fairy tale, Liszt, in the "Faust" Symphony placed his smaller genius at the discretion of a theatrical sense sufficiently mature to appreciate the meaning of a great drama (Goethe's), and sufficiently modest—despite Liszt's avowed intention—to bow to musical exigencies. And it is significant that where programmatic considerations cause "Faust" themes to outstay their welcome, they persist in exactly the same way as do the themes of the unspeakable B minor sonata, which is non-programmatic.

The score received the dual benefit of Dr. Koussevitzky's understanding and his orchestra's virtuosity. The Harvard Glee Club, which is spending a busy weekend in New York, provided a credible "Chorus Mysticus," with a tenor solo by Rulon Y. Robison.

RALPH WINETT.

Vehanen. And finally a group
Negro spirituals: "I'm a Poor Pi grim," "Lord, I Can't Stay Away

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1937

Harvard Glee Club Takes Part In Boston Symphony Orchestra Final Concert of the Season

The final concert of the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given last evening at the Academy of Music. The Harvard Glee Club joined with the orchestra in the performance of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures." The work, which was enthusiastically received, is for orchestra with male chorus and tenor solo and often has been named as the composer's masterpiece.

This concert was the last of five presented in the borough this Winter at the Academy of Music under Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

With this final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed his 11th consecutive season at the head of this philharmonic organization.

Miss Frances Coutts, who represented the Brooklyn Committee as hostess in the committee box, last night entertained at a dinner party at her home, 128 Willow St., before the concert. Her guests included Mr. and Mrs. Richard H. McIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips Elliott, Mrs. Kenneth M. Reed, William J. Foster and Miss Isabel F. Ide. Mrs. Van Sinderen made her box available to members of the staff of the Visiting Nurse Association of Brooklyn. In the box tendered by the Brooklyn Committee to members of the staff at Fort Hamilton were Col. and Mrs. Royden Beebe, Col. and Mrs. Kenneth Lord and Maj. and Mrs. Milo Buchanan.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart occupied the box of the Associate Alumnaes of Adelphi Academy. Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives had Mrs. John Nathaniel Ives as her only box guest.

The Liszt symphony is in three parts, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The conclusion introduces the voices singing the "Chorus Mystious," which also concludes the second part of Goethe's "Faust." Rulon Y. Robinson sang the tenor solo and the Harvard Glee Club the chorus.

As an introductory number on this program, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn in G major.

Assisting in the interest of the 51st season were Mrs. Blum as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman and Miss Virginia Mervin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

• • •

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 3 - 1937

The New Records

Two New Versions of the Beethoven Eighth —Lieder by Schlusnus—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

With a unanimity almost breath taking, both Victor and Columbia seem to have recognized at the same moment that a new version of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was desirable. In consequence there is today the choice between performances by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra, or Felix Weingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic. Nor, after repeated playings of both, is it plain that either possesses a clear margin of superiority. Either would have been hailed by joyous cries had it appeared separately, and it would be pointless to deny these merits simply because of coincidental release.

In part this is a consequence of the nature of the symphony itself, particularly since ideational content is not its predominant characteristic. In a word, the strongest values of the score are musical, not philosophic; and it is only in these terms that the differences between the two performances can be discussed. Koussevitzky's pace for the first movement is considerably faster than Weingartner's, so much so that he is able to take the formal repetition of the exposition (omitted by Weingartner) within the two sides used by both. The two Allegrettos are scarcely distinguishable from each other, a remarkable example of interpretative agreement. Koussevitzky's tempo for the Menuetto is again faster, and he observes the second repeat (also omitted by Weingartner). Both finales are vigorous, Koussevitzky's definitely more propulsive and nervous. His emphasis on virtuoso playing here is the single weakness of the performance. There is more essential character in the Weingartner reading.

Columbia's recording is virtually identical with the recent "Eroica," meaning that it is altogether first rate. There are a few spots of excessive hall resonance (particularly in the Allegretto and the Finale), but these are scarcely material. However, the Koussevitzky reproduction is considerably more brilliant, recorded at a higher volume level, with more sharpness of detail. Both performances occupy three twelve-inch disks.

HERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY, April 3

23

Koussevitzky Closes Evening Concerts Here

Boston Symphony Offers Works of Bach, Sibelius, Brahms at Carnegie Hall

Four Soloists Presented

Georges Mager, Trumpeter, Heard in F Major Concerto

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday. The program began wtih Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major, which was played in place of the third concerto originally announced, and continued with the seventh symphony of Sibelius, Op. 105, concluding with the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Op. 68. The soloists in the Bach work were Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist; Ferdinand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpeter.

When Arturo Toscanini last directed the F major Brandenburg concerto here with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra he substituted an E flat clarinet for the trumpet because the first trumpet player of his orchestra held that it was impracticable to perform this part on a modern trumpet.

Schweitzer, in his monumental study on the interpretation of Bach's music, has said, however, that with a small trumpet Bach's trumpet parts present on insuperable obstacles to an expert performer. And those who have heard the recorded version of the F major concerto by the Busch Chamber Ensemble under Adolf Busch's direction, know that the trumpet part therein can be delivered with technical precision and tonal purity. Whether Mr. Mager, because of Mr. Koussevitzky's last-minute change of program, did not have sufficient time to master his portion of the score is not known, but he was obviously ill at ease and unable to give an accurate account of his difficult pages. In consequence, the two end movements of the con-work. The border line between sentiment and sentimentality was crossed with disturbing frequency in the andante sostenuto movement; the third movement, which Brahms marked "un poco allegretto e grazioso," sacrificed its immanent graciousness by being paced so vertiginously and the irregularity of the pacing of the closing movement was hardly conducive to a veracious realization of the music's content. The playing of the orchestra was, technically speaking, beyond cavil. The house was completely sold out and there were numerous standees and enthusiasm ran high.

It is difficult to write objectively of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the C minor symphony of Brahms, which he treated somewhat cavalierly. The closest approximation to the composer's intentions was achieved in the opening allegro movement. The remaining three movements were interpreted in a Tchaikovskian vein, which ill-became this intrinsically German as guest. Pieces by the South American composers R[illegible] Villa-Lobos, and Fernandez will be played, together with compositions by Beethoven and Weber.

---

Post April 4/37

At the symphony concert of next Tuesday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will offer the symphony of Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." At the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Myra Hess will be the soloist, playing the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms. That composer's Academic Festival Overture and Second Symphony will complete the programme.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

MAR 31 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

New Brunswick, March 31—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Rutgers University last night at the close of his popular annual concert here.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LISZT WORK

N.Y. Times

'Faust' Pictures After Geothe Mark 50th Anniversary of Composer's Death

April 3/37

RULON ROBISON SOLOIST

Harvard Glee Club Also Takes Part in the Performance—Koussevitzky Conducts

By OLIN DOWNES

A memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony after Goethe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and the solo tenor, Rulon Robison, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall constituted the only adequate observation given—belatedly, owing to certain practical circumstances at the Boston end—but given, this musical season of 1936-37, in New York, of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Frank Liszt, which occurred July 31, 1886, at Bayreuth.

The musical ceremony, as will be seen, took place in the fifty-first year of the anniversary, and not the fiftieth. Had it been practical to visit here with Liszt's great work and the necessary assisting forces in the early part of the Boston Symphony season the performance of his unique score would not have been so delayed.

It is a poor record for other orchestras, visiting and resident, in this city. The position of Liszt in the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is wholly exceptional and prophetic. Aside from critical or historical values, his most representative scores contain remarkable and arresting. He has been unduly neglected.

Atones for Neglect

So far as a single performance might, this one atoned for much of the neglect. It was a performance that illuminated in a special and very impressive manner the qualities of the composition itself, the magnificent qualities of the orchestra and the art of the conductor which becomes constantly more distinguished.

Musical valuations of the material of the score may differ, and after all music's the thing—not the philosophic or dramatic source of the composition, save in so far as it really colors and fertilizes the imagination of the composer to the point where he becomes newly creative.

That Liszt was inspired by Goethe; that it is a series of three symphonic tone pictures, which have much thematic material in common, labeled respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles"; and that in special ways the themes undergo transformation according to the composer's conception of these characters, need not move us if in the last analysis Liszt the musician fails his hearers.

Not to pretend that the "Faust" is a perfect score or one commensurate in musical material with a symphony of Mozart or Brahms, it remains fascinating music, unequal in places, but in sum extremely impressive and moving; and it predicates and relates itself remarkably to later scores by other composers.

Music Expresses Dignity

Leave aside the harmonic indebtedness of Wagner, which is palpable and is hardly longer disputed. The composer finds puissant utterance in music that expresses dignity, pride, introspection, passion, sensuousness. The love motive is oversensational—a tune that Vernon Blackburn would have called "overripe."

The theme which seems to be associated with Faust's search and self-torture is couched in the rather banal language of the "diminished seventh" chord that plagued music of the middle century, although Wagner proves how marvelously and creatively this chord can be used in the second act of "Tristan" and even in his own early "Faust" overture, while Liszt is neither so resourceful technically or so original in its employment.

Nevertheless, this theme has unforgettable physiognomy, and it speaks. There are some places of padding in the first movement. For all that there is a noble, extended and original form, and a noble, if sometimes theatrical, gesture. The essential expression, which is lofty, rings true. There are modulations and instrumental effects of a subtlety which has greatly influenced music and which corresponds in some sort to the modern conception of Goethe's character.

In fact, so many harmonic turns in this score have become familiar that for a student of orchestral composition of the romantic period it is as a book of quotations, and some of them very moving, too.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SUN, FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 1937. N.Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BACH MUSIC

Georges Mager as Soloist Uses Special Trumpet.

In presenting the fifth and last evening concert of its fifty-first season in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, discoursed music by Bach, Sibelius and Brahms in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was one of capacity proportions, with standees at the back of the auditorium. Among these latter were discovered two visiting conductors. With only tomorrow afternoon's program remaining of the ten given annually in this series, the Bostonians were accorded a rousing final tribute by their evening subscribers, who remained to applaud long and heartily after a brilliant performance of Brahms's first symphony had swept the concert to a climactic conclusion.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble began an evening of notably fine playing with the second of Bach's Brandenburg concerti, that in F major, in which solo violin (Richard Burgin), flute (Georges Laurent), oboe (Fernand Gillet), trumpet (Georges Mager) and harpsichord (Ernst Victor Wolff) were called upon for virtuoso achievement of the inner group of voices, contrasted with the tutti of the Bachian small orchestra. The performance was a stimulating and admirably balanced one, with Mr. Mager performing prodigies of trumpet valor on a specially constructed instrument in G, said to be the only one of its kind, which he brought with him to these shores from Paris. Whether Bach had in mind a trumpet corresponding to this one, or whether—as the late Charles Sanford Terry contended—trumpet players of Bach's day achieved their altissimo effects by the simple device of changing to a different mouthpiece, remains a question for further patient research. Of last night's heroic effort to play the notes as written, it could not be said that the player came off unscathed in all that pertained to tonal quality and intervalic surety. But it was a striking performance none the less and one of special interest to those familiar with sundry transpositions and simplifications of the trumpet part.

The infrequently performed seventh symphony was the evening's measure of Sibelius. Since the projected but mysteriously withheld eighth is still something of conjecture, this work, now some thirteen years old, is the Finnish giant's last published and performed contribution to the world's masterpieces in symphonic form. As magnificently played last night, its entire duration was only nineteen minutes, much less than the time required for a single movement of one of the colossal Bruckner symphonies. Yet Sibelius, in compressing into one-movement form all of the essentials of an extended work, is here much less spare and laconic than he is in the four-movement fourth symphony, with which the tendency is to bracket the seventh, possibly because both have yet to win any such popular recognition as the first and second symphonies; or, in less degree, the fifth. Why the third and the sixth, particularly the latter, are so little known to this public is something that explanations do not quite explain, save on the basis that conductors, not the public, determine which symphonies of Sibelius are capable or worthy of assimilation.

Consistently in the van in performances of the Finnish master's works, Dr. Koussevitzky again proved himself a devout and thoroughly understanding interpreter, and the orchestra brought to the score the translucence of tone, the incisive but, where required, gracious attack, the sweep and the serenity to communicate richly and fully the beauties of a work that is at once a marvel of structural achievement and of high Olympian vision. All the Sibelius hallmarks, as made familiar by the earlier symphonies, are met with in this symphony, from the first characteristic ascending scale passage to the running basses and bardic brasses, but its spirit is much less that of struggle than of calm outlook on the heights.

Mellower than in the past, Dr. Koussevitzky's achievement of the Brahms C minor symphony was likewise something of superlatively good playing on the part of the orchestra. Details of accentuation within the phrase and of emphasis on subsidiary voices, particularly in the first movement, remained to evoke differences of opinion, but these were of scant effect upon the eloquence of the performance in its revelation of the larger and more essential Brahms. O. T.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1937

Music of the Day

By B. H. HAGGIN

Marian Anderson in Season's First Appearance —Boston Symphony Plays Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony at R

...ong the lack of rhythmic defination n Mr. Vehanen's accompaniments was particularly noticeable.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky last night concluded its Brooklyn Academy series with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony and Liszt's "Faust" Symphony.

If the "Faust" were performed as often as the B minor sonata or "Les Preludes," the name of Liszt might undergo a well-deserved change of conotation. For this symphony, which offers concrete evidence of Liszt's influence on Wagner, possesses in miniature the qualities (and the faults) that subsequently grew large in the music of the latter composer.

"Liszt did indeed develop his themes," writes John N. Burk in the program notes, "and with consummate resource, but it was a development by metamorphosis, in fidelity to his subject, a process far more suggestive of Wagner than Beethoven." In the intrinsic worth of some of the "Faust" themes and t[illegible] source of their development [illegible] ted the wonders of [illegible] also in his harson added, [illegible] But, "Liszt ubiquitous Finnish [illegible] nue, "that ranged by her accompanist, Kos Vehanen. And finally a group of Negro spirituals: "I'm a Poor Pi grim," "Lord, I Can't Stay Away

'in program music the returns; alterations, modifications and modulations of motives are conditioned by their relation to a poetic idea,' that 'one theme does not link up with another in accordance with formal relationships,' and that 'all exclusively musical considerations, although they are by no means to be left out of account, must be subordinate to the actions of the literary subject'." And here Liszt anticipated the fault that grew large in Wagner.

That Liszt did not leave out of account exclusively musical considerations in the constructions of the "Faust" Symphony, is shown by the purely formal validity of most of the thematic development. Whereas Wagner, in "Die Walküere," placed his genius at the mercy of an adolescent sense of theatre, turning superb leit-motifs on and off endlessly with the progress of an overgrown fairy tale, Liszt, in the "Faust" Symphony placed his smaller genius at the discretion of a theatrical sense sufficiently mature to appreciate the meaning of a great drama (Goethe's), and sufficiently modest—despite Liszt's avowed intention—to bow to musical exigencies. And it is significant that w here programmatic considerations cause "Faust" themes to outstay their welcome, they persist in exactly the same way as do the themes of the unspeakable B minor sonata, which is non-programmatic.

The score received the dual benefit of Dr. Koussevitzky's understanding and his orchestra's virtuosity. The Harvard Glee Club, which is spending a busy weekend in New York, provided a credible "Chorus Mysticus," with a tenor solo by Rulon Y. Robison.

RALPH WINETT.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 3 - 1937

Harvard Glee Club Takes Part In Boston Symphony Orchestra Final Concert of the Season

The final concert of the 51st season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given last evening at the Academy of Music. The Harvard Glee Club joined with the orchestra in the performance of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures." The work, which was enthusiastically received, is for orchestra with male chorus and tenor solo and often has been named as the composer's masterpiece.

This concert was the last of five presented in the borough this Winter at the Academy of Music under Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman.

With this final concert, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, completed his 11th consecutive season at the head of this philharmonic organization.

Miss Frances Coutts, who represented the Brooklyn Committee as hostess in the committee box, last night entertained at a dinner party at her home, 128 Willow St., before the concert. Her guests included Mr. and Mrs. Richard H. McIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. Phillips Elliott, Mrs. Kenneth M. Reed, William J. Foster and Miss Isabel F. Ide. Mrs. Van Sinderen made her box available to members of the staff of the Visiting Nurse Association of Brooklyn. In the box tendered by the Brooklyn Committee to members of the staff at Fort Hamilton were Col. and Mrs. Royden Beebe, Col. and Mrs. Kenneth Lord and Maj. and Mrs. Milo Buchanan.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart occupied the box of the Associate Alumnaes of Adelphi Academy. Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives had Mrs. John Nathaniel Ives as her only box guest.

The Liszt symphony is in three parts, entitled "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles." The conclusion introduces the voices singing the "Chorus Mystious," which also concludes the second part of Goethe's "Faust." Rulon Y. Robinson sang the tenor solo and the Harvard Glee Club the chorus.

As an introductory number on this program, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected the "Surprise" Symphony of Haydn in G major.

Assisting in the interest of the 51st season were Mrs. Blum as chairman of boxes, Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow as membership chairman and Miss Virginia Mervin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

• • •

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 3 - 1937

Fernando" (from Donizetti's "Favorita"), not merely for her admirable solution of its imposing technical problems, but rather for the manner in which the pattern was related to a basic emotion, given musical sense and immediacy.

Miss Anderson's interpretation of the more lyric Schubert songs, such as "Dass sie hier Gewesen" and "Fruehlings-Fraum" were similarly distinguished by the carefulness of the vocal planning, the taste and intelligence of her musicianship though genuine lightness and gayety are more difficult for her to convey. "Die Forelle," attempted as an added number, was scarcely the masterpiece of simple feeling that Schubert achieved on paper. Her program also included songs by Franck, Ravel, Strauss and Sibelius, as well as a group of spirituals. There was little but enraptured applause from her audience. Kosti Vehanen was the accompanist.

I. K.

WPA FEDERAL MUSIC PROJECT

the nature of the symphony itself, particularly since ideational content is not its predominant characteristic. In a word, the strongest values of the score are musical, not philosophic; and it is only in these terms that the differences between the two performances can be discussed. Koussevitzky's pace for the first movement is considerably faster than Weingartner's, so much so that he is able to take the formal repetition of the exposition (omitted by Weingartner) within the two sides used by both. The two Allegrettos are scarcely distinguishable from each other, a remarkable example of interpretative agreement. Koussevitzky's tempo for the Menuetto is again faster, and he observes the second repeat (also omitted by Weingartner). Both finales are vigorous, Koussevitzky's definitely more propulsive and nervous. His emphasis on virtuoso playing here is the single weakness of the performance. There is more essential character in the Weingartner reading.

Columbia's recording is virtually identical with the recent "Eroica," meaning that it is altogether first rate. There are a few spots of excessive hall resonance (particularly in the Allegretto and the Finale), but these are scarcely material. However, the Koussevitzky reproduction is considerably more brilliant, recorded at a higher volume level, with more sharpness of detail. Both performances occupy three twelve-inch disks.

N.Y. HERALD TRIBUNE, SATURDAY, April 3

23

Koussevitzky Closes Evening Concerts Here

Boston Symphony Offers Works of Bach, Sibelius, Brahms at Carnegie Hall

Four Soloists Presented

Georges Mager, Trumpeter, Heard in F Major Concerto

By Jerome D. Bohm

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, gave its final evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall Thursday. The program began wtih Bach's second Brandenburg concerto in F major, which was played in place of the third concerto originally announced, and continued with the seventh symphony of Sibelius, Op. 105, concluding with the first symphony in C minor of Brahms, Op. 68. The soloists in the Bach work were Richard Burgin, violinist; Georges Laurent, flutist; Ferdinand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpeter.

When Arturo Toscanini last directed the F major Brandenburg concerto here with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra he substituted an E flat clarinet for the trumpet because the first trumpet player of his orchestra held that it was impracticable to perform this part on a modern trumpet.

Schweitzer, in his monumental study on the interpretation of Bach's music, has said, however, that with a small trumpet Bach's trumpet parts present on insuperable obstacles to an expert performer. And those who have heard the recorded version of the F major concerto by the Busch Chamber Ensemble under Adolf Busch's direction, know that the trumpet part therein can be delivered with technical precision and tonal purity. Whether Mr. Mager, because of Mr. Koussevitzky's last-minute change of program, did not have sufficient time to master his portion of the score is not known, but he was obviously ill at ease and unable to give an accurate account of his difficult pages. In consequence, the two end movements of the concerto were seriously marred. The andante movement, in which only the strings, flute and oboe are called upon, was more felicitously set forth.

The seventh symphony of Sibelius is perhaps his greatest achievement. In its mastery of form and the pregnancy of its thematic material it is unsurpassed by any living composer. The individuality of the Finnish composer is to be felt in every measure of the score and his originality of utterance is indubitable. The English writer Cecil Grey's dictum that this symphony, which is in one movement, is the peer of the first movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony is a moot question. To compare composers whose ideational worlds are as antithetical as those of Beethoven and Sibelius seems, to say the least, futile. Mr. Koussevitzky's sympathy for Sibelius is well known and his interpretation, while not having all of its customary propulsive force, was telling, and, needless to say, the performance from the purely tonal aspect was superb.

It is difficult to write objectively of Mr. Koussevitzky's version of the C minor symphony of Brahms, which he treated somewhat cavalierly. The closest approximation to the composer's intentions was achieved in the opening allegro movement. The remaining three movements were interpreted in a Tchaikovskian vein, which ill-became this intrinsically German work. The border line between sentiment and sentimentality was crossed with disturbing frequency in the andante sostenuto movement; the third movement, which Brahms marked "un poco allegretto e grazioso," sacrificed its immanent graciousness by being paced so vertiginously and the irregularity of the pacing of the closing movement was hardly conducive to a veracious realization of the music's content. The playing of the orchestra was, technically speaking, beyond cavil. The house was completely sold out and there were numerous standees and enthusiasm ran high.

Post April 4/37

as guest. Pieces [illegible] the South American composers [illegible] Villa-Lobos, and Fernandez will be played, together with compositions by Beethoven and Weber.

At the symphony concert of next Tuesday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky will offer the symphony of Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." At the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Myra Hess will be the soloist, playing the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms. That composer's Academic Festival Overture and Second Symphony will complete the programme.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

3 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

New Brunswick, March 31—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Rutgers University last night at the close of his popular annual concert here.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LISZT WORK

N.Y. Times

'Faust' Pictures After Geothe Mark 50th Anniversary of Composer's Death

April 3/37

RULON ROBISON SOLOIST

Harvard Glee Club Also Takes Part in the Performance—Koussevitzky Conducts

By OLIN DOWNES

A memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony after Goethe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and the solo tenor, Rulon Robison, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall constituted the only adequate observation given—belatedly, owing to certain practical circumstances at the Boston end—but given, this musical season of 1936-37, in New York, of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Frank Liszt, which occurred July 31, 1886, at Bayreuth.

The musical ceremony, as will be seen, took place in the fifty-first year of the anniversary, and not the fiftieth. Had it been practical to visit here with Liszt's great work and the necessary assisting forces in the early part of the Boston Symphony season the performance of his unique score would not have been so delayed.

It is a poor record for other orchestras, visiting and resident, in this city. The position of Liszt in the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is wholly exceptional and prophetic. Aside from critical or historical values, his most representative scores contain remarkable and arresting. He has been unduly neglected.

Atones for Neglect

So far as a single performance might, this one atoned for much of the neglect. It was a performance that illuminated in a special and very impressive manner the qualities of the composition itself, the magnificent qualities of the orchestra and the art of the conductor which becomes constantly more distinguished.

Musical valuations of the material of the score may differ, and after all music's the thing—not the philosophic or dramatic source of the composition, save in so far as it really colors and fertilizes the imagination of the composer to the point where he becomes newly creative.

That Liszt was inspired by Goethe; that it is a series of three symphonic tone pictures, which have much thematic material in common, labeled respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles"; and that in special ways the themes undergo transformation according to the composer's conception of these characters, need not move us if in the last analysis Liszt the musician fails his hearers.

Not to pretend that the "Faust" is a perfect score or one commensurate in musical material with a symphony of Mozart or Brahms, it remains fascinating music, unequal in places, but in sum extremely impressive and moving; and it predicates and relates itself remarkably to later scores by other composers.

Music Expresses Dignity

Leave aside the harmonic indebtedness of Wagner, which is palpable and is hardly longer disputed. The composer finds puissant utterance in music that expresses dignity, pride, introspection, passion, sensuousness. The love motive is oversensational—a tune that Vernon Blackburn would have called "overripe."

The theme which seems to be associated with Faust's search and self-torture is couched in the rather banal language of the "diminished seventh" chord that plagued music of the middle century, although Wagner proves how marvelously and creatively this chord can be used in the second act of "Tristan" and even in his own early "Faust" overture, while Liszt is neither so resourceful technically or so original in its employment.

Nevertheless, this theme has unforgettable physiognomy, and it speaks. There are some places of padding in the first movement. For all that there is a noble, extended and original form, and a noble, if sometimes theatrical, gesture. The essential expression, which is lofty, rings true. There are modulations and instrumental effects of a subtlety which has greatly influenced music and which corresponds in some sort to the modern conception of Goethe's character.

In fact, so many harmonic turns in this score have become familiar that for a student of orchestral composition of the romantic period it is as a book of quotations, and some of them very moving, too.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LISZT WORK

'Faust' Pictures After Goethe Mark 50th Anniversary of Composer's Death

N. Y. Times

RULON ROBISON SOLOIST

April 3/37

Harvard Glee Club Also Takes Part in the Performance—Koussevitzky Conducts

By OLIN DOWNES

A memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony after Goethe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and the solo tenor, Rulon Robison, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, constituted the only adequate observation in this season of 1936-1937 in New York, of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Frank Liszt, which occurred July 31, 1886, at Bayreuth.

The musical ceremony, as will be seen, took place in the fifty-first year of the anniversary, and not the fiftieth. Had it been practical to visit here with Liszt's great work and the necessary assisting forces in the early part of the Boston Symphony season the performance of his unique score would not have been so delayed.

It is a poor record for other orchestras, visiting and resident, hereabouts. The position of Liszt in the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is wholly exceptional and prophetic. Aside from critical or historical values, his most representative scores contain remarkable and arresting music. On all counts he has been unduly neglected.

Atones for Neglect

So far as a single performance might, this one atoned for much of the neglect. It was a performance that illuminated in a special and very impressive manner the qualities of the composition itself, the magnificent qualities of the orchestra and the art of the conductor which becomes constantly more distinguished.

Musical valuations of the material of the score may differ, and after all music's the thing—not the philosophic or dramatic source of the composition, save in so far as it really colors and fertilizes the imagination of the composer to the point where he becomes newly creative.

That Liszt was inspired by Goethe; that it is a series of three symphonic tone pictures, which have much thematic material in common, labeled respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles"; and that in special ways the themes undergo transformation according to the composer's conception of these characters, need not move us if in the last analysis Liszt the musician fails his hearers.

Not to pretend that the "Faust" is a perfect score or one commensurate in musical material with a symphony of Mozart or Brahms, it remains a fascinating score.

Music Expresses Dignity

Leave aside the harmonic indebtedness of Wagner, which is palpable and is hardly longer disputed. The composer finds puissant utterance in the movement, which concerns Faust, with music that expresses dignity, pride, introspection, pasion, sensuousness. The love motive is oversensational—a tune that Vernon Blackburn would have called "overripe."

The theme which seems to be associated with Faust's search and self-torture is couched in the rather banal language of the "diminished seventh" chord that plagued music of the middle century, although Wagner proves how marvelously and creatively this chord can be used in the second act of "Tristan" and even in his own early "Faust" overture, while Liszt is neither so resourceful technically or so original in its employment.

Nevertheless, this theme has unforgettable physiognomy, and it speaks. There are some places of padding in the first movement. For all that there is a noble, extended and original form, and a noble, if sometimes theatrical, gesture. The essential expression, which is lofty, rings true. There are modulations and instrumental effects of a subtlety which has greatly influenced music and which corresponds in some sort to the modern conception of Goethe's character.

In fact, so many harmonic turns in this score have become familiar that for a student of orchestral composition of the romantic period it is as a book of quotations, and some of them very moving, too.

Gretchen Movement Is Poetic

But the Gretchen movement is one that will stand in a special place for a long time to come as an extraordinarily sympathetic and poetical evocation of the character. The theme that the oboe plays with the viola accompanying is as virginal as the celebrated passage that is to be associated with Gretchen's plucking of the daisy, "He loves me; he loves me not."

Then the major, if and more tenderness memorabl strings.

A third directly wi of introspe formed, c the tonal cences of the orches
ly reflected by it, as if they were the sleep-chasings of dream, or the image of Faust, approaching, and caught, before she has seen him in Gretchen's mirror.

The Mephistopheles movement was long condemned as theoretical, pretentious, pseudo-philosophic "music of the future." Therein the themes of Faust are caricatured and cheapened. Today this music remains both subtle and brilliant—not outmoded, as are earlier pages of the first movement. It is modernly felt and modernly scored music, taking in a measure the place of the classic symphony's scherzo.

Refrain is Theatrical

The end with the choral refrain is open to the reproach of theatricalism. But there is sincere and insincere "theatre." We forget how honest the romanticists of the Liszt-Wagner epoch were. Here the interpreter must sense and deeply believe in the composer. Here, if the musical idea does not match unmistakably the dramatic concept, that concept, that emotion, can readily be kindled by interpretation which makes audible the dream, even if it is more than the reality, of the musical score.

And it may be said that in this place, indeed throughout the symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky placed the work on the highest level; realized its uttermost possiblities; not only interpreted, but lived it, in every note; not only conveyed the conception of a scholar and poet, but communicated this conception, and its intense sincerity, to every one of the performers.

As a leave-taking of the Boston Symphony's New York audiences for this season, nothing could have been more fitting, or better planned. The performance drew fresh attention to the beauties of the orchestra's tone and technique, the euphony and balance of all its choirs.

In the Gretchen movement, when the clarinet took the theme from the oboe, matching its inflection so sensitively that it was as one person taking a poetical line from the mouth of another, he furnished only one example of a standard of solo performance that obtained throughout the concert. Remarkable, too, was the orchestral tone in pianissimo passages, and the superb effects attained with the voices.

Glee Club Tone Well Produced

The choral conclusion was unforgettable, preceded by pauses of silence as eloquent as the sound of the music, then by the mysterious pianissimo of the strings. The entrance of the voices was a tone-color that blended mystically with that of the instruments. It was as though the voices, solo and choral, came from some remote and radiant height. The climax had the glamour and atmosphere of a sacred drama. The tone of the singers of the glee club was wonderfully produced and controlled.

Rulon Robison, remembered for his singing of the tenor part under Muck, again took the solo, with evident feeling. It was not only the sounds in the fine thought of Whitman that moved you, but their exquisite meanings.

Conductor and orchestra were acclaimed and the conductor repeatedly recalled by the audience.

The Liszt Symphony was preceded by the impeccable clarity, finish and beauty of tone that this orchestra achieves when it performs the "surprise" symphony of Haydn. Two works more completely contrasted than these could hardly have been provided. In both of them a great conductor and interpreter did his devoir and paid profound and heartfelt respects to his art.

Carnegie Hall Program

N. Y. Her. Tribune

Haydn Work Included

Harvard Glee Club Sings Lines of Goethe Poem

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the fifty-first season of its visits to New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony (No. 94, in G major) served as the prelude to the Liszt work, in which the eight closing lines from Goethe's "Faust" were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Y. Robison as the tenor soloist.

Liszt's symphony was played here by the Federal Music Project's Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra last June, but its last New York performance by a major privately sponsored organization was in the Boston Symphony's corresponding concert five years ago under Dr. Koussevitzky, with the same chorus (though not the same members) and the same vocal soloist. Although the "Surprise" symphony is usually considered as among Haydn's best known compositions, it is even longer since its last performance in the regular music season, in October, 1930, although it has had later hearings in the Stadium concerts.

Program Offers Contrast

In style and character, the two symphonies made a well contrasted program, if not with the seventy-three-minute extent of the Liszt work, a short one, while both were well chosen to exhibit the notable qualities of the Boston Symphony considered as a whole and of its component choirs. The Haydn symphony received a straightforward reading of excellent taste which gave its hearers opportunity to consider with pleasure the clarity and polish collectively shown by the visiting symphonists, especially by the strings, and the Liszt music gave an unusually convincing revelation of the virtuosity and musicianship of this remarkable organization and its characteristic combination of clarity and opulent sonority.

The "Faust" symphony is seldom played here—the last performance before that of April, 1932, was by the former State Symphony in 1925—and the infrequency of its hearings can be partly ascribed to its length and to the need of a chorus. There is an alternative and shorter instrumental ending, but, after listening to the rich-toned singing of the young men from Harvard, one could readily believe that the omission of the chorus would leave a certain sense of incompletion. Reason for infrequent playing can also be found in the music itself, in factors which have made a war horse frequently ridden by conductors fifteen or twenty years ago such as "Les Preludes" to remain stabled for much of the time in more recent years.

Touch of Sentimentality

Some of the less time-defying traits of the work have become more apparent since its last performance; a listener can find certain melodies bordering on the sentimental or giving an impression of slightly excessive sweetening, or find the grandeur of climactic measures not unmixed at times with grandiosity. Nor does every moment of the work seem indispensable; in some of them Liszt dwells on a favorite figure or idea beyond the extent in which such dwelling contributes to the development or progress of the work.

Still, in spite of a romanticism which has somewhat dated with its time and an eloquence not always unsuspect, the "Faust" symphony is still music of consequence, not only for its historical importance and the ways in which it has influenced later major composers of the last century, but also on account of the genuine communicative expressiveness, the still persuasive poetry and often real grandeur of the work itself. It still shows largeness of vision and, if not without undeniable exceptions, convincing inspiration. If the form sometimes seems unwieldly, the expression of the basic dramatic ideas in the development and transformation of the themes remains exceptional; the orchestral coloring is still usually convincing in its mastery.

To Return Next Season

The work found Dr. Koussevitsky at his best in an interpretation which revealed every detail and did full justice to the external effectiveness and to the more fundamental expressive resources of the symphony. It was imposing, but yet gave no impression of exaggeration of straining for effect, but of realizing as clearly and convincingly as possible what Liszt had to say—and much of this seemed still well worth saying. The Harvard Glee Club had a tone of laudable mellowness and sonority and Mr. Robison did laudable work in a solo role which sometimes lies punitively high. The audience applauded the participants with deserved enthusiasm.

The Boston Symphony will return to Carnegie Hall next season for the usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts.

April 4, 1937

THE BOSTON HERALD,

Myra Hess Symphony Soloist

Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. She will play the second piano concerto of Brahms.

Lowell Sun. Tele.
April 4/37

MYRA HESS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Brahms has been planned by Serge Koussevitzky for the 21st regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Myra Hess will be heard in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of this composer in B-flat, the first occasion in which the famous English pianist will have performed this work in Boston. The concerts will open with the "Academic Festival" Overture, which Brahms based upon German student songs. The latter half of the programme will consist of the Second Symphony in D. major.

Lowell Tele. Apr. 4/37

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The last concert but one of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky, dedicating this series to nineteenth century composers, has chosen two of them for this concert—César Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov. Franck's Symphony in D minor will open the programme, and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a musical picturization suggested by the Arabian Night's tales and utilizing the full resources of a virtuoso orchestra, will conclude it.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 31 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED AT RUTGERS UNIVERSITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RECEIVES HONORARY DEGREE, DOCTOR OF MUSIC

New Brunswick, N. J., March 30-AP-Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. Clothier, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and one who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University Winter concert series.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 31 1937

The Boston Symphony orchestra is makin[illegible]ast visit of the season to New York and Philadelphia this week so that there will be no programs at home. At the regular concerts in Symphony Hall next week Myra Hess, the distinguished English pianist, will be guest artist in an all-Brahms program in the course of which she will play his Second Pianoforte Concerto.

READING, PA.
TIMES

MAR 31 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HONORED

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. C. Clothiei, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

24

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LISZT WORK

'Faust' Pictures After Goethe Mark 50th Anniversary of Composer's Death

N. Y. Times

RULON ROBISON SOLOIST

April 3/37

Harvard Glee Club Also Takes Part in the Performance—Koussevitzky Conducts

By OLIN DOWNES

A memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony after Goethe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and the solo tenor, Rulon Robison, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, constituted the only adequate observation in this season of 1936-1937 in New York, of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Frank Liszt, which occurred July 31, 1886, at Bayreuth.

The musical ceremony, as will be seen, took place in the fifty-first year of the anniversary, and not the fiftieth. Had it been practical to visit here with Liszt's great work and the necessary assisting forces in the early part of the Boston Symphony season the performance of his unique score would not have been so delayed.

It is a poor record for other orchestras, visiting and resident, hereabouts. The position of Liszt in the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is wholly exceptional and prophetic. Aside from critical or historical values, his most representative scores contain remarkable and arresting music. On all counts he has been unduly neglected.

Atones for Neglect

So far as a single performance might, this one atoned for much of the neglect. It was a performance that illuminated in a special and very impressive manner the qualities of the composition itself, the magnificent qualities of the orchestra and the art of the conductor which becomes constantly more distinguished.

Musical valuations of the material of the score may differ, and after all music's the thing—not the philosophic or dramatic source of the composition, save in so far as it really colors and fertilizes the imagination of the composer to the point where he becomes newly creative.

That Liszt was inspired by Goethe; that it is a series of three symphonic tone pictures, which have much thematic material in common, labeled respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles"; and that in special ways the themes undergo transformation according to the composer's conception of these characters, need not move us if in the last analysis Liszt the musician fails his hearers.

Not to pretend that the "Faust" is a perfect score or one commensurate in musical material with a symphony of Mozart or Brahms, it remains a fascinating score.

Music Expresses Dignity

Leave aside the harmonic indebtedness of Wagner, which is palpable and is hardly longer disputed. The composer finds puissant utterance in the movement, which concerns Faust, with music that expresses dignity, pride, introspection, pasion, sensuousness. The love motive is oversensational—a tune that Vernon Blackburn would have called "overripe."

The theme which seems to be associated with Faust's search and self-torture is couched in the rather banal language of the "diminished seventh" chord that plagued music of the middle century, although Wagner proves how marvelously and creatively this chord can be used in the second act of "Tristan" and even in his own early "Faust" overture, while Liszt is neither so resourceful technically or so original in its employment.

Nevertheless, this theme has unforgettable physiognomy, and it speaks. There are some places of padding in the first movement. For all that there is a noble, extended and original form, and a noble, if sometimes theatrical, gesture. The essential expression, which is lofty, rings true. There are modulations and instrumental effects of a subtlety which has greatly influenced music and which corresponds in some sort to the modern conception of Goethe's character.

In fact, so many harmonic turns in this score have become familiar that for a student of orchestral composition of the romantic period it is as a book of quotations, and some of them very moving, too.

Gretchen Movement Is Poetic

But the Gretchen movement is one that will stand in a special place for a long time to come as an extraordinarily sympathetic and poetical evocation of the character. The theme that the oboe plays with the viola accompanying is as virginal as the celebrated passage that is to be associated with Gretchen's plucking of the daisy, "He loves me; he loves me not."

Then there is the theme—in A flat major, if memory is correct—deeper and more poignant, of brooding tenderness sung yesterday—a phase memorably sung yesterday by the strings.

A third theme is associated more directly with Faust; Faust's theme of introspection, wonderfully transformed, clarified, ennobled, enters the tonal picture. Other reminiscences of the Faust themes cross the orchestra, are vaguely or clearly reflected by it, as if they were the sleep-chasings of dream, or the image of Faust, approaching, and caught, before she has seen him in Gretchen's mirror.

The Mephistopheles movement was long condemned as theoretical, pretentious, pseudo-philosophic "music of the future." Therein the themes of Faust are caricatured and cheapened. Today this music remains both subtle and brilliant—not outmoded, as are earlier pages of the first movement. It is modernly felt and modernly scored music, taking in a measure the place of the classic symphony's scherzo.

Refrain is Theatrical

The end with the choral refrain is open to the reproach of theatricalism. But there is sincere and insincere "theatre." We forget how honest the romanticists of the Liszt-Wagner epoch were. Here the interpreter must sense and deeply believe in the composer. Here, if the musical idea does not match unmistakably the dramatic concept, that concept, that emotion, can readily be kindled by interpretation which makes audible the dream, even if it is more than the reality, of the musical score.

And it may be said that in this place, indeed throughout the symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky placed the work on the highest level; realized its uttermost possiblities; not only interpreted, but lived it, in every note; not only conveyed the conception of a scholar and poet, but communicated this conception, and its intense sincerity, to every one of the performers.

As a leave-taking of the Boston Symphony's New York audiences for this season, nothing could have been more fitting, or better planned. The performance drew fresh attention to the beauties of the orchestra's tone and technique, the euphony and balance of all its choirs.

In the Gretchen movement, when the clarinet took the theme from the oboe, matching its inflection so sensitively that it was as one person taking a poetical line from the mouth of another, he furnished only one example of a standard of solo performance that obtained throughout the concert. Remarkable, too, was the orchestral tone in pianissimo passages, and the superb effects attained with the voices.

Glee Club Tone Well Produced

The choral conclusion was unforgettable, preceded by pauses of silence as eloquent as the sound of the music, then by the mysterious pianissimo of the strings. The entrance of the voices was a tone-color that blended mystically with that of the instruments. It was as though the voices, solo and choral, came from some remote and radiant height. The climax had the glamour and atmosphere of a sacred drama. The tone of the singers of the glee club was wonderfully produced and controlled.

Rulon Robison, remembered for his singing of the tenor part under Muck, again took the solo, with evident feeling. It was not only the sounds in the fine thought of Whitman that moved you, but their exquisite meanings.

Conductor and orchestra were acclaimed and the conductor repeatedly recalled by the audience.

The Liszt Symphony was preceded by the impeccable clarity, finish and beauty of tone that this orchestra achieves when it performs the "surprise" symphony of Haydn. Two works more completely contrasted than these could hardly have been provided. In both of them a great conductor and interpreter did his devoir and paid profound and heartfelt respects to his art.

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra Here

April 3/37

Liszt's 'Faust' Offered by Symphony Musicians in Carnegie Hall Program

N. Y. Her. Tribune

Haydn Work Included

Harvard Glee Club Sings Lines of Goethe Poem

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the fifty-first season of its visits to New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony (No. 94, in G major) served as the prelude to the Liszt work, in which the eight closing lines from Goethe's "Faust" were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Y. Robison as the tenor soloist.

Liszt's symphony was played here by the Federal Music Project's Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra last June, but its last New York performance by a major privately sponsored organization was in the Boston Symphony's corresponding concert five years ago under Dr. Koussevitzky, with the same chorus (though not the same members) and the same vocal soloist. Although the "Surprise" symphony is usually considered as among Haydn's best known compositions, it is even longer since its last performance in the regular music season, in October, 1930, although it has had later hearings in the Stadium concerts.

Program Offers Contrast

In style and character, the two symphonies made a well contrasted program, if not with the seventy-three-minute extent of the Liszt work, a short one, while both were well chosen to exhibit the notable qualities of the Boston Symphony considered as a whole and of its component choirs. The Haydn symphony received a straightforward reading of excellent taste which gave its hearers opportunity to consider with pleasure the clarity and polish collectively shown by the visiting symphonists, especially by the strings, and the Liszt music gave an unusually convincing revelation of the virtuosity and musicianship of this remarkable organization and its characteristic combination of clarity and opulent sonority.

The "Faust" symphony is seldom played here—the last performance before that of April, 1932, was by the former State Symphony in 1925—and the infrequency of its hearings can be partly ascribed to its length and to the need of a chorus. There is an alternative and shorter instrumental ending, but, after listening to the rich-toned singing of the young men from Harvard, one could readily believe that the omission of the chorus would leave a certain sense of incompletion. Reason for infrequent playing can also be found in the music itself, in factors which have made a war horse frequently ridden by conductors fifteen or twenty years ago such as "Les Preludes" to remain stabled for much of the time in more recent years.

Touch of Sentimentality

Some of the less time-defying traits of the work have become more apparent since its last performance; a listener can find certain melodies bordering on the sentimental or giving an impression of slightly excessive sweetening, or find the grandeur of climactic measures not unmixed at times with grandiosity. Nor does every moment of the work seem indispensable; in some of them Liszt dwells on a favorite figure or idea beyond the extent in which such dwelling contributes to the development or progress of the work.

Still, in spite of a romanticism which has somewhat dated with its time and an eloquence not always unsuspect, the "Faust" symphony is still music of consequence, not only for its historical importance and the ways in which it has influenced later major composers of the last century, but also on account of the genuine communicative expressiveness, the still persuasive poetry and often real grandeur of the work itself. It still shows largeness of vision and, if not without undeniable exceptions, convincing inspiration. If the form sometimes seems unwieldly, the expression of the basic dramatic ideas in the development and transformation of the themes remains exceptional; the orchestral coloring is still usually convincing in its mastery.

To Return Next Season

The work found Dr. Koussevitsky at his best in an interpretation which revealed every detail and did full justice to the external effectiveness and to the more fundamental expressive resources of the symphony. It was imposing, but yet gave no impression of exaggeration of straining for effect, but of realizing as clearly and convincingly as possible what Liszt had to say—and much of this seemed still well worth saying. The Harvard Glee Club had a tone of laudable mellowness and sonority and Mr. Robison did laudable work in a solo role which sometimes lies punitively high. The audience applauded the participants with deserved enthusiasm.

The Boston Symphony will return to Carnegie Hall next season for the usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts.

937

ALD,

Films of Week

...y Soloist

Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. She will play the second piano concerto of Brahms.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 3 1937

Lowell Sun. Tele.
April 4/37

MYRA HESS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Brahms has been planned by Serge Koussevitzky for the 21st regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Myra Hess will be heard in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of this composer in B-flat, the first occasion in which the famous English pianist will have performed this work in Boston. The concerts will open with the "Academic Festival" Overture, which Brahms based upon German student songs. The latter half of the programme will consist of the Second Symphony in D. major.

Lowell Tele. Apr. 4/37

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The last concert but one of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky, dedicating this series to nineteenth century composers, has chosen two of them for this concert—César Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov. Franck's Symphony in D minor will open the programme, and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a musical picturization suggested by the Arabian Night's tales and utilizing the full resources of a virtuoso orchestra will conclude it.

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED AT RUTGERS UNIVERSITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RECEIVES HONORARY DEGREE, DOCTOR OF MUSIC

New Brunswick, N. J., March 30—AP—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. Clothier, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and one who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University Winter concert series.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 3 1937

The Boston Symphony orchestra is makin[redacted]last visit of the season to New York and Philadelphia this week so that there will be no programs at home. At the regular concerts in Symphony Hall next week Myra Hess, the distinguished English pianist, will be guest artist in an all-Brahms program in the course of which she will play his Second Pianoforte Concerto.

READING, PA.
TIMES

MAR 3 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HONORED

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. C. Clothiei, university president said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

24

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS LISZT WORK

'Faust' Pictures After Goethe Mark 50th Anniversary of Composer's Death

N. Y. Times

RULON ROBISON SOLOIST

April 3/37

Harvard Glee Club Also Takes Part in the Performance—Koussevitzky Conducts

By OLIN DOWNES

A memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony after Goethe, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; the Harvard Glee Club and the solo tenor, Rulon Robison, yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, constituted the only adequate observation in this season of 1936-1937 in New York, of the fiftieth anniversary of the death of Frank Liszt, which occurred July 31, 1886, at Bayreuth.

The musical ceremony, as will be seen, took place in the fifty-first year of the anniversary, and not the fiftieth. Had it been practical to visit here with Liszt's great work and the necessary assisting forces in the early part of the Boston Symphony season the performance of his unique score would not have been so delayed.

It is a poor record for other orchestras, visiting and resident, hereabouts. The position of Liszt in the music of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries is wholly exceptional and prophetic. Aside from critical or historical values, his most representative scores contain remarkable and arresting music. On all counts he has been unduly neglected.

Atones for Neglect

So far as a single performance might, this one atoned for much of the neglect. It was a performance that illuminated in a special and very impressive manner the qualities of the composition itself, the magnificent qualities of the orchestra and the art of the conductor which becomes constantly more distinguished.

Musical valuations of the material of the score may differ, and after all music's the thing—not the philosophic or dramatic source of the composition, save in so far as it really colors and fertilizes the imagination of the composer to the point where he becomes newly creative.

That Liszt was inspired by Goethe; that it is a series of three symphonic tone pictures, which have much thematic material in common, labeled respectively, "Faust," "Gretchen," and "Mephistopheles"; and that in special ways the themes undergo transformation according to the composer's conception of these characters, need not move us if in the last analysis Liszt the musician fails his hearers.

Not to pretend that the "Faust" is a perfect score or one commensurate in musical material with a symphony of Mozart or Brahms, it remains a fascinating score.

Music Expresses Dignity

Leave aside the harmonic indebtedness of Wagner, which is palpable and is hardly longer disputed. The composer finds puissant utterance in the movement, which concerns Faust, with music that expresses dignity, pride, introspection, pasion, sensuousness. The love motive is oversensational—a tune that Vernon Blackburn would have called "overripe."

The theme which seems to be associated with Faust's search and self-torture is couched in the rather banal language of the "diminished seventh" chord that plagued music of the middle century, although Wagner proves how marvelously and creatively this chord can be used in the second act of "Tristan" and even in his own early "Faust" overture, while Liszt is neither so resourceful technically or so original in its employment.

Nevertheless, this theme has unforgettable physiognomy, and it speaks. There are some places of padding in the first movement. For all that there is a noble, extended and original form, and a noble, if sometimes theatrical, gesture. The essential expression, which is lofty, rings true. There are modulations and instrumental effects of a subtlety which has greatly influenced music and which corresponds in some sort to the modern conception of Goethe's character.

In fact, so many harmonic turns in this score have become familiar that for a student of orchestral composition of the romantic period it is as a book of quotations, and some of them very moving, too.

Gretchen Movement Is Poetic

But the Gretchen movement is one that will stand in a special place for a long time to come as an extraordinarily sympathetic and poetical evocation of the character. The theme that the oboe plays with the viola accompanying is as virginal as the celebrated passage that is to be associated with Gretchen's plucking of the daisy, "He loves me; he loves me not."

Then there is the theme—in A flat major, if memory is correct—deeper and more poignant, of brooding tenderness sung yesterday—a phase memorably sung yesterday by the strings.

A third theme is associated more directly with Faust; Faust's theme of introspection, wonderfully transformed, clarified, ennobled, enters the tonal picture. Other reminiscences of the Faust themes cross the orchestra, are vaguely or clearly reflected by it, as if they were the sleep-chasings of dream, or the image of Faust, approaching, and caught, before she has seen him in Gretchen's mirror.

The Mephistopheles movement was long condemned as theoretical, pretentious, pseudo-philosophic "music of the future." Therein the themes of Faust are caricatured and cheapened. Today this music remains both subtle and brilliant—not outmoded, as are earlier pages of the first movement. It is modernly felt and modernly scored music, taking in a measure the place of the classic symphony's scherzo.

Refrain is Theatrical

The end with the choral refrain is open to the reproach of theatricalism. But there is sincere and insincere "theatre." We forget how honest the romanticists of the Liszt-Wagner epoch were. Here the interpreter must sense and deeply believe in the composer. Here, if the musical idea does not match unmistakably the dramatic concept, that concept, that emotion, can readily be kindled by interpretation which makes audible the dream, even if it is more than the reality, of the musical score.

And it may be said that in this place, indeed throughout the symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky placed the work on the highest level; realized its uttermost possiblities; not only interpreted, but lived it, in every note; not only conveyed the conception of a scholar and poet, but communicated this conception, and its intense sincerity, to every one of the performers.

As a leave-taking of the Boston Symphony's New York audiences for this season, nothing could have been more fitting, or better planned. The performance drew fresh attention to the beauties of the orchestra's tone and technique, the euphony and balance of all its choirs.

In the Gretchen movement, when the clarinet took the theme from the oboe, matching its inflection so sensitively that it was as one person taking a poetical line from the mouth of another, he furnished only one example of a standard of solo performance that obtained throughout the concert. Remarkable, too, was the orchestral tone in pianissimo passages, and the superb effects attained with the voices.

Glee Club Tone Well Produced

The choral conclusion was unforgettable, preceded by pauses of silence as eloquent as the sound of the music, then by the mysterious pianissimo of the strings. The entrance of the voices was a tone-color that blended mystically with that of the instruments. It was as though the voices, solo and choral, came from some remote and radiant height. The climax had the glamour and atmosphere of a sacred drama. The tone of the singers of the glee club was wonderfully produced and controlled.

Rulon Robison, remembered for his singing of the tenor part under Muck, again took the solo, with evident feeling. It was not only the sounds in the fine thought of Whitman that moved you, but their exquisite meanings.

Conductor and orchestra were acclaimed and the conductor repeatedly recalled by the audience.

The Liszt Symphony was preceded by the impeccable clarity, finish and beauty of tone that this orchestra achieves when it performs the "surprise" symphony of Haydn. Two works more completely contrasted than these could hardly have been provided. In both of them a great conductor and interpreter did his devoir and paid profound and heartfelt respects to his art.

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra Here

April 3/37

Liszt's 'Faust' Offered by Symphony Musicians in Carnegie Hall Program

N. Y. Her. Tribune

Haydn Work Included

Harvard Glee Club Sings Lines of Goethe Poem

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the fifty-first season of its visits to New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony (No. 94, in G major) served as the prelude to the Liszt work, in which the eight closing lines from Goethe's "Faust" were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Y. Robison as the tenor soloist.

Liszt's symphony was played here by the Federal Music Project's Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra last June, but its last New York performance by a major privately sponsored organization was in the Boston Symphony's corresponding concert five years ago under Dr. Koussevitzky, with the same chorus (though not the same members) and the same vocal soloist. Although the "Surprise" symphony is usually considered as among Haydn's best known compositions, it is even longer since its last performance in the regular music season, in October, 1930, although it has had later hearings in the Stadium concerts.

Program Offers Contrast

In style and character, the two symphonies made a well contrasted program, if not with the seventy-three-minute extent of the Liszt work, a short one, while both were well chosen to exhibit the notable qualities of the Boston Symphony considered as a whole and of its component choirs. The Haydn symphony received a straightforward reading of excellent taste which gave its hearers opportunity to consider with pleasure the clarity and polish collectively shown by the visiting symphonists, especially by the strings, and the Liszt music gave an unusually convincing revelation of the virtuosity and musicianship of this remarkable organization and its characteristic combination of clarity and opulent sonority.

The "Faust" symphony is seldom played here—the last performance before that of April, 1932, was by the former State Symphony in 1925—and the infrequency of its hearings can be partly ascribed to its length and to the need of a chorus. There is an alternative and shorter instrumental ending, but, after listening to the rich-toned singing of the young men from Harvard, one could readily believe that the omission of the chorus would leave a certain sense of incompletion. Reason for infrequent playing can also be found in the music itself, in factors which have made a war horse frequently ridden by conductors fifteen or twenty years ago such as "Les Preludes" to remain stabled for much of the time in more recent years.

Touch of Sentimentality

Some of the less time-defying traits of the work have become more apparent since its last performance; a listener can find certain melodies bordering on the sentimental or giving an impression of slightly excessive sweetening, or find the grandeur of climactic measures not unmixed at times with grandiosity. Nor does every moment of the work seem indispensable; in some of them Liszt dwells on a favorite figure or idea beyond the extent in which such dwelling contributes to the development or progress of the work.

Still, in spite of a romanticism which has somewhat dated with its time and an eloquence not always unsuspect, the "Faust" symphony is still music of consequence, not only for its historical importance and the ways in which it has influenced later major composers of the last century, but also on account of the genuine communicative expressiveness, the still persuasive poetry and often real grandeur of the work itself. It still shows largeness of vision and, if not without undeniable exceptions, convincing inspiration. If the form sometimes seems unwieldly, the expression of the basic dramatic ideas in the development and transformation of the themes remains exceptional; the orchestral coloring is still usually convincing in its mastery.

To Return Next Season

The work found Dr. Koussevitzky at his best in an interpretation which revealed every detail and did full justice to the external effectiveness and to the more fundamental expressive resources of the symphony. It was imposing, but yet gave no impression of exaggeration of straining for effect, but of realizing as clearly and convincingly as possible what Liszt had to say—and much of this seemed still well worth saying. The Harvard Glee Club had a tone of laudable mellowness and sonority and Mr. Robison did laudable work in a solo role which sometimes lies punitively high. The audience applauded the participants with deserved enthusiasm.

The Boston Symphony will return to Carnegie Hall next season for the usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts.

937

ALD,

Films of Week

y Soloist

Myra Hess, distinguished English pianist, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. She will play the second piano concerto of Brahms.

Lowell Sun. Tele.
April 4/37

MYRA HESS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

A programme consisting entirely of the music of Brahms has been planned by Serge Koussevitzky for the 21st regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Myra Hess will be heard in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of this composer in B-flat, the first occasion in which the famous English pianist will have performed this work in Boston. The concerts will open with the "Academic Festival" Overture, which Brahms based upon German student songs. The latter half of the programme will consist of the Second Symphony in D. major

---

Lowell Tele. Apr. 4/37

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The last concert but one of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky, dedicating this series to nineteenth century composers, has chosen two of them for this concert—César Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov. Franck's Symphony in D minor will open the programme, and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a musical picturization suggested by the Arabian Night's tales and utilizing the full resources of a virtuoso orchestra, will conclude it.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MAR 31 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY HONORED AT RUTGERS UNIVERSITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR RECEIVES HONORARY DEGREE, DOCTOR OF MUSIC

New Brunswick, N. J., March 30—AP—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. Clothier, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and one who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University Winter concert series.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

MAR 2 1937

The Boston Symphony orchestra is makin[redacted]last visit of the season to New York and Philadelphia this week so that there will be no programs at home. At the regular concerts in Symphony Hall next week Myra Hess, the distinguished English pianist, will be guest artist in an all-Brahms program in the course of which she will play his Second Pianoforte Concerto.

READING, PA.
TIMES

MAR 31 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER HONORED

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. C. Clothiei, university president said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we may welcome into the fellowship of the university one who has been a life-long resident in the realm of music and who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

MISSING
PAGE(S)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BACH MUSIC

Georges Mager as Soloist Uses Special Trumpet.

In presenting the fifth and last evening concert of its fifty-first season in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, discoursed music by Bach, Sibelius and Brahms in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was one of capacity proportions, with standees at the back of the auditorium. Among these latter were discovered two visiting conductors. With only tomorrow afternoon's program remaining of the ten given annually in this series, the Bostonians were accorded a rousing final tribute by their evening subscribers, who remained to applaud long and heartily after a brilliant performance of Brahms's first symphony had swept the concert to a climactic conclusion.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble began an evening of notably fine playing with the second of Bach's Brandenburg concerti, that in F major, in which solo violin (Richard Burgin), flute (Georges Laurent), oboe (Fernand Gillet), trumpet (Georges Mager) and harpsichord (Ernst Victor Wolff) were called upon for virtuoso achievement of the inner group of voices, contrasted with the tutti of the Bachian small orchestra. The performance was a stimulating and admirably balanced one, with Mr. Mager performing prodigies of trumpet valor on a specially constructed instrument in G, said to be the only one of its kind, which he brought with him to these shores from Paris. Whether Bach had in mind a trumpet corresponding to this one, or whether—as the late Charles Sanford Terry contended—trumpet players of Bach's day achieved their altissimo effects by the simple device of changing to a different mouthpiece, remains a question for further patient research. Of last night's heroic effort to play the notes as written, it could not be said that the player came off unscathed in all that pertained to tonal quality and intervalic surety. But it was a striking performance none the less and one of special interest to those familiar with sundry transpositions and simplifications of the trumpet part.

The infrequently performed seventh symphony was the evening's measure of Sibelius. Since the projected but mysteriously withheld eighth is still something of conjecture, this work, now some thirteen years old, is the Finnish giant's last published and performed contribution to the world's masterpieces in symphonic form. As magnificently played last night, its entire duration was only nineteen minutes, much less than the time required for a single movement of one of the colossal Bruckner symphonies. Yet Sibelius, in compressing into one-movement form all of the essentials of an extended work, is here much less spare and laconic than he is in the four-movement fourth symphony, with which the tendency is to bracket the seventh, possibly because both have yet to win any such popular recognition as the first and second symphonies; or, in less degree, the fifth. Why the third and the sixth, particularly the latter, are so little known to this public is something that explanations do not quite explain, save on the basis that conductors, not the public, determine which symphonies of Sibelius are capable or worthy of assimilation.

Consistently in the van in performances of the Finnish master's works, Dr. Koussevitzky again proved himself a devout and thoroughly understanding interpreter, and the orchestra brought to the score the translucence of tone, the incisive but, where required, gracious attack, the sweep and the serenity to communicate richly and fully the beauties of a work that is at once a marvel of structural achievement and of high Olympian vision. All the Sibelius hallmarks, as made familiar by the earlier symphonies, are met with in this symphony, from the first characteristic ascending scale passage to the running basses and bardic brasses, but its spirit is much less that of struggle than of calm outlook on the heights.

Mellower than in the past, Dr. Koussevitzky's achievement of the Brahms C minor symphony was likewise something of superlatively good playing on the part of the orchestra. Details of accentuation within the phrase and of emphasis on subsidiary voices, particularly in the first movement, remained to evoke differences of opinion, but these were of scant effect upon the eloquence of the performance in its revelation of the larger and more essential Brahms. O. T.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS BACH MUSIC

N.Y. Sun Apr. 2/37

Georges Mager as Soloist Uses Special Trumpet.

In presenting the fifth and last evening concert of its fifty-first season in Manhattan, the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, discoursed music by Bach, Sibelius and Brahms in Carnegie Hall last night. The audience was one of capacity proportions, with standees at the back of the auditorium. Among these latter were discovered two visiting conductors. With only tomorrow afternoon's program remaining of the ten given annually in this series, the Bostonians were accorded a rousing final tribute by their evening subscribers, who remained to applaud long and heartily after a brilliant performance of Brahms's first symphony had swept the concert to a climactic conclusion.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his ensemble began an evening of notably fine playing with the second of Bach's Brandenburg concerti, that in F major, in which solo violin (Richard Burgin), flute (Georges Laurent), oboe (Fernand Gillet), trumpet (Georges Mager) and harpsichord (Ernst Victor Wolff) were called upon for virtuoso achievement of the inner group of voices, contrasted with the tutti of the Bachian small orchestra. The performance was a stimulating and admirably balanced one, with Mr. Mager performing prodigies of trumpet valor on a specially constructed instrument in G, said to be the only one of its kind, which he brought with him to these shores from Paris. Whether Bach had in mind a trumpet corresponding to this one, or whether—as the late Charles Sanford Terry contended—trumpet players of Bach's day achieved their altissimo effects by the simple device of changing to a different mouthpiece, remains a question for further patient research. Of last night's heroic effort to play the notes as written, it could not be said that the player came off unscathed in all that pertained to tonal quality and intervalic surety. But it was a striking performance none the less and one of special interest to those familiar with sundry transpositions and simplifications of the trumpet part.

The infrequently performed seventh symphony was the evening's measure of Sibelius. Since the projected but mysteriously withheld eighth is still something of conjecture, this work, now some thirteen years old, is the Finnish giant's last published and performed contribution to the world's masterpieces in symphonic form. As magnificently played last night, its entire duration was only nineteen minutes, much less than the time required for a single movement of one of the colossal Bruckner symphonies. Yet Sibelius, in compressing into one-movement form all of the essentials of an extended work, is here much less spare and laconic than he is in the four-movement fourth symphony, with which the tendency is to bracket the seventh, possibly because both have yet to win any such popular recognition as the first and second symphonies; or, in less degree, the fifth. Why the third and the sixth, particularly the latter, are so little known to this public is something that explanations do not quite explain, save on the basis that conductors, not the public, determine which symphonies of Sibelius are capable or worthy of assimilation.

Consistently in the van in performances of the Finnish master's works, Dr. Koussevitzky again proved himself a devout and thoroughly understanding interpreter, and the orchestra brought to the score the translucence of tone, the incisive but, where required, gracious attack, the sweep and the serenity to communicate richly and fully the beauties of a work that is at once a marvel of structural achievement and of high Olympian vision. All the Sibelius hallmarks, as made familiar by the earlier symphonies, are met with in this symphony, from the first characteristic ascending scale passage to the running basses and bardic brasses, but its spirit is much less that of struggle than of calm outlook on the heights.

Mellower than in the past, Dr. Koussevitzky's achievement of the Brahms C minor symphony was likewise something of superlatively good playing on the part of the orchestra. Details of accentuation within the phrase and of emphasis on subsidiary voices, particularly in the first movement, remained to evoke differences of opinion, but these were of scant effect upon the eloquence of the performance in its revelation of the larger and more essential Brahms. O. T.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS
APR 2 - 1937

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky Honored by Rutgers

The pinnacle of the music season at Rutgers for three consecutive years has been the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On each occasion, its principal conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, has waved the baton. Dr. Koussevitsky does not always conduct, directing being left sometimes to others even when the orchestra is thrilling audiences in large cities. There has grown up, therefore, an intimate tie between Dr. Koussevitsky and the university, and it had some part in the awarding of an honorary degree of Doctor of Music by the institution at the conclusion of Tuesday's thoroughly enjoyable and inspiring concert. The principal reason was Dr. Koussevitsky's rich accomplishment in the field of music. The degree that was conferred upon him was fully earned.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 3 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY MUSIC ANNOUNCED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit here of the present season for a concert in the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday evening, April 20.

Serge Koussevitzky announced the following program: Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, in A-major; Sibelius's tone-poem in miniature, "The Swan of Tuonela," based upon an episode from the Finnish folk epic, the "Kalevala." English horn solo to be played by Louis Speyer; and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, in F-minor.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 3 - 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Gives Fifth and Last Concert of Series—Serge Koussevitzky Conducts

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the inspired direction of Serge Koussevitzky, closed its fifty-sixth Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music last night, as it gave its fifth and last concert of the 1936-37 series. It was a splendid conclusion to an already exceptional season. Most significant, it seemed, was the fact that the close of the concert seemed to transcend all that went befort. It was the "Mephistopheles" movement of Liszt's "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures," derived from Goethe's "Faust." The movement opens with musci which might be said to have inspired the modern George Antheil in its Satanic, unworldly and irrational musical portrait, and somehow changes into an even more extraordinary state of calm and mysticism.

The concert opened with Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony No. 94 in G Major, which was said to have been composed by Hadyn as a "novelty" and which, at all times melodious, is the product of unusual orchestration. It provided excellent balance for the second half of the program, the Liszt "Pictures," which were of Faust, Gretchen and then Mephistopheles.

The Harvard University Glee Club assisted in the conclusion of the "Mephistopheles' movement, intoning quietly almost to the very end over the muted notes of the orchestra, "The Chorus Mysticus." The last two lines were sung and played at full value. The solo part was sung by Rulon Y. Robison, tenor soloist of the club, who had fine tone quality, but who probably needs only experience to give his voice greater magnitude. The club, directed by G. Wallace Woodworth, did itself proud.

The Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevizky will return to Brooklyn next season in another series of five concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN
APR 3 - 1937

Boston Orchestra at Best In Sibelius' 7th Symphony

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

One of the most beautiful of all the Sibelius symphonies was brought to Carnegie Hall last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh of the great Finnish composer's works in this form is, for some reason, less played than several of the others. Yet it has been hailed by those who are supposed to know their Sibelius as his greatest achievement in the art of symphonic structure.

The work, which was first introduced to this country by Leopold Stokowski in 1926, is almost thirteen years old. Last night, if memory serves, marked its first New York performance this season by any of the major orchestras.

It is a symphony in one movement and represents Sibelius in the full power of his creative maturity. The individual style that one nowadays thinks of as "typically Sibelius" flowers here with marvelous freedom and variety. Much less obscure and severe than the Sixth, this symphony brings into play genial, melodious elements that remind one of the second of the series. Except that here the structure is far more complex. Opportunities to hear it more often would be very welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was one of immaculate clarity and of great eloquence as well. The orchestra played again with its characteristic virtuosity, which is just another way of saying that the performance was a marvel of lucid and polished artistry.

The Sibelius work was preceded on the program by the Second Brandenburg Concerto of Bach. Its performance called for the solo services of several of the orchestra's principal instrumentalists, among them, Richard Burgin, the concertmaster; Georges Laurent, flutist, Fernand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpet player.

As usual, the most taxing burdens of the work fell to Mr. Mager. The high trumpet parts of the first and last movements are famous. For a long time the authorities wondered whether Bach really had a trumpet in mind when he wrote them. And their execution always has been considered more or less of a feat.

Mr. Mager tackled them creditably, though he did not succeed in dispelling the sense of discomfort and strain that so often attends their performance. The remaining elements in the beautiful old score were admirably handled, a reduced group of strings and a harpsichord supporting the solo parts.

The last half of the program was given over to a performance of Brahms' C Minor Symphony, which seems of late to be yielding its place of popularity to the Second of Sibelius. A capacity audience attended and was lavish in its appreciation.

Boston Orchestra at Best In Sibelius' 7th Symphony

By WINTHROP SARGEANT.

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

One of the most beautiful of all the Sibelius symphonies was brought to Carnegie Hall last night by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh of the great Finnish composer's works in this form is, for some reason, less played than several of the others. Yet it has been hailed by those who are supposed to know their Sibelius as his greatest achievement in the art of symphonic structure.

The work, which was first introduced to this country by Leopold Stokowski in 1926, is almost thirteen years old. Last night, if memory serves, marked its first New York performance this season by any of the major orchestras.

It is a symphony in one movement and represents Sibelius in the full power of his creative maturity. The individual style that one nowadays thinks of as "typically Sibelius" flowers here with marvelous freedom and variety. Much less obscure and severe than the Sixth, this symphony brings into play genial, melodious elements that remind one of the second of the series. Except that here the structure is far more complex. Opportunities to hear it more often would be very welcome.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was one of immaculate clarity and of great eloquence as well. The orchestra played again with its characteristic virtuosity, which is just another way of saying that the performance was a marvel of lucid and polished artistry.

The Sibelius work was preceded on the program by the Second Brandenburg Concerto of Bach. Its performance called for the solo services of several of the orchestra's principal instrumentalists, among them, Richard Burgin, the concertmaster; Georges Laurent, flutist, Fernand Gillet, oboist, and Georges Mager, trumpet player.

As usual, the most taxing burdens of the work fell to Mr. Mager. The high trumpet parts of the first and last movements are famous. For a long time the authorities wondered whether Bach really had a trumpet in mind when he wrote them. And their execution always has been considered more or less of a feat.

Mr. Mager tackled them creditably, though he did not succeed in dispelling the sense of discomfort and strain that so often attends their performance. The remaining elements in the beautiful old score were admirably handled, a reduced group of strings and a harpsichord supporting the solo parts.

The last half of the program was given over to a performance of Brahms' C Minor Symphony, which seems of late to be yielding its place of popularity to the Second of Sibelius. A capacity audience attended and was lavish in its appreciation.

NY American Apl ~~7~~ 1937

28

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here Assisted by Harvard Singers; Miss Coutts Entertains at Dinner

A large audience assembled at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening for the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-first season here. The Harvard Glee Club appeared with the orchestra, lead by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, in Liszt's "Faust Symphony."

Miss Frances Coutts, hostess in the committee box, gave a dinner at her home, No. 128 Willow street, preceding the concert. Her guests were: Mr. and Mrs. Phillips Elliott, Mrs. Kenneth M. Reed, William J. Foster and Miss Isabele F. Ide.

The box of Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen was ocupied by members of the staff of the Brooklyn Visiting Nurse Association, of which Mrs. Van Sinderen is president. In another box Colonel and Mrs. Royden Beebe, Colonel and Mrs. Kenneth Lord and Major and Mrs. Milo Buchanan, all of Fort Hamilton, were guests of the Brooklyn Committee, which acts as a co-sponsor of the concerts here.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart occupied the box of the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy. Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives had Mrs. John Nathaniel Ives as her box guest.

Rulon Y. Robinson, tenor, was the glee club soloist. The program also included the Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony in G Major.

The concert was the last in a series of five presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, chairman of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman. Assisting the sponsoring groups were: Mrs. Edward C. Blum, chairman of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, membership chairman for the Brooklyn Committee and Miss Virginia Marvin, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
APR 4 - 1937

Festivals via Koussevitzky

This being the season when summer tourists begin to think of Salzburg, Munich and other musical centers where they may be amused and instructed, a timely announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that America now is prepared to compete musically with the best Europe has to offer.

Mrs. Gorham Brooks has donated an estate—"Tanglewood"—between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., and for two summers the Boston Symphony already has given festival concerts there with a daily attendance averaging 5,000.

This summer there are to be six concerts devoted to the best in orchestral music. Later Director Koussevitzky promises great choral works and operas which are practical under the physical conditions of the locale.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
APR 4 - 1937

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The last concert but one of the Tuesday afternoon series by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall next Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Serge Koussevitzky, dedicating this series to nineteenth century composers, has chosen two of them for this concert—César Franck and Rimsky - Korsakov. Franck's Symphony in D minor will open the programme, and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a musical picturization suggested by the Arabian Night's tales and utilizing the full resources of a virtuoso orchestra, will conclude it.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 4 - 1937

Music on Record: J. S. Bach

Beethoven, Mozart, Wagner and Others

NINE of the preludes and fugues from the second book of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord recorded by Edwin Fischer have been released here by Victor. These preludes and fugues—Nos. 35 and 43—are taken from the third and fourth albums of the Bach Society, for which Mr. Fischer has recorded the entire 48. The writer is an admirer of Mr. Fischer's playing, but he is aware that it does not meet the requirements of many people of excellent taste and judgment, and he is able to understand why this is so. Mr. Fischer's Bach will only appeal to those who feel that Bach's music is essentially romantic in spirit, with the expressive dominating the formal elements This has not for some time been, and probably is not now, the prevailing view of Bach; yet it is doubtful if today the late Harold Samuel could with his facile, brittle, emotionless playing of Bach compel the reverence with which he was received a decade ago; Mr. Fischer's Bach style probably more nearly approximates, though it may not quite satisfy, the prevailing taste. It is the impression of the writer, incidentally, that Mr. Fischer's Bach style has undergone certain modifications since he made the first recordings for the series of which the discs under consideration represent the conclusion; that it has become more subjective, and that it has reached if it has not passed the point at which it may expect the reproach of sentimentalism; I prefer the recordings of the first 24 preludes and fugues for this reason.

* * *

Another Victor release for April is the Koussevitsky-Boston Symphony recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F (three discs). This is an exceptionally brilliant performance, in Mr. Koussevitsky's best classical manner—it has, that is, to say, vigor, pace, a certain effect of disciplined bluster. I am not sure that I do not prefer the Adrian Boult-B. B. C. Orchestra recording which Victor brought out a year or so ago; but in any event, Mr. Koussevitsky here avoids the palpable exaggerations and eccentricities that disfugure has recorded performance of the Eroica without lapsing into the dullness that characterizes his performance of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished in the recorded version. The recording is exceptionally fine—far superior to the Boult-B. B. C. recording I have mentioned.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES
APR 6 - 1937

Entertained by Dean.

Winifred Young Cornish of Montclair, pianist, was the guest of honor at a dinner given by Miss Margaret T. Corwin, dean of the New Jersey College for Women, preceding the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Rutgers University, New Brunswick, Wednesday evening. Following the concert the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished conductor.

N. Y. Tribune Apl 4 1937

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra Here

Liszt's 'Faust' Offered by Symphony Musicians in Carnegie Hall Program

Haydn Work Included

Harvard Glee Club Sings Lines of Goethe Poem

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the fifty-first season of its visits to New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a memorable performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. Haydn's "Surprise" symphony (No. 94, in G major) served as the prelude to the Liszt work, in which the eight closing lines from Goethe's "Faust" were sung by the Harvard Glee Club and by Rulon Y. Robison as the tenor soloist.

Liszt's symphony was played here by the Federal Music Project's Brooklyn Symphony Orchestra last June, but its last New York performance by a major privately sponsored organization was in the Boston Symphony's corresponding concert five years ago under Dr. Koussevitzky, with the same chorus (though not the same members) and the same vocal soloist. Although the "Surprise" symphony is usually considered as among Haydn's best known compositions, it is even longer since its last performance in the regular music season, in October, 1930, although it has had later hearings in the Stadium concerts.

Program Offers Contrast

In style and character, the two symphonies made a well contrasted program, if not with the seventy-three-minute extent of the Liszt work, a short one, while both were well chosen to exhibit the notable qualities of the Boston Symphony considered as a whole and of its component choirs. The Haydn symphony received a straightforward reading of excellent taste which gave its hearers opportunity to consider with pleasure the clarity and polish collectively shown by the visiting symphonists, especially by the strings, and the Liszt music gave an unusually convincing revelation of the virtuosity and musicianship of this remarkable organization and its characteristic combination of clarity and opulent sonority.

The "Faust" symphony is seldom played here—the last performance before that of April, 1932, was by the former State Symphony in 1925—and the infrequency of its hearings can be partly ascribed to its length and to the need of a chorus. There is an alternative and shorter instrumental ending, but, after listening to the rich-toned singing of the young men from Harvard, one could readily believe that the omission of the chorus would leave a certain sense of incompletion. Reason for infrequent playing can also be found in the music itself, in factors which have made a war horse frequently ridden by conductors fifteen or twenty years ago such as "Les Preludes" to remain stabled for much of the time in more recent years.

Touch of Sentimentality

Some of the less time-defying traits of the work have become more apparent since its last performance; a listener can find certain melodies bordering on the sentimental or giving an impression of slightly excessive sweetening, or find the grandeur of climactic measures not unmixed at times with grandiosity. Nor does every moment of the work seem indispensable; in some of them Liszt dwells on a favorite figure or idea beyond the extent in which such dwelling contributes to the development or progress of the work.

Still, in spite of a romanticism which has somewhat dated with its time and an eloquence not always unsuspect, the "Faust" symphony is still music of consequence, not only for its historical importance and the ways in which it has influenced later major composers of the last century, but also on account of the genuine communicative expressiveness, the still persuasive poetry and often real grandeur of the work itself. It still shows largeness of vision and, if not without undeniable exceptions, convincing inspiration. If the form sometimes seems unwieldly, the expression of the basic dramatic ideas in the development and transformation of the themes remains exceptional; the orchestral coloring is still usually convincing in its mastery.

To Return Next Season

The work found Dr. Koussevitsky at his best in an interpretation which revealed every detail and did full justice to the external effectiveness and to the more fundamental expressive resources of the symphony. It was imposing, but yet gave no impression of exaggeration of straining for effect, but of realizing as clearly and convincingly as possible what Liszt had to say—and much of this seemed still well worth saying. The Harvard Glee Club had a tone of laudable mellowness and sonority and Mr. Robison did laudable work in a solo role which sometimes lies punitively high. The audience applauded the participants with deserved enthusiasm.

The Boston Symphony will return to Carnegie Hall next season for the usual quota of five evening and five afternoon concerts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 7 - 1937

Finland's Male Chorus Plans American Tour

University of Helsinki Group to Sing Here Jan. 6

The chorus of the University of Helsinki in Finland, known at home as the "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat" or "Y. L." will make its first American tour next season, beginning with appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on December 31 and January 1 and in New York on January 6. The programs on the tour will be devoted to Finnish music.

The organization, which now consists of fifty men, conducted by Dr. Martti Turunen, was organized in 1883; Jean Sibelius is an honorary member. The American tour will be made under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Musical Council, of which Marshall Bartholomew is president, and under the management of Richard Copley.

Eero Jarnefelt, the Finnish Minister, heads the sponsoring group for the tour, which also includes K. F. Altio, Finnish Consul General in New York, the Finnish consuls in Philadelphia, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, Duluth, Toronto and Montreal; Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick A. Stock, Werner Janssen, John H. Finley, Olin Downes, William J. Henderson, Professor Harry Rogers Pratt of the University of Virginia; Professor Eugene Van Cleef, Ohio State University, and others.

Honorary sponsors in Finland include President Kyosti Kallio, Rudolf Holst, Minister of Foreign Affairs; K. A. Brotherus, president of the University of Helsinki; Georg Schneevoigt, conductor of the Helsinki Municipal Orchestra, and Jean Sibelius and Selim Palmgren, composers.

NEW YORK MIRROR
APR 5 - 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting; Harvard Glee Club and Mr. Rulon Y. Robison, tenor. Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon.

THE PROGRAM.

Symphony in G (No. 94, "The Surprise") .... Haydn
"A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures" .... Liszt

Dr. Koussevitzky performed another act of devotion to the cause of neglected music on Saturday, by reviving Liszt's somewhat theatrical setting of the Goethe legend. The full title specifies "after Goethe," which has left the composer no end of liberty.

Franz begins his wayward way by regarding the sonata form, which alone gives the slightest excuse for using the word "symphony" at all, from afar. It is a vague designation, at best, for Liszt's score has but a faint resemblance to the classic structure.

This is meandering, attenuated music, strangely empty and tiresome at times. Yet there are many pages fraught with a noble dignity. Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a devoted reading, and the chorus, in the final movement, "Alles Vergaengliche," sang exquisitely; though Mr. Robison's voice stretched perilously at one point.

The same organization presented this work in Carnegie Hall five years ago.

* * *

That being that, so to speak, the Harvard boys got into their tail coats and went down to the Town Hall in the evening for their annual choral concert with the girls of Radcliffe College. And it seemed to me that the boys had by far the better of it. For the species of tone evoked by the Radcliffe Choral Society was not enticing, although Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth, who conducted this joint effort, did his considerable best to preserve the amenities. The program was most interesting—motets, psalms, songs from the 15th to the early 20th Century, including the choruses from Offenbach's sparkling operetta, "La Belle Helene."

The world premiere of an opera by Aaron Copland, "The Second Hurricane," will take place on Wednesday evening, April 21, at The Playhouse, 466 Grand St., under the auspices of the Music School of the Henry Street Settlement. There will be two other performances, on Friday evening, April 23, and Saturday afternoon, April 24. The proceeds will go to a special fund for the production of original stage works by composers in America. Tickets are now on sale at the home of Mrs. William Lescaze, 211 E. 48th St.

Times Mar 31/37

RUTGERS HONORS KOUSSEVITZKY

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 30 (AP)—Rutgers University conferred the honorary degree of doctor of music tonight on Dr. Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the ceremony which followed a concert by the orchestra in the Rutgers gymnasium, Dr. Robert C. Clothier, university president, said to the conductor:

"We are doubly happy to have you with us this evening, not merely that we might enjoy the artistry of your orchestra under the inspiration of your genius—but that we have welcomed into the fellowship of the university one who has been a lifelong resident in the realm of music and who has contributed in great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance."

The concert was the third in as many years that the Boston Symphony has presented on the program of the Rutgers University winter concert series.

29

Hartford Courant

Rapt Crowd Hears Boston Symphony

Nov. 18 /36

Koussevitzky and His Players Wring 'Bravos' From Audience With Brilliant Performance

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the second concert of the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony in B flat (Ninth London) Haydn
Divertimento, "Baiser de la Fee" Stravinsky
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor Beethoven

About a year ago there was in Hartford a sort of sotto voce cry faintly to be heard throughout the musical quarters of the city, calling for four appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during our customary season of six concerts. Had the members of last night's audience been polled just at the end of the performance, the four-times-Boston movers would doubtless have found a constituency numerous enough to swing the deal. In this reviewer's four years of local concert going, it was the first time that "Bravos" were heard at the close of any musical event. Granted that they were rather timid Bravos, but nevertheless there they were—the bravest applause yet to be heard here.

Since Mr. Toscanini left the New York, writers and commentators upon music around the country have suddenly focused their attention and adulation on the Boston and Dr. Koussevitzky. They have called it the greatest extant musical body, pointed the explanatory finger at the fact that no other orchestra has worked so long with one conductor, and generally pressed wreaths upon the brows of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, one and all. Strange discovery— when so many of us could have told them that long, long ago. Maeterlinck has a little story for these discoverers, called "The Bluebird."

Virtuosity Stands Out.

Last night's performance was one of the really superb events in the city's musical annals, a brilliant piece of program-making spectacularly set out. Hundreds of reviews have expounded the peculiar and special qualities of the Boston and its Imperator, and I refer you to the compendium they would make, for detailed analyses. But if they were all sifted, their common adulation would be summed up in the term "virtuosity," virtuosity of individual players, of choirs, of the whole orchestra, and most of all, a kind of reading that ever calls out of any score, its most brilliant, most faceted, flashing sides. In fact, so gleamingly exploited is each phrase as it comes along, that it seems a fragment of music existing all alone in the world, isolated in a sort of momentary glory, and then paradoxically absorbed into the crystalline whole.

As an expression of dignity, simplicity, poise and spirit, last night's performance and embodiment of the Ninth London was an apotheosis of the symphonic Haydn. It had all the open frankness, the directness of this often trivialized composer, whose writing if not utterly deep, seizes you with its inescapable sincerity and realism.

As Flowing As Sea.

In performance, the Symphony was flecked with as many changing lights, as many changing tones and flowing rhythms as the surface of a sea. It had a continual swell and cadence, and a fine-figured spray, continually passing through and above it. Out of the adagio, Dr. Koussevitzky made a sad little bourgeois German song, but after all such was its composer, and I daresay tears came readily to Papa Haydn's eyes on occasion in the good old German fashion. In the subsequent movement there was the most marvelous trilling between strings and woodwinds, one of the glories of performance of the whole evening. It was all beautiful, clear, clean, spontaneous Haydn throughout.

"Igor, you are only a villain," Debussy once said to Stravinsky. Before the "Baiser de la Fee" began, someone nearby said, "I suppose this is going to be terribly noisy." Igor, my villain, how you fooled that person. Your fay certainly gave a kiss like that from a child who had just been licking a chocolate peppermint. "Baiser" is one great big birthcake. "Greetings from Igor to the New Romantics" iced pinkly out on top, a miracle of instrumentation, a melodic dessert, a cloying delight, and as magnificently performed last night as—well, as the Boston can perfect all modern scores. Almost too good to be true.

Last night's Fifth Beethoven was huge performance, in which Dr. Koussevitzky made this C Minor Symphony seem the true candidate for the otherwise bestowed title of "Eroica." It was of imperial dimension in tone, in brilliance, in stature, and time and again it rose and shook a mailed fist in the audience's face, much as Beethoven or Napoleon might have. I doubt if it was an intensively introspect presentation, but it had certainly a regal musicality about it, and lightning flashed over its highly chased bronze surface. In fact the modelling of the score, dynamically and rhythmically, was of extraordinary variety and vitality, and, shone with an amazing technical splendor. The second movement was the most memorable of the four, for power and a kind of rugged poignance, though personally I shall long remember the overwhelming beauty with which the first theme of the third section rose up out of faintly humming strings at its final appearance just before the "bridge."

T. H. P.

Franck, Rimsky In Eloquent Vein

Apr 7

It is a never-ending source of wonder to observe the intensity and apparent freshness with which Serge Koussevitzky approaches the most hackneyed item of the symphonic repertory. He is of that rare genus of story-tellers for whom the telling of an oft-repeated tale never seems to lose gusto. This was evident during the course of yesterday's matinee concert, the fifth in the Tuesday series, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the program consisted of two such standard works as Franck's Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

"Standard" puts the case mildly, since for anyone within earshot of a radio loudspeaker both works are much overplayed. They are not strangers, either, to the Boston Symphony repertory, where both appeared earlier in the season. The reason for their re-appearance on yesterday's program was that the Tuesday series of programs is being devoted this year to symphonic masterpieces of the nineteenth century. But Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the performances yesterday as if both numbers were new discoveries and he the discoverer.

The quality of the orchestral playing was especially remarkable since it is likely that scant attention had been given yesterday's program in this week's rehearsals. Under such circumstances the talents of both orchestra and conductor may in some respects be best judged. The present listener, who utilized the occasion for the perusal of thrice-familiar scores, was astonished not only by the superbly beautiful quality of tone heard in the performance of the Franck Symphony and the wonderfully precise ensemble and admirable balancing of parts, but even more by the almost literal fidelity to the printed indications of the score. There was no reasonable basis for anyone to complain that Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra with him, did not carry out Franck's intentions to the letter. Whether he realized the Franckian spirit is naturally a matter of opinion. It is the judgment of at least one listener in this regard that the performance was eloquent.

Nor did the presentation of the "Scheherazade" fall far behind. An occasional uncertainty of attack or sluggishness of release—unnoticeable in the case of a lesser orchestra than the Boston Symphony—may have been detected in the first two movements. Otherwise the performance was as brilliant as the instrumentation of Rimsky-Korsakov. The last movement was reproduced by conductor and players with a veritably frenetic vitality.

M. S.

Globe Apr. 10/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Serge Koussevitzky turned to the music of Johannes Brahms for the Boston Symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening. He chose three compositions which may reasonably be specified as of the serene and amiable side of Brahms: the "Academic Festival" Overture, the B-flat Piano Concerto, and the Second Symphony. The soloist in the concerto was that gifted and admired English musician, Myra Hess.

If ever a creative musician could boast of consistent and unmistakable style he was Brahms. So consistent and so unmistakable are all his works, orchestrally speaking for the present purpose, that the element of contrast must rigidly be preserved lest an entire Brahms' program pass beyond satisfaction to surfeit. That of this week falls a little short of desirable variety, though Brahms is always good to hear. The "Tragic" Overture or the C minor Symphony might better have been substituted for either the "Academic Festival" or the radiant D major Symphony.

One who remembered Miss Hess' vital playing of Brahms' D minor Piano Concerto with this orchestra a few seasons ago was slightly disappointed at the persistent heaviness which characterized most of her performance—with the exception of the slow movement—yesterday. As some in the audience observed, the piano music of Brahms may be unsuited to feminine musicians and reserved for the exclusive pleasure of males. But that is distinctly an unreliable rule, witness the perfection which Miss Hess has brought in her Jordan Hall recitals to the smaller piano pieces of Brahms.

The orchestra was also inclined to this same heaviness, most conspicuous in the first movement, but which as well detracted from the rippling Hungarian zest of the finale. The slow movement, on the other hand, was beautifully sensitice, impeccably phrased, a musicianly collaboration of soloist, orchestra and conductor. The cello solo revealed Mr Bedetti at his best. Overture and symphony lacked nothing of finesse or spirit.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky will revive the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, last heard here in 1932. The program includes a Suite of Corelli; the orchestral prelude, "Deep Forest," by the Boston composer, Mabel Daniels, and the most cherished of all Strauss waltzes, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

C. W. D.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first pair of Friday-Saturday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates the works of Brahms. Between the "Academic Festival" Overture and the Symphony No. 2 in D major was set the Pianoforte Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, with Myra Hess as soloist. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

It is probable that almost any American university might consider itself honored upon receiving a gift such as the "Academic Festival" Overture. Surely the master of symphonic form conferred upon the University of Breslau a greater honor than the Doctorate in Philosophy which the university conferred upon the composer and which occasioned the writing of this entertaining orchestral piece founded on student airs. As performed yesterday, the unacademic import of the piece was considerably in evidence and served to emphasize the Brahmsian qualities in informal array.

The concerto was a point of interest in more ways than one. In the first place, Miss Hess had the score before her—a procedure which naturally caused some speculation; yet it was noticeable that she virtually ignored the printed page during the performance. And possibly there were extenuating circumstances surrounding the preparation for this performance. Yet even the score upon the pianoforte could hardly obscure the musicianship of the pianist, whose performance occasioned unusually fervent applause. Had Miss Hess played nothing but the Andante movement of the concerto, the enthusiasm of the audience would have been justified.

Although the concerto was a highlight on the program, the performance of the symphony was a genuine triumph for Dr. Koussevitzky and his men. Climaxes were well prepared and were accomplished without the preliminary over-play which occasionally leads Dr. Koussevitzky into channels of emotionalism out of proportion to the significance of the musical text. It was a superb performance, well meriting the unmistakable evidence of enjoyment given by the audience, which stood and applauded with the liveliest enthusiasm.

G. M. S.

SYMPHONY SOLOIST IS MYRA HESS

Second Concerto Is Played in All Brahm's Offering

Ap 10 P.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A symphonic afternoon of Brahms and a long evening of Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung" is something to strike terror to the heart of even the most eager and serious music-lover. But whoever occupied the places at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, they were nearly all filled.

UNITY OF SELECTIONS

The particular lodestone yesterday at Symphony Hall was Myra Hess, who was heard in her first performance here of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto. If unity is to be preferred to strong contrast, then Dr. Koussevitzky chose the wisest course in prefacing the Concerto with the Academic Festival Overture and following it with the Second Symphony. The pieces thus placed together were written between Brahms' 45th and 49th years, and except for the agitated second movement of the Concerto, which alone departs from the major mode, they represent him in his mellow middle age.

With the exception noted, they are as free of youthful storm and stress as they are of the pessimism which may come in later years, and which in fact occasionally crept into Brahms' final music.

Koussevitzky's Brahms

With the excuse that he had "Goetterdaemmerung" before him, this reviewer might as well be candid and admit that he heard neither oveture nor symphony, but he is almost as certain of the excellence of both performances, of their faithfulness to the composer's intentions, as though he had been present in the flesh. The tendency which Dr. Kouusevitzky displayed in his earliest years here to put into the music of Brahms perhaps a shade too much of energy and excitement, long ago disappeared.

Today his performances of that composer's music are a model of all that they should be.

Yesterday's was not the first performance of this Concerto by a woman pianist which the Symphony Concerts have known. But it was only the third, and the performances themselves have been many. Brahms, at least in his larger works, is essentially a manly composer. Miss Hess, on the other hand, is rapidly ceasing to be a typically feminine pianist. The listening ear could detect little in her playing of the concerto, which was out of keeping with its mood.

Lack of Contrast

But the fault of this over-long work is that all four movements, or rather the first, third and fourth, are insufficiently contrasted; and Miss Hess might have made the opening Allegro a trifle more decisive and the final Allegretto a little livelier than she did. Oddly enough for her, she played the Concerto with her music before her, a thing which so rarely happens at a Symphony Concert as to be worthy of comment.

The audience received her with the enthusiasm which is to be expected in a town wherein Miss Hess has long been a reigning favorite.

Providence Journal

Soloist

Louis Speyer, English horn soloist, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Providence next Tuesday night.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

H. Apr 10

The 21st regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Myra Hess, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Brahms
"Academic Festival" Overture Op. 80
Brahms
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major Op. 83
Brahms
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 73

Did Dr. Koussevitzky plan an all-Brahms program for this concert in opera week on purpose and perhaps with his tongue in his cheek? Brahms of all composers is the least operatic, the furthest removed from the footlights. If he really did so with all this in mind, he is a remarkably shrewd and penetrating observer. Nothing could be better calculated to sweep the cobwebs from a brain crammed with too many thoughts about opera and too concentrated a dose of that peculiar art. At any rate Symphony Hall was completely filled; and those who have been attending steadily the events a few blocks westward must have come away yesterday marvellously refreshed.

There is another odd thing about an all-Brahms program in this particular week: it revives haphazardly the old rivalry between Wagner and Brahms. It would be agreeable to summon from wherever they are the early embittered camp-followers of those two composers and call to their attention that 54 years after the death of one and 40 after the other the works of both are adored by the public. It would then be pleasant to point out that there still exists a little of the old hostility on one side or the other!

Brahms's Second Piano Concerto is considered by Sir Donald Tovey to be the largest in the true classical form established by Mozart. It has, of course, an extra movement, the second, which is a kind of ferocious scherzo; but the remarkably contrived opening tutti is there—even if concealed. Sir Donald prefers to call this introduction by another name, but the point is that Brahms was the last composer to retain the form.

The Concerto is a magnificent work, composed with a wealth of imagination and an intellectual power typical of Brahms at his best. The lovely adagio was beautifully played by Miss Hess. No false slip, no uneven touch or rough tone disturbed its serenity. Here was playing of the most poetic description. In the last movement, too, Miss Hess gave a performance that was strong rhythmically and nimble in spirit. In the first two movements, less happily, there was a feeling of strain. There were moments when the music sounded impetuous when it should have been impulsive. No doubt the vigor of Dr. Koussevitzky's conception of this work forced Miss Hess in the two first movements to the point where her playing no longer could sound effortless. Fortunately the last half of the concerto was superbly interpreted by both soloist and orchestra. There was prolonged applause.

It might have been well, in view of the death of the well-loved and respected Boston composer, Arthur Foote, to have substituted Brahms's "Tragic" overture in place of the breezy "Academic Festival." On the other hand Dr. Koussevitzky doubtless thought that a performance without rehearsal would not be much of an honor to the memory of a composer. The Second Symphony was played yesterday by the orchestra in fine form and with a brilliant sweep and vitality.

The concerto will be repeated tonight. Next week the program, which has been slightly changed, will offer Bruckner's 8th Symphony; a Suite by Corelli; "Deep Forest" by the local composer Mabel Daniels; and Strauss's (Johann, for once) "Blue Danube" waltzes.

8:00 P. M.

SYMPHONY HALL—A repetition of Friday's symphony concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conducting. The program will be all-Brahms. Myra Hess will be the soloist in the second piano concerto in B flat major. The program will open with the Academic Festival Overture and close with the Second Symphony in D major; 8:15 P. M.

30

Myra Hess and a Program of Brahms Music

Trans. Apr. 10/37

An Anniversary Is Recalled by Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra

An all-one-composer-program at a concert usually stimulates questions. For the all-Brahms program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon and to be repeated tonight there is presumably the simple explanation that Johannes died in Vienna forty years ago, on April 3, 1897, and that, the orchestra having been out of town last week, the present pair of concerts came nearest to the anniversary date.

It was undoubtedly fitting that a jubilant note be given the proceedings since it is the music of jubiliation that Brahms wrote which most universally stimulates contemporary listeners and which most warmly enkindles the imaginative and interpretative talents of Dr. Koussevitzky. Thus it was fortunate that without exception the three works on yesterday's program sounded this note of jubiliation more consistently than any other—the "Academic Festival" Overture, the Second Piano Concerto in B-flat and the D major Symphony.

The exultant flourish of brass at the end of the Symphony, now a familiar phenomenon in Bostonians' ears according to the Koussevitzky version, sent the audience home yesterday in the requisite and expected mood, after a concert in which listening had been made easy because no problems were offered that were not solved long ago. There was nothing more startlingly new in yesterday's performance of the Symphony than an unusually strongly stressed tone from the tuba in the first movement. Bostonians have become conversant but not sated with Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the Symphony, which is set forth like a prolonged hymn of joy with a brooding interlude in the second movement and restrainedly gay pause in the third.

An apt prelude to the proceedings was the "Academic" Overture in a happily fashioned presentation. The soloist for the ensuing Concerto was Myra Hess, a fact that was sufficient to inspire pleasurable anticipation among patrons of the symphony concerts, where she has appeared as a paragon of the pianistic virtues in the past.

The Brahms B-flat Concerto, though, is ordinarily regarded a weightier task for the pianist than Mozart or Schumann or Beethoven Fourth, or even the earlier Brahms in D minor. But by adding it to her repertory at this time Miss Hess is following a logical development of her talent from a subtle, lovely and even imaginative but essentially miniature pianism to the profound and heroic artistry of the pianistic giants.

By its length and sustained power and by the nature of its pianistic style the B-flat Concerto makes enormous demands on the sheer physical endurance of the performer. In this regard Miss Hess did not fall short yesterday, matching the orchestral outbursts chord for chord and sonority for sonority. Perhaps, however, the expenditure of physical energy made parallel concentration on other primarily musical problems impossible at times, though one hesitates to make an affirmation on the point in the light of the long-established observation that the pianism of Miss Hess has been inseparable from her musicality.

For one reason or another, at any rate, she was occasionally ill at ease. The open score on the music-rack before her, furthermore, did not insure as impeccably neat execution as is her wont, nor did it prevent a moment of slight confusion between her and the conductor in the last movement.

All of which is meant not to detract from the appeal of a rarely gifted artist, but merely to suggest that her performance of the Brahms Second Concerto wants seasoning before it will have the inevitability of, say, her presentation of the Schumann Concerto. As it was we were moved yesterday especially by the poetic beauty of the pianist's phrases in the slow movement, the 'cello solo of which was played with unusual warmth and sensitiveness by Mr. Bedetti.

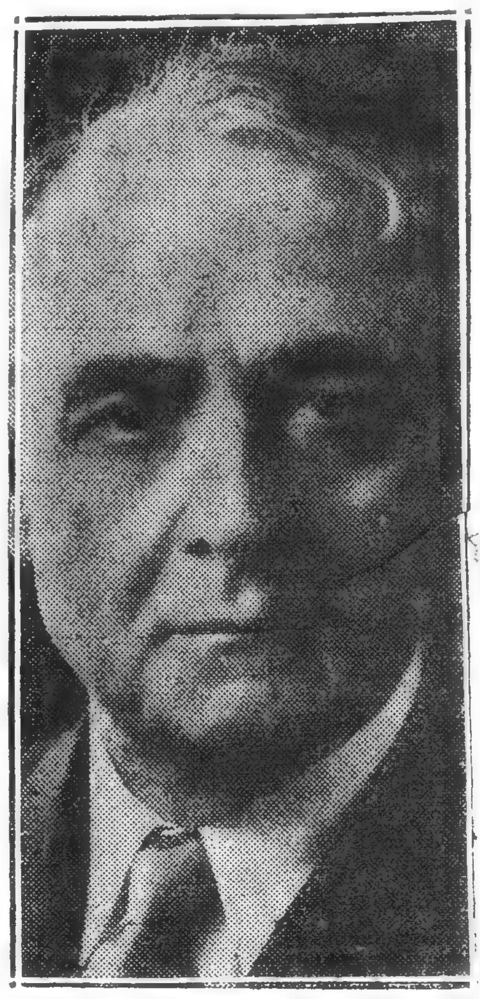
The Concerto appeals as much to Dr. Koussevitzky as it does to pianists. And so we heard yesterday the brilliant, symphonic version of the work that it asks. Miss Hess was quick to make acknowledgment to conductor and musicians as the stormy applause broke out immediately after the end of the performance.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

APR 4 - 1937

Boston Symphony to Play At Auditorium on 14th

Koussevitzky Will Bring Noted Musicians Here



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will make what has come to be viewed as its annual visit to Worcester for the Worcester Civic Music Association's concert at the Auditorium, Wednesday night, April 14, at 8.15 o'clock. This will be the fifth year that the orchestra has been included in the civic music course.

The concert will be open only to members of the association and no tickets will be sold.

More than a half century old, the orchestra holds a unique place in the musical life and history of America. It was founded in 1881 by the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson, whose dream and aspiration was an orchestra of European standard in this country.

He engaged the finest musicians, brought to this country the greatest conductors and set a precedent by demanding the musicians devote their entire talent to the orchestra.

As a result, during the years intervening the orchestra has built up literally a tradition of perfection—a tradition which was freshened and given new distinction when Dr. Koussevitzky assumed command in 1924.

In Worcester the orchestra will depart from some traditions of program building by devoting the entire evening to two major works.

The first is the great Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor, one of the greatest musical compositions of the ages, according to musicologists.

Its movements are marked "Lento—allegro non troppo," "allegretto" and "allegro non troppo."

Contrasting with this great symphony will be the ever-loved Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," by Romsky-Korsakov. The composer planned this work on the "Thousand Nights and a Night" stories and the suite includes "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kalandar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," and finally, "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior."

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
HERALD

APR [illegible] 1937

Boston Symphony Will Play a Waltz

BOSTON, April 10 (US)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra surprised the music world Saturday by announcing he will call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss, Jr., and will be played at next week's Friday and Saturday "Serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56 years history that a popular aria has been played.

Dr. Koussevitsky said:

"I admit it has common, popular qualities. But Blue Danube also possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public love it. that is a compliment to the public as well as to the music. We shall break with custom and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 4 - 1937

John Priebe, well known Buffalo tenor, who sang in the performance of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in Boston last week, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky, received some very eulogistic press notices for his work.

The Boston Herald stated that the performance surpassed that of last year and commented: "The chief reason for this was that the important role of the Evangelist was taken by a new and exceedingly able singer, Mr. John Priebe. He sang the difficult recitatives with unfailing assurance, a clear diction and a sympathetic understanding. Thus the narrative was much more vital than was the case last year."

The Boston Globe wrote: "Of the singers new to Boston, Mr. Priebe excelled. Though a young artist, his voice is strong and resonant; he sang not only with style but with depth of feeling, and his enunciation of the English text was perfectly clear. Moreover, the recitative of the Evangelist was treated with uncommon regard for accuracy of notes and their time values."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 10 1937

SYMPHONY TO PLAY "THE BLUE DANUBE"

Will Appear For First Time in 56 Years on Boston Program

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—The Boston Symphony orchestra, for the first time in its 56 years of existence, today included Johann Strauss' beautiful waltz, the Blue Danube, on its regular symphony program for next weekend.

The program marks the 70th anniversary of Strauss' composition.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, forestalled any intimation that inclusion of the lilting waltz, seldom played on a symphony program, meant the orchestra would include so-called "popular" music on its programs in the future.

"Unfortunately," he said in a footnote, "the Blue Danube has been made so common by innumerable, perhaps careless, performances that its uncommon qualities are often lost sight of. The artistic achievement of Strauss in the Blue Danube is great enough to deserve the most careful study and exceptional performance with the best of orchestral facilities."

Myra Hess As Soloist

Adv. - April 11/37

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

MYRA HESS' periodic appearances as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are always singularly happy occasions.

The very marked sympathy which exists between the distinguished British pianist and Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra has resulted in memorable artistic achievement in many past performances.

It was accordingly a devoted public which awarded its utmost enthusiasm to the performance of the Brahms Second Piano Concerto at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

On Friday afternoon the performance itself, however, was not of unmitigated success, and while this may be ascribed largely to circumstances which because of their very nature are impossible to regulate, it is also true that this particular Concerto is not one in which Myra Hess is most at home.

* * *

IN immensity of proportion exceeding all other classic literature in this form, the B flat major Concerto places correspondingly excessive demands upon the soloist. And while Myra Hess' intellectual grasp of the whole is sure, her performance lacked the abundant vitality required by this music.

The result was that the stormy first movement, as well as the great scherzo which Brahms interposed as the second were slightly forced. The performance of the Allegro Appasionata especially, while solid enough, lacked emotional intensity and boldness of sweep.

The Andante fared somewhat better. Here for the first time the mood of the music was definitely captured.

The last, Allegro con spirito, with its bubbling gayety and grace sounded only a little less well than it would have had Myra Hess been entirely at ease in it.

However, Miss Hess seldom disappoints her audiences, and it is finally this that is important rather than the single occasion which failed to find her at her best.

* * *

THE BRAHMS "Academic Festival" Overture, Op. 80 with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program was splendidly performed.

Written in acknowledgement of the degree of Doctor of Philosphy conferred upon him by the University of Breslau, it is a seriously constructed work, despite the fact that it is based on student songs.

It is hearty music but likewise contains a meditative quality, that lifts it out of the sphere of potpourri.

The Brahms Second Symphony in D major, with which Dr. Koussevitzky concluded the program, was superbly performed. The orchestra was, as a matter of fact, in top form throughout the afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky was completely absorbed in the latter work and it was as though one realized for the first time the poetry of expression, the serenity, and joy, of which it is possessed.

* * *

TOMORROW evening Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in the last concert of the Monday evening series in Symphony Hall. The Beethoven Second Symphony in D major, and Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor will be heard at this time.

The program for the next regular pair of concerts, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, has been revised.

It will open with Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor, and will include Ettore Pinelli's arrangement for String Orchestra of a Corelli Suite.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

APR 10 1937

ARTHUR WILLIAM FOOTE.

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, April 10.—Arthur William Foote, 84, of Newton, widely-known composer and organist, died in Massachusetts General Hospital yesterday.

Among his best-known works are "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" and "Four Character Pieces After Omar Khayyam," first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

MUSIC

Globe Apr. 13/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Monday series of Boston Symphony concerts was ended last night with a program that consisted of two symphonies, the second of Beethoven, and the fourth by Tchaikovsky. The hall was virtually filled, and enthusiasm was the order of the evening. Seasonal leave-taking of Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra is, at each series of concerts, something of a rite. Therefore, the applause which greeted the end of Tchaikovsky's music was more frenetic than usual, and it included stamping and cheers.

In prospect this program was conventional enough to the point of slight dullness, though it was bound to provide a dramatic conclusion. Yet in actual performance, last night proved one of the most exciting concerts Dr Koussevitzky has ever conducted here. With Tchaikovsky, in particular, he dealt with more than customary warmth. The result was a startlingly brilliant performance, with the finale taken at a furious pace, but not to the sacrifice of clarity and proportion, save a little over-stressing of the inner brass voices.

Beethoven's remarkable Second Symphony — remarkable because, though but his second, it is distinctly prophetic of more individual works to follow—was revived at the Friday and Saturday concerts this season, after a considerable silence at Symphony Hall. The reading last night seemed to be even more balanced and precise than those of a few weeks ago, the tempi impeccable, and the spirit absolutely that which should characterize "early Beethoven."

C. W. D.

In the World of Music

Trans. April 13/37

Koussevitzky Plays Russian, German Symphonies

By Redfern Mason

For the Monday evening concert of the Symphony Serge Koussevitzky invited the audience to make a comparison between Beethoven and Tchaikowsky. The works he chose for the purpose were Beethoven's Second Symphony and Tschaikowsky's Fourth, neither of them the work of the mature master, but each of them, in a its own way, characteristic.

The audience took pleasure in the Beethoven; but they were more enthusiastic over the work of the Russian. Perhaps the audience of the Friday concerts would have judged the opposite way, for most of them have gone through their Tschakowsky enthusiasm, which is intense while it lasts, and emerged from the experience with a deeper reverence for Beethoven.

Beethoven's Second Symphony bears the mark of the prentice; but it is still the mark of Beethoven. The plan and manner of working out show the influence of Haydn and Mozart, especially in the more formal first movement. But there are moments of the real Beethoven in the Finale. You feel the composer champing his bit and getting ready for his burst for freedom in the "Eroica."

Tschakowsky, in his Fourth Symphony—"our symphony" as Madame Von Meck liked to call it, though it is doubtful whether she had any formative influence on her friend—is already the complaining, self-pitying being, eloquently weak, that he is in the "Pathetic." He knows the world is out of joint and bewails his inability to it right.

Beethoven's world is just as much in trouble as was Tschaikowsky's, but he faces it with a quiet strength and never whimpers.

The orchestra played the two works spiritedly. The brass and the reeds probably preferred the Russian score, for Tschaikowsky indulges their love for self display. But in their hearts, I think they are aware that Beethoven will continue to sound new to them when the Muscovite rings old fashioned.

Sudden enthusiasms die away; but love based on solid character is long lived.

Of course, the problem is one which each person must solve for himself, for, in matters of taste, nobody has the right to lay down the law for another. But one may say to music-lovers, as the old friar said to Romeo:

My son, love moderately;
Long love does so.

Yet, with Koussevitzy conducting, it would not seem unreasonable to confess a divided allegiance.

Her. Apr. 14/37 ML

HINDEMITH CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Paul Hindemith, the eminent German composer who is making his first visit to America, appeared yesterday evening at a private concert given in his honor at the Women's Republican Club. Mr. Hindermith played the viola in two works. He was assisted by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players under Arthur Fiedler. The program was as follows:

Hindemith....Kleine Kammermusik Op. 24 No. 2
Hindemith....Sonata for viola alone Op. 25 No. 1
Haydn....Divertimento No. 3 for 8 wind instruments
Hindemith...."Der Schwanendreher," Concerto on old folk-songs for viola and chamber orchestra (1935)

Hindemith made his first concert appearance in America last week-end at the Coolidge festival in the Library of Congress in Washington, an event which this writer attended and which will be discussed at greater length in these columns next Sunday. On that occasion both the viola sonata and the "Schwanendreher" (organ-grinder) concerto were played for the first time in America, though the wind instrument "Kammermusik" was not. At any rate we can boast, if necessary, that we have experienced a good deal of Hindemith's music in the past few days, which admits of a personal test as to pleasure or pain in listening to it.

We may say, then, that our admiration for Hindemith has increased and that his work at the best is both interesting and stimulating. The last adjective is important, for in less skillful hands dissonant counterpoint can look well on paper but sound horrid to the ear. It must be admitted that Hindemith, even, is not always successful in this difficult art of making what must sound discordant actually delight an audience. In the viola sonata, for example, he does not put it across; and the work is consequently arid and tedious. As a player Mr. Hindemith is like his music; that is, downright and efficient. He has no tricks whatever of showmanship and simply gives the impression of a musician doing a businesslike job.

If the viola sonata has little to beguile the ear, though much to tax the performer, the concerto is quite a different work. Its form is clear—an opening movement of singular intensity, a slow movement chiefly for solo viola and harp and interrupted by a cheerful fugato, a gay and vigorous finale. This was played with excellent spirit and understanding between the soloist, Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra, in fact a better performance than that under Mr. Chavez in Washington.

The opening wind instrument piece was a most diverting example of chamber music, one that compared favorably with the similar divertimento of Haydn, that was offered presumably as contrast in a program honoring one composer. The concert was an unusual one in many ways and served in an intimate fashion to introduce the German composer and some of his music, that has never been heard here, to Boston. It is to be hoped that he will return next season, again in chamber music and also in larger works under the auspices of the Boston Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

APR 1 0 1937

Arthur Foote

Special Dispatch to New York Post

BOSTON, April 10.—Arthur William Foote of Newton, one of America's most gifted composers, died in Massachusetts General Hospital yesterday. He was eighty-four.

His best known works included "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" and the suite, "Four Character Pieces After Omar Khayyam," which was performed first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

Mr. Foote's first compositions were published in 1882. In all, his compositions numbered more than 100, including trios and quartets for chamber music; cantatas for choruses and orchestras; songs, part-songs anthems, and 'cello concertos.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played his suite for strings in E minor at Carnegie Hall last January.

He was organist of the First Unitarian Church of Boston from 1878 until 1910, having studied the organ and piano under B. J. Lang. He studied composition with S. A. Emery in Boston, and Professor John Paine at Cambridge, Mass.

LANSING, MICH.
STATE JOURNAL

APR 1 1 1937

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BREAKS WITH CUSTOM

BOSTON, April 10 (US)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, surprised the music world Saturday by announcing he will call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss, jr., and will be played at next week's Friday and Saturday "Serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56-years history that a popular aria has been played.

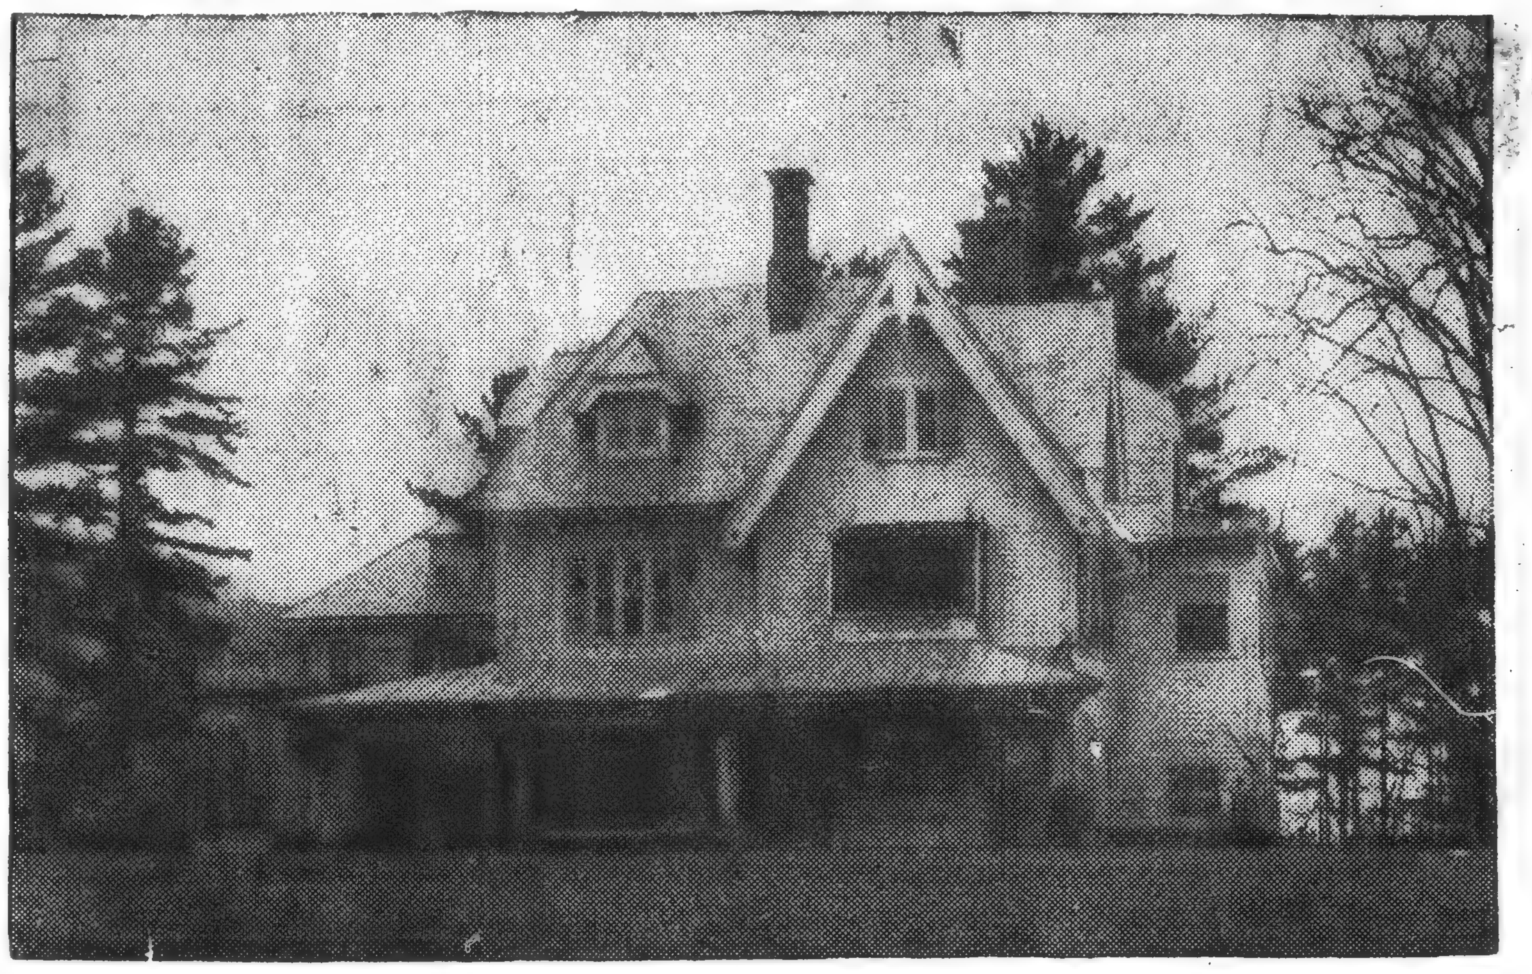
Doctor Koussevitsky said:

"I admit it has common, popular qualities. But Blue Danube also possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it. That is a compliment to the public as well as to the music. We shall break with custom and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz."

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 3 - 1937

NEW HOME OF SYMPHONY



On this Berkshire estate near Stockbridge, where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote "Tanglewood Tales," the Boston Symphony orchestra will in the future conduct its summer festival. The 210-acre estate, called Tanglewood, has been accepted by trustees of the orchestra as a gift.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 1 0 1937

Arthur Foote, Composer and Organist, Dies

Received Degrees From Dartmouth and Trinity Colleges for Compositions

100 of Songs Published

'Night Has Thousand Eyes' One of Best Known Works

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, April 9 (AP).—Arthur Foote, of Newton, composer and organist, died in Massachusetts General Hospital today. He was eighty-four years old.

A native of Salem, he was graduated from Harvard College in 1874 and studied at the New England Conservatory of Music. Dartmouth and Trinity Colleges honored him with degrees for his work as a composer.

Among his best known works are "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" and the suite, "Four Character Pieces After Omar Khyyam," first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

Was Boston Church Organist

Arthur Foote was born March 5, 1853, in Salem, Mass., the son of Caleb and Mary Wilder Foote and from 1878, four years after his graduation from Harvard College, until 1910, he was organist of the First Unitarian Church of Boston.

He studied the organ and piano playing under B. J. Lang and composition with S. A. Emery in Boston and studied under Professor John K. Paine at Cambridge, Mass. He received his Master of Arts degree at Harvard in 1875. The degree of Mus.D. was conferred upon him by Trinity College in 1919 and by Dartmouth in 1925.

Her first compositions to be published were three pieces for the cello and piano in 1882. He composed and published suites and other pieces for orchestra use; trios and quartets for chamber music; cantatas for choruses and orchestras; songs, part-songs, anthems, cello concertos. In all he published more than 100 songs. He was the author of "Modern Harmony." The Boston Symphony Orchestra played his suite for strings in E minor at Carnegie Hall last January.

From 1909 to 1912 Mr. Foote was president of the American Guild of Organists. He was a member of the National Institute of Arts and Letters and was a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Mr. Foote married Kate G. Knowlton, of Boston, July 7, 1880. They had a daughter.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The sixth and concluding concert in the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting, was presented last evening in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 36 Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, opus 36 Tchaikovsky

In the final concert of this season's Monday evening series Dr. Koussevitsky presented the opus 36 of two well contrasted composers. The first half of the program was given to the serene and joyous Second Symphony of Beethoven. That it is such a work of beauty is amazing when one recalls that this symphony was written at one of the most depressed periods of Beethoven's life. The great master's deafness was coming upon him in an alarming fashion, the thought of the possibility of his becoming a deaf musician was maddening. He was entertaining the idea of suicide. And it was in the midst of this terrifying mental and physical condition that he wrote the Second Symphony. Beethoven's greatest works still were to be composed.

The opus 36 of Tchaikovsky was written at a critical time in that composer's life also. The symphony is a tremendous protesting against fate,—death, and reveals a most searching melancholy. It has tremendous emotional force.

These two works found the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Kousevitsky in excellent form. The Tchaikovsky easily can protest too much and leave the listeners quite weary, but last night's performance provided a superb conclusion to the Monday series with a most forceful and intense reading without becoming a screaming lamentation. It is indeed a delight to hear this work so painstakingly presented and with such remarkable effect. The Beethoven Second was a most happy contrast to the Tchaikovsky. A delightfully refreshing performance. Dr. Koussevitsky and the orchestra were applauded at considerable length by a most enthusiastic and large audience.

W. J. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

APR 1 1 1937

Arthur Foote, Organist, Dies

(Reprinted from Yesterday's late Edition.)

BOSTON, April 9 (AP).—Arthur William Foote, 84, of Newton, widely known composer and organist, died in Massachusetts General Hospital today.

A native of Salem, he was graduated from Harvard University in 1874 and studied at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Dartmouth and Trinity colleges honored him with degrees for his work as a composer.

Among his best known works are "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" and the suite, "Four Character Pieces After Omar Khayyam," first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1912.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

APR 1 1 1937

Seats Available for Symphonic Festival

OCCASIONALLY, an idea of merit catches hold of a community, draws fire and grows to exceed the fondest hopes of those who originated it. That is what has happened to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, whose six concerts are to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, August 5, 7, and 8; August 12, 14, and 15 at lovely Tanglewood in the Berkshire Hills overlooking Stockbridge Bowl.

The success of the past season is fresh in memory. Crowds rolled in from all points of the compass. At least 25 states, Canada and Europe, were represented in the paid attendance of 15,000. Never before in America had an event of this character been able to pay its way financially. That is exactly what the Festival did in 1936. No guarantor was called upon. No individual was asked to make up a deficit.

Then spoke Dr. Koussevitzky! "Why shouldn't America have a real Festival, with delightful scenery, accommodations and community support? Why should not such a Festival be in the Berkshires, a place of tradition, a place of culture, a place of beautiful estates, and modest homes, where music of magnitude and beauty could be made a vital force to spread throughout the world?"

Sustaining memberships privileges expire April 30. The memberships are $10 each and entitle holders to the entire series of six concerts and are a considerable saving over the purchase of single seats and assure such holders of the same seats at each performance. Inquires should be made to The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass., or telephone Stockbridge 400.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
LIGHT

APR 1 1 1937

Boston Symphony to Go 'Low Brow'

BOSTON, April 10.—(US)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, surprised the musical world today by announcing he will call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss Jr., and will be played at next week's Friday and Saturday "serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56-years history that a popular aria has been played.

32

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 11 1937

Artist's Sketches Show Musicians in New Light

Friends of Boston Symphony and Brown University Art Department Jointly Sponsoring Exhibit Which "Introduces" Orchestra Members

By Myra H. Blosser

THIS month the Friends of the Boston Symphony in Providence will present the members of the orchestra to those who would like to meet them. The introduction will not be personal, but the musicians will come alive just the same.

They will be presented through charcoal sketches by the artist, Gerome Brush, in a public exhibition at Faunce House, from April 27 to May 14. The art department of Brown University co-operates with the Friends of the Orchestra in this showing, which will open with a private view and tea on Monday, April 26. Dr. and Madame Serge Koussevitsky will be guests of honor and it is hoped that perhaps some of the musicians of the orchestra may also make this extra trip from Boston following the final concert of the season, on Tuesday night, April 20.

Those who go to the Boston Symphony concerts know the musicians only from a distance and across the footlights. Or they may have met them hurrying out of the stage door of the Metropolitan Theatre, bundled in overcoats and lugging big and little instrument-cases on their way to the Boston train. They may have wondered what these music-makers do in off hours; how many children they have and what they like to talk about.

Biographies Answer Queries

These questions will all be answered in the short pithy biographies which will be attached to the sketches. The artist wrote them, and everyone agrees that he has "caught" his subjects in both mediums.

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe is chairman of this exhibition, which the Providence Friends of the Orchestra will sponsor. She brought together the Providence "Friends" for the first time in January, inviting them to tea to meet Mr. Edward S. Taft of Boston, one of the trustees of the orchestra. Mr. Taft talked of the "Friends," a group which is one of his hobbies. The idea of the exhibition crystallized then and there, in Mrs. Sharpe's music-room.

The whole orchestra, 109 of them, including Dr. Koussevitsky, will be present in the sketches in Faunce House, just as they were caught by Mr. Brush in friendly sittings in the room in Symphony Hall that houses the interesting collection of musical instruments. He would ask the musician who was his subject at the moment, to play—they always had their instruments with them, as the sittings were before, during or after rehearsals. The ice would be broken and the musician would talk, much or little, according to his temperament. Apparently Mr. Brush has the happy faculty for winning a musician's confidence, for the biographies are as vital and interesting as are the sketches.

The Man at the Drums

At the final concert of the season, if you watch with special interest, as many do, the young man at the percussion instruments, you can look him up in Faunce House the next week. Mr. Lawrence White is "Larry" to his friends and he still thinks Salmon, Idaho, where he learned to play the piano, from his mother, the best place on earth. But says Mr. Brush, "the marimba is his pigeon and he strikes a pretty xylophone." You have probably heard him do it.

You will be surprised to meet so many American-born musicians in this international gathering. There are 21 of them; you will find a goodly number from New England. Mr. Albert Williams Snow, who is at the organ, had a melodeon in his front parlor when he was a boy in Melrose, Mass. He is a David Harum kind of Yankee, his biographer says, and "if you are from New England, you know just where you stand with him."

The Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony are arranging this exhibition because they have an interest in the orchestra personnel, some of whom they have actually met in gatherings of the Friends of the Boston Symphony in Symphony Hall, Boston, and also because they wish to create more Friends in Providence. A very pleasant thing, they think, to be a "Friend."

The "Friends" First Meeting

About three years ago a handful of men and women who had for years sat regularly in the stalls at Boston Symphony concerts—had the chance to meet informally for the first time a small group of the artists, whom they knew only from across the footlights.

A small portion of Symphony Hall was curtained off, to make a more intimate setting three quarters the size of the big auditorium, for this meeting of music makers and music listeners.

It was the first gathering of the Friends of the Boston Symphony, a group which had but lately been called into being by Mr. Taft.

They had all come without knowing what a Friend of the orchestra really meant. In fact no one but Mr. Taft knew. It was his idea. The Symphony, like small boys, needed a friend badly; partly to help it pay its way but also to give it the warm feeling of support that is a human desire, Mr. Taft said.

There were five friends from Providence at that first party, among them, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson and her daughter, Miss A. Loraine Johnson. One gentleman from Boston spoke out, to say that he had been present at the first Boston Symphony concert and had never missed one since. Whereupon Mrs. Johnson said that she had been at the first Boston Symphony concert in Providence and had never missed one here.

Dr. Koussevitsky became a delightful acquaintance to those who had known him only as conductor. He spoke in a friendly way about the orchestra members. He led a small string orchestra in a half hour concert, with the Hadyn Variations, a theme of Arensky and Mozart's "Kleine Nacht Musik" as the program. There was a tea in the foyer, at which the hand that they had watched wield the baton shook theirs cordially.

Now Numbers 1810 Members

Today there are 1810 members of this association of orchestra Friends; most of them in Boston, naturally, but 47 in Rhode Island, 142 in New York and vicinity and 30 scattered in other cities, who have heard the orchestra and wished to form a close association with its activities and help in some way. No gift is too small, the "Friends" say, and of course no gift is too big to make one a Friend.

Since the tea at Mrs. Sharpe's home new Rhode Island "Friends" have joined each week.

M. Gabriel Paitchadze lives farthest away from the orchestra. His home is in Paris and he has no opportunity to hear his Friends play. But on a visit to Boston he spent his evenings at Symphony Hall whenever there was a concert. He asked if he might become one of these "Friends."

The idea is original with the Boston Symphony. So is the idea of introducing the musicians in sketches to the audience which hears them. That idea belongs to Madame Koussevitsky who also asked Mr. Brush the artist son of a famous artist, George De Forest Brush, to carry it out.

Annual Friends' Recital

The Friends are invited to come to Boston to attend a string orchestra recital and tea every year. At the second meeting, Olin Downes, the well-known musician and critic, told how he grew up with the Boston Symphony, standing in the long queue for hours, running up the stairs to the top gallery and then relaxing in the seat that he had picked out as "the best in the house." Every year, former Governor Alvin T. Fuller of Massachusetts, one of the association, has lent some of his old masters and gorgeous tapestries on exhibition for the occasion. One year there was high excitement when another Boston friend, Mr. Edward Dane, stated quietly that he would pay the orchestra's arrears of taxes.

Rhode Island Membership

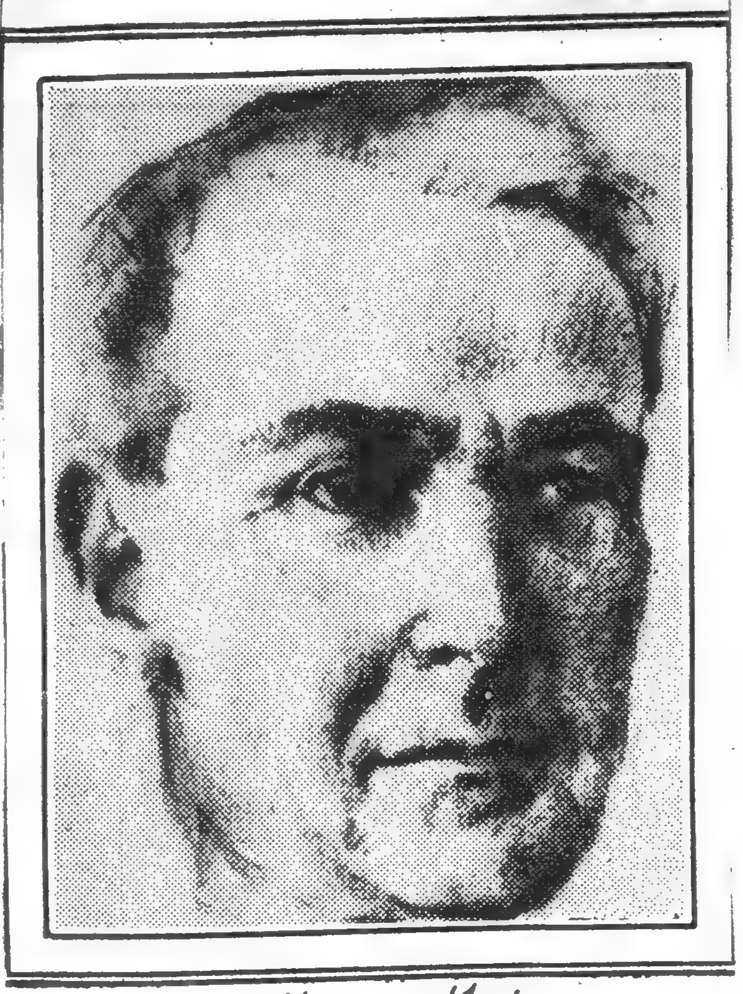
The Rhode Island friends in January included, beside Mr. and Mrs. Sharpe and Mrs. Johnson and her daughter, Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Howard L. Anthony, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Misses Ada and Janet Blinkhorn, Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mr. John Hutchins Cady, Madame Avis B. Charbonnel, Mrs. Prescott O. Clarke, the Community School of Music, Mrs. Gammell Cross, Miss Emily Diman, Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Miss C. Emily Fairbanks, Mrs. J. Warner Fobes of Peace Dale, Mrs. William B. Greenough, Miss Louise Harris, Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Mrs. Arthur Ingraham of Little Compton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Jacobson, Mr. Maxim Karolik of Newport, Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher, Mrs. Austin T. Levy of Harrisville, Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Mr. Hugh F. MacColl, Mrs. George B. H. Macomber, Little Compton; Mr. Joseph F. Malmstead, Dr. Charles A. McDonald, Mrs. Houghton P. Metcalf, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Mrs. David P. Moulton, Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Mr. Clarence Richards, East Providence; Miss Helen C. Robertson, Miss Ellen D. Sharpe, Mrs. M. B. Kelly Stower, Mrs. John O. Waterman, Mrs. George H. Webb, Miss Amey L. Willson, Mr. Wilson G. Wing and Mrs. Kenneth F. Wood.

Certainly those who visit the exhibition sponsored by the Rhode Island Friends of the Boston Symphony will find next year's orchestra concerts more interesting than ever before. Each virtuoso who has been "one of the melodious voices in the sea of sound" will be a person.

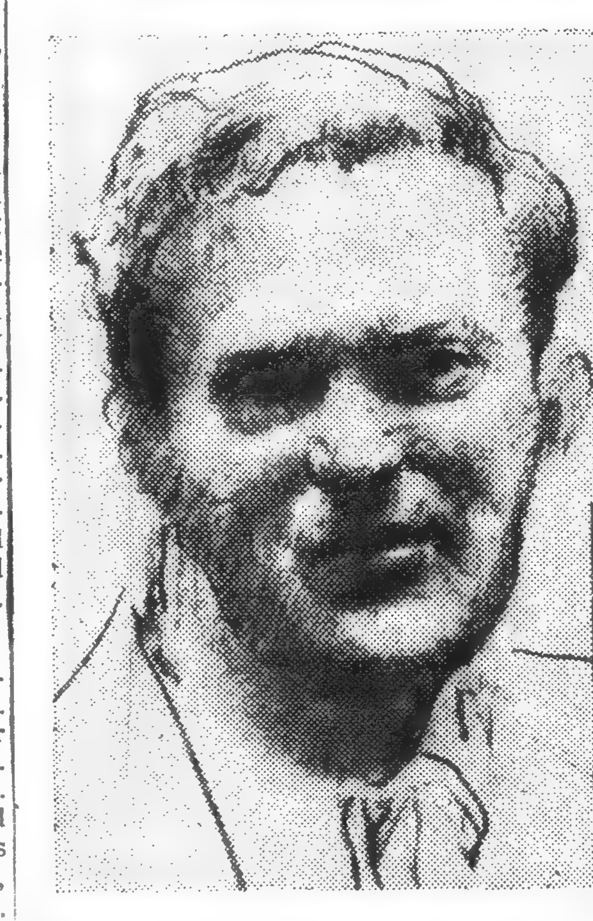
Individual Anecdotes

They will remember that Max Polster, who plays the timpani, began his musical career by rat-tat-tat-ing with a couple of sticks on a wooden fence; the funny story of how William Carl Gebhardt got his first French horn; they will recognize M. Georges Fourel in one of the bespectacled viola players and remember that he is the peripatetic philosopher of the orchestra who strolls bareheaded down the shady lane that divides Commonwealth avenue; they will smile when they remember that that other viola player with the finely chiseled scholarly head is, in Mr. Brush's opinion, a "regular guy," who pulls up trees and digs in gardens.

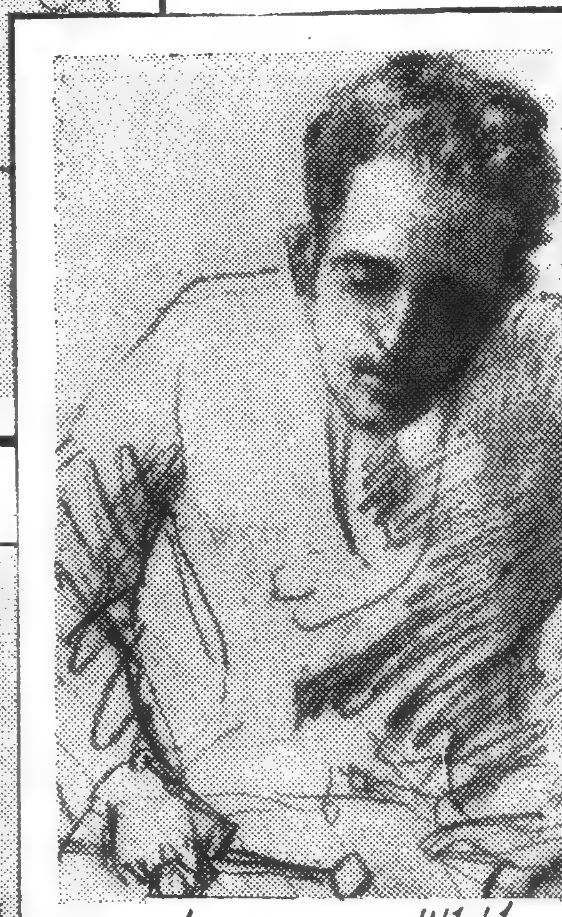
All the musicians will have lost their ambiguity. They will be men as well as musicians. And the audience will be likely to remember one of the personnel whom they have always heretofore forgotten—whom some of them never knew existed—the librarian, Leslie Judson Rogers, who toils day and night without ever making a sound. This man, with the fine brow and the straight gaze, smokes a pipe as he works with energy and skill to keep things in order. "I feel sure," says Mr. Brush engagingly, "that if he had lived a century earlier Adelaide Procter need not have waited for 'Death's bright angel' to help her find the 'Lost Chord.' Mr. Rogers would have found it for her."



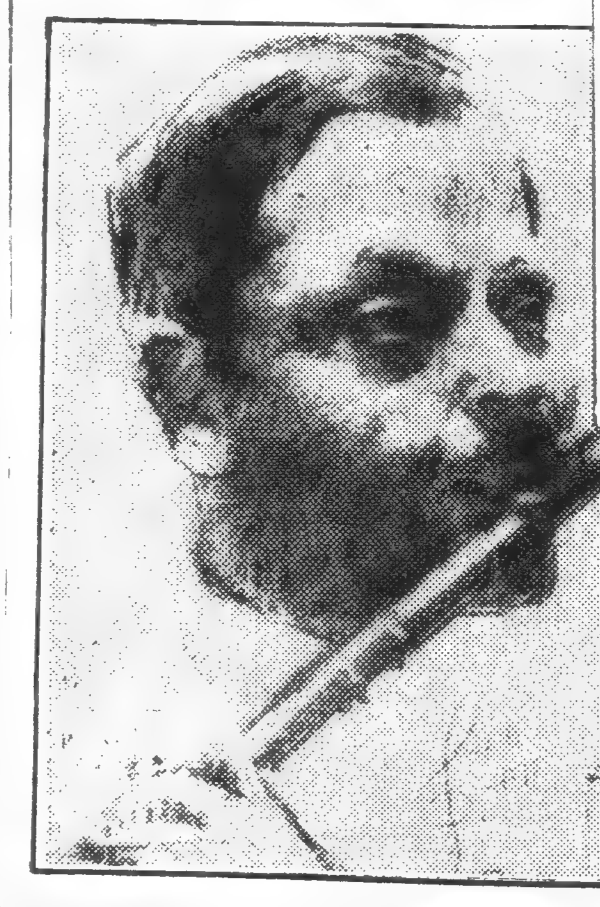
Serge Koussevitzky



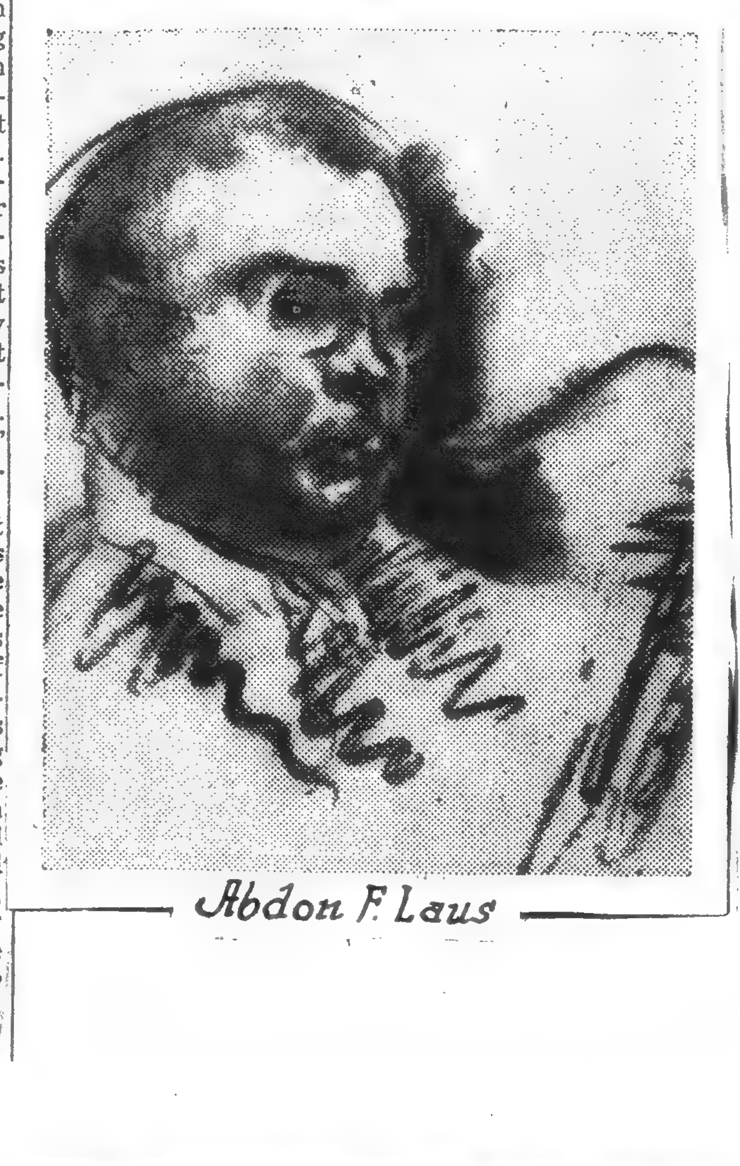
Richard Burgin



Lawrence White



Georges Laurent



Abdon F. Laus

The Friends of the Boston Symphony in Rhode Island will, in co-operation with Brown University, sponsor an exhibition of portrait sketches of the musicians of the orchestra in Faunce House from April 26 through May 14. Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe is chairman of the exhibition which was planned at a tea at her home on Prospect street on the occasion of the first meeting together of the Rhode Island "Friends." A few of the 109 charcoal drawings by Gerome Brush are reproduced here. Biographies, also by Mr. Brush, will be attached to the portraits. The personalities in a nutshell and the portraits will, it is expected, acquaint those in Providence who attend Boston Symphony concerts with the men who make the music under the inspiration of Dr. Koussevitsky's baton. Mr. Burgin is concertmaster; M. Laurent, first flute of the orchestra; M. Laus, bassoon; and Mr. Larry White, from Salmon, Idaho, "striking a pretty xylophone."

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

APR 10 1937

THE BLUE DANUBE ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Strauss' Most Popular Waltz to Be Played by Boston Orchestra for First Time.

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first time in its 56 years of existence, today included Johann Strauss' beautiful waltz, The Blue Danube, on its regular symphony program for next week-end.

The program marks the 70th anniversary of Strauss' composition.

Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, forestalled any intimation that inclusion of the lilting waltz, seldom played on a symphony program, meant the orchestra would include so-called "popular" music on its programs in the future.

"Unfortunately," he said in a footnote, "The Blue Danube has been made so common by innumerable, perhaps careless, performances that its uncommon qualities are often lost sight of. The artistic achievement of Strauss in The Blue Danube is great enough to deserve the most careful study and exceptional performance with the best of orchestral facilities."

33

Apr. 14/37 LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

At the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Dr. Koussevitzky will include on the programs the world's most famous waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube" by Johann Strauss, marking the 70th anniversary of the composition. Dr. Koussevitzky is right when he says: "The artistic achievement of Strauss in the 'Blue Danube' is great enough to deserve the most careful study and exceptional performance with the best of orchestral facilities." Also on the programs will be a Suite by Corelli arranged by Ettore Pinelli for strings; the "Deep Forest," prelude by the Boston musician, Mabel Daniels; a revival of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony.

"Our Symphony."

A chance to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky at the last of the season's Monday evening series of symphony concerts was the more interesting to the writer of this column because he had just read the book "Beloved Friend" by Catherine Drinker Brown and Barbara von Meck. This is the story of the strange friendship between Tschaikowsky and Madame Nadejda von Meck. For years they poured out their hearts to each other in letters. It was the widow's generosity which financed the composer's musical career. But strangely enough they never met. Nor, apparently, did they make any effort to do so. The woman's interest in the man's music was intense. Nadejda von Meck was the inspiration of the Fourth Symphony. In letter after letter it is referred to as "our symphony." By report, it was not very well presented at its first performance in Russia. After hearing the spirited performance of the score by the virtuosi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Monday, it is safe to say that if he could have been in the audience the composer himself would have been thrilled. The celebrated pizzicato Scherzo, of which the composer was quite proud, was a marvel as the Boston strings plucked its playful measures. The sonorities of the final movement were vibrant with colorful emotion. As I went to the check room for my coat, one young man confided to me that he would not be able to sleep a wink after hearing it. Besides the intensities of this composition the Second Symphony of Beethoven which preceded it was all serenity, although in its day the final movement was considered to be quite a wild musical orgy. Symphony hall was practically filled for the concert. And Dr. Koussevitzky was called back three or four times after its close to acknowledge the plaudits.

Arthur Foote's Death.

The exhibits in the first balcony gallery of Symphony Hall on Monday night appropriately included biographical material about the late Arthur Foote and Symphony programs on which his works had appeared. So far as was observed the Boston press showed a strange apathy at his passing. The obituary notices, even in the Boston Transcript were brief and incomplete, considering that for years he had been one of the musical celebrities in Boston, with distinguished family connections. Certainly he was to be rated as a gifted American composer of the elder generation.

Among his compositions his symphonic prologue for large orchestra, "Francesca da Rimini" is usually considered the greatest. His suite, Opus 36, and the overture "In the Mountains" were others of his works in the orchestral field which were widely performed. But he was even more generally known through his choral compositions such as "The Wreck of the Hesperus," "The Farewell of Hiawatha," and "The Skeleton in Armour," all based on poems by Longfellow.

While at Harvard, Mr. Foote was for two years the leader of the Glee Club, and he was always fond of writing for men's voices.

Few American composers have created so large an output of sacred music for mixed voices as he. And his facility in this realm was noteworthy. He was also signally successful in catching the characteristic qualities of 18th century dance music in his employment of old forms, such as the "Capriccio" in his D minor suite and the "Gavotte" in the "Serenade" for string orchestra, Opus 25.

In addition to the works mentioned, Mr. Foote's compositions included string quartets, a piano trio, a sonata for piano and violin, a piano quintet, pieces for violin and 'cello and two piano suites.

Globe Apr. 17/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program for the Boston Symphony concerts this week, twice revised, contains "A Night Piece" for solo flute (beautifully played by Georges Laurent) and strings by Arthur Foote, the Boston composer who died last week. The list begins with the Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner, revived after a comfortable silence of five years; includes the orchestral prelude "Deep Forest" by Mabel Daniels of Boston, and ends with the cherished "Blue Danube" waltzes of the younger Johann Strauss.

In Mr Foote's characteristically refined and unpretentious "Night Piece," Dr Kussevitzky made admirable choice of a memorial to the man who was among the illustrious elder New England composers. Mr Foote's music is ever enjoyable, both for substance and for the scholarly style in which it was written. One will remember Mr Foote's own reference to "A Night Piece" in a radio broadcast on the Saturday night when it was last performed by this orchestra four years ago, as a "little thing." He could modestly have added the word "charming." For the piece is just that, skillfully written and length adjusted to material.

The music of Bruckner promises to remain a problem to those who recognize the extent of his talent, but who are not disposed to couple his name with that of Mahler. For various reasons the two men have been compared over a period of years, though there is little justification. Mahler had a noble mind; that of Bruckner was commonplace.

Bruckner was an assiduous scholar; he learned to write for large orchestra with more than competent technic, but his style was imitative of Wagner and his ideas were pedestrian. Where Wagner was majestic, Bruckner managed only to be pompus. He wrote interminably, evidently overlooking the fact that large proportions do not necessarily produce heroic utterance.

Yet in the slow movements of his seventh and eighth symphonies he created pages of notable beauty, which would be even finer were they half as long. Bruckner was unquestionably a sincere musician, whose adoration of Wagner knew no limits, but sincerity is only one requisite of great art. In short, Wagner was a genius, Bruckner a talent.

Yestesday's luminous performance was a labor of love on the part of Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra. It would have been better, perhaps, to cut the symphony even more. An hour of Bruckner is arduous.

Miss Daniels' "Deep Forest" was originally cast for small orchestra. The present version dates from 1934. As usual, Miss Daniels has composed effectively. "Deep Forest," as she herself is quoted in the program book as saying, is impressionistic music, simple in concept and design. What is more, it is thoroughly pleasant. Miss Daniels, who was present, was applauded most warmly.

How good it was to hear Strauss waltzes performed by a first-rank orchestra! "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" is among the best that the gifted Viennese ever wrote. Considerations of size omitted, here is more inspiration, more real music than in a whole symphony of Bruckner. Some of these waltzes ought to be heard at the Symphony concerts every season. There is no finer light music. Dr Koussevitzky's reading yesterday was felicitous, though a slower tempo and a heavier "Viennese accent" would have been admissible.

Next week a French program will be heard, as follows: Roussel: "Flemish Rhapsody" (first performances in America); Franck: Suite from the symphonic poem "Psyche"; D'Indy: "Istar" Variations; Berlioz: "Fantastic Symphony." C. W. D.

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH BY SYMPHONY

Post Apr. 17/37

Foote's "Night Piece" and Miss Daniels' Work Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the symphony concert of yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky paid his respects to a living American composer, Mabel Daniels, and to the memory of one who has lately left us, Arthur Foote. He also brought about the now annual performance of a symphony by Bruckner, this time the Eighth, and noted the 70th birthday of Johann Strauss' most famous waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube."

FOOTE'S "NIGHT PIECE"

The death of Mr. Foote occasioned a change in the original list, which had included a Suite by Corelli. The first arrangement would have offered even greater diversity than did that of yesterday, with Mr. Foote's contemplative "Night Piece" for flute and strings and Miss Daniels' Prelude, "Deep Forest," bridging the enormous gulf between the two Austrians who, although born within a few weeks of each other and long residents of Vienna, represented in their life work the opposite poles of art.

Dr. Koussevitzky's signal success with Bruckner's Seventh Symphony last season was yesterday repeated with the Eighth, and the answering applause, to turn from the performance to its reception, was almost as hearty and long continued. If any symphony of Bruckner could become actually popular the Seventh would be the one. The Eighth is more sombre, more severe, more exalted, more exacting both of performers and of listeners.

Tremendous Yet Jerky

The later Bruckner is the most tremendous symphonic music we have, in spirit as well as in dimensions and volume. Before it the listener may well feel dwarfed and crushed, as men are over-awed and humbled by certain things in the natural world. Yet great as it is this Eighth Symphony has its faults. Bruckner had not the knack, which Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms all possessed, of making the first and final divisions of his symphonies move continuously from beginning to end. In the Eighth, even the mighty Adagio has this defect, most strikingly exemplified in the Finale which constantly stops and starts again.

An almost fanatical admirer of Wagner, Bruckner borrowed more from his idol than the Bayreuth tubas and a capacity for momentous and prodigious utterances. He will cause us to fidget in our seats with the symphonic equivalent of The Wanderer or King Mark, and then present us with a glimpse of heaven itself.

The Ninth Unplayed

The playing of this symphony yesterday matched the nobility of the music. Long as the Adagio is, however, it is still regrettable that Dr. Koussevitzky should have made the particular cut which was made yesterday, but was not made when the symphony was played here five years ago. . . . Now that the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies have been so magnificently restored to us surely the long-neglected Ninth should have its turn.

Mr. Foote's "Night Piece," lately heard at a concert of the State Symphony Orchestra, was beautifully played yesterday both by the strings and by Mr. Laurent as soloist. Miss Daniels' Prelude has more than once been heard here in its original version for small orchestra. It has now been extended, and its sonorities greatly enlarged. The ultimate gain may perhaps be questioned, but in either version "Deep Forest" is a composition to be heard with genuine enjoyment. If Debussy's Faun thrusts his impertinent head through certain measures the music as a whole has a genial warmth and richness which are by no means Debussyan. Present in the audience Miss Daniels was the recipient of applause which was much more than the respectful tribute due a fellow townswoman.

The Strauss Waltz

And so, through the two Americans, were we lowered from the heights bestrode by Bruckner to the smiling valley where Johann Strauss ministered to our need for the lighter pleasures of life. Dr. Koussevitzky when he gave us the "Voices of Spring" four years ago was the first conductor of the Symphony Orchestra to place a waltz of Strauss on the programme of a subscription concert. The unique value of these waltzes need not be questioned, if their fitness in a general symphonic programme may. In any event the now septuagenarian "Blue Danube" richly deserves the compliment paid it yesterday, the performance which it received and the applause bestowed upon it.

Her. Apr. 17/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 22d regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Kousevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Georges Laurent, flutist of the orchestra. The program was as follows:

Bruckner......Symphony No. 8 in C minor
Arthur Foote
"A Night Piece" for flute and string orchestra
Mabel Daniels.....Prelude, "Deep Forest"
Johann Strauss
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes Op. 314

It is a pity that the names of Bruckner and Mahler have become associated in the public mind, for they are really not alike except for the fact that they wrote long symphonies. There is even a society engaged in active propaganda for both composers, which certainly makes for an aesthetic confusion. Indeed it is entirely reasonable to admire one and not the other. Bruckner's seventh and eighth symphonies are masterpieces. Their faults are obvious and do not destroy the beauty of the music.

Sir Donald Tovey remarked: "Defects of form are not a justifiable ground for criticism from listeners who profess to enjoy the bleeding chunks of butcher's meat chopped from Wagner's operas and served up on Wagner nights as 'Waldweben' and 'Walkuerenritt.' If you want Wagnerian concert music other than the few complete overtures and the Siegfried Idyll, why not try Bruckner?" Good advice is seldom taken; and it cannot be said that Bruckner is really popular in our concert halls. Nevertheless, the time may come, since the average symphonic repertoire is capable of expansion.

Of course these remarks do not apply to Dr. Koussevitzky, because there is no other conductor today more catholic in his taste and more assiduous in reviving the neglected and bringing forward the new. The most lyric moment in Bruckner's symphony is the trio of the second movement. The first movement is unusually fine, and the adagio, in spite of its length, is noble music. The finale is less satisfactory, just as the seventh symphony also falls short in this respect; but for sheer power and sonority the end is amazing. The interpretation of this work was superb.

The death of Arthur Foote last week has deprived Boston of her most amiable composer. Could anything have better signalized this sad event than the charming "Night Piece," so perfectly played by M. Laurent? The prelude by Mabel Daniels is a highly successful piece of musical impressionism. It is skilfully put together and conveys a poetic mood without any sense of strain. The audience was decidedly cordial, and Miss Daniels several times acknowledged the applause.

There has been much idle speculation as to what Dr. Koussevitzky would do to the "Blue Danube." Would he waft up to the banks of the Dnieper or the Don? As a matter of fact the orchestra was in capital form, and Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was one of infinite care for the grace of the melody and the sonority and precision of the playing. There may be sticklers who do not feel that he caught the authentic Viennese lilt. Perhaps the waltz was too accurately played for them; they prefer the band under the trees and the Pilsener on the table. But to hear the Boston Symphony play the "Blue Danube" is a rare experience, an awe-inspiring descent from Olympus!

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post Apr. 17/37

Programmes of Symphony Are Varied

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

FOR a time the Symphony Concerts were offering what might be described as a diet of German classics with Russian dressing. As the season draws to a close Dr. Koussevitzky is agreeably varying the fare. Last week we had the interesting combination of Bruckner, Arthur Foote, Mabel Daniels and Johann Strauss. The programme set for the concerts of this week-end is entirely French. There is one novelty in the shape of a Flemish Rhapsody by Albert Roussel, played for the first time in America. The other numbers on an unhackneyed list are the Symphonie Fantastique of Berlioz, two instrumental numbers from Franck's "Psyche" and the ever-welcome "Istar" Variations of the too-much-neglected d'Indy. At a coming concert of the Conservatory Orchestra, by the way, Wallace Goodrich plans to revive d'Indy's three-part tone-poem, "A Summer Day on the Mountain," unheard here since the days of Mr. Monteux.

* * * *

Speaking of conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, Henri Rabaud's opera "Marouf, the Cobbler of Bagdad," based upon a tale from the "Arabian Nights," will be sung in English in the coming spring season at the Metropolitan. This popularly priced supplementary season was inaugurated last year and met with considerable success. This year not Mr. Johnson, who presently sails to Europe to discover new singers, but Lee Pattison, will be the general director.

Of the Metropolitan revivals for next year, a subject in which Boston is always indirectly interested, two have already been tentatively announced. The first of these, a genuine antique, is Gluck's "Alceste," produced at Vienna 170 years ago next December. In this opera, known to most of us only through its overture, Rene Maison will sing the chief tenor part. The other opera, which is quite certain of production, is Verdi's "Otello," and for the exacting tenor role the Metropolitan has three candidates, all of whom have sung it elsewhere: Giovanni Martinelli, who will sing it in the coronation opera season in London: Lauritz Melchior, and the new English tenor, Arthur Carron.

During the recent Boston season there was occasion to remark that it was a double pity that Verdi must play such conspicuous second fiddle to Wagner, both in the operas selected for performance and in the performances themselves. "Otello," given as the Metropolitan should be capable of giving it, would help restore the balance. Let us hope that Boston is not denied it.

* * * *

The Fifth Symphony of Mahler, unplayed at our Symphony concerts since 1914, although announced for performance there this season and also last, was recently heard in Vienna under that arch-Mahlerite, Bruno Walter. The Seventh Symphony, which has never even been threatened here, was lately made known to far-away Toyko. It is a strange world.

RECORD

APR 9 1937

Boston Symphony Leader Is Given Degree By Rutgers

Serge Koussevitzky Applauded By New Brunswick Concert Audience

(By M. M. Soperstein)

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the world-famed Boston Symphony orchestra for the past 13 years, was given the honorary degree of Doctor of Music, at a formal ceremony in the gymnasium of Rutgers University, after his orchestra had just completed its third concert in three years at that institution. The degree was presented to the eminent musician by Dr. Robert Clothier, President of Rutgers, in recognition of the wonderful work done in the cultural and aesthetic development of musical America by the Russian-born conductor.

An appreciative audience of 3,400 voiced its approval of the honor bestowed upon Dr. Koussevitzky in the presentation of the degree and kept clamoring for another and yet another encore. All who attended the concert were agreed that the program was excellent, both in choice of numbers and in the technical perfection and interpretation of those pieces by the Doctor. The orchestra proper consists of a personnel of 110 musicians, and has, for the past three years, been the highlight of the concert series at Rutgers, rivalling even the appearance of Lawrence Tibbett this year.

Experts the country, and even the world, over, agree that the Boston Symphony Orchestra ranks with the best in its class, and no small share of the credit goes to Dr. Koussevitzky, who was imported, so to speak, from Paris, in 1924 to conduct the Boston Symphony, and has remained in the position of official guest conductor ever since. Dr. Clothier, in his presentation of the degree stated, "You have contributed in a great measure to our cultural and aesthetic inheritance.—We seize this opportunity, appropriate as it is in the presence of these music devotees of the university and of your associates in the orchestra to pay our tribute to you." Dr. Koussevitzky thanked the audience in what seemed to this spectator, a broken voice and expressed his gratitude, as he must most of his feelings, through an encore.

Symphony in Vernal Mood

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

Obs. Apr. 17/37

IN A PROGRAM which ranged from Bruckner to Johann Strauss, Dr. Koussevitzky again called upon the vast resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with the customary exceptional results.

No stronger argument for the cause of Bruckner's music could possibly be made than was delivered in the compelling performance given his Eighth Symphony on these occasions.

Since Dr. Koussevitzky's revival of the work in 1929, there has been an increasing enthusiasm for it on the part of the general public. Judging from the reception given it by Friday afternoon's audience, it would appear that here, at least, Bruckner has at last come into his own.

* * *

"IT IS TRUE that the much maligned genius has suffered as greatly from the exaggerated homage of the more hysterical of his adherents as through the blindness of those prejudiced against him.

When Kathi, his old and faithful servant, said of him after his death, "He was rude, but good," she was probably nearer the true appreciation of his worth than most of his contemporaries.

Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor, written at the age of 60 was his last, as it was his greatest.

Into it was poured an arduous lifetime's deep experience, and in its substance is revealed a great heart and high fortitude.

In the surging climaxes of the first movement there is little exultation, but there is the force of a stern and indomitable will. There is questioning but no self pity.

The incomparable beauty of the Adagio is found more moving because of the peasant-like character of the Scherzo which precedes it, and in the Finale the whole mounts to its triumphant culmination.

* * *

TECHNICALLY Bruckner was master of his medium, and if he learned much from Wagner the fact remains that he learned well.

To the performances of the Eighth Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky brought a most zealous reading. The solidity and vast sonorities, the richness of tonal beauty, which are the Boston Symphony Orchestra's, here found ample scope. The audience was necessarily stirred.

Two New England composers, Arthur Foote and Mabel Daniels, were represented in the last half of the program.

Both the former's "A Night Piece," for Flute and String Orchestra, in which Georges Laurent was soloist, and Miss Daniels' prelude, "Deep Forest," were played with the utmost sensitiveness to their inherent poetry.

The latter was given its first performances at these concerts and the composer being present acknowledged applause which was genuinely warm.

Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes which brought the program to a close served as a smiling salute to the spring.

Dr. Koussevitzky had not previously presented this particular work at these concerts and he obviously enjoyed doing it for the first time.

It is perhaps unnecessary to add that the audience was of the same spirit.

* * *

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY has announced a program consisting entirely of French music for the next pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

"Flemish Rhapsody," one of Albert Roussel's most recent works, will be given its first performance in America at these concerts.

Continued on Next Page

Symphony

Continued from Preceding Page

The program will also include Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony"; "Psyche Asleep" and "Psyche Borne Away by Zephyrs," from Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Psyche," and the "Ishtar" Variations of Vincent d'Indy.

The last concert of the Tuesday afternoon series will be given on April 27. The program, devoted to 19th century composers, will include Moussorgsky's "Prelude to Khovantchina"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; Sibelius' tone poems, "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia"; and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 1 1 1937

NEWLY RECORDED MUSIC

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

IF it has happened before, we cannot recall the occasion, but certainly it is not often that two companies elect to issue the same major work at the same time. Coincidentally, both Victor and Columbia decided that this was the proper month for a new version of Beethoven's Eighth symphony, and those who would have an up-to-date recording of it—and who would not?—may choose between the Boston Symphony and Koussevitzky (Victor M-336) and the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner (Columbia M. W. 292), both hot off the griddle. With not much in common, each has its particular points of excellence and to the individual must be left the ultimate decision between two fine performances. For ourselves, we incline slightly to that played last—whichever that happens to be at the moment.

* * *

In the second movement the two conductors find common ground. Of its performance, Weingartner has written that "there is really nothing to be said. It cannot fail to produce a rare effect if played in correct time without any attempt at artificial adornment, with careful observance of the directions and with light and graceful execution." Both are within the spirit of these remarks and their pace is practically identical. But on either side of the allegretto scherzando they diverge along characteristic paths. Koussevitzky's tempi are consistently faster—sufficiently so to permit of the first repeat that Weingartner cannot manage in the same space—and his approach more incisive. Where he gains in effect, and toward the end he seems to be reaching out for more than enough, Weingartner scores by his clarity and evens the account.

In other words, the qualities each has shown in his recent recordings are evident in these performances. Koussevitzky has two advantages, an orchestra that can play with distinctly more cohesion, and recording of a wider range. As to the latter, however, the customary warnings must be repeated. With the opening bars the Vienna orchestra wakes the echoes of its hall, but, as in the case of its recent "Eroica," in this respect the beginning is quite the worst spot in the set. Again, Columbia surfaces require to be broken in, and to judge between the two on parallel first playings is unfair.

* * *

In Columbia Masterworks No. 288 is more Beethoven—the Opus 18, No. 4, C minor quartet. It is played by the Leners who must by this time have the longest experience of all the recording quartets. During it they have supplied the entire Beethoven series with the exception of the fifth in this group. This new item is not an addition to their list but a replacement of one of their earliest electrical performances. A comparison of the two, made at an interval of a number of years, is interesting, quite apart from the astounding improvement in recording shown by the current release. The balance between the instruments is now completely secure, and the tendency this quartet had at one time to oversweeten everything it touched has now been neatly rounded into a gracious suavity particularly to the advantage of a work of this nature. Probably the last of the Opus 18 series, the fourth stands out in that group as the only one in the minor and for the prophetic spirit pervading it. As such it forms the logical bridge from the first group to the three Rasumovskys of Opus 59.

BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN
APR 1 1 1937

Personalities In News Of Today

WALTZ—The music world has been surprised by the announcement of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that he will call on the orchestra to play the "Blue Danube" waltz. The director explained he was breaking precedent on the playing of a popular aria because the waltz held exceptional instrumentation and the public "loves it."

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
APR 1 1 1937

BOSTON'S ALL AGOG! ORCHESTRA TO PLAY BLUE DANUBE WALTZ

Boston April 10 — (US) — Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, surprised the music world today by announcing he would call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Beautiful Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss, Jr., and will be played at next Friday's and Saturday's "serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56 years that popular music has been played. Dr. Koussevitsky said:

"I admit it has common, popular qualities, but 'Blue Danube' also possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it. That is a compliment to the public as well as to the music. We shall break with custom, and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
APR 2 0 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play Here Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present its final concert of the season tonight at the Metropolitan theatre, Providence

Prior to the concert Dr. Koussevitzky was guest of honor at a preview showing of the drawings of Gerome Brush in the Faunce House Art Gallery. The exhibition, to remain open daily until May 15, is being sponsored jointly by officials of the art department and the Friends of the Orchestra. President Henry M. Wriston of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston were present at the reception.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 1 1 1937

Symphony to Play Famous 'Blue Danube'

BOSTON, April 10 (US)—Like Ted Lewis or Benny Goodman calling on the lads for a rollicking Beethoven Ninth Symphony or a Bach Fantasy and Fugue, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famous director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let a surprise out of the bag today. He revealed he would call on his 110 musicians for a waltz.

It will be the gloriously popular "Blue Danube," waltz by Johann Strauss, Jr., played at the coming Friday and Saturday "serious" concert, the first time in the orchestra's 56 years of history.

"I admit it has common, popular qualities," said the Boston conductor, who has helped record masterpieces for the ages, "but 'Blue Danube' possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it. That is a compliment to the public as well as the music.

"Our musicians love it, too. With our exceptional orchestral facilities, we shall break with custom and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
APR 1 1 1937

Boston Symphony To Relax with 'Blue Danube'

BOSTON, Apr. 10.—(US)—Like Ted Lewis or Benny Goodman calling on the lads for a rollicking Beethoven Ninth Symphony or a Bach fantasy and fugue, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famous director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, let a surprise out of the bag today.

He revealed he would call on his 110 musicians for a waltz.

It will be the popular "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss Jr., played at the coming Friday and Saturday "serious" concert, the first time in the orchestra's fifty-six years of history.

"I admit it has common, popular qualities," said the Boston conductor, "but Blue Danube possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it."

OMAHA, NEB.
MORNING BEE NEWS
APR 1 1 1937

Concession to 'Blue Danube'

Universal Service

BOSTON, April 10. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston symphony orchestra, surprised the music world today by announcing he will call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss jr., and will be played at next week's Friday and Saturday "serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56 years' history that a popular aria has been played.

Dr. Koussevitsky said:

"I admit it has common, popular qualities. But Blue Danube also possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it. That is a compliment to the public as well as to the music. We shall break with custom and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz."

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

Boston Orchestra Heard in Beethoven Eighth Symphony

Beethoven's clean-cut, lovely Eighth Symphony is a star album of the new record lists.

Sometimes it is played daintily, but Serge Koussevitzky, heading the glorious Boston Symphony (Victor), gives it stirring brilliance and Beethovenian conviction—a performance worth treasuring.

Important recordings appear on single discs—

Guila Bustabo (lately a Persinger pupil) plays Novacek's "Moto Perpetuo" and Paganini's "Caprice" No. 5 (Columbia) with an absolutely dazzling virtuosity. More should be heard of this girl right away.

Elizabeth Schumann, famous lyric soprano, sings poetically (Victor) Robert Schumann's "Mondnacht" and Strauss' beautiful "Traum durch die Dammerung" and "Ich schwebe."

Among new record albums is an admirable "Partita" (Columbia) of the late Swiss-American, Loeffler. It is excellently played by Jacques Gordon, violinist, and Lee Pattison, pianist.

The work mixes styles oddly, ranging from a pure "Sarabande" to influences of Debussy and jazz. But Loeffler was a distinguished artist. His "Partita" is maturely formed and pervaded with lyric charm.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
APR 1 2 1937

Boston Symphony Group Will Play Its First Waltz

(By Universal Service)

Boston, April 11.—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, surprised the music world today by announcing he will call on his musicians for a waltz.

The waltz will be the "Blue Danube," by Johann Strauss, Jr., and will be played at next week's Friday and Saturday "serious" concerts. The rendition will mark the first time in the orchestra's 56 years' history that a popular aria has been played.

Dr. Koussevitsky said:

"I admit it has common popular qualities. But 'Blue Danube' also possesses uncommon, exceptional instrumentation and artistry. The public loves it. That is a compliment to the public as well as to the music. We shall break with custom and try to compliment this superb, artistic waltz."

AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN
APR 1 3 1937

Russian Recordings Are on Musical Hour

Two Russian songs recorded by Igor Gorin, baritone, and the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 4 in F Minor" played by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will comprise the Music of the Masters program this afternoon at 5 o'clock in the main lounge of the Texas Union.

Mr. Gorin made his debut on records this month, and it is this initial performance which will be heard this afternoon. The numbers are "Viut Vitre," Ukranian folk song, and "Molitva" (The Prayer), with lyrics and music by the performer.

Beginning Wednesday afternoon, Music of the Masters will present a series of all-Brahms programs commemorating the fortieth anniversary of the death of Brahms.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS
APR 12 1937

Fine Records Are Found in Month's List

Koussevitsky Conducts for Excellent Franck Symphony

Two magnificent symphonic recordings worthy of everyone's attention have been added to Victor's library of Masterwork Sets:

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony as played by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky's baton, and the Cesar Franck D Minor Symphony played by the Philadelphians under Stokowski. The latter has, as a postlude, Stokowski's orchestral transcription of Franck's chorale, "Panis Angelicus," beautifully done.

Koussevitsky's reading of the Beethoven is direct and forceful, and the reproduction is one of extraordinary clarity, permitting the various instrumental voices to be heard and distinguished quite as readily as if the listener were in the concert hall.

Orchestral Verities

The personality in front of the Philadelphia Symphony is no less well projected in the Cesar Franck than the music itself. Stokowski gets certain qualities from his players which no other director so successfully develops, and these qualities are readily recognizable in recording.

A new baritone of impressive caliber, Igor Gorin, offers a delightful Ukrainian folk song, "Viut Vitre" and a prayer, ("Molitva") of his own composition for what we believe to be his first Victor record.

Menuhin Plays

Yehudi Menuhin offers two Paganini caprices, recorded in Europe. The first in A Major, arranged by Enesco, made one wonder if the European laboratories were as skilled in the business of recording as the New York ones. But the second in E Major, unaccompanied, fully compensates for any lack of clarity in the first.

Eager to see what Victor was putting forth for juveniles, we investigated some of their "Chording" Songs, delightful little tales about Echoes, Robinson Crusoe Cats and Dogs, Keeping Time, etc., in three part harmony sung by a vocal trio.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
APR 14 1937

"Our Symphony."

A chance to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky at the last of the season's Monday evening series of symphony concerts was the more interesting to the writer of this column because he had just read the book "Beloved Friend" by Catherine Drinker Brown and Barbara von Meck. This is the story of the strange friendship between Tschaikowsky and Madame Nadejda von Meck. For years they poured out their hearts to each other in letters. It was the widow's generosity which financed the composer's musical career. But strangely enough they never met. Nor, apparently, did they make any effort to do so. The woman's interest in the man's music was intense. Nadejda von Meck was the inspiration of the Fourth Symphony. In letter after letter it is referred to as "our symphony." By report, it was not very well presented at its first performance in Russia. After hearing the spirited performance of the score by the virtuosi of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Monday, it is safe to say that if he could have been in the audience the composer himself would have been thrilled. The celebrated pizzicato Scherzo, of which the composer was quite proud, was a marvel as the Boston strings plucked its playful measures. The sonorities of the final movement were vibrant with colorful emotion. As I went to the check room for my coat, one young man confided to me that he would not be able to sleep a wink after hearing it. Besides the intensities of this composition the Second Symphony of Beethoven which preceded it was all serenity, although in its day the final movement was considered to be quite a wild musical orgy. Symphony hall was practically filled for the concert. And Dr. Koussevitzky was called back three or four times after its close to acknowledge the plaudits.

LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
APR 13 1937

BLUE DANUBE

THE announcement that the Boston Symphony orchestra will play the "Blue Danube," a waltz so long popular and movingly beautiful, is pounced upon, by news editors as a hot piece of news. Not in the 56 years of the orchestra's existence has the organization played the piece.

Now that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces it will be played, the announcement is called a "surprise," for it is to be played at a "serious" concert, and the lads who wrinkle a ponderous brow at the news service desks consider they have run smack into something neat, hot and gorgeously colossal.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky says that the "Blue Danube" has "common, popular qualities," but hastens to add that it possesses "uncommon, exceptional instrumentation. One might almost gather that the conductor is apologizing.

Perhaps it really isn't necessary for him to apologize. Quite probably the public will forgive him. There are times when a lot of the public would be glad to hear a good orchestra play something from which it could gain a faint inkling of understanding.

It would be much easier than the present strain under so which much of the public labors, that of trying diligently to adorn the face with a look of rapturous, ecstatic understanding and applauding politely when they haven't the slightest idea of what it is all about, or why.

Some years ago a famous operatic star went back to the little Maine village where she was born. The homecoming called for a celebration of some sort, so the good folk of the town arranged it, a bit timid all the while, for they were to welcome back a glorious figure, with a glorious voice that had thrilled opera audiences the world over.

They hired a hall. There were probably speeches of welcome and the usual fuss and feathers that adorn such an occasion—the memory is a bit faulty on that point—but eventually came a point in the program where the celebrity was to sing.

The audience leaned back, expecting the most intricate and screechiest that grand opera could offer through the vocal chords of the home town girl who had made good in a big way.

But they had the surprise of their lives and a pleasant one.

The great opera star sang no arias from great works, but lifted her golden voice in the strains of "Home, Sweet Home."

She sang as probably she had never sung before to that audience of home folks, and at the last note those who weren't weeping were deaf, and the hearing of those in that was acute.

The lady was easily forgiven. Perhaps the Boston Symphony will live it down if it plays the "Blue Danube."

Quite often it is necessary to endow a symphony orchestra to keep it alive and its players in nourishment.

The public endows the swing bands and hill billy groups without urging. There may be a lesson in this, but we wouldn't know.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 14 1937

CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Serge Koussevitsky will bring his famous Boston Symphony Orchestra to the Auditorium tonight for another series of concerts presented by the Worcester Civic Music Association. The concert, starting at 8.15, will be open only to members of the association.

Tonight's program will include the Cesar Franck Symphony in D Minor and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite "Scheherazade."

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE
APR 14 1937

TANGLEWOOD'S TRANSFER IS COMPLETE

Estate Given for Festival as Memorial to Mrs. Brooks' Parents

The transfer of the undivided one-half interest in "Tanglewood," 210-acre estate in Lenox and Stockbridge given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, was recorded at the registry of deeds today by the office of Judge Charles L. Hibbard. This portion of the estate was that owned by Mrs. Brooks. Previously the portion of Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, aunt of Mrs. Brooks, had been recorded through Judge Hibbard's office.

Mrs. Brooks, elected to the board of trustees of the Berkshire Festival last week, is interested in seeing the Festival established on a permanent basis in cooperation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a memorial to her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Richard C, Dixey, late of Boston. Mr. and Mrs. Dixey laid out the beautiful formal garden at "Tanglewood," which will be used as an open air foyer during the concerts in August.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 14 1937

FESTIVAL BOARD TO MEET FRIDAY

Membership Campaign Reports Will be Made

AT STOCKBRIDGE

Mrs. Shelley W. Potter Named to Berkshire Symphonic Festival Advisory Committee.

The advisory committee of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will meet Friday afternoon at 3 o'clock with the president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, in Stockbridge, to submit reports on the sustaining membership campaign. Enthusiastic support for the festival continues to come in by mail daily and if the same enthusiasm is found in the Berkshires, officers of the fesivtal say, there will be no question of success for the campaign which ends April 30.

New members of the advisory committee include Mrs. Shelley Waterman Potter of North Adams, Mrs. Richard A. Douglas of Albany, N. Y., and Mrs. Sang Collins of Moores Mills, N. Y. Music lovers from these communities are serving on the local committees.

In Pittsfield, Miss Elizabeth Gamwell, chairman, and Mrs. Louis E. Underwood, co-chairman, are canvassing the city thoroughly, and have also sent letters to merchants, pointing to the benefits to Berkshire from the festival. Similarly thorough canvasses are being made by Mrs. J. T. Owens in Lee, Miss Estelle Hutchinson in Lenox and Mrs. George L. Taylor in Great Barrington.

Miss Robinson Smith today urged all who can to become sustaining members of the festival, thereby taking advantage of the low price for tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in August, and at the same time lending encouragement to the efforts of the festival workers. Music lovers not reached by local committees are urged to send their memberships directly to Stockbridge, where they will receive prompt attention from Miss Elizabeth Bliss, executive secretary.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 15 1937

Music

Mendelssohn, Sibelius and Tchaikovsky on Last Program of Boston Symphony Orchestra Here This Season.—Winter's Fare Restricted to Works of Accepted Writers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city will come to a close next Tuesday night with a concert in Metropolitan Theatre, the fifth of the series.

The program is of the tried-and-trustworthy variety, bringing forth Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," in A-major; Sibelius's tone poem "Swan of Tuonela" and Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony." in F-minor. There is nothing likely to startle the local audience or any other audience, and, in fact, the orchestra's season here has gone by without even one venture into anything but thoroughly explored and comfortably habitable musical territory.

It is true that the programs have contained several items not often heard here or elsewhere, but all were in familiar manner. No doubt that is what most of the audience prefers, but it does seem as though everybody would have been benefited by being subjected, at least once during the season, to something like the Berg violin concerto, which was played by the orchestra in Boston and New York with a former Providence man, Louis Krasner, as soloist. It is hardly possible that many persons would have been roused to anything besides indignation—but that in itself is often a pleasure.

The following composers will have been represented on the programs: Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Kalinikoff, Liadov and Sibelius. All respectable—too respectable. Somebody not yet admitted, perhaps never to be admitted, to the circle might well have been invited for at least one evening.

However, that is assuredly not to say that the previous programs haven't been enjoyable or that the one Tuesday night will not be. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is, after all, one of the world's foremost, and whatever Dr. Koussevitzky chooses to play is well worth hearing.

The "Italian Symphony" was written during and after Mendelssohn's visit in Italy in the early 1830's. Some persons are enchanted by the Italian atmosphere of the work; others see nothing, or almost nothing, Italian in it except the fourth movement, based on the saltarello, an Italian peasant dance. It appears that in music one finds chiefly what one is looking for. Schumann once mistook the "Scotch" symphony for the "Italian" and was enraptured by the visions of Italy that it aroused.

Berlioz, in his "Memoirs," gives an instance concerning Mendelssohn himself that indicates how perilous it is to be too certain about music. Mendelssohn had professed surpassing admiration for Gluck and had intimated that Berlioz was incapable of appreciating Gluck. This happened in Rome at the time Mendelssohn was writing his symphony, and Berlioz had brought with him from Paris a beautiful but not well-known aria from a Gluck opera. He left an unsigned manuscript copy of it on a piano where Mendelssohn would see it. The latter, supposing it the work of some unimportant Italian, played it through in parody fashion and found it not very good. He was chagrined when Berlioz revealed who had written it.

Whatever the influences in the Mendelssohn symphony, it is melodious and pleasant, and is constructed in the composer's usual polished manner.

"The Swan of Tuonela" is gloomy and portentous music, one of several pieces inspired by the Finnish folk-epic "Kalevala." On the score there is the following note: "Tuonela, the kingdom of death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and rapid current, in which the swan of Tuonela glides in majestic fashion and sings." The famous English horn solo in this piece will be played by Louis Speyer.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony is the one dedicated only "To My Best Friend." The secret is now known to all; the friend was Nadejda von Meck, the wealthy widow who was the composer's admirer and benefactor. The symphony was first performed in 1878 in Moscow, while the composer was in Florence. The conductor was Nicholas Rubinstein. Mme. von Meck wrote later to the composer: "The public received your symphony very well, especially the scherzo. Applause was great and at the end they called for you. It must have been Rubinstein who came out; I didn't see because I had started to go out. But I believe the composition was somewhat marred by a poor performance; the orchestra was worse than I ever heard it. Usually they give a good performance, but this time surely they did not rehearse enough."

This letter, and one from Tchaikovsky to Mme. von Meck in which he provides a program for the symphony, are to be found in the recent book "Beloved Friend," by Catherine Drinker Bowen and Barbara von Meck. The introduction is "the germ of the entire symphony, the idea upon which all else depends," he writes, quoting a few measures. He continues: "This is the 'Fatum,' the inexorable force that prevents our hopes of happiness from being realized, that watches jealously lest our felicity should become full and unclouded—it is Damocles's sword hanging over the head in constant, unremitting spiritual torment."

G. Y. L.

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER
[illegible] 1937

Symphony Concert Dates Announced

Mrs. Georgiana Philips has been appointed to the advisory committee from Bennington for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival whose six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will be an attraction August 5, 7 and 8 and August 12, 14 and 15. Professor Charles L. Safford is the representative from Williamstown and Mrs. Shelley W. Potter from North Adams.

The concerts will be given this year at Tanglewood, beautiful 210-acre estate given to the orchestra as a permanent home for the Festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline. The estate, located between Stockbridge and Lenox is easily accessible by two roads and is off the Federal route.

Sustaining memberships will be available for the Festival until April 30. Members receive a reduction in price either for one series or all six concerts and they also have first choice of reserve seats.

Mrs. Phillips has circulars and other information at her home and will be pleased to pass on this information to music lovers of Bennington and vicinity.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
STATES
APR 14 1937

The Waltzing Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra lowers the bars sufficiently to admit "The Blue Danube" to its serious concerts. This is a vast concession for the classicists to make.

"Blue Danube" is, of course, one of the most glorious pieces ever composed. People of all classes love it. And it is of rare artistry. But it has been kept from symphonic programs because it was popular music. One must have a peculiar mental slant in order to understand this reasoning.

Art cannot fulfill itself by holding itself aloof from the people. The greatest artists have known this, and have thought of the many as well as of the few, for the few are recruited from the many. We are glad the Boston Symphony has been awakened to human values. If all creators of the beautiful were so minded, the understanding and enjoyment of our people would be a great deal fuller than it is.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 15 1937

Big Audience Gives Ovation to Boston Symphony Here

By E. GWYN THOMAS
Telegram Staff Reporter

A performance redounding to the honor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its noted conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, last night brought an audience of 3600 persons to its feet in a tremendous ovation at the Auditorium.

Ordinarily the concert would have ended the current season of the Worcester Civic Music Association, but because of the cancellation of Nelson Eddy's March recital, a replacement program will be presented on May 10 by John Charles Thomas and Efrem Zimbalist.

Only two works engaged the famed Boston musical organization and its splendid leader as it filled its fourth consecutive engagement in the Civic Music series here. They were the great Symphony in D Minor of Cesar Franck and the "Scheherazade" symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakov.

Variety Enough

But the two filled the evening—and gave enough variety, too. More important they provided the medium through which could be exhibited all of the virtues which have carried the 56-year-old Boston Symphony to the fore among famous orchestras of the world.

Dr. Koussevitzky's acknowledged gift for musical punctuation—which makes the Boston Symphony play the musical chapters, the musical paragraphs, sentences and phrases so that they tell their own strong message—undoubtedly was responsible for the virility, the quietly strong passion of the performance. Especially was that true in the dark first movement. The contrasting moods of the second emphasized the tonal unity.

And here, L. Speyer, masterly, and in just the correct tempo under Conductor Koussevitzky, executed the English horn solo.

The second half of the program brought the familiar musical tales after "The Thousand and One Nights." Here, again, subtly conveying the oriental motif of the four pieces that make up the suite.

Magic in Play

They are well known and part of the repertoire of many smaller amateur orchestras. In the order of the suite, "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," "The Story of the Kelendar Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" (the best known in the set), and "Festival at Baghdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion."

Here again, came into play the magic of the genius which causes the well-known to become as something new. And the solo work of Richard Burgin, concertmaster, added something of new beauty to the new vision.

It was after the last glowing harmonies had died away that Conductor Koussevitzky was called back from the wings, again and again, and insisted that the applause be shared by his concertmaster.

Before the concert began W. Karl Lations, association president, said that three thousand members already have renewed subscriptions and that the deadline for renewals is tonight.

He announced, also, these concert dates for 1937-38—Oct. 26, Salzburg Opera Guild; Nov. 29, Yehudi Menuhin, violinist; Jan. 21, Kirsten Flagstad, soprano; Feb. 4, Richard Crooks, tenor and Emanuel Feuermann, 'cellist, and April 12, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
[illegible] 5 193

Concert Tuesday Closes Boston Symphony Season

Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony Among Final Selections

The Boston Symphony will bring its Providence season to a close, next Tuesday night, with a concert to begin at 8:15 o'clock in the Metropolitan Theatre. For this occasion, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Italian Symphony of Mendelssohn; the Swan of Tuonela, a tone poem of Jan Sibelius; and the Tchaikovski's Fourth Symphony in F minor.

Mendelssohn called his fourth symphony the "Italian," a title justified by the fact that he composed it during a sojourn in Italy. Being impressed by the sights and sounds of the country, then new to him, he based the finale on the rhythm of the saltarello. The whole atmosphere of this work reflects the sunny clime of Italy.

"The Swan of Tuonela" was one of a cycle of tone poems which Sibelius composed on the exploits of Lemminkainen in the Finnish saga, the "Kalevala." Frankly programmistic, this sketch follows the descent of the hero into the underworld to shoot a swan which glides upon the waters of the river which encircled it.

The solo in this gem of musical description is the darkly colored voice of the English horn, ennunciated by Louis Speyer, distinguished virtuoso of this instrument in the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Tchaikovski's brilliant Fourth Symphony needs no introduction to Providence audiences. More distinctly Russian than the other five symphonies, it draws on the folk music of that country for its themes. The result is an exciting, lyrical and somewhat morose whole, set off by the most unusual third movement in symphonic music, a movement almost entirely scored for strings in pizzicato.

T. A. M.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
APR 16 1937

SYMPHONIC HOME IN BERKSHIRES

Stockbridge, Mass., April 16—(UP)—Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally-known architect, will design the building which will serve as the permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic festival, it was announced today.

The building will be erected at "Tanglewood," the 210-acre estate between here and Lenox which Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline recently gave the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was at "Tanglewood" that Nathaniel Hawthorne penned his famous tales of that name.

Saarinen, a native of Helsingfors, Finland, will be the architect for the entire development, including a musical pavilion seating 5000. Construction is expected to start this year.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST
APR 15 1937

Two Symphonic Works Are Superbly Given

Presentation of Boston Orchestra Under Dr. Koussevitzky for Civic Music Association

By INEZ M. EAMES

An all-symphonic program was presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky last evening in the Auditorium for the members of the Civic Music Association. Originally the concert would have been the last of the civic music series, but due to the substitution of John Charles Thomas and Efram Zimbalist for Nelson Eddy, it was next to the last.

Dr. Koussevitzky presented music by Cesar Franck and Rimsky-Korsakov, dividing the entire evening between the "Symphony in D Minor" by the former while the latter contributed "Scheherazade." With two symphonic works listed upon the program, perhaps it would appear as a heavy concert to anyone but a student of music, but with Dr. Koussevitzky's inspired readings it proved one of delight.

Franck has only one symphony to his credit, but it is a great work which deservedly ranks with the masterpieces of Brahms, and bridges the gap between the classic symphony and modernism. There are many other Russian symphonies of interest and merit, although public approval has concentrated on the "Scheherazade" which is really a suite of such symphonic proportions that is frequently found on concert programs in place of a regular symphony.

After the four symphonies by Brahms had been completed it seemed that the last word had been uttered in this form. But the only one produced by Franck in 1889 was an important one, the "Symphony in D Minor," included in last evening's program.

It was interesting to note in the "program notes" that this work was first played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra April 15, 1899, with Wilhelm Gericke, conductor.

Although Franck was a Belgian by birth, he spent the most of his life in France where he was a teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. Among his pupils were such famous modernists as Debussy and d'Indy. His life was uneventful and filled with hard work.

Modern Harmony

This symphony, filled with modern harmony and freedom of structure, is one of the outstanding pieces of musical originality and has become one of the most popular numbers on orchestral programs.

Made up of only three movements instead of the conventional four, it is of strong and impressive character. Franck shows individuality in carrying themes of original beauty from one movement into another.

First in slow time the opening theme is based mainly upon three notes which soon take on a fast tempo, becoming a full-sized melody. In this passage from the first movement the composer presents his main theme in the guise of a canon. The subject is announced by trombone, 'cellos and basses, and is immediately imitated by the trumpets, one octave higher. There is a sternness about all this which the theme derives partly from the canonic treatment and partly from the stern quality of the instrumentation. Again the slow main theme is played in a new key, with chromatic progressions leading to a different theme, going on to a part where the melody is given a plaintive atmosphere as it is softly put forth by the horns and woodwind instruments. Comparing this to a conventional symphonic writing, the whole melodic and harmonic scheme has a striking originality. In the coda other interesting harmonies and modulations are indulged in until the main theme returns with tremendous volume, ending upon an agitated D major chord.

A contrasting second movement starts with a harp accompaniment, followed by the English horn playing the melody, with a second broad melody to which the strings play an accompaniment.

After a brief introduction the finale goes into a syncopated tune, first played in the bass. The second tune also hints at the modern. The main theme of the first movement later appears with rhythmic changes, finally starting this coda with full orchestral volume. Various themes reappear, making a unity which binds together all three movements.

Soft and Rich

The quality of the Boston group's grand playing was delightful as each choir had distinction and melted into an ensemble that was soft and rich.

There are many other Russian symphonies of interest and merit although public approval has concentrated on a work which is really a suite. Rimsky-Korsakov was one of the famous Russian group of five, which devoted itself to restoring the folk elements in the music of their country and making it more truly nationalistic. However, Rimsky-Korsakov showed greater adaptability than any of his colleagues and was particularly successful in catching the spirit and melodic outlines of the Oriental music which is so closely allied to the Russian.

The suite was originally a mere succession of disconnected dance movements, which have actually developed into the symphony as we know it today. This is distinctly a piece of program music, representing a series of pictures and stories which the composer made clear in his published comments. It is a "set" of pieces now an orchestral form in several movements, but the individual movements have more freedom and informality than those of the symphony.

Depicting four episodes from the "Arabian Nights," the literary materials for "Scheherazade" are taken from this famous story. The name is that of a favorite sultana who succeeded in saving her own life and those of her companions by telling the sultan each night a new story, so that eventually he could not bear to kill her, which had been his habit with wives in general. Thus the stories are literally the "Thousand Nights and a Night," which name appears in the composer's sub-title to this suite.

Solo Violin

Each movement represents a definite story and a different set of characters, all bound together by the recurrent theme of the solo violin which represents Scheherazade herself. These solo parts were played by an artist who did his work admirably in both melody and undersong.

It is program music of the highest type, bringing us a musical account of exciting adventures as well as fascinating characters. The work falls into four sections entitled: "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship," a ship which sailed lightly yet rhythmically over the waves; "The Story of the Kalandar Prince" with the muted trombone and trumpet adding to the calm and tempest; "The Young Prince and the Young Princess" singing their song graciously by means of scale passages announced by the flute and imitated by other instruments, and "Festival at Baghdad, the Sea, the Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior, Conclusion."

Rimsky-Korsakov was the musical poet who told these stories through the medium of music, and it was Dr. Koussevitzky and his men who through the magic of the score artistically related these tales.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 17 1937

PLAN SYMPHONY PAVILION

Berkshire Group Names Architect for Boston Orchestra Home

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., April 16 (AP).—Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival today named Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., famous Finnish architect, to design a permanent Summer musical pavilion here for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The building will be constructed on Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires and wrote his "Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales." Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline gave the estate as a permanent home for the festival.

The Boston Symphony will give six concerts there this Summer between Aug. 5 and 15 under Conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
APR 16 1937

SAARINEN TO DESIGN HOME FOR FESTIVAL

Eminent Architect Chosen by Trustees for Development at Tanglewood in Berkshires

Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally-known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect for the building to be erected at "Tanglewood," 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, as a permanent home for the festival.

ELIEL SAARINEN

"Tanglewood" is where Hawthorne lived, where he wrote "The Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are Aug. 5, 7 and 8; Aug. 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the festival last summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 States and Canada.

Mr. Saarinen will be the architect for the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood including the musical pavilion to seat 5000 persons. It is hoped to make a start on construction of the pavilion this year, but completion is not planned until 1938.

Born in Helsingfors, Finland, in 1873, Mr. Saarinen was graduated in 1897 from the Institute Polytechnic in Helsingfors. For 11 years he was associated with Herman Cossellius and Armas Lindgren whose most prominent work was the National Museum at Helsingfors.

Since 1907 Mr. Saarinen has worked alone and has designed the following more remarkable buildings: Railway station at Helsingfors; town hall in Joensuu, Finland; town hall at Lahti, Finland; the private gallery, Keirkner, Helsingfors; Estobank, Reval, Estonia.

Since 1925 Mr. Saarinen has resided at Cranbrook, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., where he designed the Cranbrook School for Boys, the Kinswood School for Girls, the Cranbrook Academy of Art of which he is the director, and he is now developing the Cranbrook Institute of Science Building. The academy of art is a graduate school with a small limited enrollment.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
APR 16 1937

ARCHITECT CHOSEN FOR MUSIC PAVILION

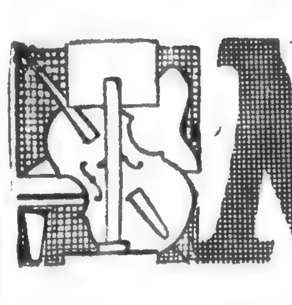
Eliel Saarinen Will Draw Plans for Building at Tanglewood Estate—Work to Start in 1937

Pittsfield, April 15—The trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic festival have chosen as architect for the development at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Eliel Saarienen, 64, a native of Helsingfors, Finland, now residing at Bloomfield Hills, Mich. He is to draw the plan for the music pavilion, which will have a seating capacity of 5000, the construction of which is to be started this year with completion in 1938.

At Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate, the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor is to give six concerts August 5, 7, 8, 12, 14 and 15.

Mr Saarinen has an international reputation as an architect and was selected after a careful search for the man whom the trustees regarded as best fitted for this undertaking.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 15 1937



MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Program of Season Here Presents Mendelssohn, Sibelius and Tchaikovsky.—Speyer to have solo part.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in this city will come to a close next Tuesday night with a concert in Metropolitan Theatre, the fifth of the series.

The program is of the tried-and-trustworthy variety, bringing forth Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," in A-major; Sibelius's tone poem "Swan of Tuonela" and Tchaikovsky's "Fourth Symphony," in F-minor. There is nothing likely to startle the local audience or any other audience, and, in fact, the orchestra's season here has gone by without even one venture into anything but thoroughly explored and comfortably habitable musical territory.

It is true that the programs have contained several items not often heard here or elsewhere, but all were in familiar manner. No doubt that is what most of the audience prefers, but it does seem as though everybody would have been benefited by being subjected, at least once during the season, to something like the Berg violin concerto, which was played by the orchestra in Boston and New York with a former Providence man Louis Krasner, as soloist. It is hardly possible that many persons would have been roused to anything besides indignation—but that in itself is often a pleasure.

The following composers will have been represented on the programs: Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Brahms, Wagner, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Kalinikoff, Liadov and Sibelius. All respectable—too respectable. Somebody not yet admitted, perhaps never to be admitted, to the circle might well have been invited for at least one evening.

However that is assuredly not to say that the previous programs haven't been enjoyable or that the one Tuesday night will not be. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is, after all, one of the world's foremost, and whatever Dr. Koussevitzky chooses to play is well worth hearing.

The "Italian Symphony" was written during and after Mendelssohn's visit in Italy in the early 1830's. Some persons are enchanted by the Italian atmosphere of the work; others see nothing, or almost nothing, Italian in it except the fourth movement, based on the saltarello, an Italian peasant dance. It appears that in music one finds chiefly what one is looking for. Schumann once mistook the "Scotch" symphony for the "Italian" and was enraptured by the visions of Italy that it aroused.

Berlioz, in his "Memoirs," gives an instance concerning Mendelssohn himself that indicates how perilous it is to be too certain about music. Mendelssohn had professed surpassing admiration for Gluck and had intimated that Berlioz was incapable of appreciating Gluck. This happened in Rome at the time Mendelssohn was writing his symphony, and Berlioz had brought with him from Paris a beautiful but not well-known aria from a Gluck opera. He left an unsigned manuscript copy of it on a piano where Mendelssohn would see it. The latter, supposing it the work of some unimportant Italian, played it through in parody fashion and found it not very good. He was chagrined when Berlioz revealed who had written it.

Whatever the influences in the Mendelssohn symphony, it is melodious and pleasant, and is constructed in the composer's usual polished manner.

"The Swan of Tuonela" is gloomy and portentous music, one of several pieces inspired by the Finnish folk-epic "Kalevala." On the score there is the following note: "Tuonela, the kingdom of death, the Hades of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by a broad river of black water and rapid current, in which the swan of Tuonela glides in majestic fashion and sings." The famous English horn solo in this piece will be played by Louis Speyer.

The Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony is the one dedicated only "To My Best Friend." The secret is now known to all; the friend was Nadejda von Meck, the wealthy widow who was the composer's admirer and benefactor. The symphony was first performed in 1878 in Moscow, while the composer was in Florence. The conductor was Nicholas Rubinstein. Mme. von Meck wrote later to the composer: "The public received your symphony very well, especially the scherzo. Applause was great and at the end they called for you. It must have been Rubinstein who came out; I didn't see because I had started to go out. But I believe the composition was somewhat marred by a poor performance; the orchestra was worse than I ever heard it. Usually they give a good performance, but this time surely they did not rehearse enough."

This letter, and one from Tchaikovsky to Mme. von Meck in which he provides a program for the symphony, are to be found in the recent book "Beloved Friend," by Catherine Drinker Bowen and Barbara von Meck. The introduction is "the germ of the entire symphony, the idea upon which all else depends," he writes, quoting a few measures. He continues: "This is the 'Fatum,' the inexorable force that prevents our hopes of happiness from being realized, that watches jealously lest our felicity should become full and unclouded—it is Damocles's sword hanging over the head in constant, unremitting spiritual torment."

G. Y. L.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
EAGLE NEWS
APR 17 1937

LOCAL MUSIC PROFESSOR NAMED TO COMMITTEE

Professor George Dickinson, head of the Vassar college music faculty, has been chosen to the advisory committee of the Berkshire Symphonic festival which will be held at "Tanglewood" in Stockbridge, Mass., in August.

His selection was announced yesterday by Elizabeth Bliss, permanent secretary of the festival. At the same time she announced that Eliel Saarinon of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally-known architect, will design the permanent building which will be erected to house the new summer home of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Bliss stated that reservations from more than 25 local persons, including 15 from Vassar students have been received by her office. The festival is an annual affair, featuring guest conductors and artists.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 17 1937

Saarinen Will Design Pavilion in Berkshires

Picked to Draft Plans for Boston Symphony Hall

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., April 16 (AP).—Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival today named Eliel Saarinen, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., a Finnish architect, to design a permanent summer musical pavillion here for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The building will be constructed on Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires and wrote his "Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales." Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Brookline, gave the estate as a permanent home for the festival.

The Boston Symphony will give six concerts there this summer between August 5 and 15 under conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
NEWS
APR 16 1937

MUSIC in Milwaukee

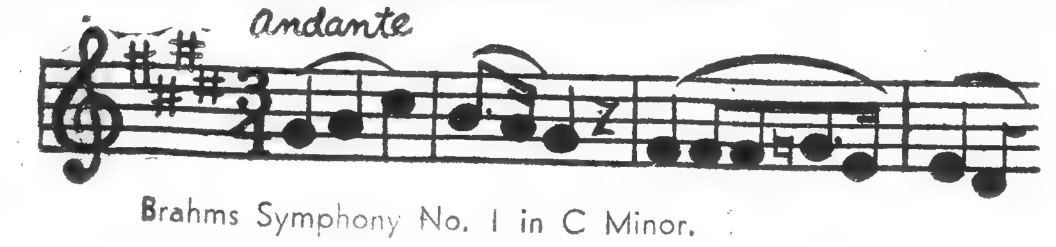
By RALPH TILLEMA



Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C Minor.

The Wisconsin News Music Editor suggests that music pupils and music lovers clip and paste these themes on a filing card, with composer's name at top, and file them in alphabetical order. A new theme will appear daily.

The chorus of the University of Helsinki, Finland, composed of 50 male singers, will make an American tour next season, debuting with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Dec. 31 and Jan. 1 in Boston and in New York Jan. 6.

This chorus, known in Finland as the "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat," abbreviated "Y. L.," was founded in 1883. From its very beginning the principal aim of the founders was the creation of Finnish choral music and they have contributed largely to raising the standards of the Finnish choral singing to its present high level. Prof. Heikki Klemetti was it first conductor and remained with the organization for 25 years. The chorus is now conducted by Dr. Martti Turunen, who has occupied the position for the last six years. During its existence of more than 50 years the position of the Y. L. chorus in the musical life of Finland is manifested in the fact that many Finnish composers have written and dedicated much of their music for male chorus to the Y. L. Jean Sibelius, who is an honorary member of the chorus, has composed all of his most famous male chorus music for this organization. On the forthcoming tour the programs will be devoted exclusively to the music of the Finnish composers.

The Y. L. chorus has given concerts in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary and Italy.

Prominent Sponsors

The organization will visit this country under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Music council, Marshall Bartholomew, president, which last year presented the Budapest University chorus, and a committee of prominent Finnish-American citizens. The honorary sponsors in Finland are headed by Kyosti Kallio, president of Finland; Rudolf Holsti, minister of foreign affairs; Jean Sibelius, the distinguished composer; K. A. Brotherus, president of the University of Helsinki; Georg Schneevoigt, conductor of the Helsinski Municipal orchestra; Selim Palmgren, composer, and many important members of the Finnish ministry of state, newspaper editors and others of prominent civic positions.

In America the sponsoring group is headed by his excellency, Eero Jarnefelt, minister of Finland at Washington, D. C.; K. F. Altio, consul general of Finland in New York; the consuls of Finland located in Philadelphia, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Duluth, Toronto and Montreal; and is further composed of such outstanding musical names as Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick Stock, Werner Janssen, etc.; also Dr. John H. Finley, Olin Downes, William J. Henderson, Prof. Harry Rogers Pratt of the University of Virginia, Prof. Eugene Van Cleef of the Ohio State university, Hon. Oscar J. Larson, and many others.

The American tour will be under the direction of Richard Copley of New York.

Piano Recital Saturday

The second of a series of informal piano recitals will be given by the elementary pupils of Leah Ina Cook in the Fine Arts building, 125 E. Wells st., Saturday evening, April 17, at 7:30.

Those appearing on the program are Beatrice Boym, Alfred Bernacchi, Martha Hanna, Marilyn Pross, Betty Schnall, Esther Neehanikin, Nancy Langlae, Harriet Perchonok, Mildred Sielkow, Shirley Altfeld, Barbara Altfeld, Lucile Rothman and Martha Woodling.

They will be assisted by the following violin pupils of Nathan Aaron:

Venlo Wolfson, Violet Herschensohn and Lawrence Post.

Versatility in presentation and variation in features will typify the fourteenth concert presented by the Boys' Technical High school band and glee club Friday evening, April 16, in the school auditorium.

The program features Marvin Draeger, Tech's versatile young musician and swimmer, in an intricate xylophone solo; a trombone solo by Eugene Weber, and vocal solos by Paul Grambsch and William Thiele.

The newly organized drum and bugle corps will perform the opening march, followed by a series of selected musical numbers, both classical and popular.

The program will start at 8 sharp.

This singable and eloquent theme opens the second movement. It is richly harmonized by the strings with the first violins and bassoon playing the melody in octaves.

The mystery theme of this week was taken from the Allegretto of Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata."

ALBANY, N. Y.
NEWS
APR 17 1937

SAARINEN NAMED ARCHITECT FOR TANGLEWOOD PAVILION

Pittsfield—Eliel Saarinen, internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to direct construction of a 5,000-seat pavilion at Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox.

Construction of the pavilion will start this year but it will not be finished until next. Tanglewood was a gift of Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a permanent home for the festival.

The orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are Aug. 5, 7 and 8, and Aug. 12, 14 and 15.

Mr. Saarinen, native of Finland, has designed many world-famous structures. He is vicepresident of the International City Planning Conference and holds the gold medal of the Architectural League of New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
APR 17 1937

TOUR TO BE MADE BY FINNISH CHORUS

THE chorus of the University of Helsinki, Finland, composed of 50 male singers, will make an American tour next season, opening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on December 31 and January 1 in Boston and in New York on January 6.

This chorus, known in Finland as the "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat," abbreviated "Y. L.," was founded in 1883. From its very beginning, the principal aim of the founders was the creation of Finnish choral music and they have contributed largely to raising the standards of the Finnish choral singing to its present high level.

Prof. Heikki Klemetti was its first conductor, and remained with the organization for 25 years. The chorus is now conducted by Dr. Martti Turunen, who has occupied the position for the last six years.

During its existence of over 50 years the position of the Y. L. Chorus in the musical life of Finland is manifested in the fact that many Finnish composers have written and dedicated much of their music for male chorus to the Y. L. Chorus. Jean Sibelius, who is an honorary member of the chorus, has composed all of his most famous male-chorus music for this organization. On the forthcoming tour, the programs will be devoted exclusively to the music of the Finnish composers.

The Y. L. Chorus has given concerts in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary and Italy. The organization will visit this country under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Musical Council, Marshall Bartholomew, president, which last year presented the Budapest University Chorus and a committee of prominent Finnish-American citizens. In America, the sponsoring group is headed by his excellency, Eero Jarnefelt, Minister of Finland at Washington.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
APR 17 1937

Symphony to Close Its Season Tuesday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its Providence season to a close at the concert to be given in the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will present the following program for this ocsion: Mendelshohn's Fourth Symphony, Sibelius' tone poem, "The Swan of Tuonela," and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in F Minor.

Mendelssohn called his Fourth Symphony the "Italian" symphony, a title justified by the fact that he composed it during a sojourn in Italy, and being much impressed by the sights and sounds of a country then new to him, based the finale upon the rhythm of the saltarello. The "Swan of Tounela" was one of a cycle of tone poems which Sibelius based upon the exploits of Lemminkainen, in the Finnish saga, the "Kalevala." It tells of the descent of the hero into the underworld to shoot a swan which glides upon the waters of the river which encircled it. The solo in this gem of musical description is the darkly colored voice of the English horn. The part will be taken by Louis Speyer, distinguished virtuoso of this instrument in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tchaikovsky's brilliant symphony will bring the season to a close.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
[illegible]

ARCHITECT ENGAGED

STOCKBRIDGE, April 17 (AP)—Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has named Eliel Saarinen, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., famous Finnish architect, to design a permanent Summer musical pavillion here for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The building will be constructed on Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires and wrote his "Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales." Mrs. Gorham Broks, of Brookline, gave the estate as a permanent home for the festival.

38

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 16 1937

Saarinen Architect For Music Festival Pavilion

Chosen for Entire Development Contemplated at "Tanglewood," Between Lenox and Stockbridge, Including Structure to Seat 5000 Persons — Hoped to Start Work on Pavilion This Year But Completion is Not Planned Until Next Year— Native of Helsingfors, Finland, Has Had Distinguished Career.

Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect for the building to be erected at "Tanglewood", 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, as a permanent home for the Festival.

"Tanglewood" is where Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, where he wrote "The Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are August 5, 7 and 8; August 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the Festival last summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 states and Canada.

Mr. Saarinen will be the architect for the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood including the musical pavilion to seat 5,000 persons. It is hoped to make a start on construction of the pavilion this year, but completion is not planned until 1938.

Born in Helsingfors, Finland, in 1973, Mr. Saarinen was graduated in 1897 from the Institute Polytechnic in Helsingfors. For 11 years he was associated with Herman Cossellius and Armas Lindgren whose most prominent work was the National Museum at Helsingfors.

Since 1907 Mr. Saarinen has worked alone and has designed the following more remarkable buildings: railway station at Helsingfors; town hall in Joensuu, Finland; town hall at Lahti, Finland; the private gallery, Keirkner, Helsingfors; Estobank, Reval, Estonia.

Since 1925 Mr. Saarinen has resided at Cranbrook, Bloomfield Hills, Mich., where he designed the Cranbrook School for Boys, the Kingswood School for Girls, the Cranbrook Academy of Art of which he is the director, and he is now developing the Cranbrook Institute of Science building. The academy of art is a graduate school with a small limited enrollment.

Next door to Mr. Saarinen lives his friend and associate, Karl Milles, famous sculptor.

In international competitions Mr. Saarinen has figured prominently, winning first prizes for city planning for Reval, Estonia and Gewerbovereinshaus, Riga, Latvia, second prizes in city planning for Yas Camberra, Australia and the Tribune Building at Chicago, Ill.

To Budapest, Hungary and Reval, Estonia, Mr. Saarinen was asked as expert of city planning to Paris as a member of the jury for the architectural competition at the Olympiad in 1924, and for the same reason to Los Angeles in 1932; to Yas Camberra, Australia, as jury member of the competition for a Parliament house; to Bergen, Norway, as jury member of the city planning competition; and to Madrid, Spain and Rio Janeiro, Brazil, as a jury member of the international competition for the Columbus memorial light tower at Santo Domingo.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

APR 17 1937

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL ARCHITECT SELECTED

Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect for the building to be erected at "Tanglewood," 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent home for the Festival.

"Tanglewood" is where Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, where he wrote "The Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are Aug. 5, 7 and 8; Aug. 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the Festival last summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 states and Canada.

PITTSFIELD, MASS
EAGLE

APR 16 1937

ELIEL SAARINEN, EMINENT ARCHITECT, WILL PLAN FOR FESTIVAL'S DEVELOPMENT

Bloomfield Hills (Mich.) Resident, Known Internationally for Buildings and City Planning, To Design Musical Pavilion at "Tanglewood," and Entire Development of Property Given Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks

Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect for the building to be erected at "Tanglewood," 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent home for the Festival. This announcement was made to members of the advisory committee meeting with the president, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith in Stockbridge today.

"Tanglewod," is where Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, where he wrote "The Wonder Book," and first told his "Tanglewood Tales."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are, Aug. 5, 7 and 8; Aug. 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the Festival last summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 States and Canada.

Architect for Whole Development

Mr. Saarinen will be the architect for the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood including the musical pavilion to seat 5000 persons. It is hoped to make a start on construction of the pavilion this year, but completion is not planned until 1938.

Born in Helsingfors, Finland, in 1873, Mr. Saarinen was graduated in 1897 from the Institute Polytechnic in Helsingfors. For 11 years he was associated with Herman Cossellius and Armas Lindgren whose most prominent work was the National Museum at Helsingfors.

Designed Many Buildings

Since 1907, Mr. Saarinen has worked alone and has designed the following more remarkable buildings: Railway station at Helsingfors; Town Hall in Joensuu, Finland; Town Hall at Lahti, Finland; the private gallery, Keirkner, Helsingfors; Estobank, Reval, Estonia.

Since 1925, Mr. Saarinen has resided at Cranbrook, Bloomfield, Hills, Mich., where he designed the Cranbrook School for Boys, the Kingswood School for Girls, the Cranbrook Academy of Art of which he is the director and he is now developing the Cranbrook Institute of Science Building. The Academy of Art is a graduate school with a small limited enrollment.

Friend of Milles

Next door to Mr. Saarinen, lives his friend and associate, Karl Milles, famous sculptor.

In international competitions Mr. Saarinen has figured prominently, winning first prizes for city planning for Reval-Estonia and Gewerbovereinshaus, Riga, Latvia; second prizes in city planning for Yas Camberra, Australia, and the Tribune Building at Chicago, Ill.

Expert City Planner

To Budapest, Hungary, and Revel, Estonia, Mr. Saarinen was asked as expert of city planning; to Paris as a member of the jury for the architectural competition at the Olympiad in 1924; and for the same reason to Los Angeles in 1932; to Yas Camberra, Australia, as jury member of the competition for a Parliament house; to Bergen, Norway, as jury member of the city planning competition; and to Madrid, Spain, and Rio Janeiro, Brazil, as a jury member of the international competition for the Columbus memorial light tower at Santo Domingo.

ELIEL SAARINEN
Retained by Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc.

Holds Gold Medal

Mr. Saarinen is vice president of the International City Planning Conferences, holds the gold medal of the Architectural League of New York. He is honorary professor, honored by the Finnish Government; commander, Class 1 of Finland's White Rose Order, honorary doctor of philosophy of the University of Helsingfors, honorary doctor of technology of the Technical University of Finland, honorary doctor of engineering of the University of Karlsruhe, Germany; honorary doctor of architecture and city planning of the University of Michigan, member of the Finnish Academy of Art, the Imperial Academy of Art in St. Petersburg, Russia; the Royal Academy of Art in Stockholm, Sweden; honorary member of the Architects Society of Finland, honorary member of the Central Institute of Architects in Brazil, of the Architects Society of Uruguay, Detroit Chapter of the American Institute of Architects, the Michigan Society of Architects, honorary corresponding member of the Royal Institute of British Architects, corresponding member of the Royal Society of Arts and Crafts in Budapest, Hungary, Der Deutsche Werkbund, Germany and Der Zentralvereinigung der Architeckten Oesterreichs, Vienna, Austria.

MONTREAL, CAN.
GAZETTE

APR 17 193

Finnish University Chorus To Make North American Tour

New York, April 16.—The Chorus of the University of Helsinki, Finland, composed of fifty male singers, will make an American tour next season, appearing first with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, on December 31 and January 1 in Boston and in New York on January 6.

This Chorus, known in Finland as the "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat," abbreviated "Y.L.", was founded in 1883. From its very beginning the principal aim of the founders was the creation of Finnish choral music and they have contributed largely to raising the standards of the Finnish choral singing to its present high level. Prof. Heikki Klemetti was its first conductor and remained with the organization for 25 years. The chorus is now conducted by Dr. Martti Turunen who has occupied the position for the last six years.

During its existence of over fifty years the position of the Y.L. Chorus in the musical life of Finland is manifested in the fact that many Finnish composers have written and dedicated music for male chorus to the unit. Jean Sibelius, who is an honorary memeber of the chorus, has composed all of his most famous male choral music for this organization. On the forthcoming tour the programme will be devoted exclusively to the music of the Finnish composers.

The Y.L. Chorus has given concerts in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary and Italy.

The organization will visit this continent under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Musical Council, Marshall Bartholomew, president, which last year presented the Budapest University Chorus and a committee of prominent Finnish-American citizens. The honorary sponsors in Finland are headed by Kyosti Kallio, President of Finland; Rudolf Holsti, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Jean Sibelius, the distinguished composer, K. A. Brotherus, president of the University of Helsinki, Georg Schneevoigt, conductor of the Helsinki Municipal Orchestra, Selim Palmgren, composer, and many important members of the Finnish Ministry of State, newspaper editors and others of prominent civic positions.

In North America the sponsoring group is headed by His Excellency, Eero Jarnefelt, Minister of Finland at Washington, D.C.; K. F. Altio, Consul General of Finland in New York; the consuls of Finland located in Philadelphia, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Duluth, Toronto and Montreal; and is further composed of such outstanding musical names as Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Dr. Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick Stock, Werner Janssen, etc.; also Dr. John H. Finley, Olin Downes, William J. Henderson, Professor Harry Rogers Pratt of the University of Virginia, professor Eugene Van Cleef of the Ohio State University, Hon. Oscar J. Larson, and many others.

The American tour will be under the direction of Richard Copley of New York.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 18 1937

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S RECEPTION APRIL 26

Invitations have been extended by Brown University and Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a reception and tea in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The affair will be held at a preview of original drawings, by Gerome Brush, of members of the Boston Symphony, at Faunce House Art Gallery, Monday afternoon, April 26, from 4:30 to 6 o'clock.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER

APR 17 1937

APPOINT ARCHITECT TO PLAN THEATRE FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS

A meeting of the sub-chairmen of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival was held yesterday afternoon at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson in Glendale, Mass., near Stockbridge.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, presided. Membership reports, by towns showing already a splendid number of subscribers for this year's concerts, were read by Mrs. George Edmund, of Pittsfield, Mass., vice president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced reports were supplemented by those of the many sub-chairmen present.

At Miss Robinson Smith' request, George Edmund, of Pittsfield, a member of the Board of Trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, announced appointment of Eliel Saarmen, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., as architect for the building which is to be erected at "Tanglewood," the estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, generously given for the concerts of the Festival. Eliel Saarmen, a native of Finland, is an internationally known architect, who has designed many noted buildings in this country and in his native Finland. He is a personal friend of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the concert.

Details of the programs to be presented at this year's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, were discussed, and also transportation facitilities for the accomodation of those living some distance from Stockbridge.

Great enthusiasm prevailed throughout the entire meeting. At the close of the meeting tea was served.

Sub-chairmen were present from Lee, Lenox, Stockbridge, South Egremont, Pittsfield and Richmond, Mass., while this section of Columbia county was represented by Mrs. O. H. Bradley and Gerald S. Bliss, of this city, and James E. Leath, of Kinderhook.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

APR 17 1937

SUB-CHAIRMEN OF BERKSHIRE SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL MEET

A meeting of the sub-chairmen of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival was held yesterday afternoon at the home of Miss Gertrude Robinson in Glendale, Mass., near Stockbridge.

Miss Robinson Smith, president of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, presided. Membership reports, by towns, showing already a splendid number of subscribers for this year's concerts, were read by Mrs George Edmund, of Pittsfield, Mass., vice president of the Eerkshire Symphonic Festival, announce-reports were supplemented by those of the many sub-chairmen present.

At Miss Robinson Smith's request, George Edmund, of Pittsfield, a member of the Board of Trustees of the Berkshire Syfphonic Festival, announced appointment of Eliel Saarmen, of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., as architect for the building which is to be erected at "Tanglewood," the estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, generously given for the concerts of the Festival. Eliel Saarmen, a native of Finland, is an internationally known architect, who has designed many noted buildings in this country and in his native Finland. He is a personal friend of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, the conductor of the concerts.

Details of the programs to be presented at this year's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky, were discussed, and also transportation facilities for the accomodation of those living some distance from Stockbridge.

Great enthusiasm prevailed throughout the entire meeting. At the close of the meeting tea was served.

Sub-chairmen were present from Lee Lenox, Stockbridge, South Egremont Pittsfield and Richmond, Mass., while this section of Columbia county was represented by Mrs O. H. Bradley and Gerald S. Bliss, of this city, and James E. Leath, of Kinderhook.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 18 1937

Boston Symphony Will End Series Here Tuesday Night

University Glee Club, with Hartford Singers, Gives Its Last Program of Season Friday.—Providence Symphony in First "Pop" Concert Tonight

TWO more concert series close this week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fifth and final visit of the season Tuesday night, and Friday night the University Glee Club will appear in a joint concert with the Choral Club of Hartford. Both events will take place in the Metropolitan Theatre. The week's musical bill opens tonight with a "Pop" concert by the Providence Symphony Orchestra in Rhode Island Auditorium.

This is an experiment in putting on a concert after the pattern of the Boston "Pops" and if there is sufficient response there will be more of the same. Those who wish to may sit at tables and be served refreshments. The music will be of the lighter variety.

Tomorrow night, in Churchill House, at 8:30 o'clock, Gertrude Joseffy-Chase, pianist, and Edwin Stuntzner, violoncellist, will give a joint recital. James Gray will be accompanist for Mr. Stuntzner.

Thursday night the Brown University Glee Club will give its last concert of the season on the campus in Faunce House Theatre at 8 o'clock.

◈ ◈ ◈

Boston Symphony

At the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock, Dr. Koussevitzky will lead the Boston Symphony through Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony and Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela." The latter is one of a cycle of tone pomes which Sibelius based on the exploits of Lemminkainen in the Finnish saga, the "Kalevala." It tells of the descent of the hero into the underworld to shoot a swan which glides upon the waters of the river which encircle it.

The solo part on the English horn will be played by the orchestra's virtuoso on that instrument, Louis Speyer. Mendelssohn called his symphony the Italian because he composed it during a visit to that country and was much impressed by the sights and sounds new to him. The finale is built on the rhythms of the saltarello. The program follows:

Symphony in A-major, "Italian," opus 90 .... Mendelssohn
- I. Allegro vivace
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Con moto moderato
- IV. Saltarello: presto

"The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the "Kalevala," opus 22, No. 3 Sibelius
(English horn solo, Louis Speyer)

Symphony No. 4, in F-minor, opus 36 Tschaikowski
- I. Andante sostenuto. Moderato con anima in movimento di Valse
- II. Andantino in modo de canzona
- III Scherzo pizzicato ostinato: Allegro
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

APR 1[illegible] 193[illegible]

Saarinen Named to Build Estate

Eliel Saarinen, president of the Cranbrook Academy of Art and an internationally recognized architect, has been chosen by the trustees of the Berkshire Symphony Festival as architect for the development of Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, it was announced Saturday. The estate has been given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the festival.

The orchestra is to give six concerts on the estate this summer, under direction of its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

Included in the proposed development is a musical pavilion to seat 5,000 persons. Completion of the development is scheduled for next year.

Saarinen has been president of the Cranbrook Academy of Art since 1932.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 18 1937

Beethoven's Eighth Now in New Pressing

Is Spirited Rendition by Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony.

LEADING the list of recent Victor releases is a recording of the Eighth Beethoven symphony by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The interpretation is spirited, the tempi high, yet the grateful little work does not lose its general character of mellowness and restraint. The string tone of the Boston orchestra is famous. Here are numerous opportunities to study and enjoy the miraculous beauty of its woodwinds. The first such opportunity comes when these admirably played instruments sing the eloquent contrasting phrase of the opening theme.

The name of Fritz Kreisler dominates another Victor album. The Kreisler string quartet, led by the redoubtable first violin of Fritz Kreisler, records the Kreisler A minor quartet. This is attractive music, with a quiet luster about it. The melodic and harmonic schemes are interesting without being alarmingly modern. In this work Kreisler is content to be Kreisler, but on the eighth side [the quartet takes seven] the group records the same composer's Scherzo a la Dittersdorf. This serves as a brief reminder of the great violinist's incorrigible habit of writing in the style of earlier musicians, some of them fictitious. Dittersdorf, however, is not fictitious. He was a contemporary of Haydn, Mozart, and the early Beethoven.

◆

Of interest to antique instrument enthusiasts is Wanda Landowska's playing of the Bach Italian concerto on the harpsichord. Her sense of classical style and her immense technical equipment produce on this instrument what is probably authentic Bach. However, our ear has been partially spoiled by continuous hearing of the Bach harpsichord works on the modern piano, and we are likely to find the elder instrument a little austere in comparison to the rich glow of the younger. This observation, however, applies in this case principally to the concerto's middle movement. On the fourth record face of this two-disc set are three short preludes and a fugue of Bach.

◆

Two excerpts from "Die Meistersinger,' "Dance of the Apprentices," and "Entrance of the Mastersingers" are available now in a recording by the Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting. Into a small compass the musicians compress several of the characteristics of this greatest comic opera in the literature. There are moods of whimsy, moments of tremendous majesty, an impression of everyday, diatonic honesty.

Attention should be called also to another recent Victor release—the A major Sonata of Faure, beautifully played by Jascha Heifetz, violinist, and Emanuel Bay, pianist.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
APR 18 1937

Music

RODZINSKI CONSERTS VERSATILI

Editor Reviews New York's Philharmonic-Symphony Season

By Winthrop Sargent
Universal Service Music Editor

NEW YORK, April 17.

With this afternoon's Carnegie Hall concert and broadcast, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony brings its season to a close. It is therefore time for that annual Sunday sermon of blame and praise in which the venerable institution's Winter doings are surveyed.

As Philharmonic seasons go, it has been an interesting, though not very well balanced one. The situation under which it was launched was, of course, extraordinary. The great Arturo Toscanini had resigned. A virtually unknown conductor, John Barbirolli, had stepped into his shoes for the first half of the season.

It is to Mr. Barbirolli's credit he could make a reasonably satisfactory showing under the circumstances. And that—no more, no less—was what he did.

Names Three Others

The guest composer-conductors provided a more or less sensational interlude. The greatest figure among them, Igor Stravinsky, was effective as a conductor only in his own works. The Messrs. Enesco of Rumania and Chavez of Mexico, on the other hand, had their claims to ability as orchestral leaders, though the first was his best in romantic, the second in modern scores.

Then came Artur Rodzinski of Poland and Cleveland, the most experienced and possibly the most gifted of the season's roster. Mr. Rodzinski also shone to better advantage in certain types of music than in others. But it can at least be said for his reign that it brought a new lease of life to the Philharmonic's programs.

Mr. Rodzinski not only introduced out-of-the-way compositions, but several of the works so introduced were important ones. Under his direction at least two memorable events of the symphonic season took place.

Refers to 'Elektra'

I refer to the concert performance of Richard Strauss great music drama, "Elektra," with Rosa Pauly in the title role and to the recent performance of Arthur Honegger's "King David," both of which were broadcast.

These memorable events, however, were somewhat late in arriving on the Philharmonic's schedule, and there were not any too many of them. It remained for the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, to do Liszt's "Faust" symphony and Mahler's "Das Lied Von Der Erde."

And it remained for the Philadelphians, under Eugene Ormandy, to bring us the two most notable premieres of the season the "First Symphonies" of Tykhon Khrennikov and William Walton.

Finds Record Spotty

Where the real bread and butter basis of the symphonic repertoire is concerned, the record has been somewhat spotty. Beethoven has been represented by five symphonies, Schubert and Schumann by only one apiece. Brahms was taken care of with three symphonies, two concertos and his "Haydn" variations.

The Sibelius record was bad. Only the first two of the great Finn's symphonies were heard. Liszt had a transcription.

"La Mer" and the "Nocturnes" spoke for Debussy. Strauss and Tchaikovsky made a fair showing. Not a single work by Bruckner or Mahler was given.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 18 1937

Pearl Hill Will Play Concert Friday Night

A limited number of invitation cards for the free concert in which Pearl Hill will be presented in the Colonial Room of the Bushnell Memorial are now available at the box office, and applications for these cards will be filled in the order in which they are received.

Miss Hill, widely known Hartford pianist and teacher, will play her second annual Bushnell recital Friday evening, starting at 8:15 o'clock. For some time she has been studying with J. M. Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and she has a varied background of concert experience.

Miss Hill's program includes works by the following composers: Brahms, Scarlatti, Beethoven, Bach, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Ravel and Debussy.

Another capacity audience is expected for this event which, like last season's concert, is available free to the music-loving public.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

APR [illegible] 1937

When Serge Kouscevitzky was first engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, they gossipped that he was "a prima donna conductor" who practiced before the mirror. Well, so did Johann Strauss the younger, the idol of Vienna's Volksgarten. Perhaps the now honored Doctor Koussevitzky was fully aware of the Strauss fascinations when he magically led "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltzes last Friday afternoon. We thrill to their melodies when the engaging and handsome Arthur Fiedler conducts them at the Pops, but with Koussevitzky, they were a resurrection of their period. His body yielded to every shade of the langour and the snap that makes up their perennial charm—an epitome of what the musical comedy, "The Great Waltz" over at the Opera House is communicating to a less elegant generation.

Little things happen at Symphony concerts that don't always appear in serious reviews of the programs. When Ruth Posselt made her first solo appearance on a Friday afternoon (honor greater than a Cambridge Thursday or a Boston Monday or Tuesday) the dignified gentleman from the podium patted her curly blonde head. Myra Hess, last Friday week, thanking and congratulating Bedetti who played the incidental 'cello solo in her Brahms concerto, Burgin the concertmeister and the conductor himself, became all tangled up with her floating Burne-Jones black chiffons in strings, piano and music racks. Dr. Koussevitzky firmly extricated her and brought her forward to be received by the adoring audience.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

APR [illegible] 1937

ELIEL SAARINEN of Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect for the building to be erected at "Tanglewood," 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the festival. Mr. Saarinen will be the architect for the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood, including the musical pavilion to seat 5,000 persons. Completion is not expected until 1938.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this Summer under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are August 5, 7 and 8 and August 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the Festival last Summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 States and Canada.

A VIOLIN and piano recital by pupils of Professor Antonin Honicky will be given at Odd Fellows' Hall, corner of State end Hawk Streets, May 3, at 8 p. m. The program, which will include duets, trios, quartets and quintets in addition to solos, is open to the public.

40

‘Ninth Symphony” Tomorrow Opens Quiet

Musical Editorial by Redfern Mason

Transc. The Passing of Arthur Foote Apr. 17/37

The "Gentle Elia" of American music has passed away, full of years, honored and beloved. Arthur Foote numbered his four score years and four; but in spirit he was young till the day of his death. Up to the last he attended the concerts of the Symphony, and he took as much pleasure in its performances in his ninth decade as he did in the eighties of last century when, with all the enthusiasm of his early manhood, he rejoiced in the enterprise to which Henry Lee Higginson had set his hand.

Arthur Foote was in every way an American musician. Born in Salem eighty-four years ago, all his study was done here in Boston, first at the New England Conservatory, with Stephen A. Emery, who taught him piano and harmony. With B. J. Lang he took up the organ, still continuing his work at the piano. Composition he studied with John Knowles Paine, the first professor of music that Harvard ever had.

There you have the simple outline of his musical studies; but, to understand the man, you must know his strength of purpose, his unwavering pertinacity. He had no yearnings to be a virtuoso; the dream of his life was to be a good musician, and that dream he realized, both as instrumentalist and as composer.

Carry yourself back in imagination to the early eighties when, thanks to the work of men like Carl Zerrahn, the criticisms of John Sullivan Dwight, and the visits of the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, Bostonians had begun to think of music, great music, as a necessary part of their daily life. The days of the "Big Four" were approaching, when Bostonians took piano lessons from Edward MacDowell, when Horatio Parker was organist at Trinity, and George W. Chadwick—they called him "Chad" and the name stuck—was also playing accompaniments to public worship. Into this august company young Foote was introduced. He even shared in some of those meetings when the quartet met and discussed one another's compositions and told the truth with a frankness that left no sting behind it.

But whereas MacDowell had studied with Raff in Germany, Parker had sat at the feet of Rheinberger, and Chadwick worked with Reinecke and Jadassohn, Foote's musicianship was of undiluted American origin. In that particular he was ahead of his generation. Today we are beginning to recognize that, whereas travel abroad is good for a musician who has learned his craft, going to Europe to study is running the risk of acquiring an un-American idiom.

Foote was appointed to the directorship of the Harvard Glee Club, a position which he held for a couple of years. Inspired by this work he turned his attention to choral work. He found inspiration in the poetry of Longfellow and left us such notable compositions as "The Skeleton in Armour," "The Wreck of the Hesperus" and the "Farewell of Hiawatha," fluent masculine writing. Here he had the inspiration of John Knowles Paine, who was the first to write a symphony and an oratorio which Americans would take seriously.

Inspired, in all likelihood, by the Boston Symphony, he turned his attention to writing for orchestra and composed a series of compositions several of which have become a recognized part of the Symphony's repertory. The "Omar Khayyam" Suite, a setting of the Francesca episode of the "Divina Commedia," an Orchestral Suite and a Serenade for Strings are among his best work in this kind.

Then there were compositions for the piano, including gavottes which were styled as "the best since Bach" and, most popular of all, songs which today have fallen into a most undeserved neglect. Time was when you could rarely open a program without coming across the "Irish Folk Song," "I'm wearing awa, Jean," "It was a lover and his lass," or "The Night has a thousand eyes."

But Arthur Foote had a trait which, in the eyes of the world, is a fault. He never blew his own trumpet; he was utterly unskilled in the art of crying up his own wares. Chadwick would try to stir him up. "When I want a work produced I go to Chicago and get Stock to do it," he would say. But Foote would shake his head. As William Arms Fisher says, "He made music for the joy and the love of it." The art of self-advertisement was something he was ashamed to learn.

When he stood up in old Chickering Hall to direct his chamber music, or when he played the piano in his Piano Quintet with the Kneisels, then he was happy. The toys of ambition had no fascination for him. To create something beautiful; to write a song that would express what was in the minds of the people; to do that was more to Arthur Foote than to make a fortune

Yet he could criticize at need, and the students whom he taught at the New England Conservatory were aware of it. But there was no venom in his words: he did not find fault, but gave fatherly counsel. Yet his judgment was sound, as the faculty council of the Conservatory well knew. He could sum up the merits and demerits of a student in a few pithy words that told the truth and did not hurt. Horatio Parker found fault with MacDowell's "Indian Suite." "It has no Indian blood in it," he exclaimed. Foote said nothing; but his silence suggested that, when he reached home, he might make a few significant remarks to his beloved daughter.

Loyalty was part of his nature. Perhaps he carried it to a Quixotic excess. The Ditsons asked him to edit a book of American songs for them. "I thank you for the honor you offer me," he said; "but I have never done any work editorially or offered my compositions to any publisher but Arthur P. Schmidt. I have been loyal to him from the beginning and I shall be loyal to him to the end."

Arthur Foote was the last of the Big Four; he was a gentle spirit; his eager smile will be an abiding presence with all who have known it. In him the Boston quietude and self-respect expressed itself alike in the man and his work. In him Van Wyck Brooks would find an authentic illustration of "The Flowering of New England."

SYMPHONY PERFORMS WORKS OF BRUCKNER AND BOSTON WRITERS

By Redfern Mason

There was a touch of melancholy about yesterday's concert of the Symphony, for Arthur Foote was no longer with us, unless indeed he revisited the glimpses of Symphony hall in the spirit, to hear his own "Night Piece" played in his memory.

Our generation may need to be reminded that Boston's old friend was a composer who did honor to his country. His music is consistently beautiful. In its excellence it is American, though Foote made no effort to give it a national "tang." He had a cultus of beauty and his "Night Piece," which is for flute and strings proved on what a solid basis of accomplishment that cultus was based. George Laurent played the flute solo; the strings sang their sweetest and the audience, touched but contented, listened with deep attention.

Another Bostonian figured on the program, Miss Mabel Daniels, whose prelude, "Deep Forest," was given a notable reading and, at the conclusion, the composer was greeted with a warm handshake by Serge Koussevitzky, while audience and orchestra applauded and applauded. Miss Daniels knows the validity of the Nietzschean dictum that "the Muses always move with light feet." For a few moments I thought the instruments were going to evoke the forest of Broceliande "where Merlin paid the monstrous debt"; but soon the sentiment developed into that of such a New England woodland as Emerson used to wander in and think thoughts which, like verbal mosaic, he wove into his essays. Miss Daniels' piece is a tonal reverie in which she tells us what Mother Nature means to her. In this vein she has something in common with Edward MacDowell; but she is a dryad of the forest, not a faun.

To lead up to these charming numbers we had Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, the one that extracted unwilling recognition from the boorish Hanslick, who could hear nothing in music but Brahms, hated Wagner and, to his sorrow, sat as a model for Beckmesser. It is a glorious symphony, with such "heavenly lengths" as Schumann admired in Schubert. It lasts for more than an hour, but it is so full of sheer loveliness that I fancy only a minority of the audience would have wished it shorter.

Here you have the genial Austrian villager brooding over life and nature, and putting his reactions into symphony form. But, though the form is correct enough, the spirit of the work is, in the main, hardly symphonic. What Brucker was concerned in was to record his own musings, and he does so in masterly fashion Here and there you get passages which tell you how much he loved Wagner and, for that reason, earned the dislike of the partisans of Brahms, who, by the way, was far from being a Brahmsite himself.

Bruckner loved the orchestra and our Boston strings plainly love him, for they put an ecstasy into the master's music that revealed them at their best, and I do not think the world can show any better. There are noble raptures for brass which, risking a contradiction in terms, may be called golden sonorities. That Adagio is an inspired composition and the Finale, ending in "the great C major of our life," is Olympian.

Last came the "Blue Danube," the greatest waltz ever written, a waltz which Brahms himself, never prodigal in praise of others, regretted he had not written. It set all those who have "dancing toes" tremulous to swing off into the waltz. The little strain which leads into the dance proper was so seductive that, in my mind's eye, I could almost see Pavlowa become imponderable and float off into the ether.

The audience thundered their plaudits. It calls for more than a musician to play the "Blue Danube." You must be a lover as well.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 17 1937

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
APR 23 1937

Symphony Committee Meets

The Spring meeting of the Brooklyn Committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday afternoon at the home of the executive chairman, Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, 40A Monroe Place.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, who is chairman of boxes for the coming season and who served in the same capacity this year, reported an exceptionally fine record for the 51st season just past. Mrs. Davenport reported that renewals for the coming 52d season are larger than any other year.

The Brooklyn committee along with the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is president, and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, sponsors the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn.

This Spring meeting was held in the interest of the coming season. There will be five concerts next year in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

Those present at the meeting included:

Mrs. Davenport, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Samuel Brown, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Miss Marion Terry, Mrs. Frank Parsons, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. Ernest Ashe, Mrs. Carroll L. Nichols, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Miss Weeks, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Frederick Johanns, Nelson Sprackling, Mrs. Otis S. Carroll, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Walter Truslow and Miss Irene Miles.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 21 1937

Enesco to Lead Symphony

Will Conduct During Barbirolli's Vacation in January

According to an announcement from the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, Georges Enesco will conduct the orchestra during the four weeks of John Barbirolli's midseason vacation next year, from Wednesday night, January 5, through Sunday afternoon, January 30. The Rumanian conductor-composer will double as conductor and violinist on Sunday afternoon, January 9 and 16, and Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, will be one of the soloists under his direction.

Mr. Enesco also will conduct concerts of the Cincinnati, Boston, Cleveland and Pittsburgh Orchestras next season. It was originally planned to have him conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony for a fortnight next winter, leaving the other two weeks to another composer-conductor.

Sharps and Flats

By PIERRE KEY

A group of music old-timers were discussing symphony orchestras. "They hold to higher levels than the major opera companies," said one whose experience and knowledge and judicial qualities give weight to his opinions. "And our country has the finest orchestras in the world. Europe's have gone off in quality since the World War."

"How about the Lepsic Gewandhaus," inquired another member of the group who hasn't forgotten orchestra history; "and Willem Mengelberg's Dutch Concertgebouw; and the Vienna Philharmonic?"

"All good orchestras," replied the earlier speaking expert, "but America's are better. Take the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony which rank one, two, three (and in that order, if you ask me) among the world's best. Besides, we have several others that can give cards and spades to the pick of Europe and then win."

So it ran on, with individual opinions differing on one orchestra thing and another; until finally someone mentioned conductors. Whereupon the lid came off, and there ensued a discussion so heated that I felt moved to open a window.

Who's a Conductor?

"Trouble with conductor's" observed the speaker who began the discussion. " is that comparatively few people know a real conductor from a false-alarm. Especially in our grand and glorious U. S. A. Too many people wield the authority in symphony orchestra circles whose decisions are reached with the naked eye."

"Naked eye?" queried a little man with a mild manner but who has a right to be heard.

"Well, with glasses," retorted the other, if it's a case of myopia. Give these people a well set-up chap who wears his clothes well and if he gets a bit of a build-up he is welcomed with open arms. Too bad, because conducting an orchestra is a major job. And not many who are leading our foremost orchestras are genuinely of first rank.

"A reasonable conducting talent plus very little experience will put a well known musician on the podium in this country in surroundings his abilities do not deserve. Our music woods are full of that variety and it's too bad.

"The place to test a conductor's knowledge and skill is in rehearsal. But again we come straight against another difficulty; very few persons are qualified to judge of a conductor's capacities."

Which is why we have so many arm-waving individuals asking consideration who often fail to know how to beat time.

Microphone Technique.

Ambitious young singers who go in for radio fear the microphone. Especially if they have large, well-bred voices. For there is always the blasting-bogy to disturb them when high notes have to be sounded.

To sing with the same technique that is employed in opera or on the concert platform does not always fit with broadcasting apparatus. Now and again an exception occurs, one such being Richard Bonelli who has just been engaged for another important "hour."

The Bonelli voice somehow takes kindly to the machine—or the machine to the Bonelli voice. "You don't have to bother with the control-dials," remarked a network engineer the other day, "when Bonelli sings. The needle is set at a given point, and there it stays . . . no matter how much voice Bonelli uses."

The same is equally true of a few other great singers, but only a few. For the most part the engineers watch the needle with a hawk's eye, ready to check any undue quantity of sound when that delicate pointer starts to dance like a steller ballerina.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 18 1937

WORKS OF ARTHUR FOOTE

By OLIN DOWNES

WHEN Arthur Foote came to his seventy-fifth birthday and was asked to write a sentiment he did so. He wrote, "may the next quarter of a century"—referring to the life of the world—"be as interesting as the last." He died on the ninth of this month, at the age of 84, of sudden pneumonia, which took him in the midst of customary activities. He had spent months of the Summer at the piano getting back into his fingers the Bach "Italian" concerto, and rememorizing certain compositions of Brahms, of which he was extremely fond; also in active correspondence, and the curious reading of the newspaper clippings with which friends and pupils kept him supplied—clippings from various parts of the world. He was also active in association with the American Guild of Organists, the Institute of Arts of Letters, and other honorable societies and institutions. He lived in a small white two-story house in Newton Center, a house decked out in the warm months with flowers. His studio contained books, music, mementoes, and a Chickering piano, not of recent vintage, but a beloved instrument to which he was deeply attached.

Arthur Foote was spare of build, of less than average height, with rough-hewn, energetic features. Only with his intimates was he disposed to many words,

Of an old New England family, born in Salem, Mass., in a house which he said was prototype of the one described by Joseph Hergesheimer in "Java Head," he was deeply religious, but could summon a hot temper, and express himself picturesquely. In other words, he could swear, artistically and without apology. He held strong views on all subjects, from George Gershwin to national and international politics! A New England Gentile and a church organist, he was also composer of one of the best modern services for the Jewish synagogue.

* * *

Think of the music Foote must have heard! Nevertheless, he remained singularly independent as a composer. Independence, quality, unfailing taste and fineness of workmanship characterized his pages. Because of his simplicity, sincerity and melodic frankness, they have stood up amazingly through the years and generations. His music never conspicuously changed in character, or owned to a special influence, which is more than can be said of perhaps any other of the leading American composers of Foote's generation.

Thus, MacDowell the tone-poet was plainly affected by Liszt and Raff. Chadwick, the most fertile of that group, was not oblivious or wholly independent, in his later days, of modern French and other derivations. These sat poorly upon a man whose sentiment and wit in his art, when naturally expressed, allied him with American writers like Thomas Bailey Aldrich and Mark Twain. Horatio Parker, whose "Hora Novissima" would, in itself, have entitled him to a lasting and high position in early American music, could have been an English organist.

Foote was the oldest member of this group. He was born in 1853, Chadwick in 1854, Parker in 1863. The New England line was continued by Henry Gilbert, 1868-1928, by Frederick S. Converse and Henry Hadley, both living, and both born in 1871. Foote lived to see and to watch with great interest, if not invariably with approval, the wholly different manifestations of a rising generation.

Foote was of fairly advanced age before such words as "radio," "propaganda" and the like were in use, and when a World War was an amusing fantasy of a young man named H. G. Wells. For all that, and to the very end, he was abreast of and keenly interested in everything. He stood, as we have indicated, singularly firm, singularly integrated, as a creative artist, and was never hesitant, on any musical question, of stating where he stood, but knew very well the fallibility of human opinion.

* * *

"Listen," he said once to a pupil, "did you ever hear Raff's 'Lenore' symphony? The whole world marveled at it, and I sat up all night in a train to be present at an early performance." He admired much in Richard Strauss, but remarked upon the "wrinkles" now visible upon the face of his music. He had profound respect and admiration for Ernest Bloch. Scriabine appeared to Foote as a cul-de-sac. He placed Sibelius above all other composers of this time. He admitted that Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps" communicated a fine shock, but said, "after the shock is over, what have you left?"

He didn't admit the necessity of Honegger's "Pacific 231," or of Mossoloff's factory piece. He was not enamored of the music, esthetic, or philosophy of Shostakovich. Some one insisted that Ravel was a great modern master. Foote pointed to the authenticity and superiority of Debussy. He cherished a deeper admiration for Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" than for any of his original works. He said these latter were good "hors d'oeuvres," which could be tasted with relish before the meal.

He was capable of genuine appreciation of the musical patois of the American Gershwin, but the same man who gave Gershwin his due was devoted to Arnold Dolmetsch. With his activities in the propagation of old music and instruments Foote kept in touch, long after Dolmetsch had returned to Europe from America and from Boston, where for some years he had his home. It was a far cry from the one realm to the other—from Broadway to the house—was it not the Longfellow house out at Cambridge?—where Dolmetsch and family would gather after dinner of an Autumn night. Dolmetsch, barefoot, with rolled-up trousers, would be bearded like the pard. His eyes blazed when he jumped at a false entrance of some instrumentalist of the family. He would denounce the culprit in the midst of the performance of an old English piece composed for a "chest of viols." Happy days!

With all this, Foote was not only American-born but American-trained. He was often in Europe, especially in England, in later years, but he never made the composer's grand tour. His colleagues finished their studies, usually in Germany. MacDowell affiliated himself with Raff; Chadwick with Jadahasson and Reinecke; Parker, in earlier days Chadwick's pupil, with Rheinberger of Munich, Converse with Chadwick and Rheinberger.

* * *

Foote cultivated his own garden, musically as horticulturally. In an astonishing manner he found things to say completely, simply, durably his own. His style did not change, but refined and strengthened. It was a remarkable demonstration of the power of sincerity and taste. His scores were never clogged with notes, nor was he tempted by a trick of some one else's style or an effect of some one else's instrumentation. Miss Rosalie Housman, the composer of this city and for many years his pupil, remembers well his counsels. He congratulated her, as he congratulated himself, upon her choice of a life work. He said: "The way is long and hard. It doesn't matter." He criticized severely her prosody in the first song she brought him. "Good diction is good diction; bad diction is malediction." He was the stanchest of friends and a firebrand of inspiration.

* * *

The moral of all this is clear. What is better than the moral is the quality of Arthur Foote's music. It is genuine, unmistakable art. We need not claim that Foote will figure in American music as significantly as Chadwick, of his generation, or, possibly, John Alden Carpenter, his junior. And yet—how will they all stand, as figures of a preliminary period in American composition, fifty years from now?

This is certain, as Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have shown repeatedly in late seasons, that such works as the Suite in E major for strings—which Foote himself considered one of his best-written scores—sound remarkably well, interesting and beautiful, in the midst of a perfectly modern program. This is accomplished without a harmony of Debussy or even Strauss, to say nothing of Stravinsky. The same thing holds true of the modest and perfectly charming "Night-Piece" for flute and orchestra, originally composed for the San Francisco Chamber Music Society, of which Elias Hecht was flutist and founder. The work was composed some time between 1911 and 1914 in its original form, and later orchestrated. In this form it stands, contained, assured, distinguished in its expression, as its composer stood through the years as man and artist.

* * *

Arthur Foote composed music in all forms—for church services, for men's and women's choruses, for his piano pupils, for festival organizations and the like, for orchestra. "The Irish Folksong" and "Lad o' the Leal" were among the most popular of the songs. They, and the "Road to Kew," are Celtic in sentiment—a sophisticate might say of some measures, sentimental. The orchestral suites, the choral works of the older type, "The Skeleton in Armor," the "Wreck of the Hesperus," the piano suite inspired by poems of the Rubaiyat; the piano quintet in C; two other piano suites and Five Poems, Op. 41; other songs, such as "The Lake of Innisfree," "Memnon," and duets, including "Songs from the Persian," and much organ music, represented him well.

He not only was without illusion as to the importance of his art, but refreshingly and excessively modest about it. He said he "didn't mind" the "Hesperus"; that "you could take your choice" of some of the organ music; that one of the songs was a "good umbrella song," which meant an unusually popular last group melody or one used as an encore.

* * *

There was no one like him, even among his colleagues, no one so simply and unaffectedly absorbed in his task. He was happy and proud that the returns of some of his songs went far toward the purchase of his house. He never coveted gain, or huge rewards, and lived economically, modestly, absorbed in work. There was something of Thoreau's philosophy about him, though he never indulged in a hut on Walden Pond, and loved to go to London, and always remembered the thrill of the opening season of Baireuth in 1876, and the first hearing of the Erda chords in "Siegfried."

He lived in music and cultivated it in every possible way with intense satisfaction. He respected this privilege, and was fortunate in his devotion. No doubt he bore his burdens, and knew bitterness, like all others. What honor he did his art! What benefit he conferred upon his fellow-man! How successful, how enviable, his lot!

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 21 1937

Dr. Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Ovation at Last of Season's Concerts Here.—Tchaikovsky Brings the Program to a Close in Thunderous Style

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra bade musical farewell to this city last night for the current season.

The cannily-contrived program ended with Tchaikovsky's symphony No. 4, and the symphony itself ended with one of the most glorious fortissimos anybody is ever likely to hear. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky swung—almost literally—from the instep and smacked the fascinated audience with everything but the celesta. It was beautiful, appalling.

The audience gave him and his men an ovation that lasted for minutes. We doubt whether any orchestra on earth can make a louder musical sound than this fortissimo was; anybody going to the theatre from now until about the first of August ought to be able to hear the echo of it.

The concert began mildly enough, with the Italian symphony of Mendelssohn, just the selection for a night in spring. The justly-famed strings were in finest form, playing gaily, lightly, with precise and exquisite rhythmic punctuation. The melodies were sounded with clarity and sweetness, and the light-hearted atmosphere of the movement was joyfully conveyed.

"The Seating of Late Arrivals"

This light-hearted atmosphere was dispelled by the turning on of the lights, at the end of the movement, and the seating of the late arrivals. It seems to us that whenever we are impolite enough to chide people for being late, twice as many are late the next time. At that rate the time will come when, if we are not late ourselves, we shall be able to hear the first symphony, or at least the first movement, quite alone, a sort of private concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That is certainly something to work for, and we mean to persist at it.

To get on with the Italian symphony, as the orchestra finally was permitted to do, the mood was deftly built up again. There was faultless work by the strings throughout, impossible agility among the basses, suave and lovely texture of violins, with the fine blending of woodwinds and brasses. This may not be music as deep as a well but it will serve most wonderfully, especially as played by this orchestra.

In contrast was the next work, the "Swan of Tuonela," by Sibelius. Whether anybody would imagine from this music, without being told, that it concerns a mythical swan on a mythical river is doubtful, but nobody could fail to sense that it is portentous and awful language. Knowing about the swan, one easily pictures the mournful majesty of it, and its song evokes the despair and loneliness of death. The difficult solo for English horn, so hypnotic in effect, was brilliantly executed by Louis Speyer. He was applauded warmly by audience, orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky and had to return several times.

After intermission, the Tchaikovsky. It is a symphony that Dr. Koussevitzky is famous for interpreting, and everybody was eager for it. The full orchestra is required for this lusty and lowering composition, and the full efforts of the orchestra. From the first ominous utterance of the horns it was apparent that this would be a rousing procedure. Moments came when entrances were not as accurate as is customary with the Boston orchestra, but there was always the glow and color and brilliance that stir the senses and the soul.

The Tremendous Crescendo

Everything worked toward that final tremendous crescendo. There were experimental fortes along the way, there was the rapid and delicate pizzicato of the scherzo, so wonderfully controlled and paced, there was the beauty of flute and oboe, a diminuendo wonderfully graduated in the bassoon, clashes of cymbals, and suddenly the last gigantic doom-stroke.

One was sorry for anybody who went to bed early any closer than Westerly. Alas that Madame von Meck could not have heard this, and Tchaikovsky. Maybe they did.

The program:

Mendelssohn.......Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90.
- I. Allegro vivace
- II. Andante con moto
- III. Con moto moderato
- IV. Saltarello: presto

Sibelius..."The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the "Kalevala," Op. 22, No. 3. (English Horn Solo: Louis Speyer)
Tchaikovsky.........Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.
- I. Andante sostenuto, Moderato con anima in movimento di Valse
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona
- III. Scherzo pizzicato ostinato: Allegro
- IV. Final: Allegro con fuoco.

Symphony Season Soon to Close

With the sixth concert of the Tuesday series next Tuesday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and the twenty-fourth pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its fifty-sixth season to a close under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky announces to open the program of the closing pair of concerts a repetition of the Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi. This symphony by a contemporary of Beethoven, famous in his day, was discovered about a hundred years after the composer's death and revised by Alfredo Casella. It had its first American performances by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the earlier part of the season. Ravel's Suite, "Mother Goose," will be upon the same program, and to close, the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

The program for the Tuesday afternoon concert rounds out a series of the principal composers of the nineteenth century. Serge Koussevitzky announces Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun"; Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela" (English Horn solo by Louis Speyer); and the same composer's "Finlandia." The final number will be Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Pops Open May 5

On Wednesday night, May 5th, close upon the close of the regular Boston Symphony season, the Pop concerts will take possession of Symphony Hall. This will be the 52nd season of the Pops, and Arthur Fiedler, whose talents have long come to be inseparably associated with the enduring popularity of the Pops, will again preside over an orchestra of eighty-five Symphony players. The Pops, despite their venerable past, remain the fashion of the hour and the resort of all who relish the best of music in the popular vein when superbly performed by full symphonic forces. Symphony Hall will be decorated in its summer garb, and the floor will as usual be occupied by tables at which refreshments are served.

Trans. Tay

Pop Patronesses

Trans.
Apr. 24/37

Mrs. George Russell Agassiz of Mt. Vernon street, Mrs. Alfred M. Tozzer and Mrs. Kenneth S. Usher of Cambridge are among the first to subscribe to "Radcliffe Night at the Pops," which occasion will fill Symphony Hall on Tuesday evening, May 11, with Boston music lovers and those interested in Radcliffe College as well. There will be the usual exciting atmosphere of a pop concert with flower girls roaming about the tables peddling their fragrant blossoms, and Arthur Fiedler has promised a program of interest to Radcliffe followers as well as to the enthusiasts of light pop concert music.

Other patronesses for the affair include Mrs. George W. Pierce, Miss Katherine Searle, Mrs. Kenneth B. Murdock, Miss Georgiana Ames, Mrs. George B. Bacon, Mrs. George Lincoln Dow, Mrs. Edward H. Hezlitt, Miss Anna E. Holman, under whose auspices this particular pops began, all of Cambridge.

Still more are Miss Constance G. Alexander, Mrs. Worth Hale, and Mrs. John R. Nichols of Wellesley; Mrs. D. Abott Ames of Wayland; Miss Elizabeth Burrage of Chestnut Hill; Mrs. Paul DeWitt Caskey, Miss Kate Griswold and Mrs. Raynor G. Wellington of Belmont; Miss Olive Simes of Chestnut street; Mrs. Joseph Lee, Miss Frances Lee, and Miss Mabel Daniels, whose composition, "Deep Forest," will be one of the features of the program, all of Boston; Mrs. John P. Chase of Canton; Mrs. Fred T. Field of Newton, Miss Margaret A. Fish and Mrs. Charles D. Maginnis of Brookline; Mrs. Harry F. Hartwell of Newton; Mrs. James A. Hutchinson of West Newton; Mrs. Philip N. Jones of Beach Bluff, whose daughter, Miss Helen Jones, will e one of the flower vendors; nd Miss Elizabeth Badlam ichols of Dorchester.

42

Her Apr

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 23d regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

d'Indy
Symphonic variations, "Istar," Op. 42
Franck
"Psyche borne away by the Zephyrs" from the Symphonic Poem, "Psyche"
Roussel .... Rapsodie Flamande
Berlioz ......Fantastic Symphony Op. 14A

Roussel's Flemish Rhapsody, which was given its first performance in the United States yesterday afternoon, continues by and large in the vein of high spirits so successfully followed in the Fourth Symphony. The music is not witty or slyly ironic, in the manner of other French composers such as Poulenc and Ibert. There is nothing approaching parody in the melodies in the Rhapsody that are at times boisterously merry. The gaiety is inherent in the music as it unfolds and flows as naturally as sorrow yields to laughter or any mood to another.

The Rhapsody is extraordinarily successful in capturing the popular (that is "of the people") feeling and without the usual business of exploiting folk tunes in the fashion of Percy Grainger. The melodies themselves may be folk tunes, as the program states, but they have been so passed through Roussel's creative imagination that they belong to the substance of the music and are not merely fitted to it with skill.

Much has been made of the jolly nature of the music, but it is interwoven with sadness, too. The almost sentimental slow section before the end is not out of place in the scheme, and there could be no more impressive introduction than those rumbling, sinister bass chords which lead up so adroitly to a roistering allegro. Roussel's intellectual grasp of the art of music has been no hindrance in catching the spirit of this earthy rhapsody. There is something pictorial about it that more than justifies the title. Yet it is first of all music and good music at that.

Berlioz's Symphony is also pictorial, though over so long a period that it can be a wearisome task to listen to it. If the listener is not in the mood and eager to enjoy the fever-heat of romanticism, the symphony will be so much dust and ashes to him. Its magnificent pages will not be enough, and he will mentally carp at its short-comings. He will reflect that it would be agreeable to have Massine's choreography enacted whenever the symphony is played. There has to be a deliberate mental process to enter into the spirit of Berlioz in this work. For us, in spite of the splendor of the orchestral playing and the sympathy of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, that spirit yesterday kept obstinately away.

Oddly enough in an all-French program, the Berlioz seemed the only work definitely non-Gallic, partly because the more lurid romanticism of the period was in no sense confined to France and partly because the Fantastic Symphony lacks those qualities of order and logic so dear to the French mind. The d'Indy variations and Roussel's Rhapsody, on the other hand, are not deficient in this respect. D'Indy's music has been unreasonably neglected of recent years. Such works, as "Istar," the symony on a mountain air and others, are well worth hearing. You do not need the exotic program for "Istar;" it is enough that here is beautiful music beautifully wrought. The brief excerpt from Franck's "Psyche" was also charming to hear. The performances throughout kept to the astoundingly high level of brilliance and taste that the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky have so firmly established.

There is an excellent exhibition of musical portraits, autographs and letters from the collection of Boaz r to be seen in Symphony Hall week. Yesterday's concert will peated tonight. Next week the concerts will offer a repetition Clementi's Symphony, heard er in the season; Ravel's her Goose" suite and Brahm's Symphony.

Olin Downes Pays Tribute to Foote

When Arthur Foote came to his seventy-fifth birthday and was asked to write a sentiment he did so. He wrote, "may the next quarter of a century"—referring to the life of the world—"be as interesting as the last." He died on the ninth of this month, at the age of eighty-four, of sudden pneumonia, which took him in the midst of customary activities. He had spent months of the summer at the piano getting back into his fingers the Bach "Italian" concerto, and rememorizing certain compositions of Brahms, of which he was extremely fond.

"Listen," he said once to a pupil, "did you ever hear Raff's 'Lenore' symphony? The whole world marveled at it, and I sat up all night in a train to be present at an early performance." He admired much in Richard Strauss, but remarked upon the "wrinkles" now visible upon the face of his music. He had profound respect and admiration for Ernest Bloch. Scriabine appeared to Foote as a cul-de-sac. He placed Sibelius above all other composers of this time. He admitted that Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps" communicated a fine shock, but said, "after the shock is over, what have you left?"

He didn't admit the necessity of Honegger's "Pacific 231," or of Mossoloff's factory piece. He was not enamored of the music, esthetic, or philosophy of Shostakovich. Some one insisted that Ravel was a great modern master. Foote pointed to the authenticity and superiority of Debussy. He cherished a deeper admiration for Ravel's orchestration of Mussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exposition" than for any of his original works. He said these latter were good "hors d'oeuvres," which could be tasted with relish before the meal.

He was capable of genuine appreciation of the musical patois of the American Gershwin, but the same man who gave Gershwin his due was devoted to Arnold Dolmetsch. With his activities in the propagation of old music and instruments Foote kept in touch, long after Dolmetsch had returned to Europe from America and from Boston, where for some years he had his home. It was a far cry from the one realm to the other—from Broadway to the house—was it not the Longfellow house out at Cambridge?—where Dolmetsch and family would gather after dinner of an Autumn night. Dolmetsch, barefoot, with rolled-up trousers, would be bearded like the pard. His eyes blazed when he jumped at a false entrance of some instrumentalist o fthe family. He would denounce the culprit in the midst of the performance of an old English piece composed for a "chest of viols." Happy days!

Foote cultivated his own garden, musically as horticulturally. In an astonishing manner he found things to say completely, simply, durably his own. His style did not change, but refined and strengthened. It was a remarkable demonstration of the power of sincerity and taste. His scores were never clogged with notes, nor was he tempted by a trick of some one else's style or an effect of some one else's instrumentation. Miss Rosalie Housman, the composer of this city and for many years his pupil, remembers well his counsels. He congratulated her, as he congratulated himself, upon her choice of a life work. He said: "The way is long and hard. It doesn't matter." He criticized severely her prosody in the first song she brought him. "Good diction is good diction; bad diction is malediction." He was the stanchest of friends and a firebrand of inspiration.

FRENCH DAY ON LIST BY SYMPHONY

Post Apr. 23/37

4 Composers' Works Played at 23d Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Four composers of France shared the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, and to generally happy result. Beginning, chronologically speaking, with Berlioz and ending with Roussel, with Franck and d'Indy between, the four covered quite comprehensively the entire range of French symphonic music, from the time when it began to be worthy of the name down to our own day.

D'INDY'S "ISTAR"

It was d'Indy who actually began the afternoon with the "Istar" variations. His teacher Franck followed, with "Psyche Borne Away by Zephyrs," from the symphonic poem, "Psyche." Roussel's Flemish Rhapsody, new to this country, concluded the first half of the programme, and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," made the second.

We hear all too little of d'Indy's music nowadays, although as it happens, Mr. Goodrich and his Conservatory orchestra are giving us the "Summer Day on a Mountain," next Tuesday evening. D'Indy's more strikingly original compatriots, Debusse and Ravel, have too much eclipsed him. Less subtle and imaginative than the one, less brilliant and witty than the other, he was a sounder composer than either.

Tone of Rare Beauty

These astonishingly contrived variations reveal d'Indy at his best. There is a scholarship which does not obtrude; there is instrumentation which ravishes the ear; there is poetry, warmth and passion; in short, all that we desire in any music. The performance was worthy of the piece; no more could be asked.

Heard as a whole "Psyche," becomes cloying and monotonous, but the single excerpt of yesterday afternoon passed all too quickly. Coming after "Istar," it reminded us to what an extent d'Indy was indebted to his master. And again the ear was gladdened by orchestral coloring and orchestral tone of rare beauty.

In no disrespect to Roussel, who is always worth hearing, it may be suggested that the Flemish themes upon which his Rhapsody is based are of themselves so vital and stirring that no piece in which they are employed with any skill could miss fire, and Roussel is a composer of more than ordinary skill. The Rhapsody scored a distinct hit yesterday, at the end of a season in which new music, whether good or bad, has been at a premium.

Berlioz's Long Piece

And so from these composers, all of whom knew their business so well, to one who never quite mastered all of his tools but who for sheer originality and daring has had no peer in the entire art. That this flamingly romantic symphony should have been composed three years after the death of Beethoven is as remarkable as though a Model "T" Ford had been found in the tomb of Tutankhamen. But the Egyptian Ford would belong in a museum, not on the highway, and it has somtimes seemed that the place for the "Fantastic Symphony" today was the library rather than the concert hall.

The piece is too long by half; some of it is tawdry and some of it is twaddle. That yesterday's performance made it almost steadily endurable and often engrossing or exciting was one more tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to recreate familiar music, an ability which waxes with the years.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 25 1937

ELIEL SAARINEN of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., has been chosen by the trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival as architect of the building to be erected at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., given to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent home for the festival. Mr. Saarinen will be the architect of the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood, including a music pavilion seating 5,000. The trustees hope to start its construction this year, but it will not be completed until next season.

Globe MUSIC Apr. 24/37

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky's French program for the last pair but one of Boston Symphony concerts had seemed pleasant in prospect. As it turned out, upon a cold and disagreeable Friday afternoon, two hours of Gallic warmth were especially enjoyable. The week's novelty was the "Flemish Rhapsody" by Albert Roussel, performed for the first time in the United States. The list began with the "Istar" Variations of Vincent D'Indy, included one movement—"Psyche Borne Away by Zephyrs"—from the symphonic poem, "Psyche," by Franck, and ended with that grand example of French romanticism, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz.

The music of D'Indy, a fastidious craftsman, if a somewhat emotionally restrained composer, has been overly neglected in this city of late. The "Istar" Variations may not retain freshness so long as the "Summer Day on the Mountain" or the "Symphony on a Mountain Air;" indeed there was just a suspicion, yesterday, that the style now is a little overripe. Anyone who would let such a matter stand between him and the pleasure of D'Indy's beautiful orchestral texture would, however, be a carper.

D'Indy had a high conception of art; his mind was rugged, and he happily persisted in making plain the structural side of music, and the intellectual shape of his compositions as a whole. In a degree, this preoccupation compensated for his rigorous choice of material and expression. "Istar" represents an attractive side of his fancy. The performance was equally fascinating.

Roussel's "Flemish Rhapsody" was finished last July, performed in Brussels in December, and thereafter in Paris. It consists, in brief—acording to the program notes of Mr Burk—of a number of popular Flemish tunes. Roussel embellished these tunes in his own light manner, linked them together with transitional passages which he devised out of the melodies themselves, contrasted them effectively with a good proportion of counterpoint. From a rather turgid beginning, the piece makes lively progression to a brilliant conclusion.

Here are no "overtones," no "undertones," no psychological indwelling, no Parisian trifling, only healthy music for music's sake. An American student could, with requisite skill, approximate it by embellishing "America, the Beautiful," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Swanee River" and "Old Black Joe."

Four seasons ago, Dr Koussevitzky gave an electrifying presentation of Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," which has remained vividly in mind. He repeated his success yesterday, playing with essential bravura and deadly seriousness this romantic flight of a French composer whose imagination almost outstripped his amazing power of expression.

Difference of opinion now persists over the "Fantastic Symphony"; some profess to find it unlovely, others consider it old-fashioned. To be sure, it is old-fashioned, and could not possibly make the same impression today it did when new. As one listener of appallingly independent judgment observed of the second movement: "That's a pretty good waltz for a Frenchman." Going much further than that, the whole work is an excellent specimen of art created by a French mind fired by early 19th century romanticism. Liszt, years afterward, found an idea in the "Witches' Sabbath" for the "Mephistopheles" section of his "Faust" Symphony.

The effect of early 19th century romanticism upon modern audiences is partially dependent upon the unlimited verve and conviction with which such music must be performed. The presence of these qualities is one of the secrets of Dr Koussevitzky's reading.

The single movement from Franck's symphonic poem, sounding uncomfortably like "Les Aeolides" and the slow movement of the D minor Symphony, made little effect divorced from its context.

The Symphony concerts will end next week. Dr Koussevitzky will make his seasonal farewell with this program: Clementi: Symphony in D major; Ravel: "Mother Goose" Suite; Brahms: First Symphony.

C. W. D.

Monitor Apr 24

Symphony in French Program

The Arts in Boston

French composers supplied the program for the twenty-third pair of Boston Symphony concerts. The list was contrived perhaps to make up for an apparent neglect of the French school this year; only Franck, Satie, Debussy and Ravel from among them had been represented during the first 22 concerts. D'Indy's "Istar" Variations; "Psyche borne away by zephyrs," from Franck's symphonic poem, "Psyché"; Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande," and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz composed this week's list—a well-designed sequence, calculated to reveal various facets of the French genius.

The Roussel item was new to the United States. Arthur Hoerée, quoted in the program book, noted several Flemish popular songs in it. This Parisian critic also labored at some length to say something pleasant about the score. He satisfied us more of his resourcefulness than of the importance of the music. The themes borrowed from the Flemish folk are rather commonplace, and the composer has done little to make them more ingratiating. But his command of the orchestra helps the songs to leave a pleasant enough impression without rousing a desire to hear the work again.

The Franck contribution, a mere fragment, was exquisite. It might be a good idea to revive the rest of this suite, which has not been heard in Boston for 15 years. The "Istar" Variations were set before us at once brilliantly and sympathetically, with full understanding of the Gallic artistic virtues.

When the "Fantastic" Symphony was last performed at these concerts, we suggested that it needed a longer rest. It has now had a vacation of four and one half years, and it sounds much better. We may still, with cause, smile at the March to the Scaffold and at the Witches Sabbath; we may hide a yawn before the waltz is done. But we cannot withhold our admiration from the musical genius who created these themes, and conceived this structure and scored it. Dr. Koussevitzky read the score with insight and the orchestra lent its glorious tone and its amazing virtuosity to a splendid performance.

L. A. S.

POPS OPEN MAY 5

Lowell Tel. Apr 25/37

On Wednesday night, May 5th, close upon the close of the regular Boston Symphony season [illegible] concerts [illegible] possession of Symphony hall. This will be the 52nd [illegible] of the Pops and Arthur Fiedler, whose talents have long come to be inseparably associated with the enduring popularity of the Pops, will again preside over an orchestra of eighty-five Symphony players. The Pops, despite their venerable past, remain the fashion of the hour and the resort of all who relish the best of music in the popular vein superbly performed by full symphonic forces. Symphony hall will be decorated in its summer garb, and the floor will as usual be occupied by tables at which refreshments are served.

---

in the near future.

Brown University Honors Koussevitzky

PROVIDENCE, April 26—In honor of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a reception was held this afternoon in the Faunce House Art Gallery at Brown University. The event, which was of double significance, was under the joint auspices of the university, and the Providence division of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It constituted a finale to the recently concluded annual series of visits here by the famous group of musicians.

It also afforded the guests a preview of the two weeks' exhibition of 110 charcoal portraits of Koussevitzky and his men, drawn from life by the noted sculptor and artist, Gerome Brush. In the receiving line with the conductor were: Dr. Henry Merrit Wriston, president of Brown University; Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, chairman of the Providence group of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Edward A. Taft of Boston, a trustee of the orchestra, and general chairman of the "Friends."

In the World of Music

France Apr. 24/37

SYMPHONY IN FRENCH PROGRAM

By Redfern Mason

Yesterday's concert of the Symphony, the last but one of the subscription season, was devoted to French music. It began with the "Ishtar" Variations of Vincent d'Indy, gave us glimpses of Cesar Franck and Albert Roussel, and concluded melodramatically with the "Fantastic Symphony" of Hector Berlioz.

The French wood wind is the best in the world, as anyone may prove to his own satisfaction who will attend the concours of the Paris Conservatoire, and Vincent d'Indy uses it with an affectionate intimacy. For him flute and oboe, clarinet and fagotto have each an individuality as definite as a character in a drama, a character of many facets. Ishtar may be "the daughter of sin" but she is manifestly as alluring as the sons of Heaven found the daughters of men.

But I question whether many of the audience bothered to seek for a meaning in the music. Its beauty sufficed them. Indeed the wise read their program notes after the concert, not before it. Then they can note their own reactions and afterwards compare them with the testimony of the scholars.

The Cesar Franck number was a fragment of his "Psyche," the part in which she is borne away by the zephyrs. Cesar Franck was too good a Catholic to portray the Psyche of Apuleius. He metaphorically baptizes her and transforms her into a symbol which St. Augustine might have approved of, but which the ancient Romans would never have identified with the young lady who was made love to by Eros and badly treated by Aphrodite. He did something of the same kind with Satan in his "Beatitudes." The reader who is steeped in Latin literature has to know these things or the lovely music of the Belgian will perplex him sorely.

In the Roussel "Rapsodie" we heard a glorification of spirit of the embattled Belgians. Mr. Koussevitzky interpreted it with the fine impersonal justice that he brings to bear to the work of writers of all nations. He is no Chauvinist to plead the cause of Holy Russia at the expense of her enemies. "The music is the in the audience must have been thing," as Hamlet might have said, and the Belgians present thrilled by the interpretation which the orchestra gave of Roussel's work.

After the intermission came the Berlioz and, in a small way, it had a "success de scandale." People had all read about Henrietta Smithson, the beautiful Irish actress who was the idol of Paris. Young Berlioz saw her play Juliet and Ophelia and at once fell in love with her. After much pleading, delay and many tears she married him, and they lived a cat and dog life together. In vain Berlioz had protested his "inextinguishable love"; he got over it in a few months and contracted an equally "inextinguishable love" for another lady, and that lasted till a third candidate came on the scene.

Did Henrietta marry Berlioz because he wrote the Symphony? That is the question and the quidnuncs are agog with it. Of course it may be that a lady will be flattered if you dream her execution and, in fancy, see her welcomed in Hades; but it is rather difficult to believe it. To tell the truth the composition smacks of revenge and a letter which Berlioz wrote to his friend Ferrand confirms this idea. "I did not wish to avenge myself," he writes to a friend. "I pity her and despise her. She is an ordinary woman, endowed with an instinctive genius for expressing lacerations of the human soul which she has never felt, and incapable of conceiving a sentiment immense and noble like that with which I honored her."

The music is the product of great talent, which stops short of genius. The opening movement is the poorest, for Berlioz was weak in the matter of form. "He does not like the fugue because the fugue does not like him," said Cherubini and the remark applies to sonata form as well. There is grace in the Ball Scene, and "In the Fields" is a genuine pastorale. Yet all yesterday's audience did not like it, for about fifty people left the hall.

They made a mistake, for the last two scenes, theatrical and bombastic though they are, are notable examples of their genre. The lady is led to the scaffold and, when her head falls, there is a tremendous crash. Then comes the Witches Sabbat, and a man behind me observed that it was the first time in his life he had ever heard the "Dies irae" sound pleasant. If Berlioz had heard that remark, he would have gone into a frenzy and written blisteringly about the "canaille." It is Liszt before the time with a French accent. Yet one cannot but feel that Berlioz' figures are mannekins. The score is a brilliant make believe.

Next Friday we shall be able to sprinkle ourselves with the holy water of Brahms and relegate the "Fantastic Symphony" to the limbo of forgetfulness

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 24 1937

New Records

By AARON STEIN

The recording companies have been lavish this month, making available a choice of no less than two separate recordings of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. Victor released the album on its April list and the Columbia version came out as a special release this month. For Victor the symphony is played by the ~~Boston~~ Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Columbia performance is by Felix Weingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic.

Both sets are admirably recorded with nothing to choose between the very satisfactory record surfaces. Both furthermore are such performances as should evoke cheers if offered before a concert hall audience. Since a good modern recording of the merry and vigorous Eighth has long been needed, the two new versions present something like an embarrassment of riches.

In making a choice between the two there is little to go on but questions of individual taste. We happen to incline toward the Weingartner. He has a way with Beethoven, and that way seems especially effective in relation to the witty good humor of the Eighth Symphony. We have reasons for this preference, but there will be many who have as good reason for preferring the Koussevitzky reading.

The Vienna Philharmonic has its record of sounding like a tired and careless band, but for Felix Weingartner on these discs they did their best, and it is a best that is admirably faithful to both the conductor and the composer. They handle this chuckling and laughing music with grace, vitality and precision, keeping a beautifully delicate balance between the bright freedom of its moods and the neat shapeliness of its form.

The Koussevitzky treatment is brilliant, and the Bostonians show their customary responsiveness in living uy to the brilliance of their great conductor. The more monumental and vigorous finale they handle superbly, but the earlier parts of the work seem to us a bit overdone, slightly too portentuous in emphasis. We happen to believe that, in the Eighth, Beethoven went back to the gracious manners of an earlier style because what he had

---

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post. Apr. 25/37

Once Again, the First Brahms Symphony

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

When Deems Taylor was music critic of the New York World he was disturbed by the fact that the pianists were not agreed as to where the Symphonic Studies of Schumann should be placed upon a programme. "Some day," he added, "a pianist will come along and not play the Symphonic Studies at all, and there will be rioting in the streets." Some day a conductor will find some piece other than the First Symphony of Brahms with which to end a symphony season, and there will be a similar demonstration. Last Sunday this masterpiece was performing its time-honored function in New York when Mr. Rodzinsky led the season's last concert of the Philharmonic Symphony. This Friday afternoon and Saturday evening it will be in its expected place at the end of the programme when Dr. Koussevitzky brings to a close the 56th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following Wednesday evening the Pops, again directed by Arthur Fiedler, will begin their 52d season. Time marches on.

Besides the symphony of Brahms—which after all is as good a piece for the purpose as could be found, even though it would be a rare treat to hear it, let us say, in January or February—the Boston orchestra's final programme will include the D major Symphony of old Muzio Clementi as restored by Alfredo Casella, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to America this past winter, and the sophisticatedly innocent "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel. It was a happy thought to repeat the Clementi symphony, which was not altogether easy to evaluate at the first hearing. The idiom, suggestive of Cherubini and Spontini, even of Rossini, is not that which we have associated with symphonic composition, and there was considerable disparity between the actual effect of the music and the claims that have been made for it in certain quarters. Next week it will be in order to review the current season as a whole. For the moment an agreeable final concert, or pair of concerts, is in prospect.

* * * *

This week also brings an end to the Tuesday afternoon series, which has this season been devoted to music composed in the 19th century. Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" are combined in a programme which should lack neither warmth nor brilliance. . . . Almost a 19th century list is that which Wallace Goodrich and the orchestra of the New England Conservatory will offer at Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening. Besides the Violin Concerto of Brahms, in which Frances Brockman, concert-mistress of the orchestra, will be the soloist, this programme contains d'Indy's "Summer Day on the Mountain," composed just after the turn of the century, in 1905, and the second movement of the late Arthur Foote's Suite in D major which was first performed at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1906.

Music From The French

Adv. By Ruth Marsters Apr. 25/37
Music Editor

A CURIOUS assortment of personalities in music was presented by Dr. Koussevitzky in a program devoted to works of French composers at the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The contemporary work was Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande," Op. 56, one of the most recent productions of the composer, performed for the first time in the United States on the occasion of these concerts.

Essentially "well made" as befits the pen of this composer, it is said by M. Hoeree (whose criticism of the work is found in Mr. Burke's enlightening program notes) to be Roussel's self vindication of his Flemish origin.

* * *

IN THE "Rapsodie" Roussel has followed th method, not a little in use among artists of th day, of incorporating folk art into what finall is a highly stylized structure.

The Flemish folk themes on which the "Rapsodie" is built are thus distilled through Roussel' own idiom, with results that bespeak the individuality of the composer yet are strong with the flavo of purely racial characteristics.

The first part of the program was otherwis taken up with d'Indy's "Istar" Variations, an Cesar Franck's "Psyche Borne Away by Zephyrs from his Symphonic Poem, "Psyche."

The latter, though slight in length, and fa from being negligible, is poetry of the most exquisite substance.

The "Istar" Variations, in which the usua order is reversed and the theme unravelled from the most complex of its variations, in accordance with the idea of the piece which is the unveiling of "Istar", is, of course, likewise descriptive music of a high order.

The fact then that Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" was perhaps the necessary forerunner to other symphonic poems makes one more kindly disposed to it than one might otherwise be.

* * *

THE ELEMENT of daring originality in the work which stirred its first hearers cannot affect us as directly now. We are accustomed to orchestral sonorities as great, to instrumentations as brilliant, as we are to the use of the leit-motif and the symphonic poem.

The gratitude that we owe the composer of the "Fantastic Symphony" for his contributions to such later developments of the art of music cannot however prevent us from finding this particular work somewhat worn.

* * *

THE 56TH season of the Boston Symphon Orchestra will be brought to a close this week with the twenty-fourth pair of Friday and Saturday concerts and the last of the Tuesday afternoon series.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program of the last regular pair of concerts with a repetition of the Symphony in D by Clementi, revised by Alfredo Casella. Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Brahms' First Symphony in C minor will also be performed in this program.

For the Tuesday afternoon concert Dr. Koussevitzky has announced Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina"; Debussy's Prelude, "The Afternoon of a Faun."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 26 1937

CONCERTS LISTED IN BERKSHIRE FETE

Koussevitzky and Orchestra to Play Beethoven, Tchaikovsky, Mozart in First Week

The six programs to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, during the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be held at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., Aug. 5-15, will include three devoted respectively to works by Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms. The other lists will be made up of compositions ranging from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky, with Respighi, Ravel and Edward Burlingame Hill representing the contemporary field.

The festival will be distributed over two week-ends. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday, Aug. 5, 7, 8, and the second series will be given on the corresponding days of the following week.

During the first week the compositions to be performed include the Fifth and Sixth symphonies of Beethoven and his "Leonore" No. 3 overture; Mozart's symphony in E-flat; Ravel's second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and ballet music from "Rosamunde;" Respighi's "Pines of Rome," and the César Franck symphony.

Works for the second week include the First and Third symphonies and the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms; six Wagnerian excerpts, Haydn's symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh symphony of Sibelius and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade."

SIX CONCERTS ARRANGED FOR BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

First announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is made by Serge Koussevitzky.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned as concerts of special Summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge offer music from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken.

The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (Aug 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (Aug 12, 14, 15).

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs follow:

FIRST WEEK—Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

SECOND WEEK — Excerpts from "Tannhaeuser," "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal"; Brahms' First and Third Symphonies; his "Academic Festival". Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

Berkshire Festival Programs Detailed

The detailed programs for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky will play six concerts on the Tanglewood estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, reveal a few excursions into the field of contemporary music in addition to three separate lists devoted exclusively to the music of Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms respectively.

The dates of the concerts, as previously announced in two series, will be Thursday, Saturday and Sunday, Aug. 5, 7 and 8; and the same days of the following week, Aug. 12, 14 and 15. The complete list of works to be played summarizes in some detail the progress of symphonic music from the time of Mozart to our own day. The contemporary composers on the programs are Sibelius, Respighi, Ravel and Professor Edward Burlingame Hill of Harvard University.

Two movements of Professor Hill's Sinfonietta for string orchestra will be played on a day which the preliminary announcement does not specify. During the first week there will be a Beethoven program consisting of the Third "Leonore" Overture, the "Pastoral" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony; a program containing Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and a third including Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the ballet music from the same composer's "Rosamunde," Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and the Symphony by Franck.

The Wagner program of the second week will include excerpts from "Tannhaeuser," "Walkuere," "Siegfried," "Tristan and Isolde" and "Die Meistersinger." The Brahms program will contain the "Academic Festival" Overture and the First and Third Symphonies. The other program will consist of Haydn's Symphony in D Major (No. 104), the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

Post. Apr. 28

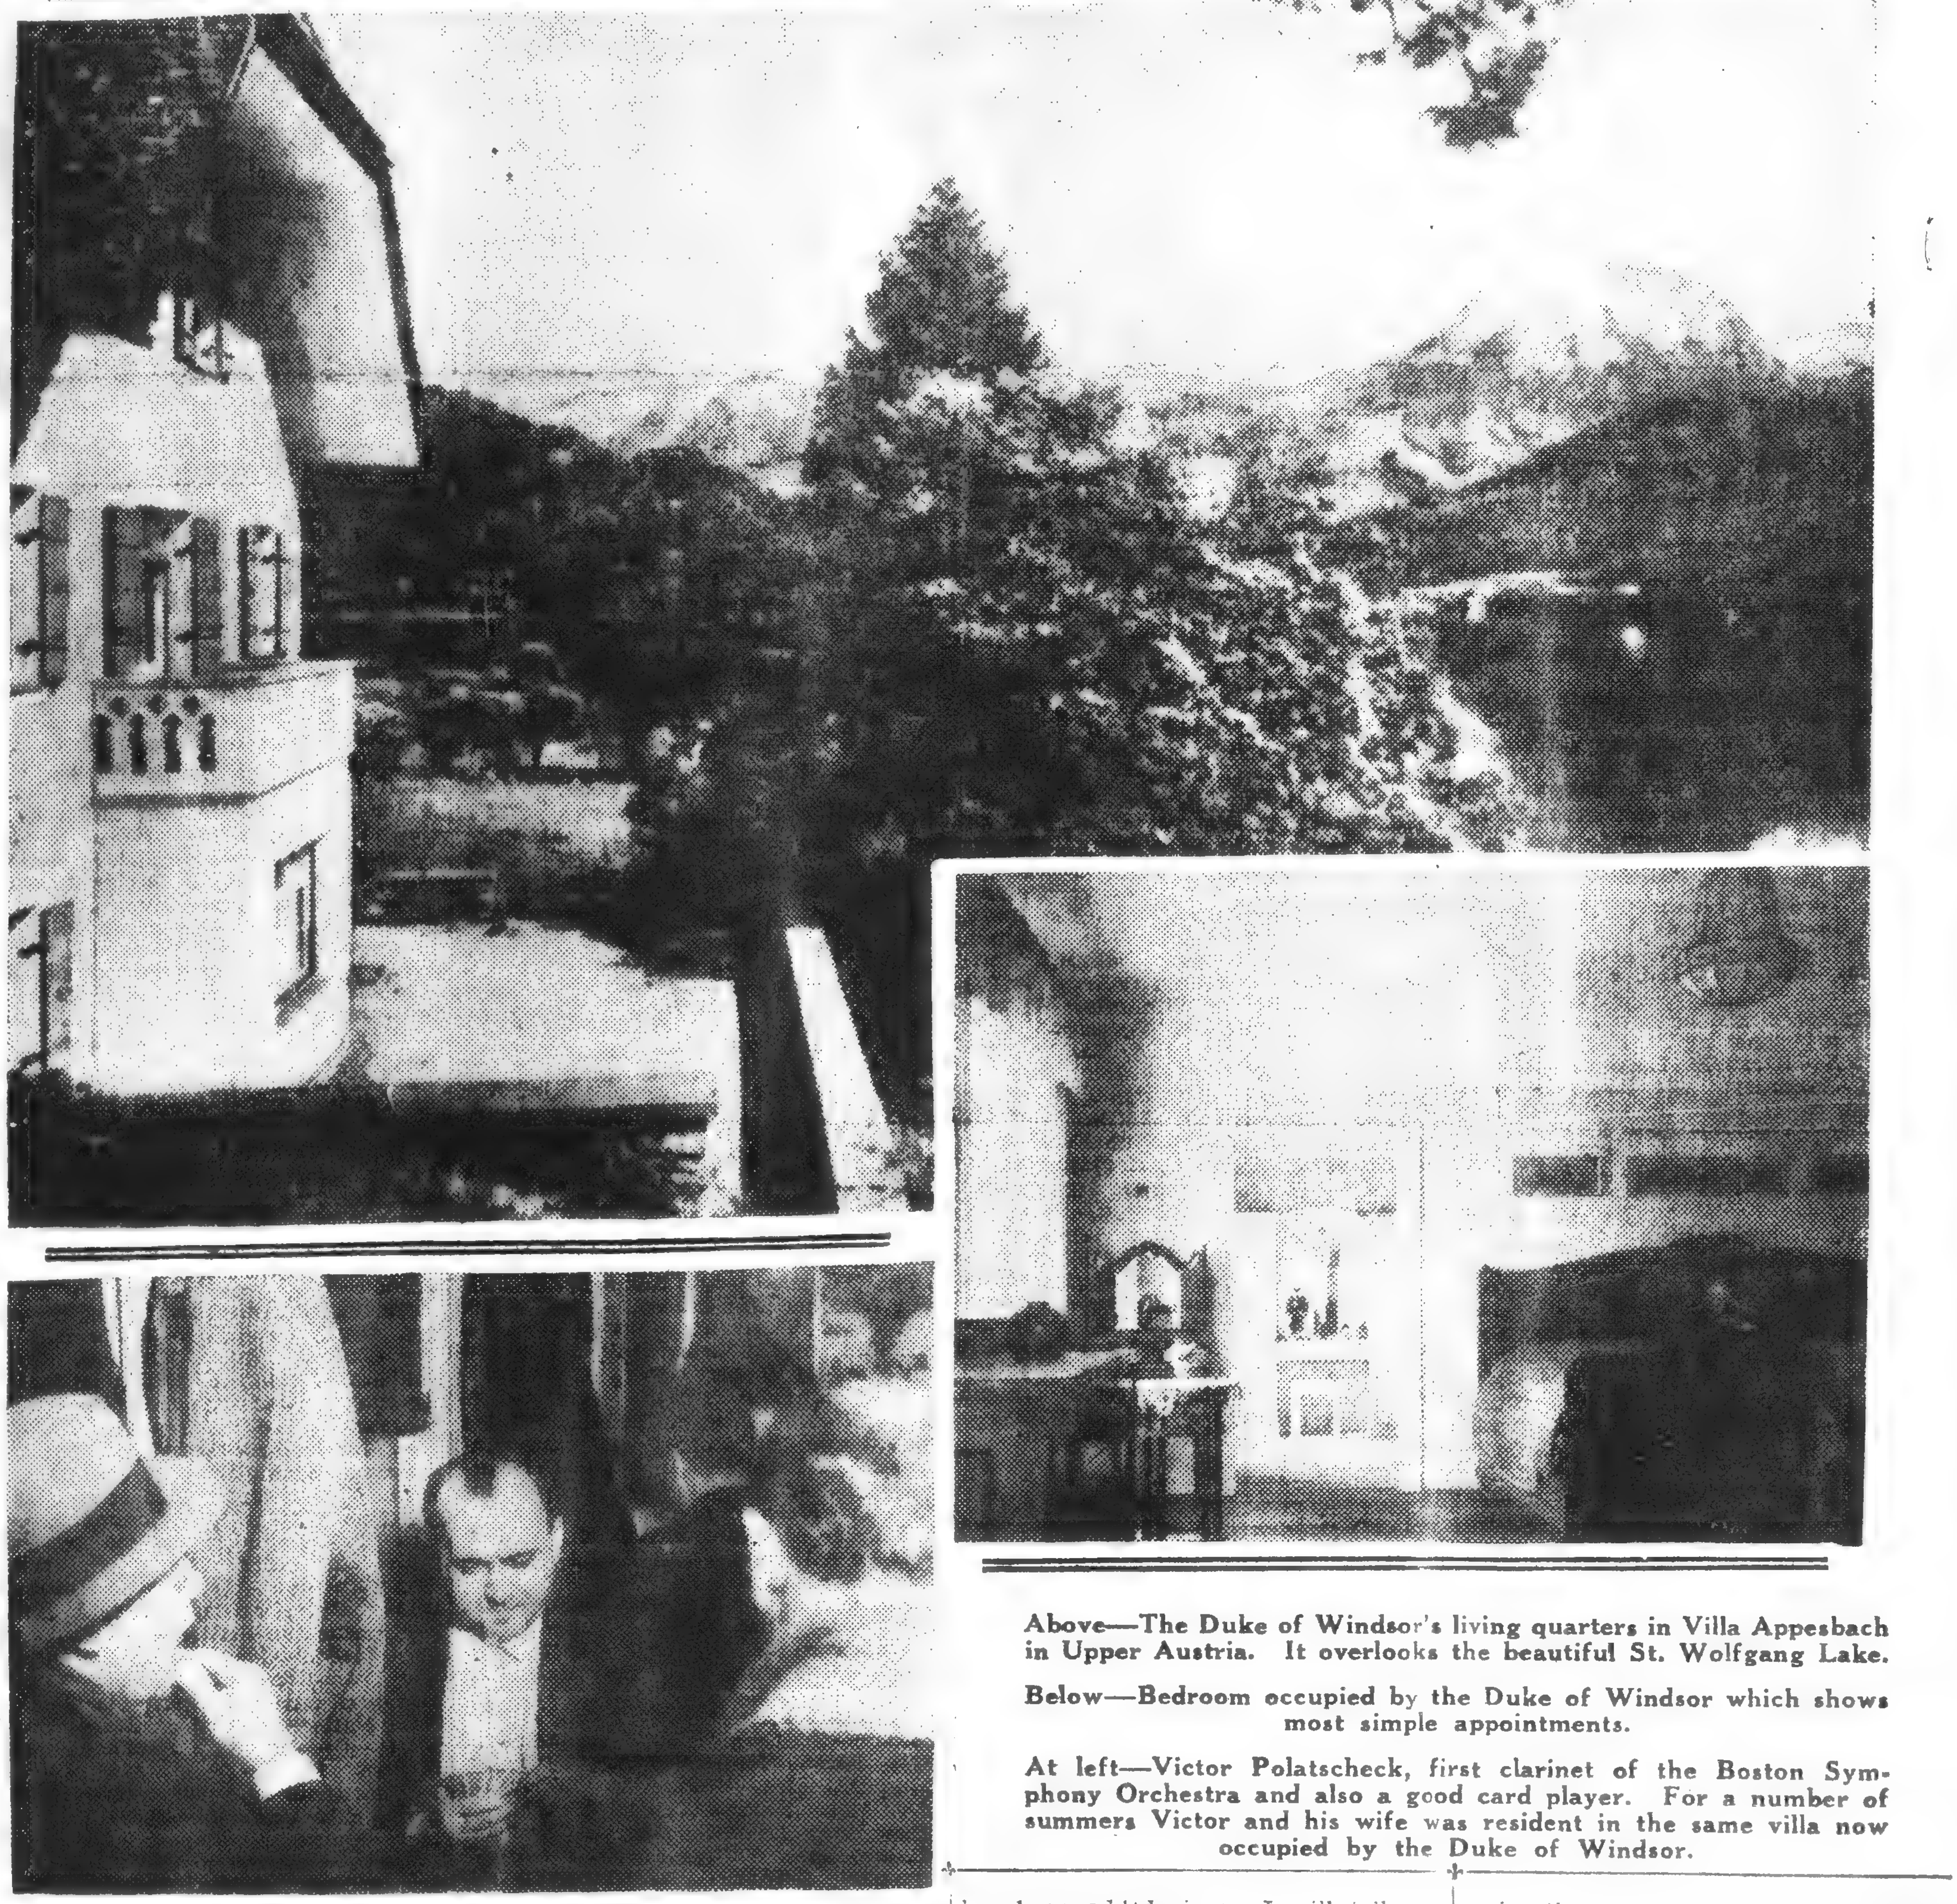
SYMPHONY IN FINAL TUESDAY

Best Music of 19th Century Performed

The Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony Concerts came to an end yesterday with a programme which included, in the order named, Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," two short tone-poems by Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia," and Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The pieces by Sibelius and Strauss were performed quite recently at the regular concerts, those of Moussorgsky and Debussy are in what may well be called the orchestra's active repertory. All of them were played as well yesterday as they would be anywhere in the world today.

This year, as has been repeatedly stated, the Tuesday concerts were given over to music composed during the 19th century. Seventeen composers were represented by 21 compositions, and these last ranged chronologically from Beethoven's Symphony of 1808 to Sibelius' "Finlandia" of 1899. The complete chronological table at the end of the programme book was both entertaining and instructive to read.

Hub Symphony Man's Villa Now Windsor's Palace



Above—The Duke of Windsor's living quarters in Villa Appesbach in Upper Austria. It overlooks the beautiful St. Wolfgang Lake.

Below—Bedroom occupied by the Duke of Windsor which shows most simple appointments.

At left—Victor Polatscheck, first clarinet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also a good card player. For a number of summers Victor and his wife was resident in the same villa now occupied by the Duke of Windsor.

BY ROBERT HUME

The former King of England is living in the former home of the first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

When news despatches applied adjectives such as "charming" to the Villa Appesbach, which the Duke of Windsor rented recently in upper Austria, a smile of agreement was registered by Victor Polatscheck.

"That's just what I thought, when I lived there myself," he told his colleagues in the intermission of a rehearsal under Serge Koussevitzky.

Meeting with some skepticism, the clarinetist appeared at the next rehearsal armed with a sheaf of photographs. They bore printed labels that tallied absolutely with the cabled descriptions of Windsor's new home. The labels were worded: "Villa Appesbach, on St. Wolfgang Lake, St. Wolfgang, Upper Austria."

In Royal Style

"Yes, my wife and I lived there for several summers," Mr. Polatscheck said to an inquiring reporter. "There were then 14 rooms in the house, and a wing has been added since. I will tell you something, though. We did not hire the whole house, but just one room. You see, it belonged to a Professor Hortner, a doctor of philosophy at the University of Vienna.

"He had it built very beautifully for himself. The depression comes, and his wife decides to take in boarders. She ran it very smoothly, with a small staff including a very fine cook, so that the place had a high reputation among tourists. That's why my wife and I went there to board, and we found everything so good that we returned.

"The grounds around the villa are not very large, but there is a tennis court on one side, and the views are very pretty. At the back you see the Austrian Alps. At the front is St. Wolfgang Lake, which is about seven miles long, with a winding shape. You can swim there, or go sailing, or fish for pike and whitefish. Very good golf links are about a mile away.

"The villa is about 30 miles from Salzburg, where Mozart was born. At the north end of the lake is St. Gilgen, the birthplace of the mother of Mozart. He composed his great G Minor symphony there.

"Most of the rooms in the villa are decorated and furnished in peasant style. Each has a very beautiful tile stove for heat or hot water. The place can be quite chilly.

"The Duke of Windsor's bedroom has a balcony overlooking the lake. This room is under the one I had. Even when I was at the villa, this room was not in peasant style like the other.

"I used to say that at the Villa Appesbach, we lived in royal style. You see, it was the truth!"

Trans Apr. 28/37

Pop Patrons

Time: eight-thirty on the evening of Thursday, May 6. Place: Symphony Hall. Characters: Arthur Fiedler and the symphony orchestra; Mario Braggiotti and Jacques Fray at their pianos; Paul Draper, whose dancing feet will tap over the stage; and, last and far from least, an audience of music lovers, which, according to reports from Mrs. Ernst Parsons of 172 Beacon street, chairman in charge of reservations, will fill the house.

To be brief, the Christopher Pops is rounding itself out into becoming one of the most interesting affairs of the spring season. Among those who have taken tables for the concert are Mrs. William Jason Mixter, and Mrs. Mixter will have many friends with her for she has reserved not only one table, but three. Mrs. Henry Pratt McKean has also taken three tables while Mrs. John B. Buttrick has reserved two tables. Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman will entertain a group of young people at the Pops while Mrs. Eben S. Draper and Mrs. Dunbar Lockwood are entertaining together.

Mrs. Henry V. Greenough has reserved two tables; Mrs. Henry Lyman will have a party of eight guests as will also Mrs. Clement S. Houghton. Mrs. Ralph Pope and her debutante daughter, Miss Lucy Pope, are intertaining a number of guests at two tables, while Mrs. W. B. Duncan Dana and her daughter, Miss Anstiss Dana, will be at the Pops especially interested in watching the dancing of Mr. Draper, who is their cousin.

Other patronesses for the evening are Mrs. John C. Rice, Mrs. James R. Torbert, Mrs. Bernard C. Weld, Mrs. William Constable, Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Charles E. Lee, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. Galen L. Stone, John Woodbury, Robert W. Maynard, Mrs. William Whitman Jr., Mrs. John W. Bartol, Mrs. J. Franklin McElwain and Mrs. Elwyn G. Preston.

Also Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson, Mrs. Samuel H. Pillsbury, Mrs. Livingston Davis, Mrs. Holden McGinley, Mrs. Richard H. Thompson, Mrs. David K. Horton, Mrs. Ralph Bradley, Mrs. John P. Chase, Mrs. Ward Thoron, Mrs. Charles F. Weld, Mrs. John H. Cunningham, Mrs. Edmund Sears Kelley, Mrs. Walworth Pierce, Mrs. Gardner Woodworth, Mrs. William E. Ladd, Mrs. Carl T. Keller, Mrs. Preston Upham, Mrs. Henry M. Shreve, Mrs. Frederick Lesh, Mrs. Walter H. Holbrook, Mrs. Philip L. Spalding, Mrs. Richard D. Fay, Mrs. Harold F. Mason, Mrs. Channing McG. Wells, Mrs. Robert W. Sayles, Mrs. George Lee, Mrs. Charles B. Blanchard, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Herbert F. Otis and Mrs. John L. Saltonstall.

Still more are Mrs. Charles H. Myers, Mrs. William Ellery, Mrs. Edwin P. Brown, Mrs. Harry Hayward, Mrs. Robert D. Farrington, Mrs. Atherton Loring Jr., Mrs. A. Francis Breed, Mrs. Otto F. Bradley, and Mrs. Theodore E. Brown.

Several young ladies have been added to the list of those who will sell programs, of which the purchaser of one particular one will be the owner of a new Ford after the concert. Among these newly recruited salesgirls are Miss Anne Motley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Motley of Milton, who is making her debut this season. Others are Miss Jane Hopkins of California, a niece of Mrs. Charles A. Proctor who is spending some time here in Boston and is attending the Garland School; Miss Constance Turner, Miss Eleanor Little, Miss Barbara Bassett, and Miss Peggy Stuart, the latter a composer of music for the Vincent Club show and the skating carnival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

APR 26 1937

Koussevitzky To Be Greeted Today At Reception and Tea in Providence

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, April 25.—A reception and tea will be given at Faunce House tomorrow afternoon jointly by Brown University and Providence friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to honor Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe is chairman of the reception committee, and in the receiving line with Dr. and Mme. Koussevitzky will be the president of Brown University, Mr. Henry Merritt Wriston and Mrs. Wriston, and Mr. Edward A. Taft, of Boston, chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Boston.

Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross will be in charge of tea and the assistants will include Mmes. John Nichols [illegible] Maurice Congdon, George Pierce Metcalf, Jesse H. Metcalf, S. Foster Hunt, Kenneth F. Wood, and Henry S. Lanpher.

Associates of Mrs. Sharpe on the committee are Mmes. Thomas H. West jr., Royal Little, Murray S. Danforth, Russell Grinnell, Elisha C. Mowry, William H. Edwards, John O. Waterman, John S. Cooke, Seeber Edwards, and William B. Greenough, and the Misses Emily Jiman, Margaret C. Mowry, Eleanor Mowry and Gertrude E. Lawson.

The reception will be followed by a preview of original drawings, by Gerome Brush, of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Elizabeth Nicholson White gave a musicale at her home this afternoon in honor of Mrs. William L. Mauran. Paul Dognereau, pianist, [illegible]

WISCONSIN RAPIDS, WIS.
TRIBUNE

APR [illegible] 193

Famous Violin, Cello to Be Heard Here

Remo Bolognini, violinist, who plays at the Congregational church with his brother Ennio, cellist, and Doriss Wittich, pianist, owns a $30,000 Guarnerius violin, a gift to him by a wealthy American music patron.

He has played this violin in solo appearances with the New York Philharmonic, Boston and Chicago Symphony orchestras, and it is with this instrument that he made his last European concert tour. Local music patrons will have the opportunity of hearing the violin in a blending of tone with that of an equally famous Italian cello played by his brother Ennio.

Ennio Bolognini handles the violincello like a toy, handling music of every type as easily, as musically as he plays a scale. Miss Wittich is a favorite artist in this city, her appearance with Gina Vanna in the popular February concert increasing the number of her admirers.

This final concert will climax the Civic Music association series here, which opened with a recital by Alec Templeton, blind English pianist. The concert will begin at 3 p. m. A few single admission tickets are still available.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 10 1937

Composer-Organist Dead in 85th Year

BOSTON, April 10 (AP)—Arthur William Foote, 84, of Newton, composer and organist, whose suite, "four character pieces after Omar Khayyam," was first performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1912, died yesterday in Massachusetts General Hospital. He was a native of Salem, Mass.

Her

Apr 28

MUSIC

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The final concert of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Moussorgsky..Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Debussy
Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun"
Sibelius..........."The Swan of Tuonela"
Sibelius...."Finlandia," Symphonic Poem
Strauss
"Thus Spake Zarathustra," Tone Poem

The Tuesday concerts are tactfully designed to appeal to conservative taste; they must neither harrow the ear with wild and shrieking discords nor stun it with long and difficult works. Yet all the music on yesterday's program was certainly at one time and in varying degrees considered radical; and Strauss's tone poem must have been thought abstruse. Now, however, these composers are listened to eagerly, their "revolutionary" ideas fall on receptive ears. Neither their harmony nor their form presents any hopeless problems to the listener. It is not hard to believe that Hindemith and Roussel, Berg and Prokofieff—to take names at random—will be appreciated as readily by a Tuesday audience in 1970.

Another point in general about yesterday's program was that all the works were representational, were written, that is, to a program of varying complexity. Moussorgsky, Debussy and Sibelius painted, with exquisite beauty, pictures of a passing mood. Strauss attempted in music a treatise on Nietzche's philosophy. It is the rare listener who pays studious attention to an elaborate program. If the program or the idea of conveying something more than musical emotion appealed to a composer and helped him create, that is all very well. When the music is familiar few people bother about consciously thinking of or reading the program. Even when music is not so well known a program is sometimes a doubtful aid to the imagination. Would not d'Indy's "Istar," played last Friday, sound as well without the story? Yet some music emphatically does demand a title and a poetic background.

Actually it was a splendid concert with which to end this series. "Finlandia" is on the noisy side, but it made a popular ending to the first half of the program after the quiet beauty of the first three pieces. "Zarathustra" is Strauss's most magnificent tone poem, and it is a marvellous vehicle to display the qualities of a first rate orchestra. In particular the Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitzky have made it their own by the brilliant performances of the last few years.

Moussorgsky's imaginative prelude would have sounded even better if the peaceful conclusion had not been interrupted by so much coughing. After all Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of the orchestra do not cough, though they may be strongly tempted to do so. Why should the audience not restrain itself? Mr. Speyer in the English horn solo in "The Swan of Tuonela" again covered himself with glory. His playing was thoroughly artistic, and the tone was ravishing. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations were in perfect sympathy with the descriptive character of the music.

Y, APRIL 28, 1937

What's Going

Tuesday Symphonies in Conclusion

Dr. Koussevitzky's excursion into the realm of symphonic music, composed in the nineteenth century, came to a climax yesterday afternoon with the final program of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This has been an illuminating sequence. It has led the patrons of these concerts through the period from 1808, the year in which Beethoven wrote the immortal Fifth Symphony, which appeared upon the first program of the season last November, to 1899, the date of "Finlandia" by Sibelius, which closed the first half of the program yesterday.

In addition to the usual informative notes, the program book also carried a chronological list (dated) of the nineteenth century music which has been performed at these concerts during the season; and, from a study of it one arrives at the conclusion that the composers listed were in possession of ripened powers at the moment of production. Schubert and Mendelssohn were of course the young men of the group, but proportionately each man was as mature as his colleagues who lived to a greater age. Thus, in addition to making a chronological selection, Dr. Koussevitzky assembled what might be termed a fairly representative group of orchestral works, a no inconsiderable achievement.

In addition to "Finlandia," Dr. Koussevitzky chose the Prelude to "Khovanstchina," by Moussorgsky, Prelude à l'Apres-midi d'un Faune," by Debussy, "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the "Kalevala," Op. 22, by Sibelius and the Tone Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," Op. 30 (Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche) by Richard Strauss. With the Moussorgsky opus Dr. Koussevitzky not only established a definite mood, but he also stirred once again the desire to hear this opera in its entirety, despite the measures reminiscent of the "Boris Godounoff" which preceded it.

Debussy's "Faune" continues to preserve the characteristic of perennial youth attributed to him and yesterday once again came to life in an exquisite bit of tone painting to which the deft performances of Messrs. Laurent and Gillet lent unusual charm. Orchestral perfection of a high order also marked the performance of "The Swan of Tuonela," with Mr. Speyer's superb performance of the solo for English Horn an outstanding item in a beautiful ensemble. To one listener, "Finlandia" seemed more theatrical than dramatic, but the Strauss opus was impressive and the conception, as a whole, led us to overlook the obviously less inspired portions of the work. In all, a rewarding conclusion to this series, another of which will open next autumn on October the 26th.

G. M. S.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Globe Apr 28/37

The Boston Symphony Orchestra bade farewell to the Tuesday subscribers yesterday afternoon. Completing his tour of the 19th Century—which era has furnished the music for this series—Dr Koussevitzky conducted a program which approached our own century as near as 1899, when Sibelius "Finlandia" was composed. The list contained another item by that Finnish master, "The Swan of Tuonela," music even better, in one sense, than "Finlandia." Otherwise there were the Prelude to Moussorgskys "Khovantschina," Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and for a grand and stirring goodby, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Richard Strauss.

There may be a tendency on the part of listeners who consider Sibelius only in terms of his symphonies, to deprecate "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia" as trifling lesser works. That attitude misses the point. "Finlandia," if grandiose, yet breathes racial ardor, and presents a ruggedness found in music of emotional depth. Had it not been hackneyed by so many performances year in and out on "popular" programs, it might sound even fresher than yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky's apostolic reading, brimming with intensity, has for one person restored the beauties of the piece. "The Swan of Tuonela" is marvelously imaginative, true music of the north. From the first measures a definite mood is established, and it is carried through to the end without the slightest diminution. The English horn solo was again played impeccably by Louis Speyer.

Debussy's fanciful tone-picture—for such it is—once more gave pleasure, both by its own inherent qualities and those of an excellent performance. Not precisely the same can be said of "Thus Spake Zarathustra," because the orchestra unaccountably played off pitch here and there. Nevertheless, the tremendous surge of Strauss' music invariably carries all before it. Here is a stupendous tonal conception, expressed by the technical resources of a man who probably was never excelled in his knowledge of orchestration. Here, too, is what may be inextinguishable vitality. What if Strauss' complete unrestraint does lay him open to the charge of "vulgarity?" Better that than pathetic mincing caused by fear of the slightest breach of "good taste."

Up in the second floor foyer of Symphony Hall is an exhibit of photographs, prints, composers' autographs and such memorabilia, from the collection of Boaz Piller, bass, Bassoonist of the orchestra. From a strictly musical point of view, this exhibition is the most interesting to be shown at Symphony Hall this season. It will remain on view through the final concerts of Friday and Saturday.

C. W. D.

In the World of Music

Trans

Koussevitzky Gives Notable Concert

apr. 28, 37

By Redfern Mason

If Anatole France had been at yesterday's concert of the Symphony, he would have added the occasion to his "adventures among masterpieces." For such it verily was and I can answer for two members of the audience who were grateful to Serge Koussevitzky for giving us a couple of hours of unalloyed pleasure.

In the first half of the program Russian, Finn and Frenchman elbowed one another in neighborly fashion. First came Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," a compasition brimming over with melody and all of it characteristically Russian. Chameleon-like he took his color from his environment, as indeed all great composers have done.

All the audience had to do was to adopt a receptive attitude and drink in the music. This they did, and their enjoyment was manifestly great.

From Moussorgsky we turned to Debussy and listened, with an attention that familiarity has not caused to wane, to that most exquisite pagan poem of our generation, "L'Apres midi d'un faune." By rights, of course, before listening to it, one should re-read Mallarme's poem. Not that one would hope to understand it. For Mallarme's verse is not so much a series of intellectual propositions as a mosaic of verbal tones, chosen for their sheer sonorous loveliness. Mallarme would build up an orthodox line and then eliminate every syllable save those that convey a certain aesthetic thrill.

Debussy's score follows, to a certain extent, the like procedure. With flute and reeds he evokes a mood purely pastoral into which he plunges a Nijinsky like figure enamoured of nymphs and drunk with the languid warmth of noon.

It has come home to the public, which cares little for partisans and prefers to follow its own preference, that Debussy's "Faun" is a masterpiece. Anatole France must have loved it. If you read his "Jardin d'Epicure," you will know the reason why. For it is not the paganism of Cicero and Tacitus, but that of the Greek Anthology. Read the poem of Meleager, in which he give to every poet a flower, and you will sense the same exotic languor.

From Debussy Mr. Koussevitzky turned to that patriot musician of the North, Jan Sibelius. He gave us the "Swan of Tuonela" and I am sure that everyone went home the happier for the lyric beauty of Louis Speyer's English horn. Its pearly tones distilled the nostalgia of the North, and Sibelius' music is what is called, sometimes in a spirit of depreciation, "map music." What should a musician do but sing in his mother tongue?

Then the "Finnlandia," and every listener with a patriot's heart in his bosom must have responded to the passionate outcry of the brass, like the roaring of a caged lion, with which this splendid work opens. The chorale, which follows, sung first by the wood wind, is the lament of a people enslaved. The emotions "relieve one another in squads," as d'Annunzio says of "Tristan," rising to a paean in praise of freedom. Grand music, and the audience sensed its meaning with the infallible instinct of people who hearken with their hearts.

After the intermission we had the "Also sprach Zarathustra" of Richard Strauss. It represents a chapter of the composer's life. Did he attempt to explain philosophy in music? Of course not, it cannot be done. What he did was to picture the moods of the philosopher as he faced the experiences of existence. When he greets the sun there is a glory of instruments thrilling as Brunnhilde's cry to the orb of day. When he uses the fugue to express his doubts of the power of the mind to solve the problems of life, he is not scorning science, as commentators have suggested, but trusting to instinct and intuition. Life is beautiful; but what it means, its final significance, is beyond his ken .So the composition ends in opposing tonalities. To Strauss may be applied the great line in which Tennyson apostrophizes Virgil:

"Thou majestic in thy sadness at the doubtful doom of human kind."

It was a beautiful concert, one of the best Mr. Koussevitzky has given us this season.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Honors Strauss' "Blue Danube"

Sunday Post - Apr. 4/37

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in "working togs," as he will look when rehearsing "By the Beautiful Blue Danube." (Insert.) Amusing caricature of Johann Strauss, composer of the famous "Blue Danube Waltz," from an old German book.

"A symphony orchestra programme would be over my head—a common, everyday piece like 'The Blue Danube Waltz' is about my limit."

Anyone subscribing to that sentiment is in for a very pleasant surprise, a flattering compliment to his taste.

"The Beautiful Blue Danube" has been placed on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening by its world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. A never-failing favorite at the Pops in their career of 52 years, this waltz of Johann Strauss, Jr., has been placed on a programme of the regular, "serious" season for the first time in their 56 years.

Why?

The Boston conductor wants to join the celebration which Vienna has been observing in honor of the 70th anniversary of the first performance of the waltz there, its native city. The leader and his 110 musicians love the piece—for more than just its dance spirit, too.

"Although it has not been the custom for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play 'The Blue Danube' on its regular programmes, I am very happy to break this custom, for once, this year," Mr. Koussevitzky said.

Musicians Love It

"'The Blue Danube' is truly a work of art. Johann Strauss undeniably was a genius, and all his waltzes show high artistic merit. If the general public specially loves 'The Blue Danube,' that is a compliment to the public as well as to Strauss.

"Musicians love this work because it is not only a superb waltz, but a most beautiful piece of composition, from the point of view of workmanship. It is admirably constructed. There is much art in the instrumentation. From a technical point of view, one does not think how the instruments could be used more beautifully.

"Unfortunately, 'The Blue Danube' has been made so common by innumerable, perhaps careless, performances, that its uncommon qualities are often lost sight of.

"The artistic achievement of Johann Strauss in 'The Blue Danube' is great enough to deserve the most careful study, and an exceptional performance with the best of orchestral facilities. That is what I hope to effect."

Strauss' Art Envied by Brahms

Some composers able to rise to sublime heights of inspiration, or to plumb profound depths of human feeling, through their compositions, have achieved this without commanding the art of instrumentation in its perfection. Such a great composer of serious music as Johannes Brahms is accused of "muddy" instrumentation. He lived in Austria at the same time as Johann Strauss, and rather envied his art of instrumentation. Brahms enjoyed nothing better than to hear Strauss waltzes—especially "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," played by Strauss' own orchestra, under "The Waltz King's" own conductorship, in a pleasant beer garden.

Writing to a friend, Brahms said:

"You must go to the Volksgarten on Friday evening, when Johann Strauss will conduct his waltzes. THERE is a master—such a master of the orchestra that one never loses a single tone of whatever instrument!"

When the pretty step-daughter of Strauss, Frau Alice von Meyszner-Strauss, asked the great Brahms to autograph her fan—a fad of those days—he set down the first bars of "By the Beautiful Blue Danube." Underneath, he wrote, "Alas, not by Johannes Brahms!"

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 8 - 1937

Music With Your Meals.

DINNER is being served. Dr. G. Archibald Presby's voice flows from the radio set in an adjoining room. Expounding modern music. Interpreting with pseudo-erudition, measured phrase and highbrow cant, as if he were spokesman for the Stokowsky or Koussevitzky band, the hottest hullabaloo out of Harlem. And a swell satire it is.

The boys belt out bughouse rhythm, swinging it so-so in a grand jam. Table tempo steps up. Steak begins to shake a shoulder. Salad catches the beat. Plain and pious bread, mother of life, begins to swing it. Knives and forks, quickening to Harlem hotcha, do to dinner what Mr. Astaire does to his feet when he pulls out all stops.

Bughouse rhythm ends. Flows on a bughouse "commercial." Something for that acidity. Alkalize the easy way. Two tablets after meals . . . tra la! On with the dance.

Cause and effect, bughouse rhythm and pills, are linked strikingly during the dinner hour. Music at meals is said to aid digestion and promote health. It may be true. Radio hasn't given the theory a fair test.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
TWIN CITY SENTINEL

OCT 6 - 1946

~~SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY~~ will be on the podium Tuesday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to the air (ABC-WAIR).

performed on January 29, 1781, to great applause, two days after the composer's twenty-fifth birthday.

"Idomeneo" has had occasional performances in Europe, mostly in Germany and Austria. There were further revivals in 1931, the 150th anniversary of the first performance, when there was a production at the Vienna State Opera in a version edited by Richard ss and L. Wallerstein, and an-ich musically edited by E.

Stahl. A ver-

in Lon-

involves the predicament of the king of Crete, who, in gratitude for escaping shipwreck, vows to the god Neptune to sacrifice the first one whom he meets upon his own shores. It is his own son, Idamante, who first greets him. Idomeneo seeks to save his son by sending him to Argos with Electra, the Princess of that country, but the Gods intervene, and decree that Idamante replace Idomeneo on the throne of Crete, together with his true love, Ilia, prisoner of war from Troy.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS
APR 1 - 1937

Koussevitzky Family Thrills Concertgoers

By PHILIP KLEIN
Music Editor Daily News

A double-barreled music fest by the famous Koussevitsky family supplied entertainment galore to concert-going Philadelphia last night. Uncle Serge Koussevitsky held the spotlight at the Academy of Music when he maestroed the renowned Boston Symphony orchestra for the members of the Philadelphia Forum. Half a block away Nephew Fabien Sevitsky was doing musical tricks with the popular Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta, in the ballroom of the Bellevue-Stratford. And to top it all, Maria Koussevitsky, soprano wife of the Simfonietta's founder and conductor, appeared as soloist with the tabloid string orchestra.

This Boston Symphony, on its altogether - too - rare appearances here, gives opportunity to compare the qualities of our own village band. Uncle Serge, according to rumor, is a strict and sincere disciplinarian. Evidently his belief in rigid training has been sustained by the beauty of the notes that [illegible] can produce. There is an indefinable harmony that this orchestra possesses that demands attention. The violins bow with the same stride and manner. The woodwind section is superb. The cello group is indeed unique for its qualities. With such ensemble the grandness of results cannot be deterred.

Koussevitsky opened the concert with the Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, an unusual, but adaptable, curtain-raiser. Four movements of this symphonic writing won the approval of the listeners. A feature of the program was the rendition of Sibelius' Pohjola's Daughter, a delightful study of harmonics. Finally, as a generous gesture came the Tschalkowsky Fourth Symphony, played with true artistry and ability.

All this while, the Simfonietta was doing its work well with a program that displayed great versatility. Purcell's Old Bachelor's Suite, gay and humorous, was succeeded by the very modern Trauermusik, by Hindemith. Schoenberg had his inning with the now-approved Verklarte Nacht. Four modern writings followed in succession, with Mme. Koussevitsky doing the vocal in Hadley's The Time of Parting. Her voice is rich and robust and her interpretation is unusually good. More of her singing in these parts would not be amiss. Maestro Sevitsky was well received and acclaimed for his contribution which brought the 11th season of the Simfonietta to an end. He has just been appointed conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony.

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
APR 11 1937

British Societies to Observe Coronation

The British and Canadian Societies of Boston and the English Speaking Union are collaborating in preparing for a British coronation ball and promenade concert to be held on coronation night, May 12th, in Symphony Hall, Boston.

The promenade concert will be given by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchesetra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, to be followed by dancing with music furnished by Al Statrita and his London Orchestra.

The Caledonian Pipe Band will be in attendance.

Trooping of the colors by British and Canadian War Veterans; special recorded broadcast from London of the coronation of the King and the Queen.

The net proceeds from the event, which will be one of the principal celebrations in Boston of the coronation of King George VI and Queen Elizabeth, will be divided amongst the British and Dominion charities in Boston.

STAMFORD, CONN.
ADVOCATE
APR 9 - 1937

rites In Music

Rabinowitz Chooses Masters And Artists

Meets Request of Readers, but Emphasizes List Is Based on Personal Opinion—With Selections Not to Be Construed as "Greatest"—Toscanini Returns.

BY DAVID RABINOWITZ

Several readers have requested me to name the "best operas", "greatest composers" and most talented contemporay concert artists. Up to now I have refrained from making any such selections, because it is my firm conviction that no two persons could possibly agree on a list of the "greatest" this or that. With this in mind, I'm willing to name my favorite composers and compositions; emphasising the fact that they are personal choices, and in now way to be construed as "greatest."

The operas which most appeal to me are, in order:—"Meistersinger," by Wagner; "Tannhauser" by Wagner; " Rosenkavalier" by Richard Strauss; "Carmen" by Bizet; "Falstaff" by Verdi.

My favorite symphonies are Mozart's G minor symphony; Beethoven's 9th symphony; Brahms' C minor symphony No. 1; Franck's D minor symphony; Schubert's B minor (Unfinished) symphony.

Other favorites are: Piano; Chopin's B minor sonata; Schumann's Fantasie in C op. 17; Tocatta and Fugue in D minor by Bach-Tausig; Prelude, Chorale and Fugue by Cesar Franck; Braham's Variations on a Theme by Handel.

Violin Compositions: Chaconne from Sonata no. 4 by Bach; Sonata in A by Cesar Franck; Concerto D major by Beethoven; Concerto D major by Mozart; Sonata F major by Beethoven: pianists:Walter Gieseking, Josef Hofmann, Jose Iturbi, Laonia Kreutzer, Egon Petri; violinists: Szigeti, Menuhin, Kreisler, Heifetz, Zimbalist.

Orchestras: Philadelphia Symphony, Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, Chicago Symphony, Cleveland Symphony. Conductors: Toscanini, Kousevitzky, Bruno Walter, Mengelburg, Leopold Stokowski.

Critics: Ernest Newman, Lawrence Gilman, W. J. Henderson, Hugo Lichtentritt, Olin Downes; Musical Essayists: James Huneker, Philip Hale, Henry Finck. Singers: Enrico Caruso, Edouard and Jean DeReszke, Fedeor Chaliapin, Laurits Melchior, Geraldine Farrar, Kirsten Flagstad, Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Marjorie Lawrence, Elizabeth Rethberg.

Books: "Life of Richard Wagner" by Ernest Newman." Jean Chirstoph" by Romain Rolland." Beethoven, the man who freed Music" by Robert Haven Schauffler, "Mozart" by Marcia Davenport, Grove's "Dictionary of Music." Contemporary composers: Jan Sibelius, Richard Strauss, Ernest Bloch, George Antheil, Maurice Ravel.

Recent significant events: The news that Toscanini will return to America to conduct radio concerts. The feat of Kirsten Flagstad in singing three taxing Wagnerian roles on three consecutive evenings, the great recitals by Marian Anderson, contralto, the return to this country of Moritz Rosenthal, great pupil of Liszt; The superb singing of Emily Roosevelt in her recent Town Hall recital, where she delighted a packed house with her artistry; The miracle which Hugo Kortschek has performed with the Stamford Symphony Orchestra, and the pianistic possibilities displayed by Ralph Sheldon at the orchestra's last concert.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
APR 11 1937

Americana via Feet

Martha Graham and her dance troupe are scheduled for an evening at Carnegie Music Hall, April 30. This will be an important event since Miss Graham—by the way, a Pittsburgher by birth—is exploiting Americana in her new dances. "Frontier" has made somewhat of a sensation in Chicago.

* * *

Podium Changes

Owing to the many visits of the Minneapolis Orchestra to our Syria Mosque we are naturally interested in the choice of director for the coming season. This winter there have been many tryouts by eminent leaders. Dimitri Mitropoulos, conductor of the Athens Symphony and inhabiter of the Boston Orchestra's podium the last two years during the mid-season vacation of Serge Koussevitzky, finally has received the appointment.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky's nephew, Fabien Sevitzky, founder of the Philadelphia Chamber String Sinfonietta and conductor of the Boston People's Symphony, has just been selected to head the Indianapolis Orchestra. And despite his wide European background, he insists on including an American work on each of his programs; not only an admirable policy, but one which all his colleagues in this country would gain much by following.

* * *

Bethlehem Festival

Devotees of Bach will want to watch the dates of this year's festival at Bethlehem, Pa., Friday, May 28, six cantatas and five chorales will comprise the program. The next day the usual performance of the B Minor Mass will take place. Soloists include Louise Lerch, soprano; Grace LaMar and Lilian Knowles, altos; Arthur Kraft, tenor, and Julius Huehn, baritone.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
APR 10 1937

Recorded Music

Fischer's Bach

VICTOR continues its seriatim release of Edwin Fischer's performance of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord," one of the most admirable moves in its history. The music itself is well worth study and restudy, and to the inexperienced music-lover it has a peculiar charm through its variety of mood and the detached but curiously fascinating nature of the fugue as a form of music. More, Mr. Fischer's approach is astonishingly sane, unlabored and sympathetic. He is under no impulse to make of this superb material anything but what it is, the activity of a great genius in small but exacting form. He plays it beautifully and the entire series will be invaluable when it is concluded. There remains material for one further release of the "famous forty-eight," as these seven records carry through the forty-third prelude and fugue.

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony in a brisk, six-surface recording of Beethoven's eighth symphony and fills it justly with that curious hilarity which only Beethoven has brought into music.

Fritz Kreisler heads his own string quartet to record his own charming quartet in A minor, supplementing it on an eighth surface with his scherzo for quartet in the manner of Dittersdorf. His quartet is extraordinarily free in form and is equally rhapsodic in spirit; it is so filled with its composer's own grace and sobriety and distinction as a violinist that the recording has the intimacy of an autobiography.

Igor Gorin (now in Hollywood) sings with a magnificent baritone voice a Ukrainian folk song, "Viut Vitre," and his own "Prayer." The record is theatrical, but suitably so, and would be an interesting item in anyone's collection.

Wanda Landowska's gemlike skill and exquisite taste are put to the service of a rather fiery performance of Bach's "Italian concerto." Three short preludes and a fugue fill a fourth surface. The recordings are beautiful and have astonishing variety of timbre.

Two breath-taking "vitalized" re-recordings by Caruso are among the current Victor releases, the Flower Song from "Carmen" and an incomparable performance of "O Paradiso" from "L'Africana."

Simon Barer plays a Chopin mazurka (F sharp minor) and gives a stupendous performance of the Schumann toccata.

The peerless organist, Charles M. Courboin, records a Franck andante and his own arrangement of Schumann's "Evensong."

Margherita Perras' singing of the two astonishing soprano arias from Mozart's "Abduction" is an interesting importation.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
APR 11 1937

A Pair of 'Eights'

A MERRY RACE seems progressing between Serge Koussevitzky and Felix Weingartner in engraving Beethoven's symphonies. The former's Boston cohorts respond perfectlty to his always-vital reading (Victor M-336; six sides). Occasionally he is inclined to overstress, but many will be glad he does.

The special charm of this veritable epic of humor lies in its defiant spontaneity, however, so we prefer Weingartner's method with the Vienna Philharmonic (Columbia Set 292). He lets Beethoven decide when and how to frolic, particularly in the Allegretto—the shortest movement the master ever wrote and one of the most delightful.

Ormandy 'Debut'

IN HIS FIRST recording as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy invests "Dance of the Apprentices" and the succeeding "Entrance of the Meistersingers" from Wagner's great opera with bewitching clarity (Victor 1807).

A FULL-BLOODED performance also is turned out by Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" in that Tschaikowsky electrification, "March Slav" (Victor 12006).

Organ and Harp Artistry

THE ORGAN always has given sound mechanics the most trouble, so extra significance attaches to the initial recording by the virtuoso Charles M. Courboin on the Wanamaker Organ in Philadelphia, reputed the largest in the world. The Andante from Franck's "Grand Piece Symphonique" and Schumann's "Abenlied" are played with flowing dignity, but technicians seem to have saved poetic line at the expense of proper volume (Victor 14279).

FRENCH EXPERTS offer some pointers on how to capture tonal balance, letting the high artistry of Lily Laskine float forth in Faure's "Impromptu for Harp" (Victor 12005). This disc, just released domestically, won the Candide Grand Prix for 1935.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO JUDGE CONTEST

Herald
Apr 18/37

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Myra Hess and Lee Pattison will judge the Mason & Hamlin prize competition at Jordan Hall, Wednesday afternoon, [illegible] 2:30 o'clock. This will be the 28th annual competition. A grand pianoforte will be awarded the winner of the competition. All properly qualified students of the New England Conservatory are eligible to compete. Many past winners are now well known concert performers. The list includes Jesus Maria Sanroma, Howard Goding, Martha Baird, Elizabeth Travis and Lucille Monaghan. The public is invited to attend.

COURIER
APR 14 1937

Harold Bauer, Pianist, at Hamilton Tuesday

Harold Bauer, the pianist of international reputation who won a distinguished place for himself throughout the entire musical world, will appear in a concert recital at the Colgate Memorial Chapel in Hamilton Tuesday evening, April 20. Acclaimed alike by audiences ranging from Paderewski to Arizona Indians, the eminent pianist ranks today as one of the most popular appearing before the public.

Although he was born in England, Mr. Bauer is an American by naturalization. During the winter he makes his home in New York City. His first appearance in this country was in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony in 1901, but since ~~then he~~ has appeared with every orchestra of note in this country and Europe.

MESSENGER
APR 16 1937

BARNARD CLUB TO GIVE CONCERT

A joint concert featuring Raphael Del Sordo, noted violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. ~~Lillian~~ D. Hurlock, well known Clifton pianist, will be sponsored by the Barnard Club on Wednesday, April 21st.

The concert will be held in the chapel of the Old North Church at eight o'clock in the evening. Both artists have made reputations for themselves as accomplished musicians and should provide excellent musical entertainment.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 10 1937

MUSICAL MEANDERS

BY ISABEL WHITMAN

IN EUROPE summer festivals attract the most prominent artists and throngs of eager listeners. Through the years, interest in the various festivals has grown and many travelers make it a point to attend at least one festival during their summer trips abroad. It has become an honor in the musical world to perform at Salzburg or Bayreuth. There are many people who feel that such festivals are gardually building up in the United States. Throughout the country, one can discover summer musical events which are slowly taking on the form of permanent festivals. Such a development is naturally on a small scale but the fact that each year the activities grow proves that the trend for better music in the United States is increasing. The gift of a huge country estate near Lenox, Mass., to the Boston Symphony orchestra led to a short festival in August at which the orchestra, under Koussevitzky, presented a series of concerts. This season the same festival will be held but more programs will be given including choral groups and soloists Then at Chautauqua there is a gathering of great musicians, a symphony orchestra, an opera company, famous teachers and a much heralded choral group. Each year Chautauqua becomes more and more established as an artistic summer colony. In the west, the Hollywood Bowl concerts have been a decided success, featuring guest conductors, opera companies, soloists and choruses. The growing interest of Americans in music seems to signify that this country has every reason to believe that some day in the future our countrymen will not find it necessary to travel to Europe to attend a summer festival of music.

* * *

WHEN one scans the lists of world-famous conductors, there is never a true American included. Why, we wonder? There are many naturalized American citizens but they cannot be rightfully called real Americans. Stokowski was born in England of Polish parents, was educated abroad; Stock is a German; Barbirolli is Italian-English; Enesco is Rumanian; Iturbi is Spanish; Rodzinski was born in Dalmatia of Polish parents; Koussevitsky is Russian; Goossens is British; Chavez is Mexican. Somewhere a great American-born conductor must be undiscovered. Have we overlooked a well-known conductor who is an American despite a foreign sounding name? There are several American conductors who have been sufficiently successful to make their names hold a prominent position in this country but who have never seemed to go further. The question, why this is true, is one which still remains unanswered.

* * *

OUT IN Lincoln, Nebraska, Lillian Heims Polley, a member of the voice faculty at the University of Nebraska, believes that children should begin elementary voice culture when they are just out of their cradles. She has a voice training class of little students ranging from six to nine years. She has been so successful with them that she plans to have a special class of four-year-olds next winter. Her theory is that most great instrumentalists begin their training as tiny children and that developing the voice is just like working on another type of instrument. She feels that it also teaches a child to realize the potentialities of the art of song.

* * *

ANNOUNCEMENT has been received from the managers of the Ford Symphonic Program that Nelson Eddy will sing April 18 at a regular Detroit broadcast with Alexander Smallens directing the orchestra. Mr. Eddy has been ill with a serious throat trouble caused by a strepticocous infection. He was forced to return to his home in California two weeks ago when he had a recurrence of the illness. The popular young baritone is feeling better and hopes to be able to continue his concert activities and to begin work on a new picture at M-G-M which is scheduled for production next month.

* * *

RADIO HINTS:

Regular programs tomorrow all appear to include favorite artists: At 3 the New York Philharmonic-Symphony featuring a concert presentation of Honegger's opera "King David;" on WABC; at 8 the Promenade Concert with two soloists, Helen Gleason and Joseph Schmidt on WEAF; at 9 the usual orchestra and Gertrude Wettengren, contralto, as soloist on WABC; and the Swarthout recital at 10 on WEAF.

Tuesday afternoon the NBC Music Guild in "Four Centuries of of Polish Chamber Music" at 2:30 over the WEAF network.

On Wednesday night at 9 Lily Pons will begin her spring season as guest artist with Andre Kostelanetz and his orchestra on the WABC chain.

Thursday the Music Hall will once more present Pery Granger, composer and pianist, as a guest soloist. This is a WEAF presentation.

Saturday, next week, Richard Bonelli will give the first of a new series at 7:30 on the WABC chain. He will be assisted by Alec Templeton, blind pianist, and the Landt Trio.

* * *

WHENEVER a symphony orchestra introduces a modern orchestral composition on a program there always seem to be those who cannot bear the "noise" and the "lack of beauty" in the work. It would be a pleasure if these complainers would only think back and realize that the old orchestral repertory sometimes loses its vitality through over-usage. Seldom are the "noisy" works boring and they are certainly not worn out by constant playing. It must be because the familiar sounds of the old symphonies allow more time for mental relaxation.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD-NEWS

APR 24 1937

Radcliffe to have Night at the Pops

Announcement has been made by Mrs. DeForest Anthony, Radcliffe alumna, of "Radcliffe Night at the Pops" to be held May 11 in Boston. The program will include requests, the Regional Scholars and Jesus Maria Sanroma, soloist. Mr. Sanroma, pianist, is known in this city, having appeared here several times, most recently at the Fall River Woman's Club in December. He is a Spanish-American, pianist, a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, and has appeared many times as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has an impressive record of successes on the concert platforms of London, Paris and Berlin.

PORTLAND, ME.
NEWS

APR [illegible]

* * *

Harvard Glee Club In Maine Concert Program Tomorrow

Completing an engagement at Wellesley College Sunday, the chorus of the Harvard Glee Club, composed of 60 men, will make its next trip to Maine, where the musical organization, conducted by G. Wallace Woodworth, yill present a concert program in the Chapel of Bates College tomorrow at 8 P. M. This program is the last in a series of the 1936-37 Lecture and Concert Series, sponsored by campus organizations at Bates and the George Colby Chase Lecture Fund.

The Harvard Glee Club, which is recognized as one of the ablest choral organizations in this country, was founded in 1858 and began its expansion in 1912 under the leadership of Dr. Archibald T. Davison, until it now has a membership of 250 members. According to bulletin reports, more students at Harvard try out for the Glee Club than for the football team.

Under the present leadership of Mr. Woodworth, the Glee Club has also won distinction for its performance of major works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky and for it twenty-odd annual concerts. The Glee Club's visit to Europe in 1921 aroused considerable interest in choral singing there. It has also given a performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" with the Philadelphia orchestra under Stokowsky.

* * *

B Herald Apr 18/37

Mrs. Coolidge's Festival; Progress at Washington

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

The eighth chamber music festival last week-end at the Congressional Library, Washington, and under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation was chiefly remarkable for the introduction of Paul Hindemith on his first visit to America. The entire audience, led by Mrs. Coolidge, rose to its feet to welcome him when he came on the stage, and thereafter applauded his music with enthusiasm. The works that were played, mainly for the first time in this country, were Hindemith's sonata for flute and piano; four songs to poems by Friedrich Hoelderlin; sonata for viola alone; four part-songs to old texts; sonata No. 3 for piano; "Der Schwanendreher," viola concerto. Works not by Hindemith and played for the first time in public were the Quartet No. 1 in E minor, by Roger Sessions; Quartet No. 4, by Jerry Fitelberg; concerto for four horns, by Carlos Chavez; introduction and allegro, by Nicolai Berezowsky.

We may say at once that the best of the Hindemith works easily eclipsed the other new compositions. He has not only an assured mastery over the problems of counterpoint and modern harmony, but also a technique of making the finished work sound well. This is usually accomplished by rhythmic vitality; and it is likewise clear that Hindemith is a thoroughly sincere composer. He has been frequently accused in the past of spinning counterpoint in the humdrum way that the ordinary man solves a cross-word puzzle. He is certainly a prolific composer; but his really good work, such as "Der Schwanendreher" and the "Mathis der Maler" symphony, has a great deal more to it than the mere machine-like competence of which his severe critics, particularly in England, accuse him. It is true that some of his music, the viola sonata, for example, fails to sound effective. In other works, though, there is a combination of high spirits and an intellectual quality of reflection which is the emotional virtue of this music, aside from its undeniable technical skill.

HOMAGE TO HINDEMITH

"Der Schwanendreher" was played by the composer here in Boston last Tuesday and discussed at that time. In addition at that concert there was the Kleine Kammermusik for wind instruments, which showed Hindemith's ability to write with a sense of humor and exhilaration. In Washington we heard two other pieces, which should certainly be performed here. These were the sonata for flute and piano (1936) and the Sonata No. 3 for piano (1936). These were played with consummate ability by Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and Georges Barrere, flute. The piano sonata seems almost fiendishly difficult, but when taken in hand by a good pianist is both a powerful and an effective work. The flute sonata was less serious in mood, an engaging and occasionally "tongue-in-the-cheek" composition.

These fine performances were continued by the motet singers of the Dessoff Choirs of New York (Paul Boepple, conductor), in four part-songs beautifully composed to old texts by such writers, as Martin Luther. Two years ago this festival, which is never lacking in contemporary musical interest, presented Stravinsky. This composer is undoubtedly more popular for his larger works than is Hindemith; but he was not a wise choice for chamber music, since his achievement in this field has been insignificant and in the nature of experiments, transcriptions of larger works and rough sketches for future compositions. Hindemith was a much more sensible choice for a chamber music festival; and we may hope that this successful introduction will result in a more extended American tour next year.

NEW QUARTETS

The Sunday afternoon concert brought forward the Sessions and Fitelberg quartets for the first time and the Brahms Op. 67 in B flat, all played by the Coolidge string quartet. This organization, composed of William Kroll, Nicolai Berezowsky, Nicolas Moldavan and Victor Gottlieb, has played for special broadcasts, but not technically in public before. It is an admirable ensemble. Most of the musicians are young, so that, besides the excellent tone and precision that they have acquired, there is a feeling of vitality in their playing. They are worthy of every encouragement.

Mr. Sessions, who was in the audience, has written a quartet that is profoundly intellectual, and that probably is full of interesting and ingenious problems for the scholar of modern music. But it is extraordinarily unpleasant to listen to and makes no concessions of any kind that might even remotely be described as attractive. The reactions of the audience were amusing to follow. After the Brahms, of course, there was prolonged applause from everybody. The Sessions brought a polite response from many in the audience and a prolonged demonstration from a more than friendly group in one corner of the hall, who kept it up long after the majority had quit.

This audience in Washington, as a matter of fact, had an amazing stomach for chamber music. Here was a concert of straight string quartets lasting well over two hours and with no noticeable diminution of enthusiasm. The Fitelberg theme, variations and fugue won the Coolidge prize for 1936, and was even more confoundedly ugly than the Sessions. It was also exceedingly long and may have won the prize for what must be the most interminable fugue in existence. Actually its running the gamut of contemporary tricks was less impressive than the honesty of Mr. Sessions' creation.

At the final concert the audience expressed most enthusiasm for the introduction and allegro by Mr. Berezowsky. It is not so good a work as his Third Symphony, played here recently; but as a light and vivacious chance piece (it was written in 1927 and revised this year) it is certainly an agreeable work for chamber orchestra. Mr. Chavez's concerto for four horns is only a concerto in the sense that the horns are prominently scored. The first movement is a brightly attractive study in rhythm; the second movement is a perversely unsuccessful adagio, which finally stops and brings the concerto to a close with the ear still unsatisfied. As we said at the beginning, Hindemith was—and properly so—the hero of the festival.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 21 1937

3ravo Echoes at To Boston Sympl

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played its final concert of the season last night at the Metropolitan Theatre. The concert was a veritable triumph, for when a Providence audience stands to applaud and shouts of "Bravo" are heard, something extraordinary has happened. It was Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony which caused the outburst, and rightly so. It is beautiful music but it takes on added glory under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. He is easily the outstanding interpreter of Tchaikovsky. We are indeed fortunate to be able to record in our musical experiences another of his famous performances of the great Russian's music.

The program opened with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4 in A major. This is called the Italian Symphony. The key of A major is a happy one and the allegro vivace was played with much sparkle and zest. To speak of unity in the string section savors of the trite. Any first-rate orchestra has it. Last evening's playing showed the type of unity which fine string quartets exhibit; a certain indescribable quality which comes from long association. It is akin to the conversation of devoted friends which requires few words but which denotes perfect understanding. The precision of the phrasing was noteworthy as the delicate modulations brought out the development of the themes. In the second movement, the oboe and bassoon carried the plaintive minor strain of melody which rests gently on a delicate staccato 'cello accompaniment. The flutes were most expressive in their counter-theme. The third movement has much of the lyric quality of many of the songs without words. The last movement, a saltarello, presto, was played at top speed. The saltarello is a type of Italian dance not unlike a tarantelle. Here the brass section distinguished itself by the clarity of tone in the rapid passages.

In direct contrast to Mendelssohn was "The Swan of Tuonela," a legend from the Kalevala Opus 22, No. 3, by Sibelius. In Finnish mythology, Tuonela is land of death which is surrounded by a swiftly running river of black water. A lovely white swan sings while floating majestically on the river. In the score an English horn portrays the swan. This solo was exquisitely played by Louis Speyer. The beauty of his tone, the balance of his phrases together with the poignant delicacy of the orchestral accompaniment made this music a thing which tightens the throat. The prolonged hush at its finish spoke more than the volume of applause which finally burst forth. The genius of Sibelius at writing weird but lovely music was eloquently displayed by Mr. Speyer, who was recalled many times.

Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4 in F minor was the final number. The opening brass octaves presaged the high level of this performance. The strings were vibrant and went quickly into the working out of the first movement. At the moderato the clarinet sang its hesitating little theme which soon becomes a conversation between flutes and oboes in descending chromatic bits. A climax of tremendous power was built and here again the brass gave splendid support. In the second movement the oboe announces the graceful theme which the 'cellos later take up along with an interesting figuration of reeds. The full orchestra in the chorale-like passage played with great beauty of tone. The third movement written for pizzicato strings throughout was played with marvelous precision. The finale was truly allegro con fuoco. It seemed that orchestra and conductor were intent on giving their utmost to finish the season gloriously. Their aim was reached and Dr. Koussevitzky was obliged to return many times and to bring the orchestra to its feet to acknowledge the thunderous applause.

R. T.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader

APR 25 1937

HERE AND THERE

. . . the board of trustees of the Berkshire Summer festival is erecting a permanent summer pavilion for the Boston Symphony concerts this summer . . . the closing date for the entries in the contest for New York's anthem has been advanced to July 1 . . . "Rendezvous

The Latest Opinions of Science on

RIGHT WAY of LIVING

FACTS ABOUT OUR BODIES, OUR FOODS, OUR HABITS, ETC., OF GENERAL INTEREST

By JAMES W. BARTON, M. D.

(Copyright, 1937, by the Bell Syndicate, Inc.)

April 21 1937 Post

HUNGER PAINS OFTEN GO UNNOTICED

We have been told that we should not eat any food until Nature sends us a warning by giving us "hunger" pains; that if we follow Nature we'll never have any upset of the stomach or intestine. We have been further advised that the infant teaches this lesson—to wait until we feel hunger pains before we eat—as it would sleep all the time if hunger pains did not wake it up to take in some more food.

Now we all have hunger pains at times but research physicians tell us that even when there is still food in the stomach, the hunger pains may develop. These hunger pains are due to the contraction of the muscle walls of the stomach (they act just like the opening and closing of your hand).

As the stomach becomes empty, its muscular walls contract from 10 to 25 more times, after which it becomes quiet again and then following this the contractions occur again and then the stomach becomes quiet. If no food is taken these pains become stronger and occur oftener. In the child the quiet periods (when there are no contractions and pains) last from 10 minutes to one hour, and from one to three hours in the adult.

In his book, "The Control of Hunger in Health and Disease," Dr. A. J. Carlson says that with strong hunger contractions there is an unpleasant or even painful sensation in the region of the stomach. While these contractions are painful enough to make an infant cry, they are often unnoticed by the adult, but there is a feeling of weakness, irritability, and an inability to concentrate, and also a feeling of tiredness, fatigue, and lack of desire to work.

Now if these symtoms were due to just tiredness or fatigue, rest should bring relief, thus Drs. Howard W. Haggard and Leon A. Greenberg point out in their book, "Diet and Physical Efficiency":

"The feeling of fatigue and irritability that shows the need for food is not relieved by rest but is relieved by food. And the food that appears to be most needed is sugar."

Thus the piece of bread covered with brown sugar our mothers gave us after school was really a "scientific" method of preventing quarrels and crying spells.

A lump of sugar, a piece of taffy, a chocolate bar or a banana at mid-afternoon should relieve those feelings that were formerly thought to be due to fatigue.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
APR 24 1937

Great Music Is Not Written in Attic, Says Composer's Widow

The popular conception of genius toiling in an attic is "all wrong," Mrs. Edward McDowell, widow of the composer of "To a Wild Rose" and other favorite compositions, said today.

"While it is conceivable that an artist might compose a sonata in an attic, it would be nearly impossible for the same person to write a symphony or any larger work in the same atmosphere," Mrs. McDowell added.

She speaks with authority because, for the last thirty years, she has devoted her life to the development of the McDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H.

The ideal of the colony, she explained, was to supply all the physical elements conducive to creative work, and then to leave the artist alone.

After many years of contact with persons regarded as geniuses, Mrs. McDowell asserted it was her observation that "really big persons are the simplest."

"While European artists are often inclined to look the part, American artists in most cases could easily be mistaken for scientists, or about anything."

One of the compensations for assuming the responsibility for the colony comes when a member's work meets popular acclaim. A recent tribute to one of the colony's products was accorded Mabel Daniels when after a rendition of her composition, "Deep Forest," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the composer was called to the platform at the demand of the audience.

"I am not an unusual woman. This is my life's work," Mrs. McDowell said.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
APR 24 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Open Berkshire Festival With All-Beethoven Program

Closing Program Devoted to Music by Brahms—Ballet Music From "Rosamunde," Schubert's Unfinished" Symphony, Compositions by Mozart, Ravel, Tschaikovsky, Respighi, Franck, Sibelius and Rimsky—Korsakov Also Included—Next Week Last Opportunity for Membership

First announcement of the programs to be played at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in August, was made today by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

The Festival will open with an all-Beethoven program and close with a Brahms program. There will also be one program devoted entirely to Wagnerian music. Sebelius' Symphony No. 7 is included on the next to the last program.

Last Week for Membership

Next week will be the last in which memberships may be secured for the series of concerts, Aug. 5, 7 and 8 and Aug. 12, 14 and 15. Music lovers who have not taken advantage of membership are urged to do so as soon as possible through their local chairmen or through the office at Stockbridge.

The Programs

PROGRAM I
Overture to Leonora No. 3 .... Beethoven Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"
Symphony No. 5

PROGRAM II
Symphony in E Flat .... Mozart
Suite No. 2 "Daphnis and Chloe"...Ravel
Symphony No. 4 .... Tchaikovsky

PROGRAM III
Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"..Schubert
"Unfinished" Symphony .... Schubert
"Pines of Rome" .... Respighi
Symphony in D Minor .... Franck

PROGRAM IV
Overture and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"
Forest Murmurs
Siegfried's Ascent to Brunnehilde's Rock from "Siegfried"
Good Friday Music from "Parsifal"
Prelude to Act III, "Meistersinger"
Prelude to Act I, "Meistersinger"

PROGRAM V
Symphony in D Mayor .... Haydn
Symphony No. 7 .... Sibelius
"Scheherazade" ...... Rimsky-Korsakov

PROGRAM VI
Variation on a Theme by Haydn...Brahms
Concerto for Violin
Symphony No. 1
Academic Festival Overture ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 3
Symphony No. 1

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 24 1937

MUSIC

—By Carl E. Lindstrom—

IT IS A TRUISM of the concert hall that the audience is a vital factor in music making.

A crowded auditorium of enthusiastic listeners can stimulate musicians to inspired effort; empty seats often chill them to lassitude and indifference. So important is this factor at times that the listeners could be considered a part of the instrument, like the additional strings on the viola d'amore and certain Oriental instruments which, vibrating sympathetically, affect the timbre of the strings actually played upon. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has said that he prepares and plays upon his audiences as he does upon the orchestra.

This is astute musical psychology but, as a comprehensive theory, the existence of the Unknown Musician cuts the ground from under it. He is the man who is passionately devoted to musical art, treasures it as a restorative panacea in a busy and pitiless world and clings to it for its power to lift up out of every day life.

He has no audience. He has never expected music to earn a cent for him; he is the aristocrat of music. He is the amateur, if you like. Does he make good music? It doesn't matter in the least. It doesn't even matter whether his friends like it—a great many of them don't know him as a musician, for to the world he is a doctor, a banker, a laborer, a lawyer or an insurance executive. His performances have never been "reviewed."

The lack of listeners was never a handicap to inspiration and an elevated mood. Quite the contrary. He is usually at his best when alone. Eavesdroppers said of Adolf Henselt that he was capable of poetical flights comparable to a Liszt or a Chopin but he was unable to play the piano in public.

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES
APR 24 1937

MUSICAL GENIUS AT FIVE—Alan Reed-Tikman, 5, of Dorchester, Mass., is hailed as a musical genius. According to Harvard intelligence rating, Alan is five points above that of a genius. His father, Louis Reed-Tikman, is a former member of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 24 1937

PROGRAMS FOR MUSIC FESTIVAL

Announced Today by Serge Koussevitzky

SECOND SEASON

Will Include All-Beethoven, All-Wagner and All-Brahms Concerts.

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms programs have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works by Respighi, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (August 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (August 12, 14, 15).

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser", "The Valkyrie", and "Siegfried"; also from "Tristan and Isolde", "Die Meistersinger", and "Parsifal". Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade".

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
APR 24 1937

The Critic Talks to MUSIC

By SAMUEL

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMEN has just been completed in New Yo Friends of Music, which was organi by Mr. I. A. Hirschmann and carried to a most successful conclusion. One of the most interesting and novel results of its season of sixteen chamber music concerts was the fact that the project almost paid its own expenses throughout its season and for one of the very rare times on record, nobody had to dig down to pay a sizeable deficit which in the past has marked most seasons of this kind of music, which has always and with some reason been considered the red-headed step-child of the art. Certainly it has always been the hardest form of music to make pay its own way.

Of equal interest is the fact that Mr. Hirschmann, the president of the New Friends of Music, has made public the complete financial statement of the organization's opening season, being one of the very few times that any musical organization has done this. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only one of the major groups of the country, as far as the writer knows, which has done this in the past, evidently believing that when the public is asked to make up a deficit it has some right to know exactly where the money went. Mr. Hirschmann's reason for doing this, however, is of an entirely different kind, for the fact remains that the deficit incurred by his organization, was less than $26 a concert, which in itself is well worth chronicling in view of experiments of a similar kind in this city and other music centers.

* * *

THE WATCHWORD OF the New Friends of Music, which is an incorporated organization, is, "to answer the increasing demand for the best of the major works of lieder, piano and chamber music at prices within the reach of all," a most laudable undertaking. Mr. Hirschmann, in sending out the statement, writes that he "believes that music lovers throughout the country will be interested in seeing the results of a determined and uncompromising effort to make chamber music self-supporting at a very low cost to the audience under conditions closely approaching the ideal." Furthermore, he says: "For many years the unfortunate idea has persisted in musical and managerial circles that chamber music was 'over the heads' of the general musical public and, therefore, had to be heavily subsidized. The result of our concerts this season should help to dispel this idea once and for all."

The concerts of the new organization were given on Sunday afternoons, at 5 o'clock, a most unusual hour for a musical entertainment and which may or may not have anything to do with the gratifying success of the season. Certainly, from experience in the past in this city, it would be difficult to get a large audience together on this day and hour. However, it has worked in New York. The use of Town Hall for the events also gave the organization an auditorium of sufficient size, so that a paying audience could be accommodated there. Mr. Hirschmann explains also that the small deficit was accumulated through money paid to additional artists in the closing events; otherwise, the project would have paid its own way completely.

* * *

THE FINANCIAL results of the season show that the total income for the sixteen concerts was $16,024 (omitting the odd cents), of which artists' fees, rentals and audience services accounted for $10,065, the other expenses being $3813 for publicity, advertising and promotion, and $2254 for taxes, administrative and clerical salaries. No officer of the corporation received any compensation whatever. In a "breakdown" of the use made of each subscriber's dollar it is brought out that 44 cents went for artists' fees, 9 cents for hall rental, 5 cents for audience service (programs, printing and tickets), 24 cents for advertising, promotion, publicity and postage, 14 cents for secretarial and clerical salaries and 4 cents for miscellaneous expenses.

The total income of the organization was derived from the sale of tickets and there were no donations or contributions of any kind whatever. Therefore the income averaged just about $1000 per concert which is a very satisfactory figure for chamber music events, especially when it is considered that some of the famous chamber music organizations of the world were obliged to disband in the last few years because of lack of popular support. From these figures, either the tide has turned in favor of this enlightened form of the musical art or else there was unusual acumen displayed by the New Friends of Music in securing its audiences. Whether it would be possible to duplicate this success in other cities is of course a matter which can only be settled by trying it.

* * *

MR. HIRSCHMANN declares that "in principle" he is "opposed to the patronage system which places a musical organization on the infirm basis of one or more individuals' desire to subsidize the music" and, as he justly remarks, "the results, as history shows, are unstable and often capricious." This is perfectly true as a matter both of principle and history but too often in the past it has been a matter of getting some person or persons to subsidize chamber music or doing without it altogather; and of course, the continuance of it depends entirely upon the ability or on the disposition of the subsidizers to do so. The plan, adopted by the New Friends of Music, is by far the better one, provided it can be carried out.

In emphasizing the "co-operative spirit" which existed between the audience and the artists Mr. Hirschman said: "We believe we have now established a vehicle through which all the great chamber music organizations of the world will continue to be invited at appear with compensation satisfactory to themselves and at the same time chamber music lovers will have an established institution through which to hear all the literature of this type of music, together with the great lieder cycles, at prices within their reach." He does not explain the "co-operation" on the part of the musicians in detail but on a basis of 44 cents out of every dollar for the artists, this averages a little more than $440 per concert, not a large sum compared with what the great quartets of the past received, but enough to engage most artists at the present time. But, under any circumstances, the result of the first season of the new group is most encouraging.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 2 4 1937

New Records

By AARON STEIN

The recording companies have been lavish this month, making available a choice of no less than two separate recordings of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. Victor released the album on its April list and the Columbia version came out as a special release this month. For Victor the symphony is played by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The Columbia performance is by Felix Weingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic.

Both sets are admirably recorded with nothing to choose between the very satisfactory record surfaces. Both furthermore are such performances as should evoke cheers if offered before a concert hall audience. Since a good modern recording of the merry and vigorous Eighth has long been needed, the two new versions present something like an embarrassment of riches.

In making a choice between the two there is little to go on but questions of individual taste. We happen to incline toward the Weingartner. He has a way with Beethoven, and that way seems especially effective in relation to the witty good humor of the Eighth Symphony. We have reasons for this preference, but there will be many who have as good reason for preferring the Koussevitzky reading.

The Vienna Philharmonic has its record of sounding like a tired and careless band, but for Felix Weingartner on these discs they did their best, and it is a best that is admirably faithful to both the conductor and the composer. They handle this chuckling and laughing music with grace, vitality and precision, keeping a beautifully delicate balance between the bright freedom of its moods and the neat shapeliness of its form.

The Koussevitzky treatment is brilliant, and the Bostonians show their customary responsiveness in living uy to the brilliance of their great conductor. The more monumental and vigorous finale they handle superbly, but the earlier parts of the work seem to us a bit overdone, slightly too portentuous in emphasis. We happen to believe that, in the Eighth, Beethoven went back to the gracious manners of an earlier style because what he had to say in this symphony could be said most lucidly in terms of that grace. On the other hand, if you feel that Beethoven returned to the earlier style to endow it not only with fresh meanings but also with a fresh weight, you will probably prefer Koussevitzky's recording. It is the basis for long and inconclusive argument.

Light and Swingy

As usual, things go whizzing by like mad in the popular and dance divisions. There is a new series out, called Master Records, and they made a good start with swing and various dance items. Fans for swing foolery should look up the Raymond Scott Quintet which tosses off deft rhythmic wisecracks in a Minuet in Jazz which is backed by a bright burlesque called "Twilight in Turkey."

On the same list "I've Got To Be A Rug Cutter" is Duke Ellington in full ducal splendor. There is also a modernization of "In the Shade of the Old Apple Tree" by Midge Williams that is fun. Dancers should like the Hudson-DeLange orchestra's "Sophisticated Swing" and Lucky Millinder's workout with "Blue Rhythm Fantasy." The list also includes a Cab Calloway contribution, but it is only mild Calloway

Foreign and Demestic

Victor has an importation in the disc of the Quintet of the Hot Club of France. They do "Nagasaki" and "Shine"; and Django Reinhardt's guitar is one of those things you may not believe even after you've heard it. Decca has given a twelve-inch record to Josephine Tumminia and Jimmy Dorsey's band for "The Blue Danube" with swing embellishment. She sings it and they swing it after the manner of the Lily Pons performance in the recent Pons film. It's well done and on the fancy side.

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL
APR 2 5 1937

Eliel Saarinen Chosen Architect for Tanglewood Building

Eliel Saarinen of Bloomfield Hills, internationally known architect, has been chosen by trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic festival as architect for the building to be erected at Tanglewood, 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts, given to the Boston Symphony orchestra by Mrs. Gordon Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent home for the festival.

Tanglewood is where Hawthorne lived in the Berkshires, where he wrote "The Wonder Book" and first told his "Tanglewood Tales."

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give six concerts on the estate this summer under the direction of its eminent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The dates are Aug. 5, 7, 8, 12, 14 and 15. Three concerts given by the orchestra for the festival last summer were attended by more than 15,000 persons from 25 states and Canada.

Mr. Saarinen will be the architect for the entire development contemplated at Tanglewood, including the musical pavilion to seat 5,000 persons. It is hoped to make a start on construction of the pavilion this year, but completion is not planned until 1938.

Born in Finland

Born in Helsingfors, Finland, in 1873, Mr. Saarinen was graduated in 1897 from the Institute Polytechnic in Helsingfors. For 11 years he was associated with Herman Cossellius and Armas Lindgren whose most prominent work was the National museum at Helsingfors.

Since 1907 Mr. Saarinen has worked alone and has designed the following remarkable buildings: railway station at Helsingfors; town hall in Joensun, Finland; town hall at Lahti, Finland; the private gallery, Keirkner, Helsingfors; Estobank, Reval, Estonia.

Since 1925 Mr. Saarinen has resided at Cranbrook, Bloomfield Hills, where he designed the Cranbrook School for Boys, the Kingswood School for Girls, the Cranbrook Academy of Art, of which he is the director. He is now developing the Cranbrook Institute of Science building. The Academy of Art is a graduate school with a small limited enrollment.

Next door to Mr. Saarinen lives his friend and associate, Karl Milles, famous sculptor.

In international competitions Mr. Saarinen has figured prominently, winning first prizes for city planning for Reval, Estonia and Gewerbovereinshaus, Riga, Latvia; second prizes in city planning for Yas Camberra, Australia, and the Tribune building at Chicago, Ill.

To Budapest, Hungary, and Reval, Estonia, Mr. Saarinen was asked as expert on city planning, to Paris as a member of the jury for the architectural competition at the Olympiad in 1924, and for the same reason to Los Angeles in 1932; to Yas Camberra, Australia, as jury member of the competition for a Parliament house; to Bergen, Norway, as jury member of the city planning competition and to Madrid, Spain, and Rio Janeiro, Brazil, as a jury member of the international competition for the Columbus memorial light tower at Santo Domingo.

Has Many Honors

Mr. Saarinen is vice president of the International City Planning Conferences, holds the gold medal of the Architectural League of New York. He is honary professor, honored by the Finnish government; commander, Class 1 of Finland's White Rose Order, honorary doctor of philosophy of the University of Helsingfors, honorary doctor of technology of the Technical University of Finland, honorary doctor of engineering of the University of Karlsruhe, Germany, honorary doctor of architecture and city planning of the University of Michigan, member of the Finnish Academy of Art, the Imperial Academy of Art in St. Petesburg, Russia, the Royal Academy of Art in Stockholm, Sweden, honorary member of the Architects society of Finland, honorary member of the Central Institute of Architects in Brazil, of the Architects society of Uruguay, Detroit chapter of the American Institute of Architects, the Michigan Society of Architects, honorary corresponding member of the Royal Institute of British Architects, corresponding member of the Royal Society of Arts and Crafts in Budapest, Hungary, Der Deutsche Werkbund, Germany, and Der Zentravlvereinigund der Architeckten Oesterreichs, Vienna, Austria.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concert of the Season Outstanding Event Last Week.—Many Dinners, Teas and Luncheons Enjoyed

By Alice E. Dyer

Faunce House Tea to Honor Koussevitzky

Prov. Journal

Socially Prominent Folk on Committee Planning Afternoon Function for Tomorrow

April 25/37

MRS. HENRY DEXTER SHARPE is chairman of the reception and tea which will be given tomorrow afternoon by Brown University and Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Faunce House Art Gallery from 4:30 to 6 o'clock, in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The affair will be held in connection with a pre-view of original drawings by Gerome Brush, of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Assisting Mrs. Sharpe are Mesdames Royal Little, Thomas H. West, Jr., Harry Parsons Cross, Murray S. Danforth, John S. Cooke, Seeber Edwards, William H. Edwards, William B. Greenough, Sr., Russell Grinnell, Elisha C. Mowry, John O. Waterman and The Misses Emily Diman, Eleanor Mowry, Margaret C. Mowry and Gertrude E. Lawson.

In the receiving line will be Dr. and Mrs. Henry Merritt Wriston, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Mme. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Sharpe and Mr. Edward A. Taft, the latter chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross will be in charge of those who will pour. They are Mesdames John Nicholas Brown, Arthur M. Allen, G. Maurice Congdon, G. Pierce Metcalf, Jesse H. Metcalf, S. Foster Hunt, Henry S. Lanpher and Kenneth F. Wood.

Mrs. Thomas H. West, Jr., is in charge of floral decorations assisted by Mrs. Royal Little.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE
[illegible]

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY WILL BE HONORED

Receiving this afternoon at the reception in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Faunce House Art Gallery were to be Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, chairman of the reception, Mesdames Royal B. Little, Thomas H. West, Jr., Harry Parsons Cross, Murray S. Danforth, John S. Cooke, Seeber Edwards, William H. Edwards, William B. Greenough, Sr., Russell Grinnell, Elisha C. Mowry, John O. Waterman, the Misses Emily Diman, Eleanor Mowry, Margaret C. Mowry and Gertrude E. Lawson.

In the receiving line were to be Dr. Henry Merritt Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston, Dr. Koussevitzky, Mrs. Sharpe, and Edward A. Taft, the latter chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which with Brown University, is sponsoring the reception.

Pouring are to be Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, in charge; Mesdames John Nicholas Brown, Arthur M. Allen, G. Maurice Congdon, G. Pierce Metcalf, Jesse H. Metcalf, S. Foster Hunt, Henry S. Lanpher, and Kenneth F. Wood.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 2 6 1937

Map Berkshire Music Festival

Programs for Symphonic Presentations Arranged; Six Concerts Planned

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respigi, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (August 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (August 12, 14, 15).

The movements from the Sinfonietta for string orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome," and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tanhauser," "The Valkyrie," and "Siegfried"; also from "Tristan and Osolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

CHICAGO, ILL.
Herald-Examiner
APR 2 5 1937

Indiana Founds Symphony; Names Savitzky Conductor

Indiana has founded a state symphony orchestra, to be known as the Indianapolis Symphony. It is to play fifteen concerts in all parts of the commonwealth in addition to its series in the capital city.

In selecting conductors, the directors of the new orchestra have been careful to follow the best American precedent and have found an unknown European more to their taste than any of the gifted young Americans whom Dr. Stock has trained in the Chicago Civic Orchestra. Probably Mr. William B. Hall of Muncie, knew nothing of these native musicians, though if the plan to represent American composers on every program is carried through the music of several of them will be played.

Fabien Savitzky has been chosen conductor. Except that he is said to be a relative of Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, nothing is known of his talents or his previous experience. The announcement also states that only world famous artists will be accepted as soloists in the subscription concerts. Nearly any visitor from Europe is supposed to be world famous, but the real boxoffice values among the concert artists are natives, strange to tell.

This information is passed on to Mr. Hall and his associates together with the suggestion that 18,000 American musicians, plus another thousand soloists, are active in the various orchestras, bands and such, of the federal music project. The players in ensemble get a subsistance wage from taxpayers' money. The soloists get nothing, but still must live. Their numbers increase constantly but there is no opening for them in Indiana. G. D. G.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 6 1937

BERKSHIRE FETE MUSIC ANNOUNCED

Koussevitsky Schedules Contemporary and Masters' Works

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made today by Serge Koussevitsky.

The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

All-Beethoven, all-Wagner and all-Brahms programs have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate between Lenox and Stockbridge offer a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe;" Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and ballet music from "Rosamunde;" Respighi's "Pines of Rome;" and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser," "The Valkyrie" and "Siegfried;" also from "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

50

From Symphony Hall, Boston, and Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc.

For release Monday, April 26

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAMMES ARE FESTIVE

The first announcement of the programmes to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms programme have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programmes to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts, offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (August 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (August 12, 14, 15).

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programmes in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third 'Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian programme will include excerpts from "Tannhauser", "The Valkyrie", and "Siegfried"; also from "Tristan and Isolde", "Die Meistersinger", and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

APR 2 6 1937

THE first announcement of the program to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitsky. Three programs devoted individually to Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms have been planned. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tschaikowsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respigni, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

PROFESSOR ANTONIN HONICKY will present his violin and piano pupils of this City, Saratoga and Albany in recital May 3 at 8:30 p. m. in the main lodge room of Odd Fellows' Hall, corner of State and Hawk Streets, under the auspices of the Mohawk Valley Lodge, No. 12, I. O. O. F., and Dorpian Encampment 126.

Professor Honicky will open the recital with a brief address on music study, followed by "Caprice Prague," for violin, his own composition. He will be accompanied by his pupil, Mildred Meilun, a Skidmore College student, who will also play two piano solos. The Maloney Sisters, Muriel Maloney, violinist and Mary Maloney, pianist will offer a violin Concerto by Seitz and a piano solo by Alfoldy. A violin trio: "Fantasia on Home, Sweet Home," an original arrangement by Professor Honicky, will be included in the program which embraces violin and piano solos, duet, trios, quartets and quintets.

Pupils taking part in the recital are Thelma Tuttle, Clark Holzhauer, Mary Hauser, Edward and Bernard SinViora Unice Waite, Jacqueline Mabent, Alfred Stickles, Edwin and Mildred Meilun, Howard Hickin, Audrey Honicky and Gregory Utter. The recital is open to the public.

DOROTHY HUDSON WHEELER, pianist, and Herbert Hausser, baritone, presented an informal musical program in the Commons room of Yale Divinity School. Mrs. Wheeler, of Bridgeport, Conn., leaves July 1 for Los Angeles, California, where she will make her home. Both of the artists are familiar to Schenectady through their many concert appearances here.

Mr. Hausser offered Brahms, Irish, English and French folk songs and a group of contemporary interest. Mrs. Wheeler's program included Beethoven, Chopin, Brahms and Debussy.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

[illegible]

ARTIST PARRISH, MRS. GOULD JOIN SYMPHONIC LIST

Trinity College President Also a New Member; Total Reaches the 1000 Mark

PITTSFIELD, April 26 — Maxfield Parrish, the artist, of Windsor, Vt., Mrs. Frederic Saltonstall Gould of Santa Barbara, Cal., Dr. Remsen W. Ogilby, president of Trinity College at Hartford, Conn., are among recent members added to the list of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Membership lists for the festival will be available through Friday. After that date, subscriptions at an increase in price will prevail for the concerts to be given in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The six concerts will be given at Tanglewood, the estate between Lenox and Stockbridge presented to the orchestra as a permanent home for the festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston. Mrs. Brooks has recently been added to the festival board of trustees.

Sustaining memberships are now at the 1000 mark while 90 boxes have been sold for the six concerts.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

APR 2 7 1937

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Honored at Reception

A reception followed by a tea was given, jointly, in Faunce House Art Gallery, Providence, yesterday, by Brown University and Providence friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, chairman of the committee, was in the receiving line with Dr. and Mme. Koussevitzky, Henry Merritt Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston.

Following the reception, there was a preview of original drawings of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Gerome Brush.

Assisting Mrs. Sharpe in preliminary arrangements for the affair were several members prominent in society, including Miss Emily Diman, and Mrs. Russell Grinnell of South Dartmouth.

* * *

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 2 8 1937

Symphony Friends Honor Conductor

PROVIDENCE, April 28 — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was honored at a reception and tea at Faunce House art gallery in Brown University Monday evening. More than 300 attended the reception, given by the university and Providence friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The event was held in connection with the preview of original drawings by Gerome Brush, one of the members of the famous orchestra. Charcoal sketches of orchestra members were hung on the walls.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

APR 28 1937

Boston Programs.

With the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the 56th season comes to a close. On the program Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the recently discovered Symphony in D by Clementi as revised by Alfredo Casella. To complete the program the orchestra will play Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

APR 28 1937

The first of a series of Summer "pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Arthur Fielder, will be aired over WJZ next Thursday night . . . .

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 2 [illegible] 1937

Mrs. Underwood Plans Tea For Workers

Berkshire Festival Committee To Submit Reports Friday

Mrs. Louis E. Underwood, 106 Crofut Street, who is co-chairman with Miss Elizabeth Gamwell in Pittsfield for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, will entertain at tea at her home Friday afternoon at 4:30 for members of the local committee.

Miss Gamwell and Mrs. Underwood issued an appeal today to Pittsfield persons who have not become sustaining members to communicate with them or members of the committee at once, thereby assuring themselves of reduced rates for the concerts in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"By taking out memberships, Pittsfield will demonstrate that it is wholeheartedly behind this splendid community venture which is making Berkshire known far and wide as a center of great things, said Miss Gamwell.

"At the tea tomorrow, committee members will make their final reports. I hope there will be a most encouraging response."

From Symphony Hall, Boston, and Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc.

For release Monday, April 26

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAMMES ARE FESTIVE

The first announcement of the programmes to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms programme have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programmes to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts, offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (August 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (August 12, 14, 15).

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programmes in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian programme will include excerpts from "Tannhauser", "The Valkyrie", and "Siegfried"; also from "Tristan and Isolde", "Die Meistersinger", and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

APR 2 6 1937

THE first announcement of the program to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made today by Serge Koussevitsky. Three programs devoted individually to Beethoven, Wagner and Brahms have been planned. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tschaikowsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respigni, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

PROFESSOR ANTONIN HONICKY will present his violin and piano pupils of this City, Saratoga and Albany in recital May 3 at 8:30 p. m. in the main lodge room of Odd Fellows' Hall, corner of State and Hawk Streets, under the auspices of the Mohawk Valley Lodge, No. 12, I. O. O. F., and Dorpian Encampment 126.

Professor Honicky will open the recital with a brief address on music study, followed by "Caprice Prague," for violin, his own composition. He will be accompanied by his pupil, Mildred Meilun, a Skidmore College student, who will also play two piano solos. The Maloney Sisters, Muriel Maloney, violinist and Mary Maloney, pianist will offer a violin Concerto by Seitz and a piano solo by Alfoldy. A violin trio: "Fantasia on Home, Sweet Home," an original arrangement by Professor Honicky, will be included in the program which embraces violin and piano solos, duet, trios, quartets and quintets.

Pupils taking part in the recital are Thelma Tuttle, Clark Holzhauer, Mary Hauser, Edward and Bernard SinViora Unice Waite, Jacqueline Mabent, Alfred Stickles, Edwin and Mildred Meilun, Howard Hickin, Audrey Honicky and Gregory Utter. The recital is open to the public.

DOROTHY HUDSON WHEELER, pianist, and Herbert Hausser, baritone, presented an informal musical program in the Commons room of Yale Divinity School. Mrs. Wheeler, of Bridgeport, Conn., leaves July 1 for Los Angeles, California, where she will make her home. Both of the artists are familiar to Schenectady through their many concert appearances here.

Mr. Hausser offered Brahms, Irish, English and French folk songs and a group of contemporary interest. Mrs. Wheeler's program included Beethoven, Chopin, Brahms and Debussy.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

APR 27 1937

ARTIST PARRISH, MRS. GOULD JOIN SYMPHONIC LIST

Trinity College President Also a New Member; Total Reaches the 1000 Mark

PITTSFIELD, April 26 — Maxfield Parrish, the artist, of Windsor, Vt., Mrs. Frederic Saltonstall Gould of Santa Barbara, Cal., Dr. Remsen W. Ogilby, president of Trinity College at Hartford, Conn., are among recent members added to the list of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Membership lists for the festival will be available through Friday. After that date, subscriptions at an increase in price will prevail for the concerts to be given in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The six concerts will be given at Tanglewood, the estate between Lenox and Stockbridge presented to the orchestra as a permanent home for the festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston. Mrs. Brooks has recently been added to the festival board of trustees.

Sustaining memberships are now at the 1000 mark while 90 boxes have been sold for the six concerts.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

APR 2 7 1937

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Honored at Reception

A reception followed by a tea was given, jointly, in Faunce House Art Gallery, Providence, yesterday, by Brown University and Providence friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in honor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, chairman of the committee, was in the receiving line with Dr. and Mme. Koussevitzky, Henry Merritt Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston.

Following the reception, there was a preview of original drawings of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Gerome Brush.

Assisting Mrs. Sharpe in preliminary arrangements for the affair were several members prominent in society, including Miss Emily Diman, and Mrs. Russell Grinnell of South Dartmouth.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 28 1937

Symphony Friends Honor Conductor

PROVIDENCE, April 28 — Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was honored at a reception and tea at Faunce House art gallery in Brown University Monday evening. More than 300 attended the reception, given by the university and Providence friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The event was held in connection with the preview of original drawings by Gerome Brush, one of the members of the famous orchestra. Charcoal sketches of orchestra members were hung on the walls.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

APR 28 1937

Boston Programs.

With the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the 56th season comes to a close. On the program Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the recently discovered Symphony in D by Clementi as revised by Alfredo Casella. To complete the program the orchestra will play Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

APR 28 1937

The first of a series of Summer "pop" concerts by the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Arthur Fielder, will be aired over WJZ next Thursday night . . . .

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 2 7 1937

Mrs. Underwood Plans Tea For Workers

Berkshire Festival Committee To Submit Reports Friday

Mrs. Louis E. Underwood, 106 Crofut Street, who is co-chairman with Miss Elizabeth Gamwell in Pittsfield for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, will entertain at tea at her home Friday afternoon at 4:30 for members of the local committee.

Miss Gamwell and Mrs. Underwood issued an appeal today to Pittsfield persons who have not become sustaining members to communicate with them or members of the committee at once, thereby assuring themselves of reduced rates for the concerts in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"By taking out memberships, Pittsfield will demonstrate that it is wholeheartedly behind this splendid community venture which is making Berkshire known far and wide as a center of great things, said Miss Gamwell.

"At the tea tomorrow, committee members will make their final reports. I hope there will be a most encouraging response."

Chotzinoff Visits Symphony Hall

Finding himself in Boston last Saturday night and being in a holiday mood, your correspondent drifted toward Symphony Hall, where the local orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were to play an all-French program. An all-French program is a serious affair, quite different from an all-German or even an all-Russian program, and Boston's willingness to encounter one seemed like an indication of the superior receptiveness of Back Bay music-lovers. In New York we have a reasonable fondness for French music, but an entire evening devoted to d'Indy, Franck, Roussel and Berlioz would be tolerated rather than welcomed. At Symphony Hall, however, the Gallic menu had attracted a huge audience, which displayed an eagerness and enthusiasm that only a program of Bach, Beethoven or Brahms would have elicited from our heavier ticket-holders at Carnegie Hall.

New Yorkers have frequent occasion to admire Boston's illustrious orchestra, but to get its full flavor they should hear it in its home town and in that hall that is its natural habitat. In that beautiful auditorium, which seems like a copy of the Leipzig Gewandhaus, the stage encircles the band as economically as a chaste setting of a jewel. In depth exactly suited to the dimensions of the orchestra, this stage, in form and color, sets off the players and their leader to the highest advantage. For a background, golden organ pipes rise solemnly above horns and wood-winds, while in front, high up in the very middle of the proscenium arch, the eye is caught by a solitary name in bold letters —BEETHOVEN.

Acoustically the hall is a realization of the dream of all who delight in the peculiar individualities of orchestral instruments and the splendor of their massed sonority. Sound does not appear to travel toward the listener, but is instant and immediate. There is no effect of distance. The violins, the cellos, violas and basses impinge upon the ear as closely as if they are being played in a drawing room. Their tone quality is vivid. Perhaps the imperfections of an inferior band would be equally vivid in such a setting. But the brilliance and perfection of the Boston Symphony are flattered by this artful arrangement of walls and ceiling. Even the cackling, earthy E flat clarinet in Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" sounded, for once, like an instrument fit to associate with the respectable members of a symphony orchestra.

If some generous patron of our Philharmonic - Symphony were some day to decide to build a hall for its use, he could do no better than to imitate the acoustical properties of Symphony Hall. New York's only orchestra certainly deserves a proper arena which would reveal, without external hindrance, its own characteristics. With the Boston and New York orchestral habitations thus equally matched, we might then discover what it is that makes the Boston Symphony supreme.—S. Chetain W in New York Evening Post.

WHEELING, W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER

APR 26 1937

Hans Kindler to Conduct National Symphony in Concert Here Tuesday

HANS KINDLER

In bringing the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D. C., to Wheeling tomorrow evening, the Zou Hastings Frazier Memorial committee had an opportunity that could not be refused of presenting a major American orchestra. Whenever the National Symphony goes on tour it crosses the paths of other great American orchestras, among them the Philadelphia orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony, and others .

Has Kindler Director

Under the baton of Hans Kindler ,this orchestra from the nations capital will bring to Wheeling music representing the achievement of the ideals of Hans Kindler in building a major symphony orchestra in the short five years of its existence. After its several tours the organization is now widely acclaimed. However, it originally drew nation-wide attention because it gave the capital of the United States a symphony orchestra comparable to those in other large music centers in America.

More and more during the last five years eyes and ears of the musical world have been directed on Dr. Kindler and his work with this orchestra.

Growing Prestige

The growing prestige of the National Symphony has resulted in a steady increase in the demand for its music. This year the orchestra has played a total of 40 out of town concerts, many of them being return engagements. On three tours out of Washington the National Symphony has played in cities from Jacksonville, Fla., on the south, to several New England cities on the north.

Patrons of the Frazier Memorial course will present their tickets for the Mexican orchestra, whose engagement was cancelled because of flood conditions in January. Others may purchase single admission tickets at the Y. W. C. A. today or at the box office of the theatre after 10 a. m. tomorrow. The concert will be given in the Virginia theatre beginning at 8:30 p. m.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

[illegible] 1937

* * *

ALTHOUGH RCA-Victor has already recorded the Beethoven eighth symphony as played by the British Broadcasting Company orchestra, led by Dr. Adrian Boult, the latest reproduction of this fascinating though lesser known symphony, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is recommended as a ~~significant~~ achievement. Three 12-inch discs comprise the pressing, and what a glorious performance! Here we have Beethoven, glowing, pulsating, filled with the joy of life. The buoyancy of the first movement, the jovial spirit that marks the second movement—allegretto scherzando; the delightful charm and warmth of the third movement, in which Beethoven reverts to the old-fashioned minuet form and endows it with rare beauty, and the final movement—allegro vivace, potent and vigorous—all these elements are proclaimed magnificently by Dr. Koussevitzky and his players. These records represent the pinnacle of Beethoven symphonic playing through higher fidelity recording.

Kreisler! There is so much in this name—one that is a household word wherever the language of music is spoken. Fritz Kreisler, the man as well as the musician, is probably the most beloved personality on the concert stage today. His compositions, nearly all of which have been cast in the mould of miniatures, are musical gems and fascinating program material. A myriad of these have been recorded by RCA-Victor. Now comes the reproduction of Kreisler's own string quartet in A-minor on five sides of three 12-inch discs, and also his Scherzo a la Dittersdorf on the remaining side.

Here is delightful music that expresses the spirit of the composer's native Vienna. In free style, the work is replete with all the Kreislerisms which charactrize his violin pieces. This quartet is an admirable addition to chamber music literature, and as played by Kreisler himself and his three confreres on these records the composition is bound to provide great enjoyment.

ALTOONA, PA.
MIRROR

APR 27 1937

CELLIST WILL BE SYMPHONY GUEST

Thursday evening, April 29, in the Roosevelt Junior High school, the Civic Symphony of Altoona will present the closing concert of the 1937-38 season. The soloist at this time will be Georges Miquelle, first cellist of the Detroit Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Miquelle, acclaimed following his recent New York recital as "an artist of the very first order," was born in Lille, France. As a child, his talent with the cello was so impressive that he was sent to the Paris conservatoire where he won the coveted first prize and graduated with the highest honors.

His first appearance in the United States was as solo cellist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His success was immediate and innumerable appearances as recitalist and soloist with leading orchestra followed. He has also frequently been heard in joint recitals and programs of chamber music with the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and as soloist under Mr. Gabrilowitsch's baton.

Mr. Miquelle's unexcelled artistry and gift of interpretation, his magnificent tone and brilliant technique, have been enthusiastically applauded wherever he has appeared by those who love the music of the masters presented by a master musician.

Under the baton of Russell Gerhart, the orchestra will perform the Haydn Concerto in D major with Mr. Miquelle and also a group by the composer's Faure and Popper.

In closing this eighth concert season the executive board announces the dates of the season 1937-38 with guest-artists at each concert. The concerts will take place on Thursday, Nov. 18, Jan. 13, March 3, April 28, on the same basis as the season now closing. Those subscribing now will be given first preference for reserved seats.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAM ANNOUNCED

Six Concerts by Boston Symphony Over Two August Week Ends

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was made yesterday by Serge Koussevitzky The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (Aug. 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (Aug. 12, 14, 15).

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

APR 27 1937

Lenox

COMMITTEE ON FESTIVAL TO MEET

Miss Estelle Hutchinson Urges People To Buy Memberships Before Deadline

LENOX, April 27.—A meeting of the Lenox committee for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will be held in the Brotherhood Club Friday night at 7.30, Miss Estelle Hutchinson, chairman, announced today.

Miss Hutchinson urges all who have not bought their membership tickets to do so before April 30, the deadline for purchasing tickets at membership rates. After May 1 tickets will be priced higher.

At the last meeting it was reported that 68 membership tickets had been sold here. Many more have been sold since then. Among recent purchasers of boxes for the festival is Mrs. Edwards Spencer, summer resident of Lenox.

Sidney Blumenthal of 1 Park Avenue, New York City, who spent last summer at the Curtis Hotel and who attended the festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent a gift of $50 to Miss Hutchinson for the building fund.

ALTOONA, PA.
TRIBUNE

APR 28 1937

Georges Miquelle to Appear In Final Symphony Concert

Georges Miquelle, solo 'cellist of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and appearing as guest artist in the concluding concert of the Altoona Civic Symphony seriest o be held on Thursday evening, in the Roosevelt Junior High school auditorium, is acclaimed throughout the world as one of the greatest artists on his instrument.

Miquelle, reported, following his recent New York recital as "an artist of the very first order," was born in Lille, France. As a child his talent with the 'cello was so impressive that he was sent to the Paris Conservatoire, where he won the coveted first prize and graduated with the highest honors.

His first appearance in this country was as solo 'cellist with the Boston Symphony orchestra Since ~~then he~~ has won laurels in all of the principal cities of the United States, and his appearance in Altoona is indeed an honor for the city to be appreciated by all music lovers.

Mr. Miquelle's unexcelled artistry and gift of interpretation, his magnificent tone and brilliant technique, have been enthusiastically applauded wherever he has appeared.

He has appeared as geust conductor with leading Symphony orchestras, and has frequently been heard in joint recitals and programs of chamber music with the late Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who was largely responsible for the outstanding success of the Detroit Symphony orchestra. Mr. Miquelle is concertmeister of the 'cello section of the Detroit Symphony.

Director Russell Gerhart of the city symphony has surpassed all other programs in that arranged for the concluding concert.

The program will open with Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," which includes the following movements: "Allegro vivace," "Andante con moto," "Moderato con moto," and "Saltarello."

The second number will be the "Concerto in D major" by Haydn, with Mr. Miquelle taking the solo part in the arrangement of 'cello and orchestra.

Following the intermission, the Altoona Civic symphony, under the direction of conductor Gerhart, will present the overture to "Die Fledermaus" by Strauss.

Soloist Miquelle will then play the "Elegie" by Faure and the "Hungarian Rhapsody" by Popper.

The program and concert series for this season will be concluded with the orchestra's rendition of Tschaikowsky's "March Slave."

Those Altoonans who have attended all of the concerts of the symphony this season, as well as those who have been able to attend only one performance will be glad to learn that the schedule of concerts for the season of 1937-38 is now ready.

According to announcement made by conductor Russell Gerhart, a series of concerts with guests artists appearing with Altoona's own fine orchestra has been tentatively scheduled for the following dates: Thursday, November 18, 1937; January 13, March 3 and April 28, 1938. Those subscribing now will be given first preference for reserved seats.

Following the concert on Thursday evening, a reception and dance will be given for the members of the orchestra and the executive board at the Blairmont country club.

UNDREDS GREET DR. KOUSSEVITZKY AT RECEPTION

Prov. R. I. Bulletin
Apr. 27/37

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe is seated (upper left) with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. arry Parsons Cross (standing) had joined them in the informal terlude of the reception-tea opening a preview of Gerome rush drawings yesterday in Faunce House Art Gallery. Upper ght, Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher, one of the pourers, as she served rs. Henry B. Gardner, Sr. The background shows some of the harcoal sketches of the 109 Boston Symphony players. Among e guests were Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith and Mr. Edgar J. Lanher (lower right) and Mr. and Mrs. F. Alan Hallworth, couple the left.

Friends Crowd Faunce House Art Gallery

Walls Are Hung with Charcoal Portraits of Musicians

By Gladys Van Egmond

Academic, musical, artistic and society groups joined in one big family yesterday to honor the man whose baton has waved many Tuesday night audiences into being over a dozen years—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Faunce House Art Gallery, ordinarily spacious enough, was jammed with the friends Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians have made in seasonal appearances here. Certainly 300 persons shook the hand of the master during the reception and tea hours, from 4:30 to 6 o'clock.

In Receiving Line

Mrs. Henry D. Sharpe, chairman of the affair in behalf of the Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stood with Dr. Koussevitzky, Dr. Henry Merritt Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mr. Edward A. Taft, in the receiving line.

All the walls of the large gallery were hung with charcoal portraits, showing each of the 109 Boston Symphony musicians playing the instrument by which he gained a measure of fame along with the orchestra as a whole.

Guests thronged around these original pictures as best they could in the crowd. A little autobiography of the player (in his own words) was attached to every sketch for the preview of Gerome Brush's exhibition.

Coffee, Tea Served

Graceful fronds of Woodwardia fern marked the entrances to the hall and decorated the corners. By the Waterman street windows, the reception line formed. At the opposite end of the room, pourers, under direction of Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, served coffee and tea to the guests.

Yellow daffodils and purple iris made a springtime decoration for the long service table, and ivory tapers in old English silver candelabra contributed to the attractive setting.

Presiding over the tea and coffee urns were: Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon, Mrs. G. Pierce Metcalf, Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Mrs. S. Foster Hunt, Mrs. Henry S. Lanpher and Mrs. Kenneth F. Wood.

Mrs. Thomas H. West, Jr., was in charge of the floral arrangements assisted by Mrs. Royal Little.

Aided Arrangements

Others who assisted in the party were: Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mrs. Murray S. Danforth, Mrs. John S. Cooke, Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Mrs. William H. Edwards, Mrs. William B. Greenough, Sr., Mrs. Russell Grinnell, Mrs. Elisha C. Mowry, Mrs. John O. Waterman, the Misses Emily Diman, Eleanor Mowry, Margaret C. Mowry and Gertrude E. Lawson.

Noted in the afternoon's gathering were Governor and Mrs. Robert E. Quinn, Mrs. Jesse H. Metcalf, Mrs. Frederick Stanhope Peck, Mrs. G. Pierce Metcalf, Mrs. Charles H. Merriman, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Lanpher, Mrs. Peter G. Gerry, Rev. Arthur L. Washburn, D. D., Mrs. Robert Lippitt Knight, Mr. Maxim Karolik of Newport, Mrs. Walter S. Ball, Mrs. Putnam C. Aldrich, Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, Miss Amey L. Willson, Prof and Mrs. Charles Wilson Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Hart, Mrs. Charles Morris Smith, 3rd, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Clifford, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen, Mrs. William Greene Roelker, Mr. and Mrs. William Davis Miller, Mr. and Mrs. F. Alan Hallworth, Mrs. Harold T. Merriman, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Clarke Freeman, Mr. Harry Parsons Cross, Miss Sophie L. Mauran, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mrs. E. Nicholson White, Mrs. Frank E. Richmond, Miss Ruth Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel W. Smith.

Mrs. Walter E. Richmond, Mr. and Mrs. Howard L. Anthony, Samuel T. Arnold, Dean of Brown University; Prof. and Mrs. Robert H. George, Mrs. Louis C. Gerry, Mrs. Eugene S. Graves, Mrs. Russell Grinnell, Mr. S. Foster Hunt, Miss Fanny T. Ingalls, Mr. F. Ellis Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene A. Kingman, Prof. and Mrs. Hans Kurath, Prof. and Mrs. Benjamin C. Clough, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Miss Emily Diman, Miss Emily S. Paddock, Mrs. Alfred K. Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Powel, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitmarsh, Prof. and Mrs. Will S. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Wells, Mrs. Frank E. Waterman, Mrs. William B. Waterman, Mrs. John O. Waterman, Mrs. Albert H. Miller, Mrs. Donald S. Babcock, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Mr. and Mrs. Henry G. Clark, Mrs. Richard E. Wheeler, Mrs. Gustave J. S. White of Newport, Mr. Raymond G. Williams, Miss Mabel Woolsey, Prof. Jacob D. Tamarkin, Miss Kathleen Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Harold B. Tanner, Miss Edith Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Jacobson, Mr. Nelson B. Jones, Dr. Wassili Leps, Mrs. William H. Reynolds, Miss Mary C. Reynolds, Mr. and Mrs. Alden Rogers, Mrs. Edgar W. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. Kirk Smith, Mr. George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe, one of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, Dr. and Mrs. Walter I. Sweet, and Mrs. Myrick Crane of Fall River.

Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson, Mrs. Harry Hale Goss, Mrs. Arthur Ingraham, Jr., Mrs. Zenas R. Bliss, Mrs. William B. Greenough, Jr., Mrs. Alfred L. Lustig, Miss Ruth Tripp, Mr. and Mrs. Paul C. DeWolf, Mrs. May Atwood Anderson, Mrs. Royal B. Farnum, Miss A. Loraine Johnson, Mrs. Wallace Kenyon, Prof. and Mrs. George E. Bigge, Prof. George E. Downing, Miss Bertha Greenough, Mr. George Henry Lovett Smith, curator of exhibits at Symphony Hall, Boston.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

MAY 4 - 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY SAILS

BOSTON, May 4 (AP)— Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was on his way to New York today where he will sail at noon on board S. S. Paris for a quiet vacation at his home in Paris.

Accompanying the conductor were his wife, Mrs. Koussevitzky, and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff. He plans to return here late in July to complete preparationsf or the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

MAY 4 - 1937

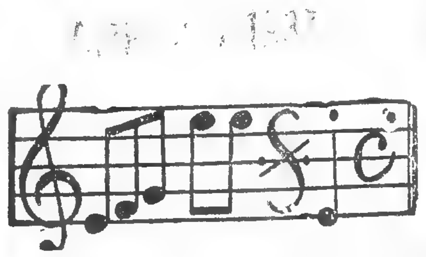
Koussevitsky to Sail for Paris

BOSTON, May 4 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was en route to

---

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

[illegible]



The first announcement has been made of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Dr. Serge Kousevitsky, celebrated conductor, and his orchestra will make their second annual appearance at the festival.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned. The other four concerns to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series at "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge, offer a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikowsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The festival will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday, August 5, 7 and 8. The second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week, August 12, 14 and 15.

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth and "Pastoral" Symphonies and third "Leonore" overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Paphnis and Chloe." Tchaikowsky's fourth symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and ballet music from "Rosamunde;" Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser," "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried," "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Eymphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

APR 2 8 1937

'Round the Town

If there's a hole in a' your coats,
I rede you tent it:
A chield's amang you taking notes,
And, faith, he'll prent it.
—BURNS.

It may have rained harder, but certainly there was never a wetter rain than that between eleven and twelve yesterday morning, and only the very wise, "respectable married people with umbrellas," as Robert Louis Stevenson once put it, were armed for the down- . . . There will be a special meeting three one-act plays which are shortly to be produced in Greenville on Friday evening in Christ church parish house. . . . There will be a special meetiung of the trustees of the Home for the Aged this morning at 10:30. . . . Many residents of this city and of the county towns will be interested to know what Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has announced that the first week of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival will include symphonies by Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Tschaikowsky and Franck, and that at the second week's concerts Rimsk-Krosakov's "Scheerazade" will be given, a symphony by Haydn and one by Sibelius. There will also be an all Wagner and all Brahms program. . . . The Columbia County Choral club has chartered a bus for its trip to Greenville this evening. . . . It is reported that two of the most attractive teahouses of the county will not open their doors this spring.

A Hudson woman on recent bus trip became quite hungry and spotting a street car asked the driver to stop. She thought it was a diner. . . . Bonds for the two Safety Commissioners whose appointments will be announced Thursday, have been applied for. When the bonds are filed their names will be made public. . . . Antique collectors will attend the Thompson auction on Fairview avenue today in goodly numbers. . . . Business in police circles has been exceptionally quiet for some time. . . . Mayor Wheeler will review his city administration and the work of the various city departments in his annual message which will not be released until he enters the Common Council chambers Saturday night. . . . There was 18 inches of snow in the Blue Mountain Lake district of the Adirondacks last week and as the result a number of Hudsonians who were to trout fish there this week are staying home. . . . The fishermen are catching great nets of herring in the run in the creek at Linlithgo these days. . . . Watch the $5 bills. Quite a few bad ones containing Lincoln's photograph slightly different from the original, have appeared here. . . . A Philmont store was robbed of a number of suits of clothing and a quantity of men's shirts, all large sizes, over the week end. . . . If it's a nice day quite a crowd will go to Albany Thursday for the opening game of the baseball league. . . . Quite a few local wrestling fans disappointed when the scheduled contestants in the main bout for last night were suspended at the last minute for their rough-house the week before. . . . A girl with a yellow-gold Easter suit plans to wear it in the rain if the weather man doesn't give her a better break.

A comedy drama, entitled, "Boomerang," and sponsored by a local young ppeople's group, is scheduled for presentation in Hudson on May 21 and 22 Local fishermen puzzled over proposed new trout law which makes size in Columbia County 7 inches and in Albany 6 1-2. Local fishermen often fish streams in both counties in one day and if they legally caught 6 1-2 inch trout in the Albany county streams and then came over the line with them here, would they be liable to arrest?...... Noted for its display of pansies each spring the Hudson Gardens surpasses itself this year with a splendid showing already in bloom.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS-TRIBUNE

PR 2 7 1937

Leader of Symphony Is Honored

Large Reception Held for Koussevitzky in Faunce House Art Gallery

Hundreds of men and women who have sat before the footlights in Providence auditoriums and enjoyed the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its able conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, personally felicitated the eminent musician at a reception given in his honor yesterday in Faunce House Art Gallery.

The affair, which was on from 4 to 6 o'clock, was sponsored by Brown University and Providence Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and offered a pre-view of drawings by Gerome Brush of members of the orchestra.

In the receiving line with the honored guest were President Henry Merritt Wriston, of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston, Mrs. Henry Dexter Sharpe, who was chairman of the reception and Edward A. Taft, chairman of the friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ON RECEPTION COMMITTEE

Assisting Mrs. Sharpe on the reception committee were Mesdames Royal B. Little, Thomas H. West, Jr., Harry Parsons Cross, Murray S. Danforth, John S. Cooke, Seeber Edwards, William B. Greenough, Sr., Russell Grinnell, Elisha C. Mowry, John C. Waterman, and the Misses Emily Diman, Eleanor Mowry, Margaret C. Mowry and Gertrude E Lawson.

The tea table was centred with an antique silver candelabra, flanked with large silver bowls holding great masses of yellow daffodils and blue iris, and at either side were other candelabra holding ivory tapers.

Pouring tea and coffee were Mesdames John Nicholas Brown, Arthur M. Allen, G. Maurice Congdon, G Pierce Metcalf, Jesse H. Metcalf, S Foster Hunt, Henry S. Lanpher and Kenneth F. Wood

Mrs. Allen wore frock of dull purple, with crescents of rose pink and purple, Mrs. Brown was in a smart tweed suit of light tan, with straw sailor of matching shade, having a brown scarf with white spots. Mrs. G. Pierce Metcalf wore a black frock with silver fox, and small black straw turban, with Dubonnet flower Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, who was in charge of the pouers, wore a black coat over her figured print on wine-rust background, and tiny hat of black silk. Mrs. Sharpe also wore block, offset with pearls. Mrs. S. Foster Hunt wore a printed gown with black and yellow daisies on a background of black. Mrs. Jesse Metcalf's blouse of silver lame was worn over an underskirt of black Mrs. William H. Hoffman also wore black. Mrs. Samuel M. Nicholson's black gown had black and white figures. Mrs. Frank E. Richmond wore a Paisley coat over a bright print gown. Mrs. Robert E. Quinn, who came in with Gov. Quinn, wore a trim black taillier, with yellow blouse studded with tiny silver dots. Mrs. Walter S. Ball and Mrs. Frederick S. Peck was among the many who wore trim tailored suits. Mrs. G. Maurice Congdon wore a strand of pearls with her black gown.

OTHERS PRESENT

Also noted in the gathering were Mr. and Mrs. Harold B. Tanner, Miss Kathleen Miller, Mrs. Donald S. Babcock, Mrs. Edgar V. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. William Greene Roelker, Miss Sophie L. Mauran, Dr. and Mrs. Henry A. Whitemarsh, Mr. and Mrs. William Davis Miller, Harry Parsons Cross, Arthur M. Allen, Henry Dexter Sharpe, M. Foster Hunt, Mrs. Elisha H. Howard, Mrs. E. Nicholson White, Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mr. and Mrs. John H. Wells, Mrs. Everitte St. J. Chaffee, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Garfield Clark, Prof. and Mrs. Robert H. George, Mrs. Putnam G. Aldrich, Prof. and Mrs. Charles Wilson Brown, Royal B. Little, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Robert Lippitt Knight, Miss Edith Nichols, Mrs. Peter G. Gerry, Mrs. Philip C. Sheldon, Mrs. Albert H. Fenner, Prof. and Mrs. Benjamin C. Clough, Mrs. Emma Winslow Childs, Miss Ruth Tripp, Miss Mabel Woolsey, Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, Mrs. Preston H. Gardner, Mrs. Edward L. Johnson, Miss A. Lorraine Johnson, Prof. and Mrs. Henry B. Gardiner, Miss Ruth Robinson, the Rev. Arthur L. Washburn, D. D., and Mr. and Mrs. Sidney C. Clifford.

SYMPHONY IN FINAL MATINEE

Clementi and Ravel Followed by Brahms' First

Post - May 1/37

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To any institution, whether it be that of monarchy or of a long-established symphony orchestra, a certain amount of ceremonial is meet and proper. Two things savored of rite and ritual at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of yesterday afternoon, the final matinee of this, its 56th season.

One of these was the simultaneous rising of orchestra and audience when Dr. Koussevitzky first came upon the platform, the other was the presence of Brahms' First Symphony as the concluding number of the programme.

DISPLAY TONAL RESOURCES

Only this symphony, however, has become an item prescribed by recent custom on this final list. For his freer choice yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky selected two compositions which had little in common beyond the opportunity they offered the orchestra to display its tonal resources. What this D major Symphony of Clementi and Ravel's "Mother Goose" did not ask of the band was required of it by the Symphony of Brahms. Had it been possible also to include the recently played "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Strauss, the casual visitor would have experienced virtually the full gamut of its sonorous and coloristic range.

Clementi's Symphony, composed at the end of the second decade of the last century and allowed to remain in obscurity for 100 years, was played for the first time in America by our orchestra last December. Briefly to retell what was then the musical news of the moment, the manuscript of this symphony came to light in London in 1917, was acquired by the Library of Congress in Washington, and was then pieced together and edited by another illustrious Italian, Alfredo Casella.

Is Grateful Music

A second hearing yesterday confirmed the original impression that the symphony, while genial, grateful music, impressive at the very outset and brilliant at the close, is the work of a composer of skill and taste but hardly of true genius. Clementi, who was born seven years before the death of Handel and who died five years later than Beethoven, nearly split the difference in his own music between the two. In the main the style of his symphony is late 18th century.

Contemporary comparisons of Clementi as symphonist with the mature Beethoven are now proved to be as erring as most contemporary judgments. Nevertheless, there is enough of interest in the symphony, aside from its picturesque history, to warrant Dr. Koussevitzky's repetition of it at the concerts of yesterday and this evening. But we do not need to hear it very soon again.

Ravel's "Mother Goose"

Ravel's "Mother Goose" is one of the most exquisite contrivances of a composer who, perhaps not with entire justice, has been called a "little master"; Ravel also wrote "Daphnis and Chloe." By itself this musical distillation of the fairy tales of Perrault must inevitably pall after too many hearings. But it would be either a callous or a satiated ear that was not charmed by the subtle and various beauties of sound which Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra here evoked yesterday.

The orchestra, which could strike with tremendous might in the final pages of Brahms' Symphony, had here on occasion the touch of a velvet glove.

Brahms' First

It is a favorite critical pastime nowadays to note the change which has come over the music of Brahms, or over the general reaction to it—which after all is the same thing. Once a formidable and remote composition of epic and heroic stride and breadth, Brahms' First Symphony, save at the very beginning and at the end, has become an essentially comfortable and companionable piece.

Its one-time glacial grandeur and aloofness must now be sought in another Symphony in C minor played by our orchestra two weeks ago, the Eighth of Anton Bruckner.

Herald May 1

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Clementi	Symphony in D
Ravel	"Ma Mere L'Oye"
Brahms	Symphony in C minor No. 1, Op. 68

During the 13 years that Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted the Boston Symphony he has chosen to end nine of those seasons with a Brahms symphony, six times for the First and three for the Second. In 1929 there was a request program drawn from votes on the music played during the year. Tchaikovsky's Fifth defeated its nearest rival, the Franck, by a lot; and the Brahms Second trailed a poor third. It is sufficient that the three remaining seasons did not wind up with Brahms. Both Monteux and Muck on the whole favored Wagner for a glorious conclusion, with Strauss as a rule to balance the last half of the program. M. Rabaud was so bold as to offer Saint-Saens' Ode, "The Lyre and the Harp."

These statistics are here presented, not simply because it is hard to find anything new to say of Brahms' First Symphony nor because the magnificent qualities of the Boston Symphony and its conductor are too obvious to need extensive elaboration, but in view of the indications of the public taste. When the social history of the time is written and the historian is expatiating on materialism and cynical disregard for life and so on and so forth, let it be remembered that there was no more popular composer than Johannes Brahms. Of course it should be added that, if Dr. Koussevitzky's predelictions had as regularly lighted on Beethoven or Franck or Schubert or several others, the Brahmsian star might not gleam so brightly. Repetition is the first requisite for public favor.

There was the customary prolonged applause after the Brahms and in regard for the final concert. Indeed it might have been any season were it not for the performance of the Clementi Symphony. This happy discovery by Alfredo Casella was wisely repeated, for it is a delightful work. Next season may we not hope for one of the other three symphonies of Clementi that have not yet been heard in America? Ravel's exquisitely orchestrated and graciously archaic "Mother Goose" suite made a good contrasting number and was played with the greatest nicety yesterday.

Artistically the Boston Symphony is keeping to the standard of perfection and brilliance which has been established in these recent years of Dr. Koussevitzky's regime. As to programs Dr. Koussevitzky has followed his rather conservative policy of last season. Not more than a dozen new works were presented, of which Berg's violin concerto, Malipiero's piano concerto (under Mr. Mitropoulos) and Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande" stand out as the most interesting. For the rest, modern music was best served by the revival of Hindemith's "Matthis der Maler" Symphony and the visit of Prokofieff.

The most important aim of this season and last has been to broaden the base of the symphonic repertoire. Although all four of the Brahms symphonies were played, it is not sensible to go on year after year repeating them and the works of Beethoven. There is a saturation point for some in the audience if not for all. Therefore the revival by a conductor of symphonies by the more neglected masters of the 19th century is wise and far-sighted. It was also intelligent to explore a little further into the vast quantity of symphonic material by Mozart and Haydn.

We have discussed the Boston Symphony season at some length for Sunday's paper and need not repeat ourselves in advance. A glance at the list of works in the back of the program will convince anyone that the choice of music has been remarkably catholic and interesting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next Wednesday the Pops will open under Arthur Fiedler.

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

Her. May 5/37

The 52d season of the famous Pop concerts will open tonight in Symphony Hall at 8:30 o'clock. Arthur Fiedler, who begins his eighth consecutive season as Pops conductor, will direct an orchestra of approximately 90 players. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of the auditorium. The opening program follows:

Procession of Nobles from "Mlada"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)	Bolzoni
Three Russian Dances	A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music	Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Historic Scenes"	Sibelius
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight" (Symphonic paraphrase by L. Cailliet)	Kern
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

52d POPS SEASON OPENS TONIGHT

Post - May 5/37

Tonight at 8:30, the 52d season of the famous Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler, who begins his eighth consecutive season as the most popular leader the Pops ever had, will direct an orchestra of approximately 90 players. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of the auditorium. The opening programme mingles old favorites with numbers new to the Pops:

Procession of Nobles from "Mlada"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)	Bolzoni
Three Russian Dances	A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music	Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Historic Scenes"	Sibelius
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight" (Symphonic paraphrase by L. Cailliet)	Kern
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The tonal magnificence of Brahms' First Symphony brought a rousing end to the Friday Symphony concerts yesterday afternoon. As usual on occasions of seasonal welcome and leave-taking, Symphony Hall was packed, and there was a certain heightened expectancy in the air. Once more it was agreeable to watch the rite of orchestra and audience rising to greet the first appearance on the stage of Dr Koussevitzky. Such a graceful sort of demonstration may be counted among the cherishable virtues of Boston audiences.

One listener, at least, was appreciative of the choice of opening number for this final program—the Symphony in D by Muzio Clementi, which Dr Koussevitzky performed for the first times in America last December. Here is music which gives us moderns an inkling of what the lesser composers shortly after the turn of the 19th century, were writing. The story of its resurrection by Alfredo Casella, after 100 years, was fully told in the Globe four months ago.

At that time this reviewer said: "The Symphony in D is melodious, dashing, constructed after formal patterns of the 18th century, yet with episodic touches of a later period. The material is plainly individual, of a Latin ardor that neither Mozart nor Beethoven, naturally, possessed. Clementi's turns of phrase have a grace easily identified with Mozart, but that was simply a manner then common. If the scoring for orchestra calls up the epithet 'Beethovenian' there is still the fact that Haydn and even Mozart in their last symphonic music employed the orchestra's resources with a boldness which heralded the middle period of Beethoven. It is likely that the elements of this orchestral style were more or less common currency.

"The minuetto of the Symphony in D in neither 18th century nor does it share the rough humor of Beethoven's scherzos. Indeed, the phrases are long, flowing and demand a faster tempo than those of Mozart. This movement shows most of all the original qualities of Clementi's talent." A second hearing confirms these first impressions. It may be added, however, that Clementi's thought stemmed from the late 18th century, through his treatment is more robust—looser, so to speak—than of that time. After the turn of the 19th century Clementi's creative thought must have been fixed by maturity. The Symphony will bear occasional repetition in the future.

The middle portion of the program is occupied with those five beautifully scored and delightfully fanciful children's pieces of Ravel, the "Mother Goose" Suite. Despite the larger proportions of some of Ravel's best scores, his talent has probably been essentially that of a miniaturist. The observation carries no deprecation, for it is just as difficult to work in miniature as it is to sketch huge tonal designs. And the necessity for polished detail is considerably greater. The "Mother Goose" pieces show this side of Ravel to perfection.

The afternoon was one of superb orchestral playing. One could not imagine better performances of Clementi and Ravel, or a more heroic interpretation of Brahms' noble C minor Symphony. Dr Koussevitzky has offered this symphony as a seasonal valedictory a number of times. It is peculiarly fitted, by reason of imposing stature and final exaltation, for this position.

With the repetition of this program tonight, the 56th season of the orchestra will be ended.

C. W. D.

Monitor - May

Symphony Season Ends

To conclude the fifty-sixth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky selected the Clementi-Casella Symphony in D, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the First Symphony of Brahms. According to custom, orchestra and audience rose to greet the conductor when he entered the hall yesterday, and there was an ovation at the close of the Symphony in C minor. Without doubt there will be similar demonstrations this evening.

This was in itself an interesting program; which displayed the conductor's catholicity of taste as well as the unexcelled virtuosity of the band which he has directed now for 13 years. The Clementi symphony was presented by Dr. Koussevitzky last December for the first time in America. The excellent impression it made then was renewed on a second hearing. The work was worth playing again so soon, and it may well take its place in the repertory.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite is among the most engaging of the French master's creations. Ravel possesses all the Gallic artistic virtues, and this unpretentious piece embodies his characteristic qualities. The performance was as representative of the modern French genius as was that of the Clementi symphony of the classical Italian.

This is the season for closing with the Brahms First. There is hardly a better candidate. The performance was eloquent, as usual. There were a few shortcomings in detail, but the peroration was irresistible.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the six concerts of the Berkshire Festival in August, as already noted in this place. In the fall he will return for another season, with nearly the same personnel under his baton. The most important change will be the introduction of a new first horn player, whose identity has not been disclosed, if indeed it has been determined. Later, we may take occasion to give some account of the orchestral season in review. L. A. S.

Radcliffe Pops To Be Staged May 11

Her. May 2/37

Concert to Benefit Special Scholarship Fund

Whenever Radcliffe alumnae gather these days, one subject which they never fail to discuss is the forthcoming "Radcliffe at the Pops" concert taking place a week from Tuesday, May 11, in Symphony Hall. The Radcliffe Club of Boston, sponsor of the concerts, will again devote the proceeds toward a scholarship to be given to the outstanding junior regional scholar at Radcliffe.

A portion of the patroness list for this year's concert has already been announced. This morning there are several notable additions, including Mrs. James Bryant Conant, wife of Harvard's president; Miss Abigail A. Eliot of Francis avenue, Cambridge; Mrs. Louis M. Atherton of Swampscott; Mrs. Percy A. Atherton of Charles River square, Mrs. A. Barr Comstock of Memorial drive, Cambridge; Mrs. Somers H. Sturgis of Willard Street court, Cambridge; Mrs. Atherton Loring, Jr. of Beacon street, Mrs. Pinckney Holbrook of Waterhouse street, Cambridge; Mrs. S. Burt Wolbach of Sudbury, and Mrs. Kenneth G. T. Webster of Hillside street, Milton.

It is only natural that a large proportion of the patronesses should be residents of Cambridge. Additional ones from the University city are Mrs. John Graham Brooks, Mrs. Sidney Fay, Mrs. Frederic L. Day, Mrs. Wilbur K. Jordan, who is dean of Radcliffe; Mrs. Richard W. Thorpe, Mrs. Charles S. Bolster, Mrs. John S. Browning, Mrs. Louis L. Green, Mrs. A. Karl Koch, Jr., Mrs. Frederick W. C. Lieder, Mrs. John M. Maguire, Miss Doris C. Mann, Miss Penelope B. Noyes, Miss Elinor Gregory, Mrs. William C. Greene, Miss Rose Sherman, Mrs. James Donovan, Mrs. Walter Earle and Miss Jennie Cummings.

Residents of other localities on the patroness list are Mrs. Arthur B. Brooks of Concord, Mrs. Seth T. Gano, Mrs. Arthur P. Stone, and Mrs. John S. Vaughan of Belmont; Dr. Fannie Fern Andrews of Commonwealth avenue, Miss Kathryn Adams of Walpole, Miss Catherine B. McCoy of Revere street, Mrs. Paul S. Phenix of Winchester, Mrs. Henry W. Porter of President's lane, Quincy; Miss Edith Johnson and Miss E. Elizabeth Jones, both of Wellesley; Miss Mary Bacon of Canton avenue, Milton; Miss Mary W. Killam of Waltham, Miss Alice M. Maginnis, Miss Caroline L. Humphrey and Miss Margaret C. Williams, all of Brookline.

POPS FLOWER VENDOR

Trav. May 1/37

The reason that Madeline Jackson of Westwood looks so cheerful is tha she hopes to win the new car which will be awarded next Thursda; evening, May 6 at the Christopher Shop Pops of 1937 in Symphony Hall She will be one of the flower vendors at this event featuring dances by Paul Draper and music by the two-piano team of Fray and Braggiotti

---

Notes from Last Symphony

In spite of our new-made resolution to have shorter lists of names it is hard to avoid reams of them in writing of the last Symphony which is definitely an "occasion" with society in all its white-gloved best. In the capacity audience . . . which rose as an ovation to Dr. Koussevitzky when he entered to conduct . . . was Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr. Wishing her good-luck for her trip to England . . . on which she starts next week . . . was her aunt, Miss Harriett Rantoul.

Arrivals instead of departures were Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Simpkins of New York, who summer at Beverly Farms with the senior Mrs. Nathaniel Simpkins. From the North Shore, too . . . Anne Ayer was with Martha Proctor. Caroline Hunnewell . . . receiving good wishes on the announcement of her engagement made since the last concert . . . wore a cunning polka-dotted hat and Eleanor Williams had a bright paisley turban.

After going over to New York every week for music lessons Jean Sears was enjoying music nearer home and other young music-lovers were Frances Lowell, Faith Thoron and Mrs. Theodore Chase, who was with Helen Mason. Mrs. Nicholas Danforth chatted with Faith Barney before going in and others were Halldis Prince, Nancy Cochrane, and the two attractive young Burrages . . . Nancy and Cynthia . . . dressed alike in navy with rolling sailor hats.

An outstanding costume was that of Eleanor Coolidge . . . red lizard shoes matching the trimming on her beige turban of the same material as her coat. Her cousin, Barbara Stevens, was in smart black. Mrs. Francis G. Shaw, Jr., with her mother, Mrs. Stanwood G. Wellington, strolled during the intermission and others were Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., Mrs. Lawrence Coolidge, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Mrs. Robert C. Terry, Mrs Adolph Leeds, her daughter, Felice; Connie Turner, Mrs. William Everts and Mrs. Hugh Bancroft.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press
MAY 2 - 1937

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAMS PLANNED

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikowsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken.

On the Paris

Dr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky sail tomorrow on the Paris of the French Line for a vacation abroad, the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Koussevitzky is the conductor, having taken place last week.

Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky will return to this country in time for the opening of the Berkshire Festival, which the former also conducts, early in August.

In the World of Music

Trav. May 1/37

Final Symphony Is Glorious

By Redfern Mason

It was the last Symphony concert of the season and audience and orchestra stood up to greet Serge Koussevitzky. He bowed modestly and pointed towards the players, as if to say, "Without the assistance of these gentlemen I could not make the music you come to hear."

The program opened with the Clementi Symphony in D, resurrected and put in order by Alfredo Casella, that good musician who loves to think that the Casella who sang for Dante Alighieri was his ancestor.

Italy is not rich in symphonic music and it is a pleasure to hear this serene and elegant score, with its occasional bravura a la Rossini, its sparkle and its clever succession of musical mosaics. It makes one think that, if men of the stamp of Pergolesi, for instance, had devoted themselves to the form, we might have had a different interpretation of the art of symphony. For Italy gave us the beginnings of fugue and sonata; opera is her invention and hers too are the first oratorios.

The audience enjoyed Clementi's well-woven fabric, which Koussevitzky directed with manifest symphony. The music sings and the making of melody which commends itself to the ear is as fine an art as the making of beautiful verse.

From Italy we passed to France and listened to the piquant make-believe of "Ma mere l'oie," Mother Goose in fact, but hardly the Mother Goose of New England, for the Frenchman based his composition on the stories which Charles Perrault wrote for the little Frenchmen and Frenchwomen of the closing years of the seventeenth century.

Think of the chateau country; people it with little folks whose parents were patricians, and set them to play on a languorous summer day, and you have the milieu into which Ravel introduces the Sleeping Beauty, that Laideronette (of whom Hans Andersen was probably thinking when he wrote "The Ugly Duckling"), and "Beauty and the Beast." It is thistledown music, simple in seeming, but, in reality of an elegant Gallis sophistication. Grown-ups are probably better qualified to enjoy it than are children. If the little folks in the score were like the children in Grimm, our youngsters would take to them more kindly. for they like their fairy lore homespun.

But it is delightful music with which to pass an idle half hour and in that spirit, I think, the Boston Symphony audience accepted it.

After the intermission, they turned their attention to one of the great pages of musical art, the C minor Symphony of Johannes Brahms, or, if you like better the "Tenth Symphony," for so it has been called, though whether the words mean the tenth of Beethoven or the tenth of all symphonies has not been determined.

The choice of this work was a kind of consecration, a reminder to the people of Boston that their Symphony is something august, an institution which ranks the city high among the communities of America, an educational force, a civic asset.

Koussevitzky gave himself to the task of direction like a priest at the altar. And gloriously the tonal epic unfolded, from the attention-compelling drumbeats of the exordium to the splendors of the Finale.

That opening movement is walled and buttressed like a great Gothic cathedral; the lyrical beauties of the Andante Sostenuto dwell in the memory alongside the choruses of Euripidean tragedy. There are pastoral notes and pages in which you feel that Brahms was downcast on the subject of our human destiny. But that beautiful horn melody, which the composer heard in the Swiss mountains, comes like a voice of comfort from another world. Finally the chorale pours forth in all the joy of renewed and unshakable faith, moving from glory to glory till the music tops Olympus.

It was a grand performance and once more establishes Mr. Koussevitzky, not only as a great director, but as an educator of men. The audience applauded him to the echo and he, palpably touched, turned to the orchestra with a gesture of recognition for their splendid service.

We shall hope to meet the Symphony again in August, when the festival is held at Stockbridge.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 2 - 1937

MUSIC

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Programs, Dates Announced by Koussevitzky

FIRST announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has been made by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two week's series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge Massachusetts, offer, in their entirety, a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the sypmphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Brulingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week-ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (August 5, 7, 8); the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following week (August 12, 14, 15.)

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Ravel's Second Suite "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser", "The Valkyrie" and "Siegfried," also from "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger", and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

* * *

"Pops" Open Wednesday; Art

Symphony Season in Review; Consolidating Success

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

It is no doubt stupid, and possibly dangerous, to take an institution for granted; but it borders on smugness to sing its praises, likes the jolly miller, "from morn till eve." Thus the Boston Symphony is a splendid orchestra, very likely the best in the world, and it has played magnificently throughout the season that has just been concluded. The public knows this, though it sometimes forgets what an immense privilege it is for Boston to be able to boast such an organization. Is it a critical duty to remind the public of this fact in glowing terms each Saturday morning? Or is it wiser to keep hosannas within modest bounds and concentrate on the music? With the posing of this problem, we shall now take the latter course.

Last year it was observed on all sides that Dr. Koussevitzky had become much more conservative with regard to the introduction of new music. Less than a dozen new works were brought forward, and the same is true of this season. If this meant that the programs merely ran a treadmill of the symphonies, concertos, tone poems and overtures that are thrice familiar, there would be cause for alarm. That, however, is not the case, although Brahms. Beethoven and Mozart, as the most represented composers, might give an impression of extreme conservatism.

BROADENING THE BASE

Actually the symphonies of Mozart, outside the three greatest, are rarely played. Together with the symphonies of Haydn they offer a rich field whereby to widen the repertoire. It was then an excellent idea to play three of the less well known Mozart symphonies and a serenade in addition to the E flat and the No. 102 of Haydn in addition to the hackneyed "Surprise." Moreover Beethoven was represented by the 2nd and 4th, neither of which is too frequently heard, and Mr. Mitropoulos's version of the long C sharp minor string quartet.

Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky is still seriously pursuing a very important goal, that of widening the symphonic reportoire by revivals of works that have not received their due recognition. No one can doubt the wisdom of this policy. You have only to look at the place that Sibelius now occupies to realize what can be accomplished in the work of changing the rut of public opinion into a road. Last year Dr. Koussevitzky revived symphonies by Taneiev, Bruckner, Glazounov, Rachmaninov, Mahler and others, This year we had Liszt's Faust Symphony, Kalinnikov's Symphony, the 8th of Bruckner, the 5th and 7th of Sibelius, Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," the 2nd and 4th of Schumann and the remarkable discovery in Clementi's Symphony in D, which was given its first American performance in December and repeated at the final concert.

That is a good record, and it becomes even better when we take into account such other revivals as Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebasian," MacDowell's Piano Concerto No. 2 and the two concertos of Dvorak. It was also gratifying that there was somewhat less emphasis on Strauss than in the past few years. His tone poems are wonderful vehicles of orchestral display, and obviously D. Koussevitzky loves to conduct them and to show off the qualties of the Boston Symphony in them. But they can and have been overworked. Altogether, from the point of view of a wide choice of music, the season was extremely interesting.

MODERN SCORES

In the realm of modern music 12 works were played for the first time at the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony and there were revivals of Hindemith's "Mathias der Maler" Symphony and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite and 3rd Piano Concerto. There was only one "world premiere," Werner Josten's cerebral and dismal Symphony in F. The following works were played for the first time in America: Berg's Violin Concerto, Castagnone's Preludio Giocoso, Malipiero's Piano Concerto, Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande," and Shaporin's Symphony.

The most pretentious of these was the Shaporin Symphony. It was supposed to have political implications and was certainly bombastic enough for anybody. It was also elaborate and difficult to play, but even the performance that Mr. Burgin and the orchestra lavished on it did not convince us that the Soviet genius had at last been found. Unquestionably the most original music was the Berg Concerto. This was an exceedingly interesting work, not one to win immediate general approval, nevertheless music that was deeply felt and individually expressed by the composer. Oliver Messiaen's composition was also a moving piece of writing, though on a smaller and simpler scale.

Two remarkable works in more cheerful mood were Roussel's Rhapsody and Malipiero's Piano Concerto. The former, as we might expect from the eminent French composer, was deftly wrought and an exceptionally attractive piece of national music. It showed that the composer of the admirable 3rd and 4th Symphonies has not come to the end of his powers by any means. Malipiero's Concerto was a surprise, for it did not resemble the rather abstruse Violin Concerto played here a few years ago. It did not withdraw intellectually from the world, as the Italian composer has often written, but was brightly and effectively direct. Furthermore in performance it justified Mr. Mitropoulos in conducting and playing at the same time, which the disappointing Respighi's Toccata did not.

Berezowsky's Third Symphony justified Dr. Koussevitzky's faith in this composer. The Castagnone prelude was a most amusing piece; and the quite different prelude by Mabel Daniels was a charming piece of impressionism. The modern revivals were excellently chosen. Hindemith's Symphony is one of the important modern scores; and Prokofieff's talents as composer and performer need no recommendation to the Boston public.

It remains only to tie up one or two other threads in this review. Dr. Koussevitzky is usually so punctilious about commemorating anniversaries that it is odd that he let slip the Balakirev centenary, especially since that composer has not been played here for a long time. The season was saddened by the death of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony from 188 to 1918, and of Arthur Foote, composer. The most important guests of the orchestra were Prokofieff in February and Dimitri Mitropoulos in January. The latter was greeted with great enthusiasm on his second term as guest conductor and again made a deep impression by his extraordinary musicianship. Of the other soloists (and there were not too many this season) the violinists Ruth Posselt and Louis Krasner, made a distinct success. The season oficially has ended, though it would be ungrateful not to remember the Pops for the next two months and the Berkshire Festival in August.

52d Season of Pops Begins Wednesday Under Fiedler

Next Wednesday night in Symphony Hall at 8:30 the Pops will begin its 52d season of concerts. Arthur Fiedler, who through the last seven seasons has brought the Pops to a greater degree of popularity than ever before, will again be in control. He will have at his bidding an orchestra of about 90 Boston Symphony players. The auditorium will appear in its summer decorations, and refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor and in the balcony as well. The Pop concerts will run nightly through May and June, with Sunday Pops included in the present month.

Arthur Fiedler has added new music of interest to the enduring favorites of former years. The concert of Thursday night, May 6, has been taken for the benefit of the Christopher Shop, at which the guest artists will be Fray and Braggioti, the two-piano team and renowned for their skillful musical parodies, and Paul Draper, the well-known dancer. Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Boston pianist, will be the soloist for the first Sunday concert. He will be heard in Grieg's Concerto.

The programs of the first week are as follows:

Wednesday Evening, May 5
OPENING NIGHT
Cortege from "Mlada" ..Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)....Balzoni
Russian Dances............A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music........Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Scenes historiques" ....Sibelius
Marche Slave.....................Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltzes. Strauss
The Way You Look Tonight........Kern
(Orchestral paraphrase by L. Caillet)
The Ride of the Valkyries........Wagner

Friday Evening, May 7
Marche Militaire...............Schubert
"Fingal's Cave," overture ..Mendelssohn
Liebestraum ....Liszt-Herbert
Persian Dance...................Guiraud
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes. Strauss
Meditation from "Thais"...... ...Massenet
Solo violin: Julius Theodorowicz
Second Hungarian Rhapsody........Liszt
Victor Herbert favorites... arr. by Sanford
Deep River............ ....arr. by Jacchia
"Pomp and Circumstance," march...Elgar

Saturday Evening, May 8
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"...........Wagner
Suite ....Corelli
Ave Maria......... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Finale from the Fourth Symphony. Tchaikovsky
A Siegfried Idyll ....Wagner
Minuet from the Symphony in G minor. Mozart
Bolero ....Ravel
"Maytime," selection ....Romberg
"Roses from the South," waltzes..Strauss
Seventh Slavonic Dance ....Dvorak

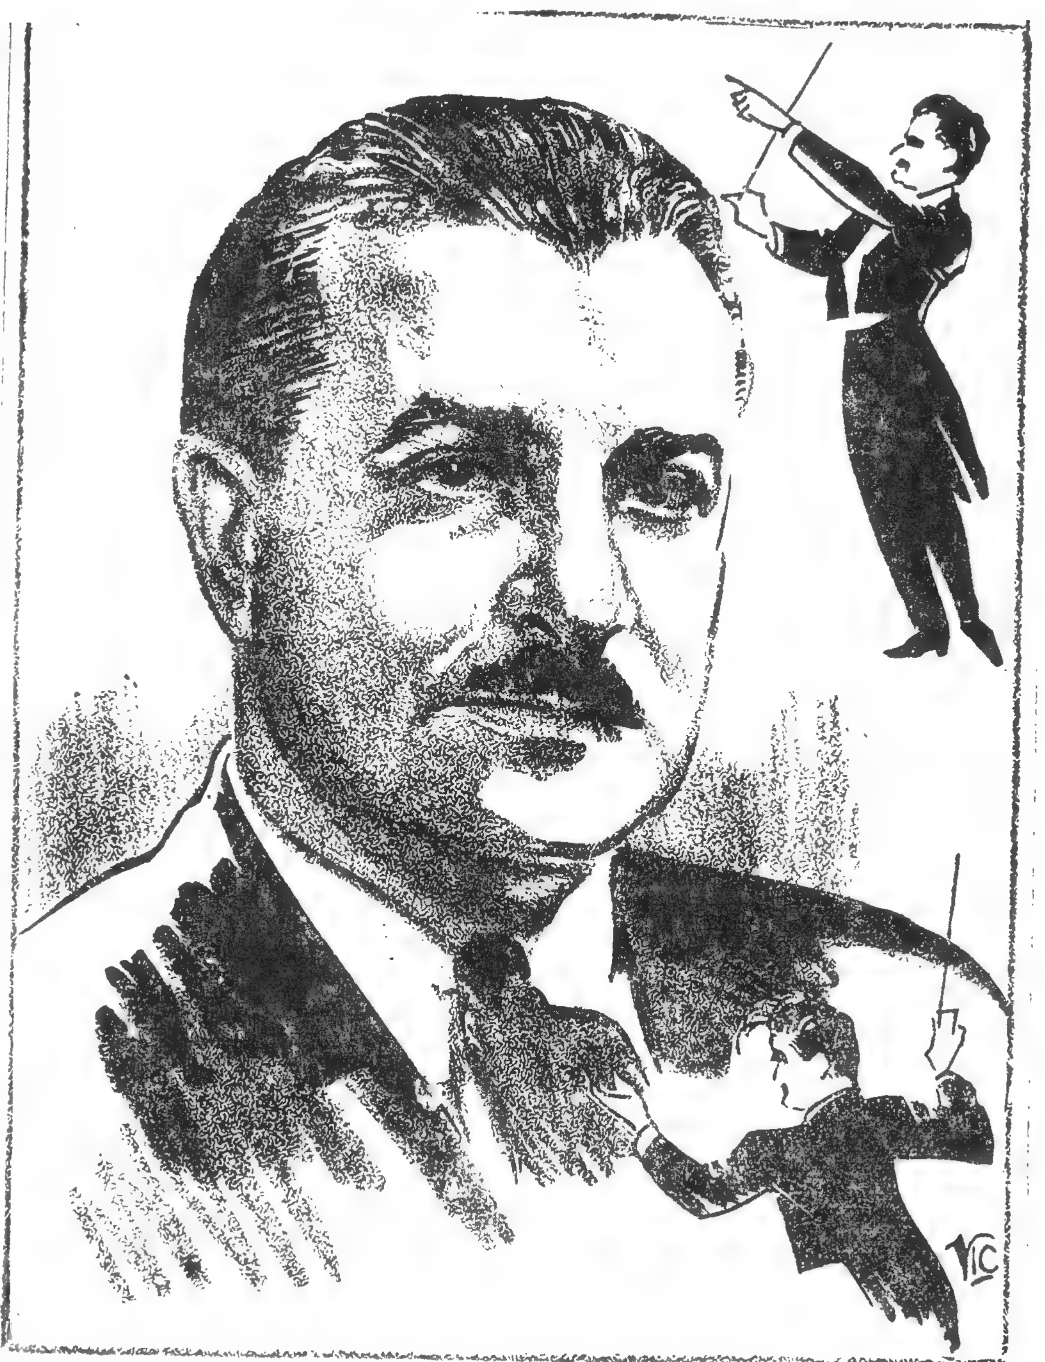
Sunday Evening, May 9
Polonaise Militaire.....Chopin-Glazounov
Suite from "Dardanus"...........Rameau
(Transcribed for orchestra by D. Lamarter)
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Second Suite from "Peer Gynt"......Grieg
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor. Grieg
Soloist: Heinrich Gebhardt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg" ....Wagner
Songs of the Volga bargemen. arr. by Jacchia
Sailor's Dance from "Red Poppy"...Gliere

Berkshire Festival Programs Are Now Announced

Dr. Koussevitzky has announced, before his departure for Europe, the programs he intends to conduct the Boston Symphony in at the summer festival in the Berkshires. An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms and other more diverse programs are planned for the two weeks' series on the beautiful Tanglewood estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, the first series of concerts occurring on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (Aug. 5, 7 and 8), and the second series on corresponding days of the following week, Aug. 12, 14 and 15.

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth and "Pastoral" symphonies, and Third "Leonore" overture; Mozart's Symphony in E Flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser, "The Valkyrie" and "Siegfried," also from "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal.' Brahms' First and Third symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture, Haydns Symphony in D Major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."



An impression of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops, which begin their 52d season at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

Symphony Audience Pays Tribute to Koussevitzky

By RUTH MARSTERS

A capacity audience rose to its feet in tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he came upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last program of the season.

The occasion was of an exceptional order from various aspects.

During the fifty-six years of the history of the organization there has perhaps never been a season so brilliant in artistic achievement as that just past.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's regime there has been evidenced a steady climb toward ever greater caliber of performance until today the orchestra stands without peer in the musical world.

These are facts of accredited truth, and are not generally unknown.

Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen a program singularly befitting the occasion of the last concerts. (The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.)

The opening work, Clementi's Symphony in D, was given its first American performance at these concerts in December of the current season.

The symphony was one of those which came to light in London in 1917 after having lain in obscurity since the composer's death.

It remained for Alfred Casella to restore the original work from the disordered manuscript, part of which had been acquired by the Library of Congress at the London auction. The missing fragments, Casella found in the British Museum.

The resurrected treasure fills a considerable gap in the history of the development of Italian music, for Clementi is here revealed as a symphonist of force and an importance that vies with his German contemporaries.

There followed Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" Suite, music of delicate substance, exquisitely performed.

It was, however, the Brahms First Symphony in C minor which which inevitably climaxed the concert.

To it Dr. Koussevitzky brought the vividness of imagination, keenness of insight, maturity of conception and poetic ardour, which are his for Brahms' music.

The orchestra again evidenced that solidity and suppleness, tonal beauty and vitality, which are among its extraordinary qualities.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 1 - 1937

Berkshire Symphonic Festival In August

The fourth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held at Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. overlooking Stockbridge bowl. The Boston symphony orchestra will assemble there for two weeks in August, giving concerts on August 5, 7, 8, 12, 14 and 15. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's leader, will return from his summer sojourn in Europe to conduct the festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky has announced part of his program. The first week will include symphonies from Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Tchaikovsky, Franck, as well as other works. The second week he will give Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a symphony by Haydn and one by Sibelius. There will also be an all Wagner and all Brahms program.

Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline has given her property, Tanglewood to the Boston symphony orchestra as a permanent home for the Berekshire symphonic festival. The surroundings are ideally suited for this purpose.

Tanglewood, established in 1849 by William Tappan of Boston, extends from West street in Lenox to Lake Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. On the shores of the lake, Chief Konkapot and the Stockbridge tribe of Indians gathered for their camp fires.

It was also at Tanglewood that Nathaniel Hawthorne lived while in the Berkshires. In the little red cottage which was burned 36 years glewood Tales" and wrote "The ago, Hawthorne first told his "Tan-House of the Seven Gables."

The list of community chairmen includes Mrs. Allan Craig of Torrington.

"Pops" Open Wednesday; Art

Symphony Season in Review; Consolidating Success

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

It is no doubt stupid, and possibly dangerous, to take an institution for granted; but it borders on smugness to sing its praises, likes the jolly miller, "from morn till eve." Thus the Boston Symphony is a splendid orchestra, very likely the best in the world, and it has played magnificently throughout the season that has just been concluded. The public knows this, though it sometimes forgets what an immense privilege it is for Boston to be able to boast such an organization. Is it a critical duty to remind the public of this fact in glowing terms each Saturday morning? Or is it wiser to keep hosannas within modest bounds and concentrate on the music? With the posing of this problem, we shall now take the latter course.

Last year it was observed on all sides that Dr. Koussevitzky had become much more conservative with regard to the introduction of new music. Less than a dozen new works were brought forward, and the same is true of this season. If this meant that the programs merely ran a treadmill of the symphonies, concertos, tone poems and overtures that are thrice familiar, there would be cause for alarm. That, however, is not the case, although Brahms. Beethoven and Mozart, as the most represented composers, might give an impression of extreme conservatism.

BROADENING THE BASE

Actually the symphonies of Mozart, outside the three greatest, are rarely played. Together with the symphonies of Haydn they offer a rich field whereby to widen the repertoire. It was then an excellent idea to play three of the less well known Mozart symphonies and a serenade in addition to the E flat and the No. 102 of Haydn in addition to the hackneyed "Surprise." Moreover Beethoven was represented by the 2nd and 4th, neither of which is too frequently heard, and Mr. Mitropoulos's version of the long C sharp minor string quartet.

Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky is still seriously pursuing a very important goal, that of widening the symphonic reportoire by revivals of works that have not received their due recognition. No one can doubt the wisdom of this policy. You have only to look at the place that Sibelius now occupies to realize what can be accomplished in the work of changing the rut of public opinion into a road. Last year Dr. Koussevitzky revived symphonies by Taneiev, Bruckner, Glazounov, Rachmaninov, Mahler and others, This year we had Liszt's Faust Symphony, Kalinnikov's Symphony, the 8th of Bruckner, the 5th and 7th of Sibelius, Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony, Mahler's "Lied von der Erde," the 2nd and 4th of Schumann and the remarkable discovery in Clementi's Symphony in D, which was given its first American performance in December and repeated at the final concert.

That is a good record, and it becomes even better when we take into account such other revivals as Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebasian," MacDowell's Piano Concerto No. 2 and the two concertos of Dvorak. It was also gratifying that there was somewhat less emphasis on Strauss than in the past few years. His tone poems are wonderful vehicles of orchestral display, and obviously Dr. Koussevitzky loves to conduct them and to show off the qualties of the Boston Symphony in them. But they can and have been overworked. Altogether, from the point of view of a wide choice of music, the season was extremely interesting.

MODERN SCORES

In the realm of modern music 12 works were played for the first time at the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony and there were revivals of Hindemith's "Mathias der Maler" Symphony and Prokofieff's Scythian Suite and 3rd Piano Concerto. There was only one "world premiere," Werner Josten's cerebral and dismal Symphony in F. The following works were played for the first time in America: Berg's Violin Concerto, Castagnone's Preludio Giocoso, Malipiero's Piano Concerto, Messiaen's "Les Offrandes oubliees," Roussel's "Rapsodie Flamande," and Shaporin's Symphony.

The most pretentious of these was the Shaporin Symphony. It was supposed to have political implications and was certainly bombastic enough for anybody. It was also elaborate and difficult to play, but even the performance that Mr. Burgin and the orchestra lavished on it did not convince us that the Soviet genius had at last been found. Unquestionably the most original music was the Berg Concerto. This was an exceedingly interesting work, not one to win immediate general approval, nevertheless music that was deeply felt and individually expressed by the composer. Oliver Messiaen's composition was also a moving piece of writing, though on a smaller and simpler scale.

Two remarkable works in more cheerful mood were Roussel's Rhapsody and Malipiero's Piano Concerto. The former, as we might expect from the eminent French composer, was deftly wrought and an exceptionally attractive piece of national music. It showed that the composer of the admirable 3rd and 4th Symphonies has not come to the end of his powers by any means. Malipiero's Concerto was a surprise, for it did not resemble the rather abstruse Violin Concerto played here a few years ago. It did not withdraw intellectually from the world, as the Italian composer has often written, but was brightly and effectively direct. Furthermore in performance it justified Mr. Mitropoulos in conducting and playing at the same time, which the disappointing Respighi's Toccata did not.

Berezowsky's Third Symphony justified Dr. Koussevitzky's faith in this composer. The Castagnone prelude was a most amusing piece; and the quite different prelude by Mabel Daniels was a charming piece of impressionism. The modern revivals were excellently chosen. Hindemith's Symphony is one of the important modern scores; and Prokofieff's talents as composer and performer need no recommendation to the Boston public.

It remains only to tie up one or two other threads in this review. Dr. Koussevitzky is usually so punctilious about commemorating anniversaries that it is odd that he let slip the Balakirev centenary, especially since that composer has not been played here for a long time. The season was saddened by the death of Charles A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony from 1885 to 1918, and of Arthur Foote, composer. The most important guests of the orchestra were Prokofieff in February and Dimitri Mitropoulos in January. The latter was greeted with great enthusiasm on his second term as guest conductor and again made a deep impression by his extraordinary musicianship. Of the other soloists (and there were not too many this season) the violinists Ruth Posselt and Louis Krasner, made a distinct success. The season oficially has ended, though it would be ungrateful not to remember the Pops for the next two months and the Berkshire Festival in August.

52d Season of Pops Begins Wednesday Under Fiedler

Next Wednesday night in Symphony Hall at 8:30 the Pops will begin its 52d season of concerts. Arthur Fiedler, who through the last seven seasons has brought the Pops to a greater degree of popularity than ever before, will again be in control. He will have at his bidding an orchestra of about 90 Boston Symphony players. The auditorium will appear in its summer decorations, and refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor and in the balcony as well. The Pop concerts will run nightly through May and June, with Sunday Pops included in the present month.

Arthur Fiedler has added new music of interest to the enduring favorites of former years. The concert of Thursday night, May 6, has been taken for the benefit of the Christopher Shop, at which the guest artists will be Fray and Braggioti, the two-piano team and renowned for their skillful musical parodies, and Paul Draper, the well-known dancer. Heinrich Gebhard, the noted Boston pianist, will be the soloist for the first Sunday concert. He will be heard in Grieg's Concerto.

The programs of the first week are as follows:

Wednesday Evening, May 5
OPENING NIGHT
Cortege from "Mlada"...Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)....Balzoni
Russian Dances............A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music.......Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Scenes historiques" ....Sibelius
Marche Slave..............Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltzes. Strauss
The Way You Look Tonight........Kern
(Orchestral paraphrase by L. Caillet)
The Ride of the Valkyries........Wagner

Friday Evening, May 7
Marche Militaire..............Schubert
"Fingal's Cave," overture...Mendelssohn
Liebestraum ....Liszt-Herbert
Persian Dance..................Guiraud
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes. Strauss
Meditation from "Thais".......Massenet
Solo violin: Julius Theodorowicz
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.......Liszt
Victor Herbert favorites... arr by Sanford
Deep River.................arr. by Jacchia
"Pomp and Circumstance," march...Elgar

Saturday Evening, May 8
Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"..........Wagner
Suite ....Corelli
Ave Maria..........Schubert-Wilhelmj
Finale from the Fourth Symphony. Tchaikovsky
A Siegfried Idyll...............Wagner
Minuet from the Symphony in G minor. Mozart
Bolero ....Ravel
"Maytime," selection ....Romberg
"Roses from the South," waltzes..Strauss
Seventh Slavonic Dance..........Dvorak

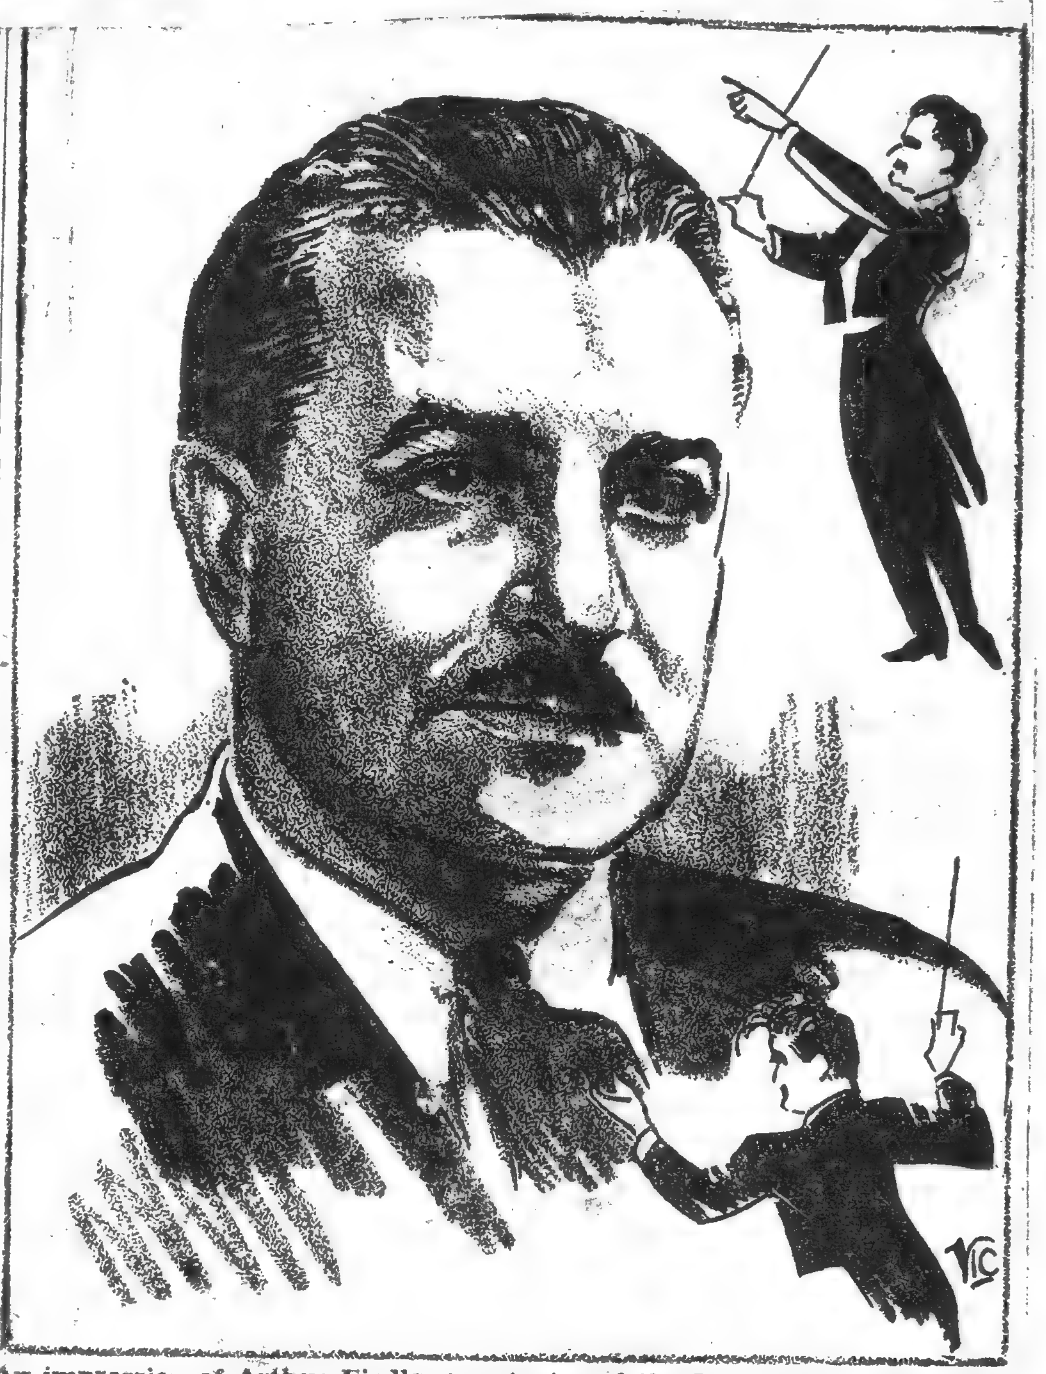
Sunday Evening, May 9
Polonaise Militaire......Chopin-Glazounov
Suite from "Dardanus"..........Rameau
(Transcribed for orchestra by De Lamarter)
Valse Triste....................Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Second suite from "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor. Grieg
Soloist: Heinrich Gebhardt
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnburg" ....Wagner
Songs of the Volga bargemen. arr. by Jacchia
Sailor's Dance from "Red Poppy"...Gliere

Berkshire Festival Programs Are Now Announced

Dr. Koussevitzky has announced, before his departure for Europe, the programs he intends to conduct the Boston Symphony in at the summer festival in the Berkshires. An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms and other more diverse programs are planned for the two weeks' series on the beautiful Tanglewood estate between Lenox and Stockbridge, the first series of concerts occurring on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (Aug. 5, 7 and 8), and the second series on corresponding days of the following week, Aug. 12, 14 and 15.

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programs in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth and "Pastoral" symphonies, and Third "Leonore" overture: Mozart's Symphony in E Flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome" and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

For the second week, the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser, "The Valkyrie" and "Siegfried," also from "Tristan and Isolde," "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal.' Brahms' First and Third symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture, Haydns Symphony in D Major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."



An impression of Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the Pops, which begin their 52d season at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening.

American, May 1

Symphony Audience Pays Tribute to Koussevitzky

By RUTH MARSTERS

A capacity audience rose to its feet in tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he came upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the last program of the season.

The occasion was of an exceptional order from various aspects.

During the fifty-six years of the history of the organization there has perhaps never been a season so brilliant in artistic achievement as that just past.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's regime there has been evidenced a steady climb toward ever greater caliber of performance until today the orchestra stands without peer in the musical world.

These are facts of accredited truth, and are not generally unknown.

Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen a program singularly befitting the occasion of the last concerts. (The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.)

The opening work, Clementi's Symphony in D, was given its first American performance at these concerts in December of the current season.

The symphony was one of those which came to light in London in 1917 after having lain in obscurity since the composer's death.

It remained for Alfred Casella to restore the original work from the disordered manuscript, part of which had been acquired by the Library of Congress at the London auction. The missing fragments, Casella found in the British Museum.

The resurrected treasure fills a considerable gap in the history of the development of Italian music, for Clementi is here revealed as a symphonist of force and an importance that vies with his German contemporaries.

There followed Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" Suite, music of delicate substance, exquisitely performed.

It was, however, the Brahms First Symphony in C minor which which inevitably climaxed the concert.

To it Dr. Koussevitzky brought the vividness of imagination, keenness of insight, maturity of conception and poetic ardour, which are his for Brahms' music.

The orchestra again evidenced that solidity and suppleness, tonal beauty and vitality, which are among its extraordinary qualities.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
MAY 1 - 1937

Berkshire Symphonic Festival In August

The fourth annual Berkshire symphonic festival will be held at Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. overlooking Stockbridge bowl. The Boston symphony orchestra will assemble there for two weeks in August, giving concerts on August 5, 7, 8, 12, 14 and 15. Serge Koussevitzky, the orchestra's leader, will return from his summer sojourn in Europe to conduct the festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky has announced part of his program. The first week will include symphonies from Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Tchaikovsky, Franck, as well as other works. The second week he will give Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," a symphony by Haydn and one by Sibelius. There will also be an all Wagner and all Brahms program.

Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline has given her property, Tanglewood to the Boston symphony orchestra as a permanent home for the Berekshire symphonic festival. The surroundings are ideally suited for this purpose.

Tanglewood, established in 1849 by William Tappan of Boston, extends from West street in Lenox to Lake Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. On the shores of the lake, Chief Konkapot and the Stockbridge tribe of Indians gathered for their camp fires.

It was also at Tanglewood that Nathaniel Hawthorne lived while in the Berkshires. In the little red cottage which was burned 36 years glewood Tales" and wrote "The ago, Hawthorne first told his "Tan-House of the Seven Gables."

The list of community chairmen includes Mrs. Allan Craig of Torrington.

56

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post, May 2/37

Pops Concerts Resume on Wednesday

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

IN the spring, to paraphrase Tennyson, the Symphony Orchestra's fancy lovingly turns to thoughts of lighter things. By next Wednesday evening Symphony Hall will be transformed within, sombre red giving way to vernal green, tables replacing chairs upon the floor, and at 8:30 Arthur Fiedler will lead an orchestra of 90 men through the first number of the first concert of the 52d season of the Pops. To judge from the reservations already made for special nights, this will be the most successful season of all, although the records of its immediate predecessors will be hard to better.

The programme for the opening concert follows familiar lines. The novel numbers are Schoenherr's Austrian Peasant Music and Lucien Caillet's paraphrase of Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight"; the unfamiliar ones, a cortege from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Mlada," Tcherepnin's Russian Dances and a movement, "Festivo," from Sibelius' "Scenes Historiques." For the rest, this initial programme offers Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, Bolzoni's Minuet, the Slavic March of Tchaikovsky, Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods" Waltzes, and Wagner's Ride of the Valkyries. The concert of Thursday evening will be for the benefit of the Christopher Shop, when the two-piano team of Fray and Braggiotti and the dancer, Paul Draper, will be the guest artists. At the concert of next Sunday evening Heinrich Gebhard will be the soloist, playing the Piano Concerto of Grieg.

* * * *

The symphony season which ended last evening was the orchestra's 56th, and Dr. Koussevitzky's 13th as its director. In brief retrospect this season would seem to have given us relatively few new or even unfamiliar pieces, and even more eloquent performances of familiar items than those of the past. This superiority in the matter of performance is, of course, something that cannot be measured, but the relative absence of novel music is a matter of record.

Four composers were represented for the first time at these concerts: Muzio Clementi (who died in 1832), Olivier Messiaen, Riccardo Castagnone and Yuri Shaporin. We are indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for Clementi's sturdy Symphony in D and Messiaen's unconvincing "Les Offrandes oubliees," and to Mr. Mitropoulos for Castagnone's brilliant "Prelude Giocoso." Mr. Mitropoulos gave us three other Italian works of interest: Malipiero's Piano Concerto and Respighi's Concerto, in both of which he was soloist and conductor, and a suite from Casella's "La Donna Serpente," played at a Monday evening concert. Dr. Koussevitzky's most effective contributions to the store of novelty were the notable Violin Concerto of Alban Berg; the exhilarating Flemish Rhapsody of Roussel; an early symphony of Mozart, in A major; and the pleasing Divertimento from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss." A symphony by the Russian Shaporin, conducted by Mr. Burgin, and symphonies by Werner Josten and Nicolai Berezowsky, conducted by their respective composers, came and went and seem not likely to disturb us again. The same may be said of the Second Piano Concerto of Leo Sowerby, which Dr. Koussevitzky introduced at a Monday concert.

* * * *

To select outstanding performances, where the general level of interpretation and execution was giddily high, is not an easy task. But here are a few for the records: the Lament from Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" and Beethoven's C-sharp minor Quartet (as arranged and conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos); the First and Fourth Symphonies of Brahms and Bruckner's Eighth; Haydn's Symphony in B-flat; the "Faust Symphony" of Liszt; Mahler's "Song of the Earth"; Mozart's Symphony in E-flat; Schumann's Symphony in C major (conducted by Mr. Mitropoulos); Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll"; the "Forest Murmers" from "Siegfried", and above all, the Pension Fund performance of Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew." To the enjoyment of the season as a whole the programme notes of John N. Burk again made valuable contribution.

The native composers fared not too well this season. Messrs. Josten and Berezewsky are Americans by adoption only, and otherwise the pieces from American hands were MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto, played by Howard Goding; the late Arthur Foote's "Night Piece," and Miss Daniels' "Deep Forest," and the concerto of Sowerby noted above.

Symphony's Vivid Close

Am. May 2/37

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE FIFTY-SIXTH season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a brilliant conclusion with the twenty-fourth regular pair of concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The occasions were singularly stirring. As Dr. Koussevitzky came upon the stage to conduct the last program, the capacity audiences of each concert rose to its feet in tribute to conductor and orchestra. And well they might!

The achievements of this great musical organization under its distinguished conductor during the season past have added gloriously to its long and honorable record.

It has been the privilege of its audiences to hear the great works of the classic literature in performances of the utmost rarity of caliber.

At the same time there has been no lack of representative contemporary efforts, and quick and unerring as has Dr. Koussevitsky's perception of true worth always been the programs have continued toc ontain only the most significant of the new works.

* * *

IN THE Orchestra's concerts in New York and elsewhere on tour it has been more than ever acclaimed during the past season, so that Boston audiences,—and the Boston press—seem a little apathetic in comparison.

It is impossible, of course, to be continually composing eulogies on the excellence of the orchestra and the musical personality of the conductor. But neither should the extraordinary be taken for granted just because it is familiar.

It is generally acceeded by those with experience to judge that the Boston Orchestra is one with which few in the world can vie, and none surpass. A fact which should make us all very proud, and not a little humble.

It was a fairly typical program which Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen for the last concerts.

The opening work, Clementi's Symphony in D, as revised by Alfredo Casella, was first performed in America at these concerts in December of the current season.

The resurrected treasure is one that certainly deserves a place in the established repertoire of the orchestra. The product of the mature genius, who, raised in the tradition of Scarlatti, lived to absorb the influence of Beethoven, this symphony appears to be possessed of certain salient qualities of both.

* * *

CASELLA has pieced it together in its present state from manuscript which had come into the possession of the library of Congress at Washington upon its emergence from the obscurity in which it had lain since the death of the composer, and fragments found in the Bitish Museum.

Casella's work has been purely that of restoring the original, and the orchestration is Clementi's own.

One might dwell at length on the delicate precision and power of the performance of the Clementi, of the exquisite poetry of performance brought to Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" Suite which followed.

But it was necessarily the Brahms First Symphony in C mior, concluding the program, necessarily climaxed the whole.

* * *

ACCORDING to D. Millar Craig, Brahms carried the manuscript of the entire symphony around with him for fourteen years before he himself considered it finishred and consented to its performance (in Carlsruhe) in 1876.

Dr. Koussevitzky brought to the reading of the Brahms Symphony that keenness of perception, and fire of enthusiasm, which mark his customary interpretation of Brahms music.

The orchestra sounded never more sonorous. Again one could not but marvel at its tonal splendour, its solidity, and vitality.

* * *

THIS WEEK AT THE POPS

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MAY 5
OPENING NIGHT

Cortege from "Mlada"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)	Bolzoni
Russian Dances	A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music	Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Scenes Historiques"	Sibelius
Marche Slave	Tchaikovsky
"Tales From the Vienna Woods," Waltzes	Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight" (Orchestral paraphrase by L. Caillet)	Kern
The Ride of the Valkyries	Wagner

Friday evening, May 7:

FRIDAY EVENING, MAY 7

Marche Militaire	Schubert
"Fingal's Cave," Overture	Mendelssohn
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
Persian Dance	Guiraud
"By the Beautiful Blue Danue," Waltzes	Strauss
Meditation from "Thais" Solo violin: Julius Teodorowicz	Massenet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody	Liszt
Victor Herbert Favorites	Arranged by Sanford
Deep River	Arranged by Jacchia
"Pomp and Circumstance," March	Elgar

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 8

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Suite	Corelli
Ave Maria	Schubert-Wilhelmj
Finale From the Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
A Siegfried Idyll	Wagner
Minuet From the Symphony in G Minor	Mozart
Bolero	Ravel
"Maytime," Selection	Romberg
"Roses From the South," Waltzes	Strauss
Seventh Slavonic Dance	Dvorak

It Is Maytime and The Pops Are Here

May 2 Adv

The 52nd season of that ever popular form of spring entertainment, the Pops, will open in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening at 8:15.

Arthur Fiedler will again conduct the Pops orchestra which will be made up of about 90 Symphony players. As has been his custom in his six consecutive seasons as director of these concerts, Mr. Fiedler will present many novelties in addition to the standard Pops fare.

The auditorium will be decorated in its usual informal fashion, and refreshments will be served.

The program for opening night is fairly typical of those to follow. There will be included Rimsky-Korsakov's "Cortege" from "Mlada," overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntala," Russian dances by Tcherepnin, Austrian peasant music by Schonherr, and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave."

A minuet for string orchestra by Bolzoni, an excerpt from Sibelius' "Scenes Historiques," Strauss' waltzes, "Tales From the Vienna Woods," Jerome Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight," and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" lend diversity enough.

Thursday evening's concert will be given for the benefit of the Christopher Shop.

As guest artists on this occasion, Marie Braggiotti and Jacques Fray will perform the former's "Spanish Rhapsody," written in the form of a concerto for orchestra and two pianos, as well as De Falla's "The Fire Dance" and "Variations on Yankee Doodle."

The latter, as arranged by Braggiotti, is a parody on the styles of Bach, Chopin, Beethoven, Debussy and George Gershwin.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

MAY 3 - 1937

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL PROGRAMS PLANNED

The first announcement of the programs to be given at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been made by Serge Koussevitzky. The celebrated conductor and his orchestra will be making their second annual appearance in the Festival, which last summer they raised to national fame.

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms program have been planned by Koussevitzky as concerts of special summer festival character. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the beautiful "Tanglewood" estate, between Lenox, Mass., and Stockbridge, Mass., offer in their entirety a panoramic view of the great musical literature of the symphony, from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikowsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel, and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two week ends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAY

Dr. Koussevitzky Sails Today For Paris

Boston Symphony Conductor To Return in July To Plan for Festival

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sailed from New York today aboard the S.S. Paris for a quiet vacation at his home in Paris. He plans to return in July to make plans for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Aug. 5 7 and 8 and Aug. 12, 14 and 15 at "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge.

As the eminent conductor boarded the ship he was handed a telegram from his Berkshire friends bidding him bon voyage and telling him that more than 1700 music lovers had taken out Festival membership. Ninety-eight have taken boxes. These two groups represent more than 2500 individuals The latest patron is Mrs. Matthew John Whittall, of Worcester and Washington, well known patron of music.

Accompanying Dr. Koussevitzky were Mrs. Koussevitzky and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY - 1937

KOUSS VITZKY IS TAKING VACATION

Boston, May 4. — (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went to New York today to sail aboard the S. S. Paris for a quiet vacation at his home in Paris.

Accompanying the conductor were his wife, Mrs. Koussevitzky, and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff. He plans to return here late in July to complete preparations for the Berkshire symphonic festival in August.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAY 4 - 1937

Koussevitzky to Vacation in Paris

BOSTON, May 4 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was en route to New York today where he will sail at noon aboard the S. S. Paris for a quiet vacation at his home in Paris.

Accompanying the conductor were his wife, Mrs. Koussevitzky and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff. He plans to return here late in July to complete preparations for the Berkshire symphonic festival in August.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—MAY 2, 1937

Gossip of the Town

MAYBE WE'RE CRAZY: Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wanted to give his fellow-virtuosi a rare threat. He didn't tell them what it was because he desired suspense and thrill. Now people who play and study and rehearse and teach music all their lives would prefer what kind of a holiday—do you think? We'd imagine they'd like to bury their instruments in the back yard and go to the circus, or play golf, or attend a wrestling match. Nothing like that.

The boys with their wives and friends, at the invitation of the conductor, got together in a private and exclusive, no-admission-charge group in Symphony Hall. The surprise was a 13-year-old lad Dr. Koussevitzky had brought over from New York. For an hour and some 15 minutes this prodigy played exquisitely on his violin the music of Saint Saens and Beethoven.

When it was over the musicians came out of the hall kissing the tips of their fingers and exclaiming: "Perfect!" "Wonderful!" "What technique!" "What tone!" "A-a-h!" "O-o-o-h!" It was very plain to a man they had simply had one wow of a time. A musician's idea of a holiday is more music.

GREAT RESPONSE TO BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Nationwide response is being shown toward the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts which will be given on Aug. 5, 7 and 8 and 12, 14 and 15 at "Tanglewood," the 210-acre estate recently presented to the Boston Symphony by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston as a permanent home for the festival. The membership lists close today, but all applications bearing the April 30 cancellation will be honored. Full memberships include the six concerts, sustaining memberships, either of the two week-ends.

Among the 90 box-holders already secured are Edward Taft of Boston; Albert Spalding, famous violinist; Miss Mabel Choate, Owen Johnson, Grenville L. Winthrop, Giraud Foster and Alan M. Limburg. Applications for membership have been received from every New England state, from Canada, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Ohio, Florida, North Carolina and even California.

Prices may be obtained by telephoning Symphony Hall, and applications for membership should be sent to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., at Stockbridge, Mass.

Gala Season of Pops Opens This Week

Tyrolienne Pops

New ideas are constantly in demand for Pops benefits, where original motives are increasingly difficult to find. The laurels for planning a different setting must go to the committee from the Infants' Hospital for creating the "Tyrolienne Pops." Mrs Ernest Dane Jr of Brookline is the chairman of this committee.

Two of the highlights of this unique "Pops" are the tyroleon yodeller and his sister who plays a guitar while he, an enormous Bavarian, in a colorfully embroidered costume, sings the folk songs of his country. Miss Evelyn Hollingsworth of Milton is in charge of the program. In charge of those distributing these programs is Miss Barbara Bremer and her committee includes Miss Beth C. Cabot, Mrs Harland Warren, Miss Frances Hovey, Mrs Francis C. Welch, Miss Susan Morse, Mrs Thornton W. Scott, Mrs Marshall Fabian Jr, Miss Sue Ayre, Miss Agnes Osborne, Miss Joanna Palfrey, Miss Mary Bird, Miss Alida Goodwin, Miss Dorothea Merriman, Miss Julia Barbour, Mrs James Parker 2d, Miss Eleanor Thompson, Miss Mary Bigelow, Miss Abigail Adams, Miss Eleanor Little, Miss Molly Ayre, Miss Rebecca Perry, Mrs William Perry, Miss Barbara Putnam, Miss Hollis Prince, Miss Marion Minot, Miss Susan Russell, Mrs Joseph Emery, Mrs Charles F. Hovey, Miss Virginia Ward, and Mrs Carl J. Gilbert.

Among the many members of the Ladies' Aid committee, of which Mrs Ernest Dane Jr is chairman, are Mrs Gordon Abbott Jr, Mrs John S. Ames Jr, Mrs T. P. Beal Jr, Mrs Thomas Blumer, Mrs Samuel Cabot, Mrs William Caswell, Mrs F. C. Church Jr, Mrs Lawrence Coolidge, [illegible] W. Cutler, Mrs Charles

POPS BEGIN TONIGHT

Tonight at 8:30, the 52d season of the famous Pop concerts will begin in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler, who begins his eighth consecutive season as the most popular leader the Pops have ever had, will direct an orchestra of approximately 90 players. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of the auditorium. The opening program mingles old favorites with numbers new to the Pops:

Procession of Nobles from "Mlada," Rimsky-Korsakov; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Minuet (for string orchestra), Bolzoni; Three Russian Dances, A. Tcherepnin; Austrian Peasant Music, Schonherr; Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Historic Scenes," Sibelius; Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes, Strauss; "The Way You Look Tonight," Kern; (Symphonic paraphrase by L. Cailliet); The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Gl. May 2

Patronesses for Radcliffe Pops

——Taking their cue from the success of last year's "Radcliffe at the Pops," members of the Radcliffe Club of Boston have planned to repeat this type of party to aid the Regional Scholarship Fund, on Tuesday evening, May 11.

Prominent among the patronesses for this event are Miss Kathryn Adams, Mrs Fannie Fern Andrews, Mrs Louis M. Atherton, Mrs Percy A. Atherton, Miss Mary Bacon, Mrs Charles S. Bolster, Mrs Arthur B. Brooks, Mrs John Graham Brooks, Mrs John S. Browning, Mrs James B. Conant.

Also included are: Mrs W. F. Earlé, Mrs Sidney Fay, Miss Abigail A. Eliot, Miss Jennie Cummings, Mrs Frederic L. Day, Mrs James Donovan, Mrs Seth T. Gano, Mrs A. Barr Comstock, Mrs Louis L. Green, Miss Elinor Gregoy, Mrs E. C. Greene, Mrs Pinckney Holbrook, Miss Caroline L. Humphrey, Miss Edith Johnson, Miss E. Elizabeth Jones, Mrs Wilbury K. Jordan and Miss Mary W. Killam.

Others are: Mrs Al Karl Koch Jr, Mrs Frederick W. C. Lieder, Mrs Atherton Loring Jr, Miss Catherine B. McCoy, Miss Alice M. Maginnis, Mrs John M. Maguire, Miss Doris C. Mann, Miss Penelope B. Noyes, Mrs Paul S. Phenix, Mrs Henry W. Porter, Miss Rose Sherman, Mrs Arthur P. Stone, Mrs Somers H. Sturgis, Mrs Richard W. Thorpe, Mrs John S. Vaughan, Mrs Kenneth G. T. Webster, Miss Margaret C. Williams and Mrs S. Burt Wolbach.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAY 5 - 1937

Koussevitzky Sails For Vacation in Paris

NEW YORK, May 4 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed at noon aboard the S. S. Paris for a vacation at his home in Paris.

Accompanying the conductor were his wife, Mrs. Koussevitzky, and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff. He plans to return late in July to complete preparations for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August.

A most gala Pops in retrospect—the attractive junior committee for last season's American Night at Pops for the Christopher Shop, who are again engaged in plans, many of them, for this season's Christopher Shop Pops on Thursday of this week. From left to right are Miss Peggy Macomber, Miss Mimi Little, Miss Betty Watson, Miss Betty Titcomb, Mrs Richard P. Waters Jr (Joan Chapin), Miss Priscilla Phelan and Miss Martha Chapin.

music.

May 5

POPS OPEN TONIGHT

Tonight at 8:30, the 52d season of the famous Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler, who begins his eighth consecutive season as the most popular leader the Pops have ever had, will direct an orchestra of approximately 90 players. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of the auditorium. The opening program mingles old favorites with numbers new to the Pops:

Procession of Nobles from "Mlada".... Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala"........Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra).....Bolzoni
Three Russian Dances.......A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music........Schonherr
Festive (tempo di bolero) from "Historic Scenes"......................Sibelius
Marche Slave ....Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," waltzes Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight".......Kern (Symphonic paraphrase by L. Cailliet)
The Ride of the Valkyries.........Wagner

AT POPS TONIGHT

Prices for the pop concert at Symphony Hall tonight have been advanced to benefit the Christopher Shop. Tonight will be known as "radio night" for the first part of the program will be broadcast. Arthur Fiedler will conduct. The program follows:

French Military March from the "Algerian Suite" .... Saint-Saens
Suite from "Dardanus"..........Rameau
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" Wagner
Waltzes, "Wine, Woman and Song".Strauss
Roumanian Rhapsody ....Enesco
Jacques Fray and Mario Braggiotti In Music for two Pianos
Spanish Rhapsody.......Mario Braggiotti
Ritual Fire Dance...............de Falla
Variations on Yankee Doodle Mario Braggiotti
Paul Draper Creative interpretations of the Dance (with orchestra)
Suite from "Alcina"............Handel
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes Strauss
Malaguena ....Lecuona-Grofe

Mrs Alfred Kidder 2d of 5 Shady Hill Square, Cambridge, heads the busy committee planning Tyrolienne Night at the Pops on May 10 for the benefit of the Infants' Hospital.

Christopher Shop Pops

——Black and silver will be the prevailing accents at the Christopher Shop Pops on Thursday evening, although the decoration motif remains a secret, except to committee members and the chance vendors, who are to wear costumes and headdress to harmonize with the general scheme. Paul Draper, Jacque Fray and Mario Braggiotti will be the popular soloists at this early Pops benefit.

Recent subscribers include Mrs Nelson W. Aldrich, Mrs Max Whiting, Mrs James Jackson, Mrs Sidney Winslow, Mr and Mrs George Lewis Jr, Mrs John C. Dinsmoor, Mrs Paul Clark, Mrs Marshall Dwinnell and Mrs Henry Clark.

SPECIAL NIGHT AT POPS

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Arthur Fiedler conductor, at which the prices will be advanced for the benefit of the Christopher Shop, is called "Radio Night," and the first part of the program will be broadcast while the audience views the operation. The program follows:

60n.6

French Military March from the "Algerian Suite," Saint-Saens; Suite from "Dardanus," Rameau; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Waltzes, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; Rumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; Jacques Fray and Mario Braggiotti in music for two pianos: Spanish Rhapsody, Mario Braggiotti; Ritual Fire Dance, de Falla; Variations on Yankee Doodle, Mario Braggiotti; Paul Draper; Creative interpretations of the Dance (with orchestra), Suite from "Alcina," Handel; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes, Strauss; Malagueña Lecuona-Grofe.

57

58

Christopher Shop 'Pops' Will Attract Social Leaders to Symphony Hall

Koussevitzky Declines Visit to Coronation

Symphony Conductor Sails from New York Today for Paris Vacation

Although Serge Koussevitzky has been invited to attend the Coronation of King George VI, he has declined the invitation.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made known that fact, before leaving for New York to sail today in the French liner Paris for a vacation at his home in the French capital. He is accompanied by his wife and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Koussevitzky plans a quiet vacation to prepare for the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, the estate of the Boston orchestra between Lenox and Pittsfield. The festival will be held Aug. 5 to 15 and the conductor is keenly interested in it.

Before leaving Boston he stated he had been invited to witness the Coronation ceremony but did not make known the name of the person from whom the invitation came.

George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra accompanied the party to New York and will watch them sail.

Smart Hostesses Busy Planning Gay Dinner Parties Prior to Attending This Annual Event for 'Sweet Charity

SYMPHONY HALL WILL be packed from pit to dome on Thursday evening . . . when the smartest of the smart will assemble to watch Arthur Fiedler conduct the "Christopher Shop Pop Concert for 1937" . . . one of the gayest of the many gay events happening this gay spring season.

As usual a series of dinner parties precedes this annual benefit concert . . . pursuasive debs and post-debs will trip about the hall and corridors . . . even out on the entrance steps to Symphony . . . selling chances on a motor car of popular make . . . the hall will be gaily decorated in silver and black . . . it seems there's a definite reason for this particular color scheme, which will be divulged to the audience during the evening.

Among the attractive girls . . . selling motor car tickets and fragrant blooms for the honor and glory of Christopher Shop . . . one of society's pet philanthropies . . . will be Anne Howard and Priscilla Weld . . . of the post-debutante set . . . representing next year's crop of debbies will be Virginia Prout . . . daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Prout of Chestnut Hill . . . Cynthia Haskell . . . whose parents are the George Haskells of Beacon street . . . Deborah Sprague . . . the Charles F. Spragues' bud . . . Anna Benedict . . . daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Edward B. Benedict of Chestnut Hill . . . Jean Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Carpenter's new debutante . . . and Nancy Nye, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Robert N. Nye of Chestnut Hill.

Mrs. John C. Dinsmoor, Mrs. Paul Foster Clark, Mrs. Nelson Aldrich and Mrs. Franklin Hobbs are among the patronesses bringing on dinner guests to the benefit "pops."

Table reservations for this annual event have been made by Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, Jr. . . . who has invited a group of young friends of her daughter, Nancy Cochrane . . . one of the past season's deb flock . . . to listen to the excellent program conducted by Arthur Fiedler . . . watch Paul Draper's trio of dance numbers . . . including his unique interpretation of the Blue Danube waltz . . . and hear the celebrated two-piano team of Fray and Braggiotti play a Spanish Rhapsody . . . written by this talented member of Boston's famous Bragiotti family.

Also entertaining guests at Symphony Thursday evening are Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Dunbar Lockwood, Mrs. Robert Gould Shaw, 2d, Mrs. Henry Lyman, Mrs. Clemenet Houghton, Mrs. George Peabody Gardner, Mrs. Galen Stone, Mrs. John Buttrick, Mrs. Charles Lee, Mrs. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. William Constable, Mrs. Bernard C. Weld, Mrs. William Whitman, Mrs. Harry Goodwin, Mrs. Roland M. Baker, Mrs. Richard D. Fay, Mrs. Peter Hunter Thompson, Mrs. Horace Morison, Mrs. J. Harleston Parker, Mrs. Lloyd Cabot Briggs, Mrs. Charles Blanchard and Mrs. Channing Wells.

A brilliant array of smart set members will turn out on Wednesday evening for the very first of the numerous benefit pop concerts . . . this particular one for Baldwinsville Hospital Cottages for children.

Before going on to Symphony Hall, Mrs. Augustine B. Conant, Mrs. Richard Palmer Watters and Mrs. Paul Mascarene Hubbard . . . all of Brookline . . . are entertaining dinner guests.

In the World of Music

Radcliffe Night at the Pops

May /37

By Redfern Mason

It was Radcliffe night at the Pops and the number the audience most loudly insisted on hearing a second time was the Cole Porter-Bodge "I've Got You Under My Skin." To tell the truth the music is much better than you would expect from the title. There are hints of "Siegfried" at the beginning; but later on it is as American as Broadway.

Those Radcliffe lassies and their swains applauded it uproariously and elders, startled out of their reserve by the sheer infectiousness of the score, followed suit, myself among them, jazzy and unashamed. For this music is audacious Yankeeland, music of the folk who, in Kipling's phrase, "toss with the embarrassed gods for beers." Of course some of the Harvard pundits will raise supercilious eyes and tell their students to go back to Mozart and repent of their sins. Yet, if Mozart had been there last night, he would probably have found in this insolent music just the note of originality which he was hoping to hear from the New World.

I had hoped that the Radcliffe girls would sing; but they are up to their ears in exams. But Mabel Daniels, one of their sisterhood, was represented by her prelude, "Deep Forest," which is subtly impressionistic and full of wildwood suggestiveness. It is well orchestrated and the Symphony manifestly took pleasure in playing it. The satisfaction of the audience was vociferously expressed.

In purest classic vein we had the Mozart "Figaro" Overture, played with rare delicacy. Louis Speyer's English horn—by the way the instrument is neither a horn nor English—sounded beautiful in the "Swan of Tuonela" of Sibelius and the gifted artist played a "Cowherd's Tune" by Schumann, a lovely mountain ditty, with something of the Ranz des vaches about it. Another soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played the piano part of Weber's "Concertstuck," music which to some sounds curiously old fashioned. Yet Weber was one of the great ones. The pianistic tradition of the Viennese lingers with him, plus romanticism. The Lisztian bedevilment of the clavier had not as yet manifested itself. Mr. Sanroma is a musician of rare talent; he is no victim of mere technique, and he knows how to make the piano sing.

It was an evening of diversities. Arthur Fiedler conducted the Ravel Bolero with a vivid bravura, not failing to let his hearers know the sinister undertone of the music. It begins unobtrusively, like the war in Spain, but it concludes with a cosmic crash. One wondered whether the parallel would be realized over in embattled Europe.

We had three numbers from Grieg's First Peer Gynt Suite, the "Blue Danube," "On the Trail" from Grofe's "Grand Canon Suite" and the "Torch Dance" by a Welshman named Jenkins, who called himself Edward German, because he did not think England would ever believe that a man with a name like Jenkins could write music worth listening to.

It was a throughly enjoyable concert. There was not a vacant seat in the hall, and Fiedler and his men were "i'th vein."

"Pop" Promenades

The Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight will be turned into a London "Prom" and dedicated to the British Coronation festivities. The floor will be cleared for promenading, London fashion, and Arthur Fiedler will include upon the program music which will also be played at the Coronation. A ball will follow the concert. The program follows:

Coronation March...Edward German
"The Royal Fireworks," Suite
Handel
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde"
Schubert
Finale, Symphony in C minor,
No. 1....................Brahms
French Military March..Saint-Saens
"The Mikado," Selection
Sir Arthur Sullivan
Two Canadian Marches:
"The Land of the Maple"
"Laurentian March".Laurendeau
"Sally in Our Alley"
(Transcribed for String Orchestra by Frank Bridge)
"Country Gardens"........Grainger
"Pomp and Circumstance," March
Sir Edward Elgar
God Save the King

May 1937

Symphony Pops Open Tonight

Tonight at 8.30, the fifty-second season of the famous Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler, who begins his eighth consecutive season as leader, will direct an orchestra of approximately ninety players. Refreshments will be served at the tables which cover the floor of the auditorium. The opening program mingles old favorites with numbers new to the Pops:

Procession of Nobles, from "Mlada"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala".Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra)
Bolzoni
Three Russian Dances
A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music.Schonherr
Festivo (tempo di bolero) from
"Historic Scenes"........Sibelius
Marche Slave..........Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods"
Waltzes .... Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight".Kern
(Symphonic paraphrase by
L. Cailliet)
The Ride of the Valkyries..Wagner

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
MAY 6 - 1937

Boston Symphony Leader Not to See Coronation

Boston, May 6—Although Serge Koussevitzky has been invited to attend the Coronation of King George VI, he has declined the invitation.

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made known that fact, before leaving for New York to sail yesterday in the French liner Paris for a vacation at his home in the French capital. He is accompanied by his wife and his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff.

Koussevitzky plans a quiet vacation to prepare for the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood, the estate of the Boston orchestra between Lenox and Pttsfeld. The festival will be held Aug. 5 to 15 and the conductor is keenly interested in it.

Before leaving Boston he stated he had been invited to witness the Coronation ceremony but did not make known the name of the person from whom the invitation came

---

POPS CONCERTS OPEN TONIGHT

The 52nd season of Pops concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open tonight at 8:30 in Symphony Hall with Arthur Fiedler conducting an orchestra of approximately 90 players.

As is customory during the Pops programs, refreshments will be served

The opening program includes:

Procession of Nobles from "Mlada"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
Minuet (for string orchestra) .... Belzoni
Three Russian Dances .... A. Tcherepnin
Austrian Peasant Music ...... Schonherr
Festive (tempo di bolero) from
"Historic Scenes" .... Sibelius
Marche Slave .... Tchaikovsky
"Tales from the Vienna Woods,"
Waltzes .... Strauss
"The Way You Look Tonight" ... Kern
(Symphonic paraphrases by L. Cailliet)
The Ride of the Valkyries ...... Wagner

59

Funds For Summer Concerts On River Esplanade Refused

B. Globe — May 4/37

House of Representatives Rejects Measure—Prorogation by End of Month Indicated

The Charles River esplanade concerts were criticized during a debate in the Massachusetts House of Representatives yesterday which concluded in the rejection of a bill to permit the Metropolitan District Commission to expend money on the esplanade musicians.

Opposing the bill, Representative Aspell of Boston, contended that the words, "orchestra concerts" in the measure restricted the sum to be spent for that purpose to the esplanade.

Representative Bowker of Brookline said passage of the bill would be detrimental to musicians in various bands. He recorded the American Legion as against the measure.

It was argued by Representative Barry of East Boston that fully $10,000 of the $20,000 appropriated by the Metropolitan District Commission for concerts would go to the esplanade but Representative Bigelow of Brookline, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, replied that there is no such authorization in the bill. Barry insisted, however, the $10,000 represented "an outright gift" to the esplanade concerts.

Representative Kimball of Malden said that Chairman Eugene C. Hultman of the Metropolitan Park Commission favored the bill. Kimball declared the esplanade concerts attract thousands while the Sunday concerts at other reservations under the Metropolitan District Commission draw only 100 or 200. For this reason he thought the larger share of the money should go to the esplanade concerts although the bill as written does not compel the Metropolitan District Commission to so distribute the appropriation.

By a rising vote of 74 to 48 the bill was not passed to be engrossed.

Drive for Prorogation

Indicating a drive for early prorogation, the House adopted an order which extends the time until next Friday at 5 o'clock in which remaining matters now before committees must be reported.

Only 75 matters were included in the order and all of these were designated by number. The matters are before the Committees on Conservation, Insurance, Judiciary, Labor and Industries, Legal Affairs, Pensions, Public Health and Metropolitan Affairs.

There now remain only 232 matters which have not been acted upon. The difference between the 232 and the 75 represents matters for the most part before the Committee on Ways and Means. This committee is holding daily hearings.

The chief remaining issues are the supplementary budget, expected to reach the Legislature about May 15, the question of diversion from the highway fund and fixing the state tax.

Legislative leaders predicted that if the present pace is maintained the Legislature will finish its work by the end of this month, if not earlier.

Two Vetoes From Governor

The bill to prohibit candidates for any state office from running on both party tickets was not ordered to a third reading by a voice vote. The measure was opposed by Representative Kirkpatrick of Holyoke. Representative Dearborn of Somerville, House chairman of the Committee on Election Laws, argued for the bill, maintaining that no man should have the nominaiton from both political parties.

Vetoes were received from Gov Hurley of the bill to place the city clerk of Worcester under Civil Service and of the bill to place the city engineer of Revere under Civil Service. The Governor's veto of the Worcester proposal read, in part:

"The custom is that city clerks are either elected by the voters of the city or by representatives of the voters. This bill is a drastic departure from such procedure, and in effect would mean that by placing the city clerk of Worcester under Civil Service, he would actually be given a life tenure.

"I do not believe that the voters in any one particular year should make a selection and take away the rights of voters at a subsequent time to express their choice in the matter."

Bill on Camps Saved

A bill requiring the licensing of recreational camps, overnight camps and transient homes was ordered to a third reading. The measure was rejected last week and a motion to reconsider was offered by Representative Willis of Saugus who said he could "tell of startling things" happening in overnight camps, many of which are in his own district. Reconsideration was carried by a rising vote of 53 to 13 and then the bill was advanced by a voice vote.

Representative Welsh of Hyde Park, Democratic floor leader, sought in vain to prevent the enactment of the bill to prohibit members of the Executive Council from being appointed to state office. Welsh admitted that members of the 1935-36 Council were "guilty of pretty sharp political practice" but declared that it would be a "distinct handicap" if members of the present Council were to be excluded.

Supporting the Democratic leader, Representative Dillon of Cambridge said it was "grossly unfair for members of the Legislature to pass this bill and exclude members of the General Court from its provisions."

Representative Luitwieler of Newton said he "could not see how any one could oppose the bill" while Representative Johnson of Brockton insisted that members of the Council, like those of the Legislature, "have a definite responsibility to serve to the end of the term."

By a rising vote of 81 to 38 Welsh's motion to strike out the enacting clause was defeated and the bill was enacted.

Labor Placard Bill Loses

Representative Morrill of Haverhill was unsuccessful in his efforts to have substituted for an adverse committee report a bill filed on petition of the Civil Liberities Committee of Massachusetts which would permit the use of placards in labor disputes. The bill would allow, under the "peaceful persuasion clause," the carrying of placards and distribution of cards and papers in a labor dispute without the necessity of obtaining a permit from local authorities. Substitution was refused by a rising vote of 56 to 28.

Representative Morris of Everett criticized the members of the Ways and Means Committee for recommending reference to the next annual session of his bill for the erection of a bathhouse on Malden River, Everett, near the Revere Beach parkway. He spoke of the "autocratic members of the committee" and mentioned the "one from Brookline" (Representative Bigelow) and the "one from Newton" (Representative Baker) as "putting their heads together to decide whether the bill should go through."

By a rising vote of 64 to 51 the House referred the bill to the next annual session.

There was extended debate on the bill authorizing the Supreme and Superior Court to make certain rules of court procedure. By a rising vote of 86 to 37 the House refused to order it to a third reading.

Representative Innes of Boston contended that the justices, by promulgating a rule, could do away with trial by jury and could change the principle of the presumption of innocence of the person accused.

The bill was defended by Representative Sherman of Somerville, who said that Innes "should know better" than to say that the justices could "wipe out the presumption of innocence."

Speakers against the bill included

TELLS HOW POPS CAME INTO BEING

Spalding Says They Help Much on Expenses

Post — May 16/37

"How did the Pops pop up some 52 years ago? Did they come in response to public demand? What connection do they have with the symphony season?" These were the questions asked C. W. Spalding, assistant manager of Symphony Hall, the other night.

"The Pops," answered Mr. Spalding, "are the result of our having to provide added income for the Hall, in order that we might provide a 40-week engagement for our symphony musicians. The Pops did not come in response to popular demand, although it was felt before they were instituted, that they would be well supported by Boston music lovers."

AIDS EXPENSES

"You see," he explained, "the symphony season has always been just 30 weeks long, and it was necessary that we hire our musicians for 10 weeks longer than that. The result was a decision to give the public a summer season of concerts at lower prices. Hence, the 52-year-old institution which we have called the Pops. Although they are well supported, they do not provide adequate income to meet all of our expenses. They do, however, go a long way toward helping us defray the added expense of providing our symphony musicians with the additional 10 weeks engagement."

"Before modern means of transportation and the resulting changed conditions in the summer hotel business," he added, "many of our musicians played summer engagements at these hotels. At that time, the Pops orchestra numbered only 50 pieces. As conditions changed, however, they kept coming back and applying for positions in the Pops. The result is that we now have a Pops orchestra of about 90 pieces."

Pasture burning destroys humus which is an important factor in drought control.

Pops Program Arouses Enthusiasm; Symphony Hall Filled for Opening

Her. — May 6/37

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Every year much is made of Boston's unique series of concerts, the New England beer-garden-cum-music and all the rest of it. And the Pops are unique in their rather conventional and unchanging fashion. No doubt a sociologist could lay down penetrating analyses of the character of the city merely from attending one Pop concert. He would surely find it odd that the Pops public is not really dependent on music, since even minor gossip is seldom interrupted for musical reasons. He would also find that the public is not dependent on wine and beer and that strange purple concoction, which finds its way to so many tables and is consumed along with huge pretzels. Yes, the sociologist would have a rich field for exploration.

The Pops are now in their 52d year and show no signs whatever either of changing their spots or diminishing in popularity. Mr. Fiedler, who is in charge for his eighth season, unquestionably knows just what his peculiar public wants. Serious programs are reserved for Sundays, when people really listen. Daring experiments are not often undertaken. It is also difficult to put over any piece which is not consistently loud and without much subtlety. Nevertheless the orchestra plays admirably, and he who has ears (like the eyes that Sam Weller ought to have had to see through a flight of stairs and a deal door) can hear.

Actually the audience on such a warm night was in no mood for any extra effort. They relaxed and enjoyed themselves. The program was shrewdly calculated to awaken enthusiasm, and there were many encores. In spite of the hum of talk such works as Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave brought forth the greatest applause. Every corner of Symphony Hall was filled, so that there was plenty of encouragement for Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra at this opening of the Pops season.

Two works were played for the first time in Boston. These were the "Festivo," tempo di bolero, from "Historic Scenes" by Sibelius and a collection of Austrian peasant music by Schoenherr. Owing to the difficulties of hearing the music, already delicately alluded to, the former did not make the impression that it well might have. Yet it was easy to recognize the composer of the Second Symphony in it. The latter is an assortment of those jolly dances that are to be heard in almost any Austrian country beer-hall on certain special occasions. The room is crowded to suffocation and filled with smoke. There is hardly room to pass around the steins. Then there is a stage and a small band, and some dancers who pound out the rhythms. Schoenherr's Suite is an effective restoration of these occasions from the musical side. Three Russian dances by Alexander Tcherepnin were also capital numbers for the Pops repertoire.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
MAY 16 1937

2 Veterans Quit Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, May 15.—(US)— Heinrich Lorber, one of the few living musicians to have the memorable experience of playing under the direction of Brahms, and who for the past forty-six years played the French horn in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today concluded a sixty-year career with his resignation from the orchestra.

At the same time, resignation of Carl Barth, celloist, who has been with the Boston Symphony for forty-four years, was announced.

April, 1937 TUFTS COLLEGE ALUMNI BULLETIN 3

Alumni Day Celebration

Pops Night Novelty

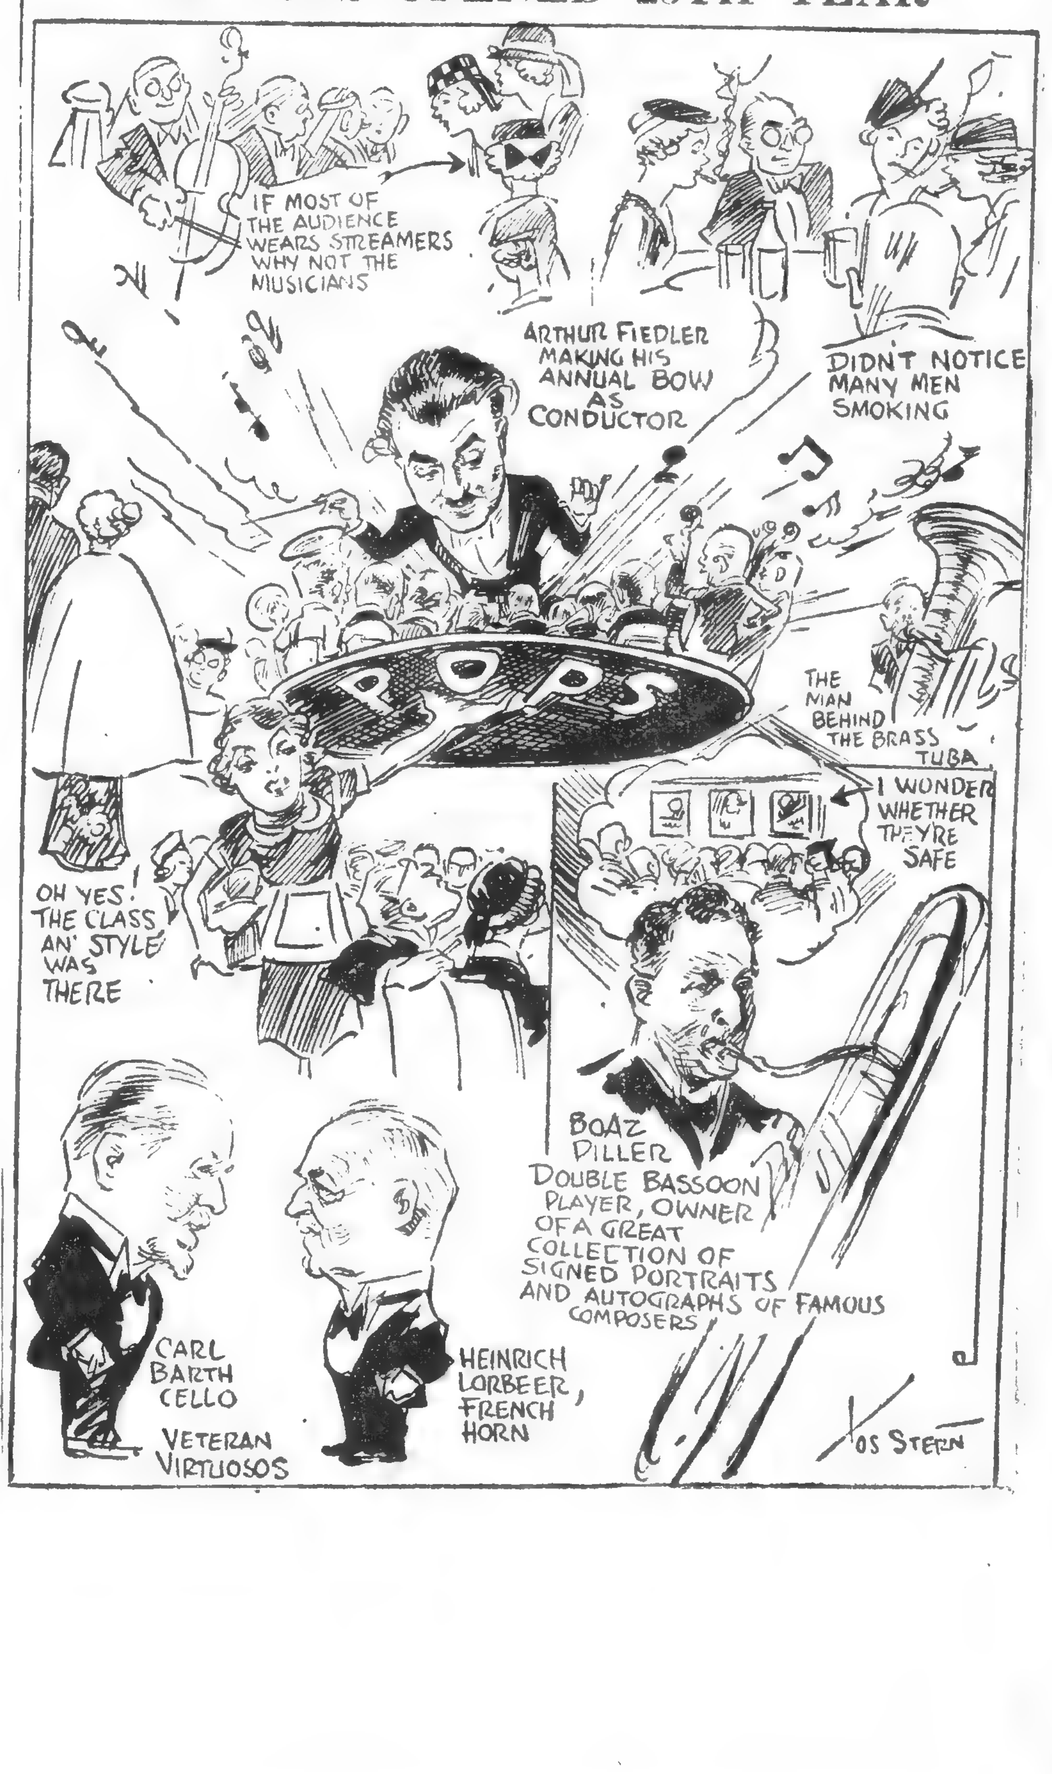
Tufts Night at the Pops on Thursday, June 10th, the evening preceding Class Day, opens the festivities.

Each recurring Pops Night is supposed to bring something of the never-before type. This year it's a Concertino for Trumpet and Orchestra which Professor Lewis has written for young Roger Voisin, brilliant instrumentalist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The soloist has already "tested out" the work, and is enthusiastic about it. The instrumentation, which draws amply on the resources of the orchestra, is finished. There will probably be a trial hearing early in the Pops season, to assure a well-rehearsed performance.

Applications for Pops tickets are printed in this issue and will also be mailed to alumni about June 1 with the Commencement invitations. For the present it is well to be getting the reunions and other groups together for reservation of tables. Reunion classes of all departments have made it a special practice of late years to canvass their members and reserve a number of tables together.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1937

AS POPS OPENED 25TH YEAR



IF MOST OF THE AUDIENCE WEARS STREAMERS WHY NOT THE MUSICIANS
ARTHUR FIEDLER MAKING HIS ANNUAL BOW AS CONDUCTOR DIDN'T NOTICE MANY MEN SMOKING
POPS
THE MAN BEHIND THE BRASS TUBA
I WONDER WHETHER THEY'RE SAFE
OH YES! THE CLASS AN' STYLE WAS THERE
BOAZ PILLER DOUBLE BASSOON PLAYER, OWNER OF A GREAT COLLECTION OF SIGNED PORTRAITS AND AUTOGRAPHS OF FAMOUS COMPOSERS
CARL BARTH CELLO
HEINRICH LORBEER, FRENCH HORN
VETERAN VIRTUOSOS
JOS STERN

"The Way You Look Tonight"..Kern
(Symphonic paraphrase by
L. Cailliet)
The Ride of the Valkyries..Wagner

Before leaving Boston he stated he had been invited to witness the Coronation ceremony but did not make known the name of the person from whom the invitation came.

Brookline . . . are entertaining dinner guests.

Funds For Summer Concerts On River Esplanade Refused

B. Globe May 4/37

House of Representatives Rejects Measure—Prorogation by End of Month Indicated

The Charles River esplanade concerts were criticized during a debate in the Massachusetts House of Representatives yesterday which concluded in the rejection of a bill to permit the Metropolitan District Commission to expend money on the esplanade musicians.

Opposing the bill, Representative Aspell of Boston, contended that the words, "orchestra concerts" in the measure restricted the sum to be spent for that purpose to the esplanade.

Representative Bowker of Brookline said passage of the bill would be detrimental to musicians in various bands. He recorded the American Legion as against the measure.

It was argued by Representative Barry of East Boston that fully $10,000 of the $20,000 appropriated by the Metropolitan District Commission for concerts would go to the esplanade but Representative Bigelow of Brookline, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, replied that there is no such authorization in the bill. Barry insisted, however, the $10,000 represented "an outright gift" to the esplanade concerts.

Representative Kimball of Malden said that Chairman Eugene C. Hultman of the Metropolitan Park Commission favored the bill. Kimball declared the esplanade concerts attract thousands while the Sunday concerts at other reservations under the Metropolitan District Commission draw only 100 or 200. For this reason he thought the larger share of the money should go to the esplanade concerts although the bill as written does not compel the Metropolitan District Commission to so distribute the appropriation.

By a rising vote of 74 to 48 the bill was not passed to be engrossed.

Drive for Prorogation

Indicating a drive for early prorogation, the House adopted an order which extends the time until next Friday at 5 o'clock in which remaining matters now before committees must be reported.

Only 75 matters were included in the order and all of these were designated by number. The matters are before the Committees on Conservation, Insurance, Judiciary, Labor and Industries, Legal Affairs, Pensions, Public Health and Metropolitan Affairs.

There now remain only 232 matters which have not been acted upon. The difference between the 232 and the 75 represents matters for the most part before the Committee on Ways and Means. This committee is holding daily hearings.

The chief remaining issues are the supplementary budget, expected to reach the Legislature about May 15, the question of diversion from the highway fund and fixing the state tax.

Legislative leaders predicted that if the present pace is maintained the Legislature will finish its work by the end of this month, if not earlier.

Two Vetoes From Governor

The bill to prohibit candidates for any state office from running on both party tickets was not ordered to a third reading by a voice vote. The measure was opposed by Representative Kirkpatrick of Holyoke. Representative Dearborn of Somerville, House chairman of the Committee on Election Laws, argued for the bill, maintaining that no man should have the nominaiton from both political parties.

Vetoes were received from Gov Hurley of the bill to place the city clerk of Worcester under Civil Service and of the bill to place the city engineer of Revere under Civil Service. The Governor's veto of the Worcester proposal read, in part:

"The custom is that city clerks are either elected by the voters of the city or by representatives of the voters. This bill is a drastic departure from such procedure, and in effect would mean that by placing the city clerk of Worcester under Civil Service, he would actually be given a life tenure.

"I do not believe that the voters in any one particular year should make a selection and take away the rights of voters at a subsequent time to express their choice in the matter."

Bill on Camps Saved

A bill requiring the licensing of recreational camps, overnight camps and transient homes was ordered to a third reading. The measure was rejected last week and a motion to reconsider was offered by Representative Willis of Saugus who said he could "tell of startling things" happening in overnight camps, many of which are in his own district. Reconsideration was carried by a rising vote of 53 to 13 and then the bill was advanced by a voice vote.

Representative Welsh of Hyde Park, Democratic floor leader, sought in vain to prevent the enactment of the bill to prohibit members of the Executive Council from being appointed to state office. Welsh admitted that members of the 1935-36 Council were "guilty of pretty sharp political practice" but declared that it would be a "distinct handicap" if members of the present Council were to be excluded.

Supporting the Democratic leader, Representative Dillon of Cambridge said it was "grossly unfair for members of the Legislature to pass this bill and exclude members of the General Court from its provisions."

Representative Luitwieler of Newton said he "could not see how any one could oppose the bill" while Representative Johnson of Brockton insisted that members of the Council, like those of the Legislature, "have a definite responsibility to serve to the end of the term."

By a rising vote of 81 to 38 Welsh's motion to strike out the enacting clause was defeated and the bill was enacted.

Labor Placard Bill Loses

Representative Morrill of Haverhill was unsuccessful in his efforts to have substituted for an adverse committee report a bill filed on petition of the Civil Liberities Committee of Massachusetts which would permit the use of placards in labor disputes. The bill would allow, under the "peaceful persuasion clause," the carrying of placards and distribution of cards and papers in a labor dispute without the necessity of obtaining a permit from local authorities. Substitution was refused by a rising vote of 56 to 28.

Representative Morris of Everett criticized the members of the Ways and Means Committee for recommending reference to the next annual session of his bill for the erection of a bathhouse on Malden River, Everett, near the Revere Beach parkway. He spoke of the "autocratic members of the committee" and mentioned the "one from Brookline" (Representative Bigelow) and the "one from Newton" (Representative Baker) as "putting their heads together to decide whether the bill should go through."

By a rising vote of 64 to 51 the House referred the bill to the next annual session.

There was extended debate on the bill authorizing the Supreme and Superior Court to make certain rules of court procedure. By a rising vote of 86 to 37 the House refused to order it to a third reading.

Representative Innes of Boston contended that the justices, by promulgating a rule, could do away with trial by jury and could change the principle of the presumption of innocence of the person accused.

The bill was defended by Representative Sherman of Somerville, who said that Innes "should know better" than to say that the justices could "wipe out the presumption of innocence."

Speakers against the bill included

TELLS HOW POPS CAME INTO BEING

Spalding Says They Help Much on Expenses

Post May 10/37

"How did the Pops pop up some 52 years ago? Did they come in response to public demand? What connection do they have with the symphony season?" These were the questions asked C. W. Spalding, assistant manager of Symphony Hall, the other night.

"The Pops," answered Mr. Spalding, "are the result of our having to provide added income for the Hall, in order that we might provide a 40-week engagement for our symphony musicians. The Pops did not come in response to popular demand, although it was felt before they were instituted, that they would be well supported by Boston music lovers."

AIDS EXPENSES

"You see," he explained, "the symphony season has always been just 30 weeks long, and it was necessary that we hire our musicians for 10 weeks longer than that. The result was a decision to give the public a summer season of concerts at lower prices. Hence, the 52-year-old institution which we have called the Pops. Although they are well supported, they do not provide adequate income to meet all of our expenses. They do, however, go a long way toward helping us defray the added expense of providing our symphony musicians with the additional 10 weeks engagement."

"Before modern means of transportation and the resulting changed conditions in the summer hotel business," he added, "many of our musicians played summer engagements at these hotels. At that time, the Pops orchestra numbered only 50 pieces. As conditions changed, however, they kept coming back and applying for positions in the Pops. The result is that we now have a Pops orchestra of about 90 pieces."

Pasture burning destroys humus which is an important factor in drought control.

Pops Program Arouses Enthusiasm; Symphony Hall Filled for Opening

Her. May 6/37

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Every year much is made of Boston's unique series of concerts, the New England beer-garden-cum-music and all the rest of it. And the Pops are unique in their rather conventional and unchanging fashion. No doubt a sociologist could lay down penetrating analyses of the character of the city merely from attending one Pop concert. He would surely find it odd that the Pops public is not really dependent on music, since even minor gossip is seldom interrupted for musical reasons. He would also find that the public is not dependent on wine and beer and that strange purple concoction, which finds its way to so many tables and is consumed along with huge pretzels. Yes, the sociologist would have a rich field for exploration.

The Pops are now in their 52d year and show no signs whatever either of changing their spots or diminishing in popularity. Mr. Fiedler, who is in charge for his eighth season, unquestionably knows just what his peculiar public wants. Serious programs are reserved for Sundays, when people really listen. Daring experiments are not often undertaken. It is also difficult to put over any piece which is not consistently loud and without much subtlety. Nevertheless the orchestra plays admirably, and he who has ears (like the eyes that Sam Weller ought to have had to see through a flight of stairs and a deal door) can hear.

Actually the audience on such a warm night was in no mood for any extra effort. They relaxed and enjoyed themselves. The program was shrewdly calculated to awaken enthusiasm, and there were many encores. In spite of the hum of talk such works as Tchaikovsky's Marche Slave brought forth the greatest applause. Every corner of Symphony Hall was filled, so that there was plenty of encouragement for Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra at this opening of the Pops season.

Two works were played for the first time in Boston. These were the "Festivo," tempo di bolero, from "Historic Scenes" by Sibelius and a collection of Austrian peasant music by Schoenherr. Owing to the difficulties of hearing the music, already delicately alluded to, the former did not make the impression that it well might have. Yet it was easy to recognize the composer of the Second Symphony in it. The latter is an assortment of those jolly dances that are to be heard in almost any Austrian country beer-hall on certain special occasions. The room is crowded to suffocation and filled with smoke. There is hardly room to pass around the steins. Then there is a stage and a small band, and some dancers who pound out the rhythms. Schoenherr's Suite is an effective restoration of these occasions from the musical side. Three Russian dances by Alexander Tcherepnin were also capital numbers for the Pops repertoire.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SUNDAY AMERICAN
MAY 16 1937

2 Veterans Quit Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, May 15.—(US)—Heinrich Lorber, one of the few living musicians to have the memorable experience of playing under the direction of Brahms, and who for the past forty-six years played the French horn in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, today concluded a sixty-year career with his resignation from the orchestra.

At the same time, resignation of Carl Barth, celloist, who has been with the Boston Symphony for forty-four years, was announced.

Alumni Day Celebration

Pops Night Novelty

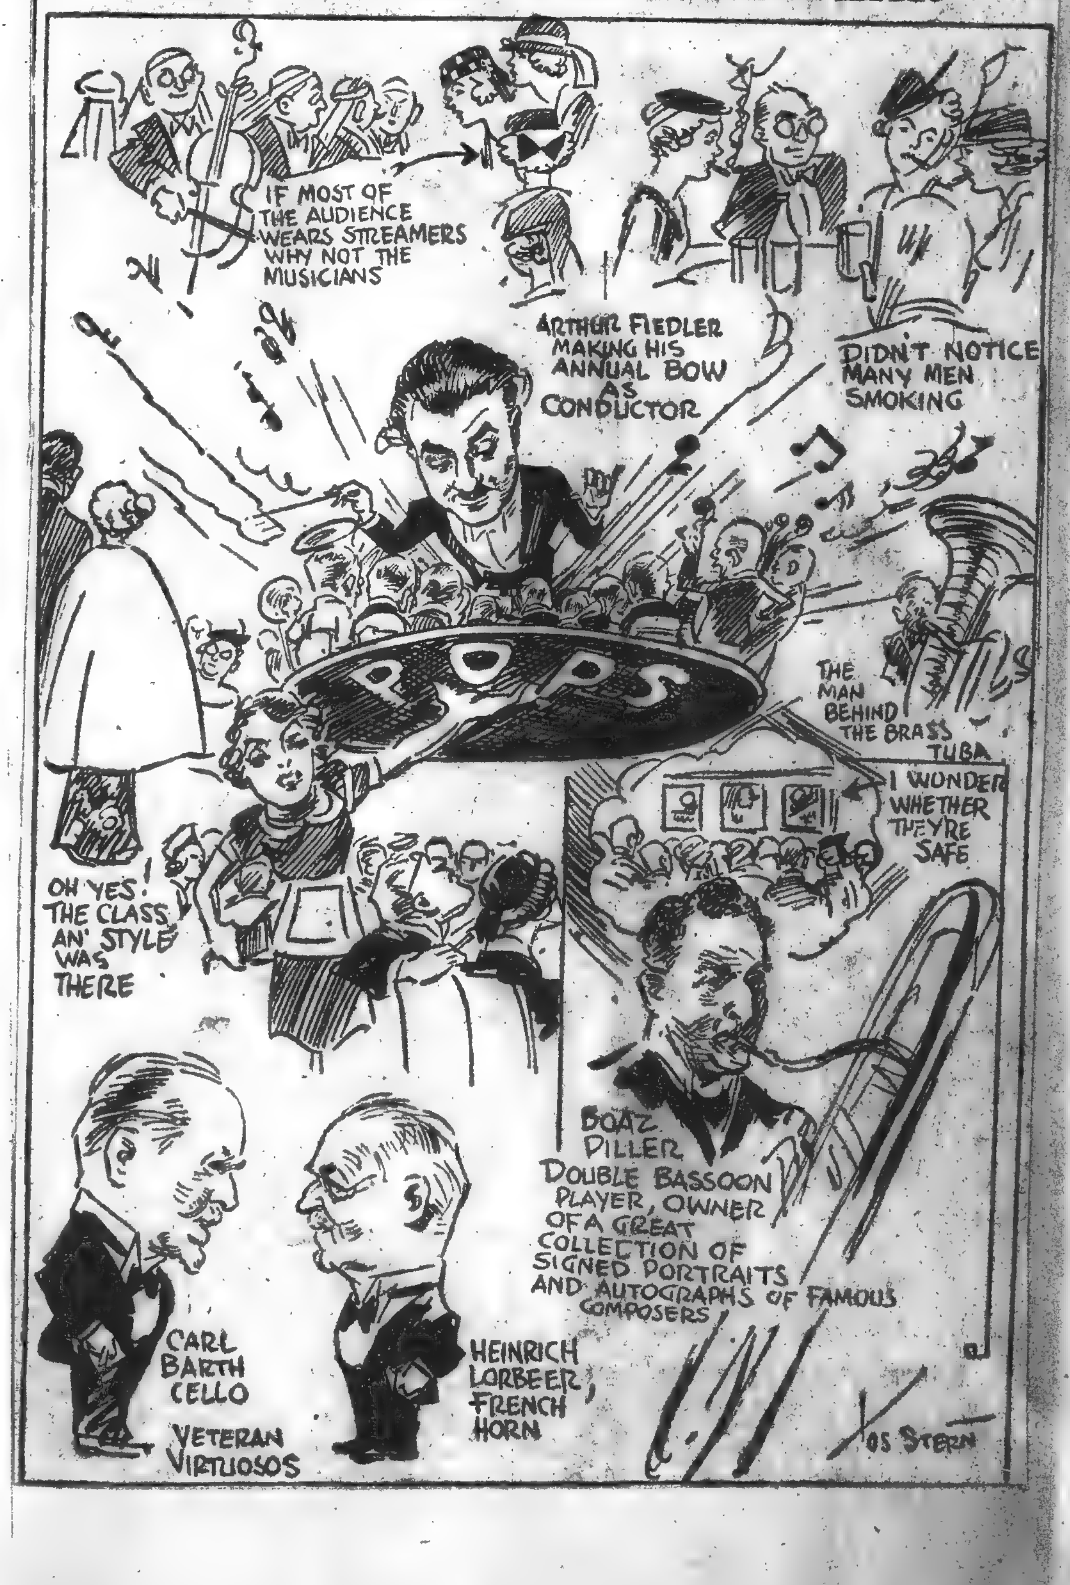
Tufts Night at the Pops on Thursday, June 10th, the evening preceding Class Day, opens the festivities.

Each recurring Pops Night is supposed to bring something of the never-before type. This year it's a Concertino for Trumpet and Orchestra which Professor Lewis has written for young Roger Voisin, brilliant instrumentalist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The soloist has already "tested out" the work, and is enthusiastic about it. The instrumentation, which draws amply on the resources of the orchestra, is finished. There will probably be a trial hearing early in the Pops season, to assure a well-rehearsed performance.

Applications for Pops tickets are printed in this issue and will also be mailed to alumni about June 1 with the Commencement invitations. For the present it is well to be getting the reunions and other groups together for reservation of tables. Reunion classes of all departments have made it a special practice of late years to canvass their members and reserve a number of tables together.

THE BOSTON HERALD, THURSDAY, MAY 6, 1937

AS POPS OPENED 25TH YEAR



IF MOST OF THE AUDIENCE WEARS STREAMERS WHY NOT THE MUSICIANS
ARTHUR FIEDLER MAKING HIS ANNUAL BOW AS CONDUCTOR
DIDN'T NOTICE MANY MEN SMOKING
POPS
THE MAN BEHIND THE BRASS TUBA
I WONDER WHETHER THEY'RE SAFE
OH YES! THE CLASS AN' STYLE WAS THERE
BOAZ PILLER DOUBLE BASSOON PLAYER, OWNER OF A GREAT COLLECTION OF SIGNED PORTRAITS AND AUTOGRAPHS OF FAMOUS COMPOSERS
CARL BARTH CELLO
HEINRICH LORBEER, FRENCH HORN
VETERAN VIRTUOSOS
JOS STERN

Brookline . . . are entertaining dinner guests.

"The Way You Look Tonight" Kern ... Before leaving Boston he stated he had been invited to witness the coronation ceremony but did not make known the name of the person from whom the invitation came.

(Symphonic paraphrase by L. Caillet)

The Ride of the Valkyries. Wagner

60

Another Pops Season Opens With Few Places Unfilled

Globe — May 6/37

"Popovers" in Program Book and Peasant Tunes From Austria Are Novelties

Spring is really here. The Pops began again at Symphony Hall last night. With Arthur Fiedler the conductor for his eighth consecutive season, with the floor of Symphony Hall covered with tables, and with the August red of Winter concerts given way to the bright gold and cool green of the Pops' familiar Summer decoration, another season of this unique musical entertainment will bring pleasure to thousands.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

The house was evidently sold out, for very few vacant places could be seen. The chatter of conversation, the clink of bottles and glasses, the haze of fragrant tobacco smoke indicated the comfort of being able to relax and listen casually, always a conspicuous luxury at these concerts. Moreover—as is usual on Pops opening nights—the atmosphere suggested a genuine holiday mood.

For the most part, the Pops follow accepted tradition in superficial details. But there are exceptions, and the most important is that agreeable contrast of familiar music and novelties which governs the programs. Mr Fiedler, with discerning skill, has not thrown out the popular favorites from the past, nor has he overlooked new or unfamiliar pieces. During his regime the Pops have kept their link with years gone by, and essential contact with the present.

Yet there was an alteration that could not be overlooked. The size and cover design of the program books have been changed, and, within, a brief column of notes about the new pieces of the evening—and there were several—bore the crisp title, "Popovers."

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Procession of the Nobles," from his opera "Mlada," led off the evening, followed by Goldmark's flavorsome Overture to "Sakuntala," and the Bolzoni Minuet. The first of Mr Fiedler's novelties consisted of three short Russian dances, harmonized in robust dissonance by Alexandre Tcherepnin, the younger member of that musical family.

But what struck one listener's fancy more were a set of peasant tunes from various sections of Austria, collected and set for orchestra with skilled hand, by Max Schoenherr. Unless one's guess is far of the mark, these will become especial pets of Pops audiences. And indeed they deserve to be, with their gay, folkish spirit. After them, the encore, "Concert Square Dance"—a set of old American fiddler's tunes—seemed a pretty tame business. And while on the subject of encores, there was "The Bee," attributed to one "F. Schubert," who was, we understand, not the immortal Franz of songs and symphonies but another of the same name.

There was a "first time in Boston," from the music of Jean Sibelius, best known as the greatest symphonist of our time. The piece was "Festivo," out of a suite "Historic Scenes." Here is music in several ways characteristic of the mature Sibelius, harmonic progressions which have since remained peculiar to him, individual use of the horns and of solo instruments. What is more, this is really festive music, far from the serious tone of much of Sibelius' writing.

Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave"; those imperishable waltzes, "Tales From the Vienna Woods," by Johann Strauss; a paraphrase of a Jerome Kern tune, and "The Ride of the Valkyries," concluded a program further amplified by liberal encores.

C. W. D.

First Sunday Pops Program Is Tonight

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

ARTHUR FIEDLER will conduct the Pops Orchestra in the first Sunday program of the season in Symphony Hall this evening.

The capacity audiences which have attended the Pops during the opening week again testify to the popularity of these concerts as informal spring entertainment.

At this evening's concert Heinrich Gebhard, distinguished Boston pianist, will appear as soloist in a performance of the Grieg Concerto in A minor.

The program will otherwise include Sibelius' "Valse Trieste," suite from "Dardanus" by Rameau, transcribed for orchestra by De Lamarter; Tchaikovsky's "Overture Solennelle," the prelude to Wagner's "De Meistersinger," and "Sailor's Dance" from Gliere's "Red Poppy."

* * *

THE Monday evening concert will be given for the benefit of the Infants' Hospital, and will be "Tyrolean Night." The program will include Tyrolean Peasant Dances by Schonherr, Strauss' overture to "Die Fledermaus," Rossini's overture to "William Tell," Kreisler's "Liebesfreud," Strauss' waltzes, etc.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist on Tuesday evening in the performance of Weber's Konzertstuck for piano and orchestra.

The Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela," Grieg's "Peer Gynt' suite, Ravel's "Bolero," Mabel Daniels' prelude, "Deep Forest" and Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltzes will also be heard on Tuesday evening.

* * *

ON Wednesday there will be a Promenade concert in the fashion of the London "Proms" featuring the music which is to be heard at the Coronation ceremony on the same day.

Edward German's "Coronation March," Handel's "The Royal Fireworks" suite, the Finale from Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Saint-Saens' French Military March, "Country Gardens" by Percy Grainger, etc., will be included on this occasion.

The Coronation Ball will follow the concert.

On Thursday evening Mr. Sanroma and Leo Litwin will be heard in "The Animals' Carnival," by Saint-Saens.

* * *

THE PROGRAM will otherwise range from Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight" to Brahms' Sixth Hungarian Dance.

On Friday evening the Orphean Club of Laselle Junior College, conducted by Sawyer Dunham, wi[illegible] pate.

The program, as that [illegible] day evening's concert, [illegible] ual Pops variety.

RECENT RE

[illegible]

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

with Simeon Bel-

Arthur Fiedler's Boston "Pops" Orchestra continues its perennial round with, every now and again, an extra fillip to the general quality of its disks. In the Dance of the Camorristi from Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna" and the Malagueña from Lecuona's Andalusian Suite (Victor 4330—10 in.), they are thoroughly in their element and, abetted by full and even recording, make heartening and exciting things of these.

Crossed Skis Will Deck Hall For Festival

Her. May [illegible]/37

Spring Flowers Frozen Into Ice Will Be Another May 10 Feature

The most unusual decorations that Boston has seen for many a week will grace Symphony Hall next Monday evening, May 10, when the whole hall will be transformed into a Tyrolean festival by the enterprising committee of the Infants' Hospital. Not only will the first balcony be festooned with crossed skis and ski poles, but on the stage there will be huge blocks of real ice sparkling with iridescent colors from the colored lights thrown on them from the rear. Bright spring flowers will be frozen into each of these cakes, adding to the color of the whole scene.

There will be a gay group of Tyrolean maidens selling gardenias and carnations during the concert under the direction of Miss Priscilla Weld. Her colorfully costumed assistants and the vendors of the special lucky number programs will include Miss J. Holladay Philbin, Mrs. Alfred B. Hallowell, Miss Marileeds Heard, Miss Nancy Crocker, Miss Charlotte Rantoul, Miss Anne Howard, Miss Elizabeth Ware, Miss Jessie Fay, Miss Patricia Preston, Miss Marjorie Saltonstall, Miss Nancy Cochrane, Miss Barbara Putnam, Miss Marion Lawrence, Miss Betsy Jaques, Miss Julia Barbour, Miss Cynthia Forbes, Miss Frances Holmes, Miss Betty Plimpton, Miss Polly Winslow, Miss Virginia Ward and Miss Alice Crawford.

The second intermission will be most exciting for then the lucky number, entitling the winner to a new Ford station wagon, will be drawn from a gigantic snow-ball suspended above the stage. In the first intermission Herr Sitzmarch and Fraulein Mochebirge and their four Tyrolean friends will perform their daring and difficult stunts on a specially constructed ski-slide.

Subscriptions are still, of course, pouring in and a few of the most recent subscribers include Mrs. John A. Moir, Mrs. Donald Falvey, Mrs. Reginald Gray, Mrs. Edward Cunningham, Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, Mrs. Conrad Wesselhoeft, Mrs. E. Lawrence Oliver, Mr. P. A. O'Connell, Mrs. Atherton Loring, Mrs. Homer B. Richardson, Mr. Hamilton Edwards, Mrs. Holmes Hinkley, Mrs. W. H. Blood, Jr., and Mrs. F. H. Godfrey.

There are only a few days left to obtain tickets for this gay affair from Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk, 109 Essex road, Chestnut Hill, or from the box office at Symphony Hall.

'Pop' Programs for Next Few Days

The Pop concerts enter their second week at the concert tomorrow night, the first Sunday concert of the season. Arthur Fiedler, conducting the Pops orchestra of about ninety Symphony players, continues to mingle special programs and music new to the Pops with the tried favorites of long standing. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, will be the guest soloist at tomorrow's concert. Monday will bring a Tyrolean program, this concert having been taken over for the benefit of the Infants' Hospital. Jesus Maria Sanroma will be soloist on Tuesday. On Wednesday there will be a Promenade concert in the fashion of the London "Proms," featuring the music which is also to be heard at the Coronation ceremony on the same day. The Coronation Ball will follow the concert.

Program follows:

Saturday Evening, May 8

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser". Wagner
Suite .... Corelli
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie
Ave Maria ......Schubert-Wilhelmj
Finale, from the Fourth Symphony .... Tchaikovsky

A Siegfried Idyll..........Wagner
Minuet from the Symphony in G minor ....Mozart
Bolero .... Ravel

"Maytime," Selection .....Romberg
"Roses from the South," Waltzes Strauss
Seventh Slavonic Dance....Dvorak

Sunday Evening, May 9

Polonaise Militaire Chopin-Glazounov
Suite from "Dardanus"....Rameau
(Transcribed for Orchestra by De Lamarter)
Valse Triste ....Sibelius
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tchaikovsky
Second Suite from "Peer Gynt" Grieg
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor .... Grieg
Soloist: Heinrich Gebhard
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg" ....Wagner
Song of the Volga Bargemen Arranged by Jacchia
Sailor's Dance from "Red Poppy" Gliere

Monday Evening, May 10
TYROLEAN NIGHT

March, "Under the Double Eagle" J. F. Wagner
"Die Fledermaus," Overture. Strauss
German Dance, "The Sleigh Ride" Mozart
"Georgica," Bavarian Folk Pieces Egk
Tyrolean Peasant Dances. Schonherr
Liebesfreud .... Kreisler
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
"Vienna Blood," Waltzes....Strauss
"Die Dorfmusik" ....Fryberg
'Donner und Blitzen," Polka. Strauss

Tuesday Evening, May 11

Wedding March from "Le Coq d'Or" ....Rimsky-Korsakov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" .... Mozart
"The Swan of Tuonela"....Sibelius
English horn solo: Louis Speyer
"Peer Gynt," Suite...........Grieg
"Deep Forest," Prelude.....Daniels
Bolero .... Ravel
Konzertstuck for Piano and Orchestra .... Weber
Soloist: J. M. Sanroma
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
"On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" Suite ....Grofe
Torch Dance from the Suite, "Henry VIII" ....German

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)
M[illegible] 7 - 1937

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which during the past year has risen to greater heights than ever before and which, with Koussevitzky conducting, is one of the greatest orchestras in the land, will return, after an absence of seven years, to Montclair on Feb. 9, 1938, and appear at the Montclair High School as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert Course series.

Of a recent concert of the orchestra which was given in New York City, Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, writes:

"The concert given last night must rank, because of the material of the program and the quality of the performances, among the most brilliant exhibitions that this distinguished instrumental body has given in this city. The interpretations bore witness again to the unsurpassed quality of the orchestra and also testify to the versatility and the constantly ripening mastery of its leader."

That Montclair is well aware of the privilege of having this great "unsurpassed" orchestra appear in Montclair is shown by the fact that at this early date, nine months before the event, more than one-half the seating capacity of the house has been taken. All who wish seats should not delay in making reservations. Tickets should be selected at the Unity Institute Office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770.

Music Year In Review

Am. May 9/37

By Winthrop Sargeant
Universal Service Music Editor

New York, May 8.

EACH SPRING it is the habit of New York drama critics to emerge from an intellectual huddle with pronouncements about the "best plays" or the "ten best plays," or the "finest piece of acting," or something of the sort, that the season has brought forth.

Music critics, though their behavior somewhat resembles that of drama critics, do not, as a rule, exhibit this tendency.

This difference in habits immediately preceding the moulting season may seem baffling. But a little investigation will disclose the fact that the music critic really doesn't know what the "finest performances" or the "best compositions" of the winter were.

If he did, the chances are that spring would find him behind the bars quietly but firmly maintaining that he was Ruth Slenzynski.

In fact, no single person could hear all of the important musical events of a New York season, even if his sanity could withstand the attempt.

* * *

NEVERTHELESS, this writer is tempted to set down what, to him, have been the most memorable experiences of the music season of 1936-37. After a long process of elimination he has decided that they are six in number.

The principal palm he would award to the Metropolitan's puroduction of "Tristan und Isolde," with Lauritz Melchor and Kirsten Flagstad in the title roles; with Friedrich Schorr and Emanuel List as Kurvenal and Marke, and with any one of that fine trio of Brangaenas, Karin Branzell, Kirsten Thorborg and Gertrude Wettergren.

If he were able to hear only one performance in a whole season ("What a pleasant idea!" reflects the careworn concert reviewer) he would have picked a "Tristan" like that, and treasured up its memory.

His second choice would be one of three events, all of them, like the "Tristan," Wagnerian occasions. These were "Siegfried," "Walkuere" and "Meistersinger," the locale again being the Metropolitan Opera House.

The rest of the "Ring" he would place in a lower category in spite of the incredible Flagstad Bruennhilde of "Goetterdaemmerung." This because of inequalities both in casting and in staging. His superlative "Meistersinger" had Lotte Lehmann as its Eva.

Flagstad, Melchor and Schorr were all indispensable parts of the "Siegfried" and "Walkuere" he has in mind, and the former music drama had the graphic mime of Karl Laufkoetter.

* * *

FIFTH on the list of the season's great occasions he would place Richard Strauss' "Elektra," done by the Philharmonic under Artur Rodzinski, with the tempestuous Hungarian Rosa Pauly in the title role. Sixth and last place he would award to the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

Each of these six represented an outstanding performance of a work of epic importance. This reviewer has heard other epics not so epic. There have also been smaller-scale events of memorable quality.

The piano recitals of Rachmaninoff and Joseph Hofmann remain among the season's finest memories, as do the violin recitals of Josef Szigeti and the 'cello recitals of Emanuel Feuermann.

Other achievements include the following: Most discerning performance of a standard romantic symphony: Georges Enesco conducting Schumann's C major.

Most inspiring and perfectly unified solo-and-orchestra performance: The Sibelius Violin Concerta with Jascha Heifetz and the Philharmonic, John Barbirolli conducting.

Most interesting novelties: Khrennikov's First Symphony; Walton's First Symphony.

Most promising opera by a young American: Gian Carlo Menotti's "Amelia at the Ball."

LONDON 'PROM' AT THE POPS TONIGHT

May 12/37

The Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight will be turned into a London "Prom" and dedicated to the British coronation festivities. The floor will be cleared for promenading London fashion, and Arthur Fiedler will include upon the program music which will also be played at the coronation. A ball will follow the concert. The program follows:

Coronation March..........Edward German
"The Royal Fireworks," suite.... Handel
Entr'acte from "Rosamunde".... Schubert
Finale, Symphony in C minor. [illegible]

French Military March........Saint [illegible]
"The Mikado," selection Sir Arthur S[illegible]

Two Canadian marches:
"The Land of the Maple"....Lau[illegible]
"Laurentian March"........Lau[illegible]
"Sally in Our Alley"
(Transcribed for string orchestra by Frank Bridge)
"Country Gardens"...............Grainger
"Pomp and Circumstance," march Sir Edward Elgar

God Save the King

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLIC
MAY

An Imp
In M

Arthur Foote, C
Outstanding
Brings Remi
Lifelong Fri and Tributes

Editor's Note:
cian who has don
in this city in th
student of Mr Foo
Edward MacDowel
music history.

IN the passing of A eminent American April 8, America has and outstanding pers that enriched the lives knew him and a life tha nation richer because among us.

Born in Salem on Ma
Mr Foote received his e tion in the state of M graduating from Harvar in 1874. He continued in composition for som Prof Paine at Harvard, and organ with B. G. La finally taking the positio at the First Unitarian Boston in 1878.

During those years M peared often as a concer in the course of thre seasons, beginning in 21 trio concerts (piano
'cello) in Chickering hal critics said, "Mr Foote fancy and an exceptio judgment in controling been demonstrated when appealed to the public ea

The Kneisel quartet ga hearing of many of h music works. Among th Sonata for violin and p minor, of which Apthorp wrote: "It is spontaneou ng, reminding one of S he breadth of phrase
elodic treatment of the Quartet Premie

Another of Mr Foote's
s first performance by uartet was the String
-major. Mr Apthorp w ork after the first he wo favorite movments of ere the Scherzo and th et to our mind, the first falling somewhat behin point of brilliancy, sur oth in a certain mas armony and fine cohere elopment. The beauty a e variations are unmist

Mr Foote's concerto fo chestra was first playe eindel and the Chicago chestra. Mr Steindel bei ellist of this organizat me. Chicago critics sai e concerto a spirited rtistic interpretation an ows Mr Foote in an e s a composer."

His works have been h argest concert halls in nd Theodore Thomas them on his program
Koussevitzky, conductor on Symphony orchestra, s last winter gave seve nces of Mr Foote's Suite or string orchestra, pla t New York and Bosto ositions include orchestra works, songs, chamber ear view rgeant

Editor
York, May 8. habit of New merge from an ronouncements the "ten best of acting," or the season has

r behavior some-critics, do not,
y.

mediately precedm baffling. But a
the fact that the
what the "finest positions" of the spring would find firmly maintaining hear all of the im-York season, even ttempt.

is tempted to set e most memorable of 1936-37. After a decided that they ward to the Metround Isolde," with agstad in the title

Emanuel List as ny one of that fine sell, Kirsten Thor-

e performance in a idea!" reflects the
would have picked
d up its memory.
ne of three events,
agnerian occasions.
re" and "Meister-
the Metropolitan place in a lower Flagstad Bruennis because of in-taging. His super-mann as its Eva.

were all indispen-
"Walkuere" he has
ma had the graphic

HT hall don tish will don inhich ion.
The

rman ndel bert hms aens ivan deau leau ank nger lgar

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 9 - 1937

An Important Figure In Music of America

Arthur Foote, Composer, Regarded as a Unique and Outstanding Personality — His Recent Death Brings Reminiscences From a Former Pupil and Lifelong Friend—Critics' Estimates of His Work and Tributes by His Associates

By JULIA C. ROGERS

Editor's Note: Miss Rogers, a well-known Springfield musician who has done much to further the cause of good music in this city in the presentation of chamber concerts, was a student of Mr Foote early in her career. Later, she studied with Edward MacDowell, another important personality in American music history.

IN the passing of Arthur Foote, eminent American composer, on April 8, America has lost a unique and outstanding personality; one that enriched the lives of all who knew him and a life that makes the nation richer because he has lived among us.

Born in Salem on March 5, 1853; Mr Foote received his entire education in the state of Massachusetts, graduating from Harvard university in 1874. He continued his studies in composition for some time with Prof Paine at Harvard, and in piano and organ with B. G. Lang of Boston, finally taking the position of organist at the First Unitarian church at Boston in 1878.

During those years Mr Foote appeared often as a concert pianist, and in the course of three successive seasons, beginning in 1881, he gave 21 trio concerts (piano, violin and 'cello) in Chickering hall. Of him the critics said, "Mr Foote has a lively fancy and an exceptionally refined judgment in controling it. This has been demonstrated whenever he has appealed to the public ear."

The Kneisel quartet gave the first hearing of many of his chamber music works. Among them is the Sonata for violin and piano in G-minor, of which Apthorp, the critic, wrote: "It is spontaneous and flowing, reminding one of Schumann in the breadth of phrase and general melodic treatment of the adagio."

Quartet Premier

Another of Mr Foote's works given its first performance by the Kneisel quartet was the String quartet in E-major. Mr Apthorp wrote of this work after the first hearing, "The two favorite movments of the quartet were the Scherzo and the Andante; yet to our mind, the first movement, if falling somewhat behind these two in point of brilliancy, surpasses them both in a certain masterliness of harmony and fine coherency of development. The beauty and force of the variations are unmistakable."

Mr Foote's concerto for 'cello and orchestra was first played by Bruno Steindel and the Chicago Symphony orchestra. Mr Steindel being the first 'cellist of this organization at the time. Chicago critics said, "He gave the concerto a spirited and highly artistic interpretation and the work shows Mr Foote in an envialbe light as a composer."

His works have been heard in the largest concert halls in the country, and Theodore Thomas placed many of them on his programs. Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as recently as last winter gave several performances of Mr Foote's Suite in E-major for string orchestra, playing it both at New York and Boston. His compositions include orchestral and choral works, songs, chamber and sacred music, "his facility in this realm being noteworthy."

Performances of Mr Foote's works by the Boston Symphony orchestra have been given since 1887, over a period of 50 years. His Suite in E-major was first given in 1909, again in 1921, 1925, 1929, and again last winter—a great tribute to the composer.

Many of Mr Foote's orchestral works have been given their first performances by the Boston Symphony orchestra. He collaborated with Prof Spalding, head of the music division of Harvard university in "Modern Harmony," a book widely used by students as a textbook.

As one whose earliest introduction to music literature was guided by the hand of Mr Foote, I look back with keen delight to the study of the great masters under his direction. A lifelong friendship has followed and some interesting passages in his letters now become historic.

His Correspondence

A Spanish musician, Fernandes Arbos, conductor of the Madrid symphony, came to America during the season of 1903 to be concertmaster of the Boston symphony. On his last visit here a few years ago, Mr Foote wrote about him in one of his letters, "Arbos was here last week. The concert was almost entirely Spanish. He was the same delightful man who was mighty pleased to be with his old friends of whom I had eight to meet him at the Tavern club. He is a good and individual conductor."

In another letter Mr Foote speaks of the new Symphony hall at Boston. "Musically we are very much interested in the new hall which is most successful. I was dining last evening with Theodore Thomas, and he was curious to see it today, especially as he had been consulted by the architects."

In speaking of chamber music programs, Mr Foote wrote: "The Schumann trio is an old favorite of mine, as are the Brahms piano quartet I brought out in Boston as well as the G-minor one in 1881."

More recently Mr Foote writes, "I look back to the days of my youth when there was also more contentment and happiness for all." As recently as January of this year, Mr Foote wrote an article for the Musical Quarterly, entitled "A Bostonian Remembers." Of this article the Boston Transcript wrote, "There is a most interesting set of Boston reminiscenses from the pen of Arthur Foote in the Musical Quarterly of January. It should be read for its matter and its manner.

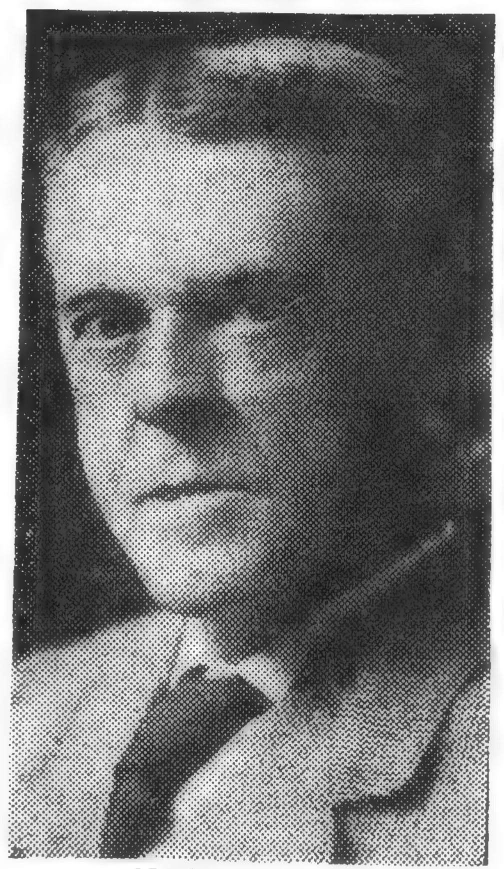
Those of us fortunate enough to have known Mr Foote appreciate the rare tribute written by his friend Prof Spalding of Harvard and published in the Boston Transcript. He writes: "Having been associated with Mr Foote in many important relationships for nearly 50 years, I know whereof I speak. All types of men admired and loved him and he always made everyone happy and at ease in his presence, the hallmark of a true gentleman.

"This broad humanity appeared in his compositions and struck a note which is not likely soon to be duplicated. Arthur Foote set up ideals and standards of artistic integrity and workmanship, always living up to them himself—which we hope the rising generation will do their best to follow."

Feb 9

THE BOSTON HERALD,

Musician Dies



ARTHUR FOOTE

ARTHUR FOOTE DIES; MUSICIAN, COMPOSER

Organist and Teacher, 84, Graduated From Harvard in 1874

Arthur Foote, 84, of 158 Rindge avenue, Newton Center, noted musician, teacher and composer, died yesterday in the Phillips House after a short illness.

A native of Salem, he was the son of Caleb and Mary Wilder (White) Foote. He was graduated from Harvard with an A.B. degree in 1874 and was awarded an A.M. degree from that university in 1875. Later he took degrees from Trinity and Dartmouth colleges. In 1880, he married Kate G. Knowlton of Boston. For many years Mr. Foote was an organist and teacher of pianoforte playing, and was organist at the First Unitarian Church in Boston. He has composed and published suites for orchestras, among his other works. He was a member of the Harvard Musical Association, and the National Institute of Arts and Letters. Among the clubs in which he held membership were the Harvard, Tavern and Brae Burn Country Club.

Funeral arrangements have not been completed.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAY 9 - 1937

Berkshire Festival

An all-Beethoven, an all-Wagner and an all-Brahms programe have been planned by Serge Koussevitsky for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival in August. The other four programs to be presented in the course of the two weeks' series on the tanglewood estate, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., will span orchestra music from Haydn and Mozart to Franck and Tchaikovsky. The contemporary field will be represented by works of Respighi, Ravel and the American, Edward Burlingame Hill.

The Festival of 1937 will consist of six orchestral concerts distributed over two weekends in August, these to be divided into two units of three concerts each, for which subscriptions are now being taken. The first series will consist of concerts on Thursday, Saturday and Sunday (Aug. 5, 7 8) the second series will be given on corresponding days of the following weeg (Aug. 12, 14, 15).

Two movements from the Sinfonietta for String Orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill will be played. The programmes in further detail for the first week will include: Beethoven's Fifth, and "Pastoral" Symphonies, and Third "Leonore" Overture; Mozart's Symphony in E. flat; Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe"; Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Respighi's "Pines of Rome"; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

For the second week the Wagnerian program will include excerpts from "Tannhauser," "The Valkyrie" and "Siegfried"; also from "Tristan and Isolde", "Die Meistersinger" and "Parsifal." Brahms' First and Third Symphonies will be played, also his Academic Festival Overture; Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade."

* * *

Concertmaster of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at the Stadium concerts this Summer will be John Corigliano. He will officiate in this capacity for eight weeks, from June 23 through August 17, while Mishel Piastro is on a concert tour.

Born in New York in 1901 of Italian parentage, John Corigliano started his musical studies as a small child. His violin teachers were Alois Trnka and the late Leopold Auer. He made his debut at Aeolian Hall in 1919 and in 1921 was soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra under Josef Stransky, playing the Bruch Concerto. Later he appeared with the Cleveland and St. Louis Orchestras, gave several Carnegie Hall recitals and concerts in such cities as Chicago, Boston, etc. During 1927 and 1928 he made coast-to-coast tours as assisting artist to Marian Talley, the following year he was heard in the same role with Maria Jeritza and in 1932 he toured with Chaliapin.

COHOES. N. Y.
AMERICAN

MAY 12 1937

61

Berkshire Music Unit Passes Quota

Promoters Have Sold 100 Boxes for This Seasons' Concerts

Stockbridge, Mass., May 12.—(UP)—George W. Edman, acting chairman, announced today that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., had "more than reached its self-imposed quota of sustaining memberships for the 1937 event." This season's concerts will be at Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate overlooking the Stockbridge bowl which was presented by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent site for the festival, on August 5, 7, 8 and 12, 14, 15.

"We are 100 per cent ahead of last year," Edman said. "We have sold 100 boxes already, or one-third more than we had sold up to concert time last year.

"I believe we were the first outdoor musical venture of its kind to pay our own way, and that we did with a surplus in 1936."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitky, conductor, will be the attractions.

Eliel Saarinen, Bloomfield, Mich., architect, has been commissioned to develop the festival grounds, "designed to be a great shrine of music in America comparable to the great festival centers of Europe."

The festival is non-profit and sponsored by residents of Massachusetts, Northern Connecticut and Eastern New York.

62

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post May 11/37

Death of Arthur Foote Loss to Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The saddening item in the music news of the moment is the death of Arthur Foote, dean of American composers, at the age of 84. Many have lost a valued, personal friend. Music has lost one who was the friend of all that was honest in the art and the foe of all that was not. Whether or not it accorded with his particular taste, there was nothing in modern music which was outside the scope of Mr. Foote's interest or which failed to receive his open-minded scrutiny. The recently issued augmented and revised edition of the Modern Harmony, which he wrote in conjunction with Walter R. Spalding, contains examples from the works of Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Honneger, Milhaud and other modernists.

As a composer in his own right, Mr. Foote was by nature conservative. But the lack of innovating and experimental tendencies had little effect on the vitality of his best work. There has been repeated occasion to remark that Mr. Foote's most characteristic pieces neither aged nor staled. If they were never sensational, neither did they lack individuality. They were genuine and they remained fresh. Happily the interest in Mr. Foote's music continued as long as his life lasted. Dr. Koussevitzky had an especial fondness for the engaging Suite for Strings in E major. The People's Symphony, under Mr. Sevitzky, devoted half a concert to Mr. Foote's music last season. He was the subject of the first of the federal music project's Composers' Forums last autumn, and the State Symphony orchestra at a recent Copley Theatre concert played the "Night Piece" for flute and strings. If the American composer now coming along could count on the long-continued recognition which Mr. Foote received, he would be a fortunate young man indeed.

* * * *

A musical anniversary is being marked at the Symphony concerts of this week, the 70th of the composition of Johann Strauss, Jr.'s, waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube." This most famous example of a fascinating genre was lately made the subject of much adulation in the composer's home city of Vienna. We of Boston are about to hear it at the conclusion of one of the most stimulating and original programmes which the lately conservative Dr. Koussevitzky has given us in some time. A composition by another and very different Austrian heads this refreshing list, the long and imposing Eighth Symphony of Anton Bruckner. The other items are the resident composer, Mabel Daniels', "Deep Forest," new to the Symphony concerts, although not to Boston, and a suite by Corelli.

The programme of the Symphony concert of tomorrow evening, which concludes the current Monday series, is made up of two symphonies, the Second of Beethoven and the Fourth of Tchaikovsky.

* * * *

Speaking of matters symphonic, the energetic and enterprising Fabien Sevitzky, who brought the People's Symphony orchestra to a new pitch of eloquence and effectiveness, has been engaged by the Indianapolis Symphony orchestra to lead its concerts of next season. There will also be a tour of the important cities of the State. Mr. Sevitzky makes his only Boston appearance of the season at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening of this week, when he leads his Young Musicians' orchestra through a programme containing Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz," the first movement of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Dubensky's "Tom Sawyer," eight Russian songs by Liadov and the first "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg.

* * * *

ZweiHerzen atPops

B. Trans.

The long awaited Tyrolean Pops arrived last night at Symphony Hall, to be greeted by a tremendous audience—"sold out tonight" was announced from the box office. Car after car drove up filled with friends of the Infants' Hospital, which benefitted from the concert, and the tables were soon crowded with groups of people, bent upon visiting until the music stole their attention. The decorations were very attractive, large cakes of ice piled about the footlights, with lovely flowers gleaming from them, and then, to carry out the more rigorous Tyrolean atmosphere of the evening, crossed skis and ski poles were hung from the balcony.

Numerous young ladies in all manner of bright, gay, costumes, sold gardenias and programs, circulating among the tables.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., one of the committee members, came out on the stage with George von L. Meyer, who as superintendent of the Children's Hospital has more than a little interest in the Infants,' to announce many interesting facts about a Ford car which would fall to the happy lot of some member of the audience, including, perhaps, himself, as he had one of the programs between whose covers was secreted the fateful sign. Mrs. Dane was in white, with large puffed sleeves and a sash of bright colored ribbons. Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk and Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, two other committee members, were both in black lace, the latter with a sash of moss green.

Mrs. Barrett Wendell arrived for the occasion in a black velvet wrap which had purple velvet for its collar. Mrs. Randolph Morgan Appleton came with her daughter, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott. Mrs. Dunbar Lockwood, who was with Mr. Lockwood, chose one of the popular prints, hers in red and green, with which she wore a white cape.

Sitting at one large table were Mr. and Mrs. Christian Herter, Mrs. Herter in a Paisley print; Mr. and Mrs. George Saltonstall West, the latter in black with a small white collar, and Mrs. W. Davies Sohier, whose black gown was covered by a brilliant red jacket made of many petals. Mr. and Mrs. Sargent Collier were there, Mrs. Collier wearing a wrap made of huge, fragile poppies.

At a nearby table were Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Mason, Jr., the latter wearing a summer ermine wrap over her gown of chartreuse; Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Cunningham, with Mrs. Cunningham wearing a gray gown with a yellow satin jacket, fastened by large frogs at the waist; Mr. and Mrs. Samuel L. Batchelder, with Mrs. Batchelder in very pale organdy, a huge flower as its only decoration, and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Abbott, Jr., the latter in black with many twisted pearls.

Others there were Mrs. Chatfield Whitman, whose gown was a combination of chartreuse green and a darker shade, with Mrs. Roger Cutler, in a printed chiffon of rose and black and white with a sable cape, and Mr. Cutler; Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Woods, Mrs. Woods in black taffeta, with Mrs. Nelson Aldrich in a very good looking striped gray and white organdie, and Mrs. Frederick M. Dearborn, Jr., in green.

Still others were Miss Grace Madden in a Burgundy print, Miss Faith Thoron in a garnet velvet wrap, arriving with Miss Katherine Newbold in sapphire blue, both escorted; Mrs. Robert Livermore in black velvet, Mrs. Wilbur Higgins, in royal blue crepe with a mink cape, enjoying the evening to the full, the pops in which she was interested for the Christopher Shop having taken place last week; Miss Alice Spaulding, in midnight blue crepe with a silver fox cape and a lovely corsage of orchids; Miss Catherine Pentecost, Mrs. John L. Grandin and her daughter, Miss Isabella Grandin, the former in a brilliant rose wrap over a black and white print, and the latter in a green moire wrap over a black sheer.

Also enjoying the spectacle and the music were Miss Liberty Dick and her sister, Miss Joan Dick; Miss Evelyn Hollingsworth who was in a party with Robert Cutler and Nathaniel Saltonstall; Mr. and Mrs. Robert W. Ladd (Helen Richmond), just back from their wedding trip, the latter looking very nice in a black wrap trimmed with ermine; Miss Celina Robbins, her black and white print worn with a beige wool street coat; Mr. and Mrs. George T. Rice, Mrs. Rice in a print, with a lame wrap trimmed with white fox.

Miss Molly Weed wore a black straw hat far back on her head to show her bangs, with her black ensemble. Arriving together were Mrs. Richard Saltonstall in a beige gown with a fascinating beige wrap, Mrs. John A. Tuckerman in black crepe, Mrs. William B. Long, in a full length black taffeta wrap and Mrs. Gardiner H. Fiske.

Mrs. Morgan Butler was in sapphire velvet, an intricate ornament in her hair, and still others were Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Chase with Mrs. Chase's mother and brother, Mrs. Frederick W. Eaton and Harding C. Newman. Also with that party was Miss Elizabeth Stewart, in a print, bright flowers on a white background. Miss Barbara Bradford was also in a party with her brother, the former wearing a print of small, bright flowers.

Mr. and Mrs. Augustin H. Parker, Jr., seemed to be having great fun, Mrs. Parker in black taffeta with a tiny frill of white. Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth also combined black and white, her dress having a tiny Peter Pan collar. Miss Anne Tuckerman was all in black with a single gardenia to lighten her costume and Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon had several narcissi pinned in her hair. Others were Mr. and Mrs. George Draper, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Daley, Mrs. Donald Falvey in striped organdy; Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Hale, Mrs. John H. Marshall in a gray dress with a silver belt, who stopped to talk with Mrs. Roger Cutler; Miss Mary Elizabeth Clarke, in black with a tiny white collar.

The much heralded skiers who came bravely out onto the stage, schussing right into the midst of the audience, were a terrific sensation. Miss Emily Dick was the only one who took a tumble, Miss Patsy Fuller, and Miss Margaret Nather having a wonderful trip, along with Alexander H. Bright, Robert Livermore, Jr., John Lawrence and John H. Marshall.

Personals

May 11/37

MRS. ROGER S. WARNER (Schervee)

Has Arranged the Unusual Exhibit of Nineteenth Century Gowns, Many of Them Originally Worn by Boston Ladies of That Period and Now Being Shown at the Women's Educational and Industrial Union as Part of Its Sixtieth Anniversary Celebration. The Birthday Banquet of the Union Is Being Held at the Somerset This Evening, with Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley as Presiding Officer.

Extra! Extra!

In preparation for the "Newsboys' Night at the Pops," which has been planned for Thursday evening, May 27, for the benefit of the Burroughs Newsboys Foundation, several of the young ladies who will don overhauls and caps and peddle copies of the Boston Blast during the concert were entertained at tea yesterday afternoon by Mrs. William P. Homans and Mrs. Roger Griswold. Some of the girls arrived in the costumes which they will wear at the affair for the approval of the committee in charge.

Miss Lucretia Brooks drove up to the tea in a trim dark blue suit, but changed into her overhauls and a light blue shirt, while Miss Helen Tufts Crocker, who is in charge of the twenty-five ushers, arrived wearing a black shirt with a neat pair of overhauls.

Others at the tea who will play the part of newsboys were Miss J. Holladay Philbin, Miss Rosemary Crocker, who appeared in white flannel trousers, not having yet secured a pair of overhauls for her costume; Miss Barbara Putnam, Miss Marguerite Pickman, Miss Susan Russell, Miss Jane Ragle and Miss Julianna Sweetser.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, MAY 10, 1937

SLEIGH IN POPS PROGRAM AND CONDUCTOR

Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, and Mrs. Alfred Kidder, member of the executive committee of Infants Hospital benefit night at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight. They are seated in a sleigh which will be part of the "Tyrolean night" setting.

TYROLEAN NIGHT - May 10

by Miss Mitchell

To all you who seek entertainment that's "Tops,"
We offer Tyrolean Night at the Pops.
A program to please with surprises for all
For we're moving the Tyrol to Symphony Hall.
Surrounded by ice, all in color so gay,
Tyrolean airs, Arthur Fiedler will play.
A ski-shute for skiers, on rollers to run,
At each intermission, will add to the fun.
And if you would know just how lucky you are,
Take a chance on a shiny, new, V eight Ford car.
With yodelers to yodel and skiers to ski
We'll all be as merry as merry can be.
So if you'd be where ne'er a dull moment crops,
Then come to Tyrolean Night at the Pops.

to Attend Tyrolean Night at Pops

WILL SELL FLOWERS AT POPS

(Photo by Garo)

Wearing this colorful Bavarian costume, Mrs. Sargent Collier (Eleanor McCormick) of Commonwealth avenue will be one of the flower and program vendors this evening at "Tyrolean Night at the Pops." Staged to benefit the Infants Hospital, it will feature one of the most spectacular stunts yet attempted in Symphony Hall, when eight well-known skiers will dash down a ski slide from above the stage to the very center of the hall.

Her. May 10/37

Ski Slide in Symphony Hall To Feature Benefit Tonight

Among Hostesses Who Will Bring Dinner Guests on To Gay Event Are Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon And Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth

By PAULINE WARREN

Perhaps the most amazing tour de force ever attempted in sedate Symphony Hall will be performed this evening when eight or ten skiers will speed down an improvised ski slide right into the midst of the apprehensive but delighted (if successful) patrons of Tyrolean Night at the Pops. All the skiers are among Boston's most experienced and prominent skiers and have long prepared for this appalling feat by many hours of practise on the steep, icy trails of New Hampshire hills or in the Tyrol. This stunt, which will be only one of the many novelties offered by the committee for the Infants' Hospital, which is to profit from the evening, promises to be more breath-taking than anything out of Barnum and Bailey, excepting perhaps the death-defying bicycle act of the Wallendas.

These daring skiers—and right here and now we wish them luck that they do not shatter a few champagne bottles on the way—will be Miss Harriet ("Patsy") Fuller, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert E. Fuller of Brimmer Street; Miss Emily Dick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Evans R. Dick of Pinckney Street; Miss Kitty Talbot, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Max L. Talbot of Brookline; Miss Margaret Nather, Mr. Robert Livermore, Jr., Mr. Alexander H. Bright, Mr. Harold Willis and Mr. John Marshall.

Dinner hostesses will bring their guests to the hall very promptly so as not to miss any part of this gay occasion, and dinners will be rather earlier than usual since the concerts always start sharp at eight thirty. Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon will come in from her home in Jamaica Plain with her guests and others giving dinners will include Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth of Milton, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer of Marlborough Street, Mrs. Thomas Barbour of Clarendon Street and Mrs. Thomas P. Beal, Jr., of Chestnut Hill.

Skiing at the Pops

Things have gone picturesque in a big way up at the Boston "Pop" Concerts, for according to reports from the Hub City Arthur Fiedler's men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been competing with yodelers and ski-jumpers. And all to the upliftment of spirits for those who are privileged to sip and munch while the orchestra and its soloists perform.

The New York Times, quoting, no doubt, from some unnamed correspondent down East, has this to say about the sacrilegious doings in Symphony Hall:

> "The Boston Symphony 'Pops' have gone cabaret—that is, potentially. This was manifested last Monday when a Tyrolean night was a featured program. So far as the Tyrolean part of the program was concerned, it consisted mainly of an exhibition called the Slalom—no more or less than a form of indoor skiing. This was made possible by the building of a runway beginning in the northeast corner of the band stand, running obliquely to the conductor's stand, and thence on an incline and a straightaway through the middle aisle to the rear of the auditorium. An added attraction, peculiarly Tyrolean, was a pair of yodelers. Together, these made a fairly good resemblance to what is known as a cabaret show. While it was somewhat new to the usually staid and solemn listeners to music, nevertheless the audience which packed the auditorium received it with screams of delight, and howls of laughter from the masculine part of the audience. Possibly, the entertainment may have stemmed from the successful 'Gay Nineties' of previous years. It was clearly an up-to-date phase of Arthur Fiedler's progress in modern musical programs, although in addition, the musical numbers were of the familiar type known to patrons of the 'Pops.'"

One can see all kinds of possibilities in the practice—should it become widespread—of putting up ski-runways in Carnegie Hall or the Metropolitan Opera House. The Snow Maiden could doubtless be put on with greater verisimilitude, as also the skating ballet in Le Prophete, or the duel scene in Eugen Onegin. But too much whizzing down the inclines and around corners might become distracting in the midst of a Mahler symphony scored for a thousand throats and instruments, or even among the thunders of a Sibelius ode to nature. We think the Bostonians will probably see the value of mending their ways as the autumn comes on, and things will probably be staid and decorous again when Sergei Koussevitzky begins his severe ministrations in the same emporium.

Editorial
Musical Courier May 22/37

Society Throngs Symphony Hall for Tyr lean Concer

B. Her. May 11/37

Ski Slide Feature of Pops Benefiting Infants' Hospital

Miss Harriet Fuller, Miss Emily Dick, Miss Kitty Talbot, Miss Margaret Nather Delight Audience with Their Daring

By PAULINE WARREN

Symphony hall rang to its rafters last evening with hearty singing and stamping of feet, while Arthur Fiedler conducted rollicking Tyrolean peasant songs and dances for the gay Tyrolean concert, which benefitted the Infants' Hospital. To add still further to the gaiety and excitement of the evening, a group of skiers sped down an improvised slide right into the midst of the cheering audience. These daring skiers were among Boston's most experienced and well-known enthusiasts of this popular sport, and included Miss Harriet Fuller, Miss Emily Dick, Miss Kitty Talbot, Miss Margaret Nather, Mr. Robert Livermore, Jr., Mr. Alexander H. Bright, Mr. Harold Willis and Mr. John Marshall, and all made the grade with only one spill.

The staid and dignified hall not only sounded like a Bavarian tavern, but looked like one as well, with pretty girls in fetching caps, aprons and bright full skirts, flitting about with trays laden with gardenias and carnations, and beguiling the audience to buy their fragrant wares to aid the hospital. A painted scene of lofty, snow-covered mountain peaks formed an appropriate background for the orchestra, and the stage was edged with huge cakes of ice, into which colorful spring flowers had been frozen, which sparkled with iridescent colors under the brilliant lights.

During one of the intermissions, Herr and Fraulein Poschner delighted the audience with their lusty yodeling, and later on the applause was so deafening that the orchestra had to play "Zwei Herzen" three times, while everyone joined in the singing. Still other numbers on the program that were welcomed with loud applause were the "Overture to William Tell" and several lilting Strauss waltzes.

In the lobby as we entered, was Miss Julia Barbour, clad in a bright Tyrolean costume, and sitting in the Ford beach-wagon that was later awarded to the winner holding the program with the lucky number. Mrs. Marshal Fabyan, Jr., very piquant in her gaily sprigged peasant frock, was seated in a sleigh in the lobby, chatting with Miss Agnes Osborne. Sitting at a table together and enjoying the concert after performing their duties as flower vendors, were Mrs. Alfred B. Hallowell, Miss Marion Lawrence, Miss Marjorie Saltonstall, Miss Marileeds Heard and Miss J. Holiaday Philbin. Mrs. Hallowell wore an authentic Tyrolean hat of straw with her linen costume and gay bandanna, Miss Lawrence enhanced her costume with a bright red peaked tiara, and Miss Saltonstall, Miss Heard and Miss Philbin all wore the saucy little felt hats, so typical of the Tyrol, with their print frocks and bright aprons.

Miss Nancy Cochrane sported a real yodeler's costume, shorts and all, and Miss Cynthia Forbes looked very demure in her checked gingham with its fetching short puffed sleeves. Miss Anne Howard topped her costume with a short scarlet jacket and her tiny hat was perched on her blonde hair in a most rakish fashion. Miss Patricia Preston was very attractive in her bodice and skirt and Miss Frances Holmes wore a peaked Tyrolean hat of straw and a neck band on which were fastened two enormous daisies.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., chairman of the ladies' aid committee of the hospital, looked very winsome in her full-skirted white frock as she stood on the stage while the lucky number was drawn from a huge snowball. With her was blonde Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, chairman of the committee in charge of the concert, whose black lace gown was sashed with green. Miss Josephine Emery, in a cunning costume, was busily selling programs.

Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman wore pearls with her sheer black gown and Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley topped her black frock with a nile green wrap. With her jade green and white print, Mrs. George H. Lyman, Jr., wore a white jacket and Mrs. Richard L. Bowditch was wrapped in a quilted taffeta cape of glowing rose. Mrs. Nelson Aldrich's diagonally striped blue and white taffeta was brightened by a gleaming diamond circlet at the neckline.

Sitting at the table with Dr. and Mrs. John W. Bartol were their two daughters, Miss Dorothy Bartol and Mrs. Frederick R. Grace. Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Loring, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. David Patten arrived together, Mrs. Loring wearing a white wrap with her emerald green gown, and Mrs. Patten in a sheer navy and white print. Mrs. Sargent Collier topped her diaphanous black frock with a cape fashioned of enormous flaming poppies, and Mrs. John W. Adie wore gold hoop earrings and a sable cape with her lame gown.

Mrs. John W. Woods wore a slim black velvet wrap trimmed with fluffy white fox, and she had a white carnation tucked in her hair. With her black net frock trimmed with bands of velvet, Mrs. Thomas Thacher, Jr., wore a sable cape, and Mrs. William B. Long's wrap was crisp black taffeta. Mrs. Frederick Bruce Robinson, who attended with Mr. Robinson, wore a frock of flowered chiffon, and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk's gown was coronation blue with bands of white.

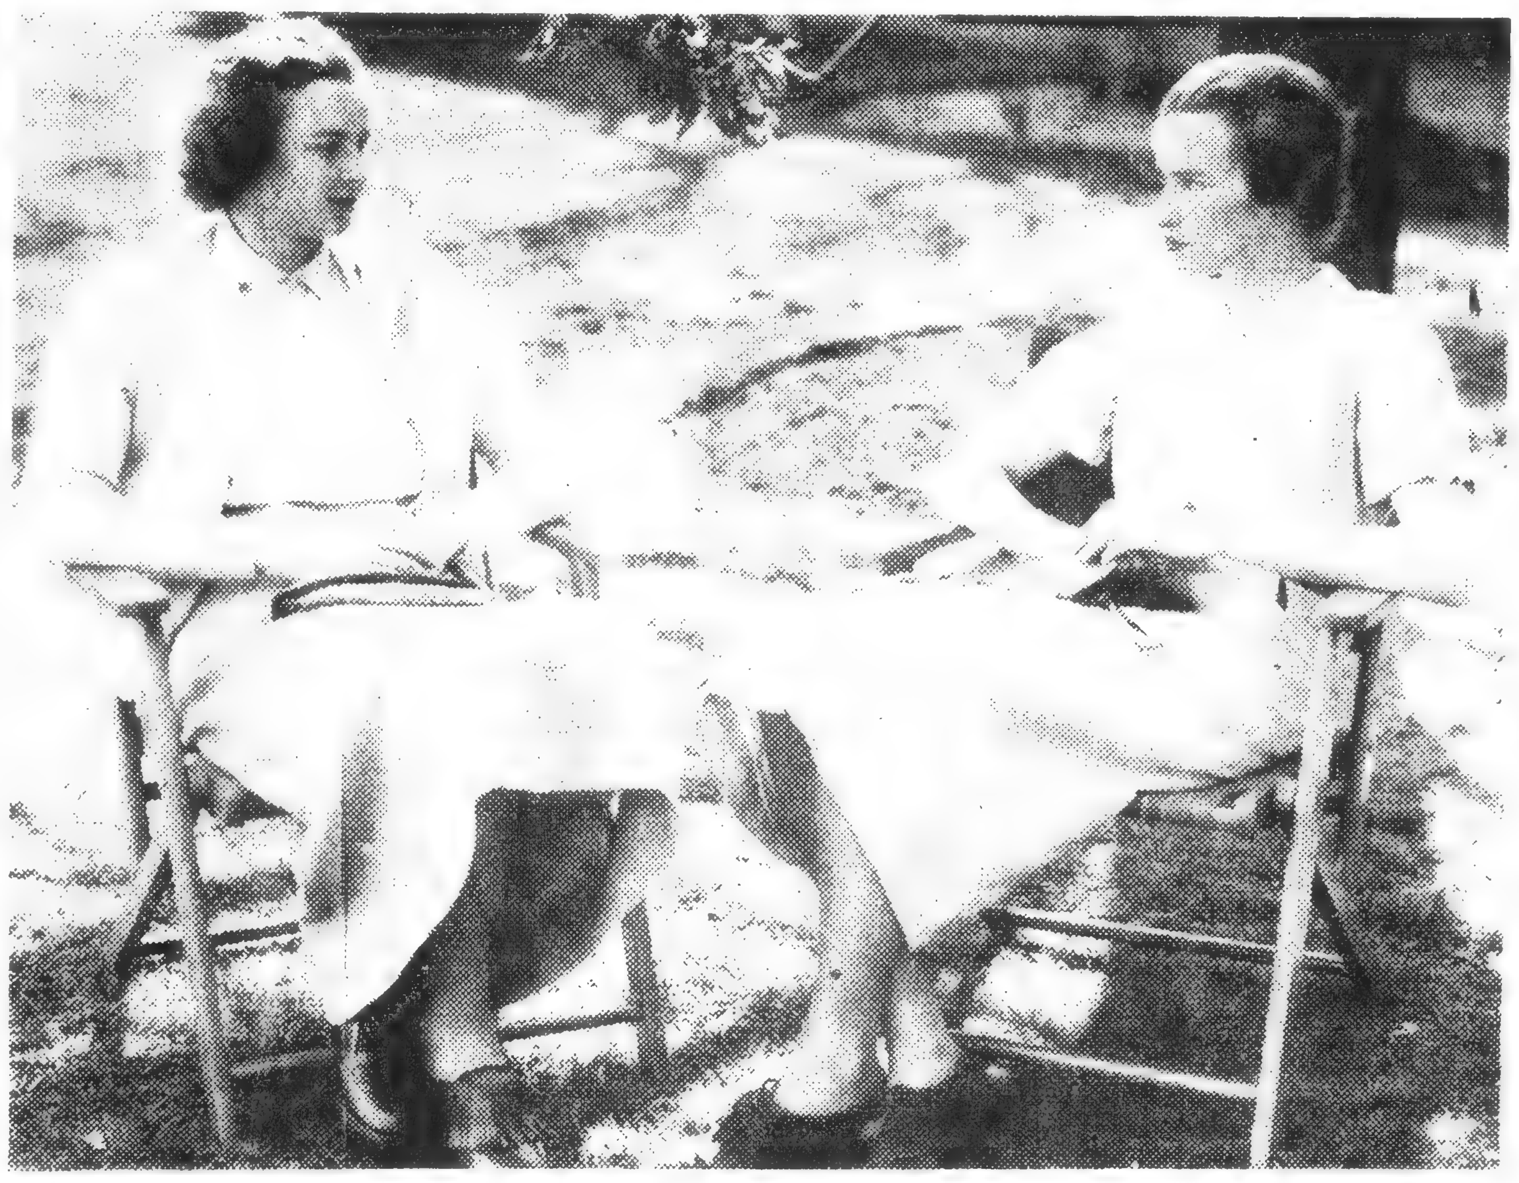
Sitting together were Miss Barbara Bassett and her sister, Miss Charlotte Bassett, and with Mr. and Mrs. James A. Garfield were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule. Miss Peggy Parker topped her pale blue frock with a shoulder cape of darker blue maribou, and she had a wee red ribbon tied on her blonde hair. Strolling about together during the intermission were Miss Betty Titcomb, whose navy frock was splashed with white daisies, and Miss Molly Ayer, in changeable violet and green taffeta.

Among others present were Mrs. Chatfield Whitman, Mrs. Barrett Wendell, Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, Mrs. Arthur M. Beale, Mr. and Mrs. Talbot Baker, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall, Miss Molly Weed, Miss Susannah Ayer, Mrs. John Yerxa, Mr. Richard Pentecost, Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., Mrs. Walter E. Campbell, Miss Constance Barbey, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Miss Barbara Bremer and Mrs. Edwin B. Dumphy.

(see next page 65)

Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, and Mrs. Alfred Kidder, member of the executive committee of Infants Hospital benefit night at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight. They are seated in a sleigh which will be part of the "Tyrolean night" setting.

DISCUSS PLANS FOR RADCLIFFE AT THE POPS'



Two attractive Radcliffe sophomores, Miss Mary Laverack (left) and Miss Margaret Eaton, photographed in the Radcliffe yard while discussing plans for "Radcliffe at the Pops," the concert taking place this evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Regional Scholars fund of the Radcliffe Club of Boston. Miss Laverack, who made her debut in the 1935-36 season, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Laverack of Boylston street, Brookline. Miss Eaton's parents are Mr. and Mrs. John Marshall Eaton of Concord.

to Attend Tyrolean Night at Pops

WILL SELL FLOWERS AT POPS

(Photo by Garo)

Wearing this colorful Bavarian costume, Mrs. Sargent Collier (Eleanor McCormick) of Commonwealth avenue will be one of the flower and program vendors this evening at "Tyrolean Night at the Pops." Staged to benefit the Infants Hospital, it will feature one of the most spectacular stunts yet attempted in Symphony Hall, when eight well-known skiers will dash down a ski slide from above the stage to the very center of the hall.

Her. May 10/37

Ski Slide in Symphony Hall To Feature Benefit Tonight

Among Hostesses Who Will Bring Dinner Guests on To Gay Event Are Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon And Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth

By PAULINE WARREN

Perhaps the most amazing tour de force ever attempted in sedate Symphony Hall will be performed this evening when eight or ten skiers will speed down an improvised ski slide right into the midst of the apprehensive but delighted (if successful) patrons of Tyrolean Night at the Pops. All the skiers are among Boston's most experienced and prominent skiers and have long prepared for this appalling feat by many hours of practise on the steep, icy trails of New Hampshire hills or in the Tyrol. This stunt, which will be only one of the many novelties offered by the committee for the Infants' Hospital, which is to profit from the evening, promises to be more breath-taking than anything out of Barnum and Bailey, excepting perhaps the death-defying bicycle act of the Wallendas.

These daring skiers—and right here and now we wish them luck that they do not shatter a few champagne bottles on the way—will be Miss Harriet ("Patsy") Fuller, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert E. Fuller of Brimmer Street; Miss Emily Dick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Evans R. Dick of Pinckney Street; Miss Kitty Talbot, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Max L. Talbot of Brookline; Miss Margaret Nather, Mr. Robert Livermore, Jr., Mr. Alexander H. Bright, Mr. Harold Willis and Mr. John Marshall.

Dinner hostesses will bring their guests to the hall very promptly so as not to miss any part of this gay occasion, and dinners will be rather earlier than usual since the concerts always start sharp at eight thirty. Mrs. Gaspar G. Bacon will come in from her home in Jamaica Plain with her guests and others giving dinners will include Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth of Milton, Mrs. J. Lewis Bremer of Marlborough Street, Mrs. Thomas Barbour of Clarendon Street and Mrs. Thomas P. Beal, Jr., of Chestnut Hill.

Skiing at the Pops

Things have gone picturesque in a big way up at the Boston "Pop" Concerts, for according to reports from the Hub City Arthur Fiedler's men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been competing with yodelers and ski-jumpers. And all to the upliftment of spirits for those who are privileged to sip and munch while the orchestra and its soloists perform.

The New York Times, quoting, no doubt, from some unnamed correspondent down East, has this to say about the sacrilegious doings in Symphony Hall:

> "The Boston Symphony 'Pops' have gone cabaret—that is, potentially. This was manifested last Monday when a Tyrolean night was a featured program. So far as the Tyrolean part of the program was concerned, it consisted mainly of an exhibition called the Slalom—no more or less than a form of indoor skiing. This was made possible by the building of a runway beginning in the northeast corner of the band stand, running obliquely to the conductor's stand, and thence on an incline and a straightaway through the middle aisle to the rear of the auditorium. An added attraction, peculiarly Tyrolean, was a pair of yodelers. Together, these made a fairly good resemblance to what is known as a cabaret show. While it was somewhat new to the usually staid and solemn listeners to music, nevertheless the audience which packed the auditorium received it with screams of delight, and howls of laughter from the masculine part of the audience. Possibly, the entertainment may have stemmed from the successful 'Gay Nineties' of previous years. It was clearly an up-to-date phase of Arthur Fiedler's progress in modern musical programs, although in addition, the musical numbers were of the familiar type known to patrons of the 'Pops.'"

One can see all kinds of possibilities in the practice—should it become widespread—of putting up ski-runways in Carnegie Hall or the Metropolitan Opera House. The Snow Maiden could doubtless be put on with greater verisimilitude, as also the skating ballet in Le Prophete, or the duel scene in Eugen Onegin. But too much whizzing down the inclines and around corners might become distracting in the midst of a Mahler symphony scored for a thousand throats and instruments, or even among the thunders of a Sibelius ode to nature. We think the Bostonians will probably see the value of mending their ways as the autumn comes on, and things will probably be staid and decorous again when Sergei Koussevitzky begins his severe ministrations in the same emporium.

Editorial
Musical Courier May 22/37

Society Throngs Symphony Hall for Tyrolean Concer

B. Her. May 11/37

Ski Slide Feature of Pops Benefiting Infants' Hospital

Miss Harriet Fuller, Miss Emily Dick, Miss Kitty Talbot, Miss Margaret Nather Delight Audience with Their Daring

By PAULINE WARREN

Symphony hall rang to its rafters last evening with hearty singing and stamping of feet, while Arthur Fiedler conducted rollicking Tyrolean peasant songs and dances for the gay Tyrolean concert, which benefitted the Infants' Hospital. To add still further to the gaiety and excitement of the evening, a group of skiers sped down an improvised slide right into the midst of the cheering audience. These daring skiers were among Boston's most experienced and well-known enthusiasts of this popular sport, and included Miss Harriet Fuller, Miss Emily Dick, Miss Kitty Talbot, Miss Margaret Nather, Mr. Robert Livermore, Jr., Mr. Alexander H. Bright, Mr. Harold Willis and Mr. John Marshall, and all made the grade with only one spill.

The staid and dignified hall not only sounded like a Bavarian tavern, but looked like one as well, with pretty girls in fetching caps, aprons and bright full skirts, flitting about with trays laden with gardenias and carnations, and beguiling the audience to buy their fragrant wares to aid the hospital. A painted scene of lofty, snow-covered mountain peaks formed an appropriate background for the orchestra, and the stage was edged with huge cakes of ice, into which colorful spring flowers had been frozen, which sparkled with iridescent colors under the brilliant lights.

During one of the intermissions, Herr and Fraulein Poschner delighted the audience with their lusty yodeling, and later on, the applause was so deafening that the orchestra had to play "Zwei Herzen" three times, while everyone joined in the singing. Still other numbers on the program that were welcomed with loud applause were the "Overture to William Tell" and several lilting Strauss waltzes.

In the lobby as we entered, was Miss Julia Barbour, clad in a bright Tyrolean costume, and sitting in the Ford beach-wagon that was later awarded to the winner holding the program with the lucky number. Mrs. Marshal Fabyan, Jr., very piquant in her gaily sprigged peasant frock, was seated in a sleigh in the lobby, chatting with Miss Agnes Osborne. Sitting at a table together and enjoying the concert after performing their duties as flower vendors, were Mrs. Alfred B. Hallowell, Miss Marion Lawrence, Miss Marjorie Saltonstall, Miss Marileeds Heard and Miss J. Holladay Philbin. Mrs. Hallowell wore an authentic Tyrolean hat of straw with her linen costume and gay bandanna, Miss Lawrence enhanced her costume with a bright red peaked tiara, and Miss Saltonstall, Miss Heard and Miss Philbin all wore the saucy little felt hats, so typical of the Tyrol, with their print frocks and bright aprons.

Miss Nancy Cochrane sported a real yodeler's costume, shorts and all, and Miss Cynthia Forbes looked very demure in her checked gingham with its fetching short puffed sleeves. Miss Anne Howard topped her costume with a short scarlet jacket and her tiny hat was perched on her blonde hair in a most rakish fashion. Miss Patricia Preston was very attractive in her bodice and skirt and Miss Frances Holmes wore a peaked Tyrolean hat of straw and a neck band on which were fastened two enormous daisies.

Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., chairman of the ladies' aid committee of the hospital, looked very winsome in her full-skirted white frock as she stood on the stage while the lucky number was drawn from a huge snowball. With her was blonde Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, chairman of the committee in charge of the concert, whose black lace gown was sashed with green. Miss Josephine Emery, in a cunning costume, was busily selling programs.

Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman wore pearls with her sheer black gown and Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley topped her black frock with a nile green wrap. With her jade green and white print, Mrs. George H. Lyman, Jr., wore a white jacket and Mrs. Richard L. Bowditch was wrapped in a quilted taffeta cape of glowing rose. Mrs. Nelson Aldrich's diagonally striped blue and white taffeta was brightened by a gleaming diamond circlet at the neckline.

Sitting at the table with Dr. and Mrs. John W. Bartol were their two daughters, Miss Dorothy Bartol and Mrs. Frederick R. Grace. Mr. and Mrs. Atherton Loring, Jr., and Mr. and Mrs. David Patten arrived together, Mrs. Loring wearing a white wrap with her emerald green gown, and Mrs. Patten in a sheer navy and white print. Mrs. Sargent Collier topped her diaphanous black frock with a cape fashioned of enormous flaming poppies, and Mrs. John W. Adie wore gold hoop earrings and a sable cape with her lame gown.

Mrs. John W. Woods wore a slim black velvet wrap trimmed with fluffy white fox, and she had a white carnation tucked in her hair. With her black net frock trimmed with bands of velvet, Mrs. Thomas Thacher, Jr., wore a sable cape, and Mrs. William B. Long's wrap was crisp black taffeta. Mrs. Frederick Bruce Robinson, who attended with Mr. Robinson, wore a frock of flowered chiffon, and Mrs. F. Wadsworth Busk's gown was coronation blue with bands of white.

Sitting together were Miss Barbara Bassett and her sister, Miss Charlotte Bassett, and with Mr. and Mrs. James A. Garfield were Mr. and Mrs. Augustus W. Soule. Miss Peggy Parker topped her pale blue frock with a shoulder cape of darker blue maribou, and she had a wee red ribbon tied on her blonde hair. Strolling about together during the intermission were Miss Betty Titcomb, whose navy frock was splashed with white daisies, and Miss Molly Ayer, in changeable violet and green taffeta.

Among others present were Mrs. Chatfield Whitman, Mrs. Barrett Wendell, Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs. Bartlett Harwood, Mrs. Arthur M. Beale, Mr. and Mrs. Talbot Baker, Mrs. Richard Saltonstall, Miss Molly Weed, Miss Susannah Ayer, Mrs. John Yerxa, Mr. Richard Pentecost, Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth, Jr., Mrs. Walter E. Campbell, Miss Constance Barbey, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Miss Barbara Bremer and Mrs. Edwin B. Dumphy.

DISCUSS PLANS FOR RADCLIFFE AT THE POPS'

Two attractive Radcliffe sophomores, Miss Mary Laverack (left) and Miss Margaret Eaton, photographed in the Radcliffe yard while discussing plans for "Radcliffe at the Pops," the concert taking place this evening in Symphony Hall for the benefit of the Regional Scholars fund of the Radcliffe Club of Boston. Miss Laverack, who made her debut in the 1935-36 season, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William H. Laverack of Boylston street, Brookline. Miss Eaton's parents are Mr. and Mrs. John Marshall Eaton of Concord.

Arthur Fiedler, Pops conductor, and Mrs. Alfred Kidder, member of the executive committee of Infants Hospital benefit night at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight. They are seated in a sleigh which will be part of the "Tyrolean night" setting.

(see next page 65)

In the World of Music

Radcliffe Night at the Pops

May 12 — 1937 Trav

By Redfern Mason

It was Radcliffe night at the Pops and the number the audience most loudly insisted on hearing a second time was the Cole Porter-Bodge "I've Got You Under My Skin." To tell the truth the music is much better than you would expect from the title. There are hints of "Siegfried" at the beginning; but later on it is as American as Broadway.

Those Radcliffe lassies and their swains applauded it uproariously and elders, startled out of their reserve by the sheer infectiousness of the score, followed suit, myself among them, jazzy and unashamed. For this music is audacious Yankeeland, music of the folk who, in Kipling's phrase, "toss with the embarrassed gods for beers." Of course some of the Harvard pundits will raise supercilious eyes and tell their students to go back to Mozart and repent of their sins. Yet, if Mozart had been there last night, he would probably have found in this insolent music just the note of originality which he was hoping to hear from the New World.

I had hoped that the Radcliffe girls would sing; but they are up to their ears in exams. But Mabel Daniels, one of their sisterhood, was represented by her prelude, "Deep Forest," which is subtly impressionistic and full of wildwood suggestiveness. It is well orchestrated and the Symphony manifestly took pleasure in playing it. The satisfaction of the audience was vociferously expressed.

In purest classic vein we had the Mozart "Figaro" Overture, played with rare delicacy. Louis Speyer's English horn—by the way the instrument is neither a horn nor English—sounded beautiful in the "Swan of Tuonela" of Sibelius and the gifted artist played a "Cowherd's Tune" by Schumann, a lovely mountain ditty, with something of the Ranz des vaches about it. Another soloist was Jesus Maria Sanroma, who played the piano part of Weber's "Concertstuck," music which to some sounds curiously old fashioned. Yet Weber was one of the great ones. The pianistic tradition of the Viennese lingers with him, plus romanticism. The Lisztian bedevilment of the clavier had not as yet manifested itself. Mr. Sanroma is a musician of rare talent; he is no victim of mere technique, and he knows how to make the piano sing.

It was an evening of diversities. Arthur Fiedler conducted the Ravel Bolero with a vivid bravura, not failing to let his hearers know the sinister undertone of the music. It begins unobtrusively, like the war in Spain, but it concludes with a cosmic crash. One wondered whether the parallel would be realized over in embattled Europe.

We had three numbers from Grieg's First Peer Gynt Suite, the "Blue Danube," "On the Trail" from Grofe's "Grand Canon Suite" and the "Torch Dance" by a Welshman named Jenkins, who called himself Edward German, because he did not think England would ever believe that a man with a name like Jenkins could write music worth listening to.

It was a throughly enjoyable concert. There was not a vacant seat in the hall, and Fiedler and his men were "i'th vein."

Festival in Berkshires

Am. May 11/3

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

NEXT to the Boston Symphony Orchestra itself, the subject nearest the heart of its conductor is the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished ambition is, in fact, to make the Festival the nucleus of events of what will one day be the summer music center of the world.

In an interview at Symphony Hall shortly before sailing for France for a much needed rest after his strenuous activities of the winter, Dr. Koussevitzky said:

"Eventually we will give operas, and oratorios in action. We will have, too, a Greek theater."

Dr. Koussevitzky hinted further at plans for an Academie which would bring together the leading exponents in the various branches of music. But he maintained an air of mystery about it.

"You will know when the time comes," he concluded, his eyes twinkling.

* * *

THOUGH the ultimate realization of so far-reaching a project is necessarily deferred, Dr. Koussevitzky is confident of the outcome.

"We have already made great beginnings," he said. "Last year's Festival was more or less of an experiment. You know the results.

"There can be no doubt that there is sufficient enthusiasm among the music-minded people of the country to support such an undertaking."

Here Dr. Koussevitzky referred to the fact that the three concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Festival under his direction for the first time last season were attended by more than 15,000 people, representing 25 states and Canada.

"We have already gone beyond the experimental stage," he continued, "and now with Mrs. Gorham Brooks' generous gift of "Tanglewood" we have a permanent basis on which to lay our plans."

"Tanglewood" is a 210-acre estate between Stockbridge and Lenox in the heart of the Berkshires. It was here that Hawthorne wrote "Tanglewood Tales" and "The Wonder Book." And it is here that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the Symphonic Festivals of the future.

* * *

THOUGH this season's Festival, to consist of six concerts on August 5, 7 and 8, and 12, 14 and 15, will be given in a huge tent, plans are going forward for the construction of a permanent music pavillion with a seating capacity of 5000.

Eliel Saarinen, distinguished architect of international reputation, has been chosen by the trustees to design the entire development at "Tanglewood."

Dr. Koussevitsky explained that "though we hope that construction on the music auditorium will be begun this year, it will not be ready for use until 1938."

Concerning his program plans for this season, the conductor announced:

"We shall devote one program entirely to Beethoven, one to Wagner, and one to Brahms. The Wagnerian program will include excerpts from 'Tannhauser,' 'The Valkyrie,' 'Siegfried,' 'Tristan und Isolde,' 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Parsifal.' Perhaps we will have soloists.

"In the course of the other concerts we will play a large variety of music. Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, Respighi's 'Pines of Rome,' Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, the Second Suite from Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe,' Schubert's 'Unfinished Symphony' are to be included.

"We will also play some Mozart and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

"Edward Burlingame Hill will be the first American composer to be represented at the Festival. We shall perform two movements from Professor Hill's Sinfoneitta for String Orchestra this season."

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

ARTHUR FIEDLER will open the third week of the 52nd season of the Pops this evening in Symphony Hall with a program of unusual interest.

J. Theodorowicz, R. Gundersen, G. Elcus and N. Kassman will be soloists in Vivaldi's Concerto in B minor for four violins and string orchestra, Op. 3 No. 10, and Marcel Lafosse will play the trumpet solo in the performance of Jacchia's arrangement of "Eili, Eili."

For the rest the program will include such contrasting works as Bach's Chorale Prelude, "Fervent Is My Longing," transcribed for orchestra by L. Cailliet; a "Divertissement" by Ibert; Mendelssohn's Scherzo in G minor from the String Octett (orchestrated by the composer), and Strauss' "Voices of Spring"; Sibelius "Finlandia," and Brahms' First Hungarian Dance.

* * *

1 MONDAY evening will be Harvard Night and G. Wallace Woodworth will conduct the Harvard Glee Club in choruses with the orchestra. The program will also include the Overture to Offenbach's "La Belle Helene," Brahms' Hungarian Dances (Nos. 5 and 6), Ravel's "Bolero," Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight," etc.

Tuesday evening's program is typical of Pops fare in the March form Gounod's "The Queen of Sheba," Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Saint-Saens' Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," the Cossack's Dance from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Mazeppa," "Violets," waltzes by Waldteufel and Cole Porter's "I've Got You Under My Skin," from "Born to Dance."

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY evening the third movement from Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony will be performed. There will be a repetition of Sibelius' "Finlandia," and performances of MacDowell's "To a Water Lily," Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde," Fantasia on Verdi's "Il Trovatore."

Friday evening brings a Sousa march, the first movement of Schubert's Symphony in B minor ("Unfinished"), Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," Brahams' "Academic Festival Overture," "Largo" by Handel, Tchaikovsky's Overture Solennelle, "1812," Strauss waltzes, "Voices of Spring," and Porter's "Night and Day."

Next Sunday evening Jesus Maria Sanroma will be the soloist in the performance of Dohnanyi's Variations on a Nursery Air for Orchestra and Piano Obligato.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

MAY 16 1937

2 Veterans Quit Boston Symphony

BOSTON, May 15— (US) Heinrich Lorber, one of the few living musicians to have the memorable experience of playing under the direction of Brahms, and who for the past 46 years played the French horn in the Boston symphony orchestra, today concluded a 60-year career with his resignation from the orchestra. At the same time, resignation of Carl Barth, celloist, who has been with the Boston symphony for 44 years, was announced. Barth, a clarinet player in his youth, serenaded Franz Liszt beneath the window of the great pianist-composer's home at Weimar, on one of Liszt's last birthdays.

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN-NEWS

MAY 8 - 1937

"Tanglewood," where Hawthor lived in the Berkshires and whe he wrote his "Wonder Book" a first told his "Tanglewood Tale has been given to the Boston Sy phony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorha Brooks, of Brookline, Mass., as permanent home for the Berkshi
Festival. A music pavilion to seat 5000 persons is being erected on the 210-acre estate. Six concerts under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky are to be given in the first fortnight of August.

MUSIC

Her. May 22

THE POPS

Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist at the Pop concert last night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducted the orchestra in the following program:

Berlioz	Rakoczy March
Beethoven Overture.	"The Creatures of Promotheus"
Grieg	Spring
Tchaikovsky	Marche Slave
Liszt	2nd Hungarian Rhapsody
Dohnanyi	Variations on a Nursery Air
Waldteufel	Espana, Waltzes
Rachmaninoff	Prelude in C sharp minor
Wagner	Ride of the Valkyries

Mr. Fiedler has been somewhat sparing of musically interesting programs in this particular Pops season. There has been plenty of light and ingratiating music, and the concerts have unquestionably been as popular as ever; but the novelty and the interesting revival, the piece of music that justifies critical comment, have been conspicuously absent. Last night, however, the delightful variations by Ernst von Dohnanyi were performed and provide cause for emphatic cheers.

Dohnanyi made his American debut with the Boston Symphony in 1900, yet his compositions have not been frequently played here. Other cities, such as London and Chicago, regard him with more favor. In point of fact he is a thoroughly effective craftsman—perhaps not a creative genius of the first rank—but decidedly an able composer. These variations on a theme, to which children sing their alphabet, are worked out by Dohnanyi in highly entertaining parody of musical styles and cliches. We hear waltz, scherzo, chorale, passacaglia, a marvelous fugal movement and other ingenious devises for variation. Echoes of composers like Tchaikovsky and Strauss are easily detected. The work is sophisticated and best appreciated by those who are familiar with the symphonic repertoire. Nevertheless they are so well done that they are most suitable for a Pops program as well.

They require, naturally, for performance a first rate pianist and an excellent orchestra. Mr. Fiedler and the musicians of the Boston Symphony were in capital form, and Mr. Sanroma was the brilliant soloist. Mr. Sanroma is so well known to Boston audiences, both as soloist and as performer in chamber music, that we are apt to take his exceptional talents too much for granted. He is an extraordinarily fine musician, with a wide knowledge of the art and a versatility which few pianists possess. Happily there was a good deal more than the usual applause for his playing last night, an enthusiastic ovation which he certainly deserved.

A. W. W.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Pops

By tradition, Sunday night Pops Concerts must partake of a grain more of seriousness than those programs played during the week. Thus the concert last night—the first Sunday program of the Pops season—conformed to this practical tradition. Further significance was added to the concert by the presence, as soloist, of Heinrich Gebhard, long a sterling musical tradition of this city.

More in the customary Pops vein were such pieces as the Chopin-Glazounov "Polonaise Militaire," Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture, Jacchia's setting of "Song of the Volga Bargemen," and the sailor dance from Gliere's "Red Poppy." These, as indeed all of the program, were played with the customary elan which Mr Fiedler's musicians muster at will. Of more than ordinary excellence were his readings of the 2nd "Peer Gynt" Suite of Grieg, and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The orchestra and Mr Fiedler gave point and grace to DeLamarter's arrangement of a suite from Rameau's "Dradanus," a thoroughly pleasant work comprising an overture, minuet, a rondo (in the French title, the adjective "tendre" modifies it), and two tanbourins.

Undoubtedly the high spot in the interest of the audience was Mr Gebhard's and the orchestra's reading of Grieg's A minor concerto. All of Mr Gebhard's blessedly familiar virtues as pianist and artist were in evidence—his pliability of mood and tempo, his clarity of tone, his modesty of intention which causes him to merge the piano part in the general orchestral scheme. In the main the performance was an eminently successful one, though at times it suffered from a lagging of the orchestra and occasional tentativeness of the orchestral entrances.

Both Mr Gebhard and the orchestra received prolonged appreciation of their fine performance.

The concert was for the benefit of the Ladies' Helping Hand Home for Jewish Children.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

MAY 9 1937

Music

Outdoor Summer Concerts Trend To Symphonic

New York, May 8—(AP)—Five million or more Americans will spend part of their summer leisure listening to good music out of doors, and nearly everybody will be exposed, at one time or another, to some sort of Al Fresco music.

Final proof that American summer music is a social activity of importance may be found in the fact that it even presents "trends." Its current trend is, according to Arthur Judson, in the direction of straight symphonic music.

Shun Operas Now.

That is to say, fewer and fewer of the summer music projects such as New York's famous stadium will spend much time on opera or ballet. A few years ago summer impresarios were hot-footing it after operas acceptable for open air performances, and season before last the ballet had a tremendous popularity.

"I can't say why this is," says Mr Judson. "Perhaps it is because both opera and ballet must produce an illusion that will pass muster before your eyes; pure music is an appeal to the emotions of the mind, and as such can function out of doors as well as anywhere."

Three of the more ambitious summer music ventures of last year are not functioning this summer, Mr. Judson points out.

When the Cleveland fair closed, it was found that the out door "auditorium" was too noisy to use again, Mr. Judson says. A number of tangles have, probably, eliminated the Washington, D. C., concerts, and San Mateo, Calif., wil not break into "song" this summer.

Main Attractions.

The major concert ventures include New York's stadium concerts, father of the lot of them; the Hollywood bowl; Ravinia park near Chicago, which dropped its opera venture in the depression, and resumed last year with symphonic music and also with great success; Robin Wood Dell in Philadelphia, the Portland, Oregon concerts; Victor Kolar's series on Belle Isle, Detroit; the Boston symphony's indoor pop concerts and out-door promenade series.

These do not exhaust summer such ventures as St. Louis' famous possibilities. There are many "Muny" opera, dedicated to operetta and a general good time in Forest park. Cincinnati's more serious Zoo opera will function again, and Chautauqua will provide its well known elaborate music program as usual, up state in New York. Artistically one of the most important festivals in the world will be played in the Berkshires next August by the Boston orchestra under Koussevitzky.

Minor Varieties

Hundreds of shorter series dot the land, and special events such as Cincinnati's great May festival abound. At the bottom of the pyramid are more park bands and orchestras than you could believe, many government supported, some as good as New York's remarkable Goldman band, some just good and loud.

Besides, Mr. Judson point out, innumerable colleges focus their year's work in music upon the months of May and June, and thus keep music sounding up Main street and down Grand avenue until municipal ventures are ready to take hold.

By no means least in importance are such music camps as the national music camp at Interlaken, Mich. This not only teaches boys and girls music; it offers an important series of summer concerts, many of which are broadcast.

THE BOSTON

ACTION

odelling of a type common ro ght at the Pops from these n and

Fiedler to Cond 'Promenade' F

May 13/3

Before the Symphony
"The Pops" Concert, it us be called a Promenade Co that was many years ago there was not much space promenade. Wedn evening, May 12, Coron night at 8.30, Arthur Fied giving as the first half of British Coronation Ball, a nade Concert similar to held at Queen's Hall, Lo which are so popular and been for many years. Over is an institution, over h is an innovation.
The secret of a good P nade Concert is all in the ility of the conductor shows his good judgemen making up a program whic cludes Edward German's fa
"Coronation March" Ent from "Rosemunde" by Schu
Brahms Finale, Symphony
Minor. The "French Mi March" by Saint-Saens, a which will be played in minster Abbey at the Coron and then old favorites of ago "Sally in our Alley" " ry Gardens." No British nation musical program be complete without Sir Ed Elgar's "Pomp and Circumst which will be rendered a finale. The second half o program includes the Tro the Colors—a recorded b cast from H.M. The Kin dancing until 1 A.M. with by Al Starita and his L
Orchestra. The net p will be turned over to British Charities.

65

ERBURY, CONN.
PUBLICAN

Y 9 - 1937

lusic

Summer Con-Trend To ymphonic

May 8—(AP)—Five nore Americans will f their summer leisure good music out of nearly everybody will at one time or an-me sort of Al Fresco

f that American sum-is a social activity of may be found in the ven presents "trends."
trend is, according to on, in the direction of nphonic music.

Now.

say, fewer and fewer er music projects such
's famous stadium will time on opera or balyears ago summer im-ere hot-footing it after ptable for open air per-and season before last ad a tremendous popu-

say why this is," says
"Perhaps it is be-opera and ballet must illusion that will pass re your eyes; pure mupeal to the emotions of nd as such can function as well as anywhere."
the more ambitious usic ventures of last t functioning this sum-
udson points out.
Cleveland fair closed,
that the out door "au-
was too noisy to use
Judson says. A num-les have, probably, eli-
e Washington, D. C., nd San Mateo, Calif.,
k into "song" this sum-tions.

r concert ventures in-York's stadium con-
r of the lot of them; the bowl; Ravinia park near hich dropped its opera the depression, and re-
year with symphonic
also with great success;
d Dell in Philadelphia;
d, Oregon concerts; Vic-series on Belle Isle, De-Boston symphony's in-concerts and out-door series.
not exhaust summer es as St. Louis' famous
There are many era, dedicated to oper-general good time in Cincinnati's more se-opera will function
Chautauqua will provide nown elaborate music usual, up state in New rtistically one of the ortant festivals in the be played in the Berk-August by the Boston
nder Koussevitzky.

ieties

of shorter series dot and special events such ati's great May festival the bottom of the pyraore park bands and or-han you could believe, ernment supported, some s New York's remark-man band, some just loud.
Mr. Judson point out,
le colleges focus their rk in music upon the May and June, and thus ic sounding up Main down Grand avenue un-pal ventures are ready old.
eans least in importance music camps as the na-ic camp at Interlaken,
s not only teaches boys music; it offers an imries of summer concerts, which are broadcast.

THE BOSTON HERALD, TUESDAY, MAY 11, 1937

ACTION AT POPS TYROLEAN NIGHT IN SYMPHONY HALL

An unexpected bit of action at the Pops Tyrolean night in Symphony Hall. Miss Emily Dick crashes the audience after descending the ski slide. (Story on society page).

(See bottom of page 63.)

Yodelling of a type common round Ils and the Salzkammergut came last night at the Pops from these native Tyrol folk, Miss Antoinette Poschner and Geppl Poschner.

Fiedler to Conduct 'Promenade' Fete

Trans
May 7/37
10

Before the Symphony gave "The Pops" Concert, it used to be called a Promenade Concert that was many years ago and there was not much space for a promenade. Next Wednesday evening, May 12, Coronation night at 8.30, Arthur Fiedler is giving as the first half of The British Coronation Ball, a Promenade Concert similar to the ones held at Queen's Hall, London, which are so popular and have been for many years. Over there, it is an institution, over here it is an innovation.

The secret of a good Promenade Concert is all in the versatility of the conductor who shows his good judgement in making up a program which includes Edward German's famous "Coronation March" Entr'acte from "Rosemunde" by Schubert; Brahms Finale, Symphony in C Minor. The "French Military March" by Saint-Saens, all of which will be played in Westminster Abbey at the Coronation and then old favorites of years ago "Sally in our Alley" "Country Gardens." No British Coronation musical program would be complete without Sir Edward Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" which will be rendered as the finale. The second half of the program includes the Trooping of the Colors—a recorded broadcast from H.M. The King and dancing until 1 A.M. with music by Al Starita and his London Orchestra. The net proceeds will be turned over to Boston British Charities.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAY 12 1937

BERKSHIRE MUSIC FETE SUPPORTEI

Stockbridge, Mass., May 12.—(UF—George W. Edman, acting chai man, announced today that th Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc had "more than reached its sel imposed quota of sustaining men berships for the 1937 event." Th season's concerts will be at Tangl wood, a 210-acre estate overlookir the Stockbridge Bowl which w presented by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent site for the festival, on August 5, 7, 8 and 12, 14, 15.

"We are 100 per cent. ahead of last year," Edman said. "We have sold 100 boxes already, or one-third more than we had sold up to concert time last year.

"I believe we were the first outdoor musical venture of its kind to pay our own way, and that we did with a surplus in 1936."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be the attractions.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAY 12 1937

1937 Success For Symphony Held Assured

Berkshire Concert Group Surpasses Quota of Memberships.

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., May 12 ((UP)—George W. Edman, acting chairman, announced today that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., had "more than reached its self-imposed quota of sustaining memberships for the 1937 event." This season's' concerts will be at Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate overlooking the Stockbridge bowl which was presented by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent site for the festival, on Aug. 5, 7, 8 and 12, 14, 15.

"We are 100 per cent. ahead of last year," Edman said. "We have sold 100 boxes already, or one-third more than we had sold up to concert time last year.

"I believe we were the first outdoor musical venture of its kind to pay our own way and that we did with a surplus in 1936."

The Boston Symphony orchestra and Dr. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitzky, conductor, will be the attractions.

Eliel Saarinen, Bloomfield, Mich architect, has been commissioned to develop the festival grounds "designed to be a great shrine of music in America comparable to the great festival centers of Europe."

The festival is nonprofit and sponsored by residents of Massachusetts, northern Connecticut and eastern New York.

UTICA, N. Y.
Observer Dispatch

MAY 13 1937

MUSIC FUND FOR FESTIVAL REACHES GOAI

Stockbridge, Mass. — (U.P.) — George W. Edman, acting chairman, announced yesterday that the Berkshire Symphonic Festival Inc. had "more than reached its self-imposed quota of sustaining memberships for the 1937 event."

This season's concerts will be at Tanglewood, a 210-acre estate overlooking the Stockbridge bowl which was presented by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., as a permanent site for the festival, on Aug. 5, 7, 8 and 12, 14, 15.

"We are 100 per cent ahead of last year," Edman said. "We have sold 100 boxes already, or one-third more than we had sold up to concert time last year.

"I believe we were the first outdoor musical venture of its kind to pay our own way, and that we did with a surplus in 1936."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will be the attractions.

Eliel Saarinen, Bloomfield, Mich., architect, has been commissioned to develop the festival grounds, "designed to be a great shrine of music in America comparable to the great festival centers of Europe."

The festival is non-profit-making and sponsored by residents of Massachusetts, Northern Connecticut and Eastern New York.

SOUTH BEND, IND.
NEWS-TIMES

[illegible] 1937

2 NOTED MUSICIANS END RECORD CAREER

BOSTON, May 15.—(US)—Heinrich Lorber, one of the few musicians still living who played under the direction of Brahms, Saturday concluded a 60-year career by resigning from the Boston Symphony orchestra. For ~~the past~~ 46 years he had played the French horn in the orchestra.

Resignation of Carl Barth, cellolist, who has been with the Boston symphony for 44 years, was also announced. Barth, a clarinet player in his youth, serenaded Franz Liszt beneath the window of the great pianist-composer's home at Weimar, on one of Liszt's last birthdays.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

MAY 22 1937

Finn Chorus Sings Here In January

Music Group Coming From University for Long Tour.

WASHINGTON music lovers will be afforded an opportunity to hear another great male chorus when the Finnish University Chorus, composed of 50 male voices from the University of Helsinki, Finland, makes one concert appearance at Constitution Hall on Sunday afternoon, January 16, at 4 o'clock, as one of the attractions of Dorothy Hodgkin Dorsey's first Sunday afternoon concert series of 1937-8.

The Finnish University Chorus will make its musical bow to the United States on December 31 and January 1 next, when it appears at Symphony Hall, Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under ~~Dr. Serge~~ Koussevitzky, conductor, who is also one of the American group sponsoring the appearance of the chorus in this country. The chorus will make a third appearance with the Boston Symphony in New York on January 6 and will then begin its tour of the country at large.

The chorus, which was first organized in 1883 and which has toured Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Hungary and Italy, is visiting the United States under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Music Council of America, which last year arranged for a visit of the Budapest University Chorus. In Finland, the co-operating committee includes not only the President of Finland and the minister of foreign affairs, but Jean Sibelius, the celebrated Finnish composer, while the group in America sponsoring the tour includes Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Koussevitzky, Dr. Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick Stock, Werner Janssen, Olin Downes and others, including the Minister of Finland, Eero Jarnefelt.

The Finnish University Chorus is known in Finland as the "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat"—popularly abbreviated "Y. L."—and from its very foundation, in the 80s, it has contributed largely to bringing the standard of Finnish choral singing to its present high level. Its first conductor served with the organization for 25 years, and its present conductor, Dr. Martti Turunen, has occupied the post for the past six years.

During its existence of more than 50 years the postition of the "Y. L." Chorus in the musical life of Finland is manifested in the fact that many Finnish composers have written and dedicated music to the "Y. L." Jean Sibelius, who is an honorary member of the chorus, has composed all of his most famous male chorus music for this organization. During the forthcoming American tour, the chorus' programs will be devoted exclusively to the music of the Finnish composers.

In addition to the concert of the Finnish University Chorus, Mrs. Dorsey's first Sunday concert series will offer concerts by Rosa Ponselle, dramatic soprano, Metropolitan Opera, on October 17; Jose Iturbi, Spanish pianist, December 5; Jascha Heifetz, violinist, January 2; Lily Pons, coloratura soprano, Metropolitan Opera, on February 13, and Nelson Eddy, baritone, on April 10.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

[illegible] 1937

Music Previews

Something unusual to look forward to next season is the concert of the Finnish University Chorus, which the Dorsey Bureau will present in January. In its homeland, the chorus is known as—take a breath — "Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat," which has mercifully been shortened to "Y. L."

In existence more than 50 years, the "Y. L." has played a significant role in Finnish music life. Jean Sibelius is an honorary member and has composed all of his more famous male chorus music for the "Y. L."

During its first American tour next year, the chorus' program will be devoted exclusively to the music of Finnish composers.

The Intercollegiate Musical Council of America is sponsoring the tour, with the support of Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Koussevitzsky, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick Stock and other well-known figures in American music.

"YES, MR. WHITNEY, WE CAN TAKE CARE OF YOU NICELY"

Do you want to enjoy every minute of your week-end? Then be sure your accommodations are just what you need. A Long Distance call makes certain that you will be comfortable, and that the opportunities for golf, tennis, swimming, or other sports are to your liking.

"WE'RE HAVING A WONDERFUL VACATION"

At the end of the day's fun the thoughtful thing to do is to telephone home. Nothing is quite as comforting as the sound of your voice over Long Distance. Expensive? Not at all! Find out for yourself how little it costs you now.

"I'd be lost without the Telephone"

Says ARTHUR FIEDLER

Popular Conductor of the Boston Symphony "Pops" and Esplanade Concerts

"In preparing rehearsals and programs, emergencies arise in which I find Long Distance telephone service invaluable in making arrangements at short notice.

"The telephone is indispensable also in planning trips to see friends during such time as I can spare from my duties."

Keep in touch by Telephone

LONG DISTANCE OPERATOR!

Savings up to 50%

AFTER 7 P. M. AND ALL DAY SUNDAYS

●

Simply call the Long Distance Operator to get the cost of any station-to-station or person-to-person call.

NEW ENGLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

NEW ENGLAND TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

MAY 16 1937

Critic Favors Shift in Policy by Symphony

Suggests Three Changes for Improvement of Chicago's Orchestra.

By Cecil M. Smith.

WITH the fanfares of Respighi's "Pines of Rome" the Chicago Symphony orchestra ended its forty-sixth subscription season on April 30. Ordinarily the close of a symphony season may be counted upon to evoke no more than a few tame retrospective observations and statistical tabulations of répertoire.

The season just completed has, however, been no ordinary one. Dr. Frederick Stock's relinquishment of the conductor's post because of serious illness during the last nine weeks of the season has inevitably caused us for the first time in many years to envisage the orchestra as an institution apart from its greatly beloved conductor. Even though the good news came two weeks ago that Dr. Stock had been able to conduct portions of two programs at Mount Vernon, Ia., we all know well that we can no longer expect him to carry the full burden of the orchestra whose life for thirty-three years has been his life.

Whenever he is able and wants to conduct it, the orchestra will always be Dr. Stock's orchestra. The rest of the time it will be the Chicago Symphony orchestra, an institution of noble history and of rich future possibilities.

Sees No Reason to Avoid Constructive Criticism.

It is of the orchestra's future I should like to speak today. For reasons which I do not quite understand, it has not been customary in Chicago to talk quite as frankly about the orchestra as about other civic institutions. Unlike the major symphonic groups of Boston and New York, the Chicago Symphony orchestra has frequently heard nothing but praise of its activities. That it deserves immeasurable praise is beyond argument. But with the most generous impulse of concern for its future welfare I feel that my honest questionings this morning will not be taken amiss, either by the management of the orchestra or by its subscribers.

In the week by week concerts of the orchestra I frequently miss that quality of electrical enthusiasm which marks the difference between good playing and inspired playing. Perhaps you may think it an unseemly notion that Orchestra hall audiences should be moved by the orchestra's playing to stand up, yell, and almost tear the coats off their neighbors' backs. Yet this happens time and again in Carnegie hall in New York, in Symphony hall in Boston, and in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. Is there something about the nature of Chicagoans which makes us prefer to receive our music in a more sedate manner than that of our eastern compatriots?

I do not think so. Cheering and joyful noise are infectious, and our orchestra would probably achieve a public support beyond any it has ever known if the concert going became a more demonstrative process.

Lists Possible Causes of Audience Lethargy.

Possibly one or more of three causes may account for the greater audience excitement aroused by other orchestras: [1] The other orchestras play better, [2] the other orchestras play more attractive programs, [3] the other orchestras add an appeal of showmanship to that of out and out culture.

While the Chicago Symphony orchestra sometimes gives performances which no other orchestra in the world could surpass, it is unquestionably cramped by an inadequate rehersal schedule. Some of the familiar compositions in the répertoire are presented in public either without previous rehersal, or with only a hasty preparation of a few of the most ticklish spots. How can such a performance rise above the level of routine? Several mishaps have been either narrowly averted or not averted at all because of the pressure upon rehersal time which makes unprepared playing unavoidable at times. Occasionally the Boston Symphony orchestra announces that a scheduled work has been postponed because Dr. Koussevitzky does not feel that it is ready. No doubt performances are sometimes postponed here, too, but what a healthy note there is in a public admission of the limitations even of a great orchestra!

Regrets Neglect of Works by Foreign Contemporaries.

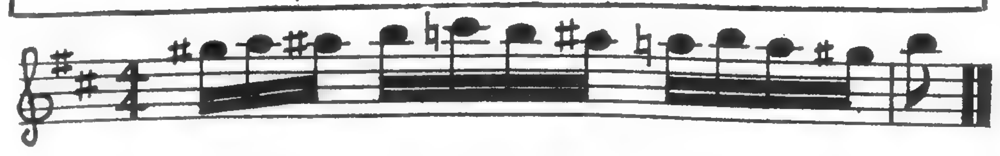
In the matter of répertoire, the Chicago Symphony orchestra does wonderfully well by the list of standard works. Its policy toward the American composer is commendably generous. But it does not go far toward acquainting us with the currents of contemporary music outside America. Instead of risking a few more royalties on stimulating and trail breaking new works, there is a tendency to draw forth too many minor, if royalty free, pieces from the obscurity of the orchestra's permanent library.

It may be, however, that a frank attitude of showmanship on the part of those who guide the orchestra's destinies would help most of all. Without losing its dignity in the least, the orchestral association might well adopt a more aggressive determination to take the public into its confidence. Why must we wait until September to know the plans for next season? Let us know right now that exciting, novel plans are afoot for 1937-'38. Give us all summer to anticipate their realization, to talk about them, to write about them. Blazon against Chicago's sky the promise of a new, a daring, a progressive orchestra! Then sit back and see what happens in the subscription department!

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES

MAY 19 1937

World of Music



Battle Theme From "Stenka Razin," by Glazounow

(A suggestion for using and preserving the daily music theme: Many teachers of music appreciation advise their pupils to clip and paste them on a 3x5 filing card with the composer's name at the top and file them in alphabetical order.)

By CARL L. BEMIES

Skiing and yodeling were added attractions offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week at one of the "Pops" concerts featuring a Tyrolean atmosphere.

Wishing to make the patrons of burlesque houses feel at home, Arthur Fiedler, conductor of the "Pops," had an inclined runway placed down the middle aisle. But instead of girls more or less clad, he had ski jumpers slide down the incline.

The report did not state whether the conductor arranged to have the drummer give a long roll while the sliding was in progress in the manner that Merle Evans features various acts with his Ringling Brothers Circus Band.

Two yodelers furnished additional atmosphere peculiarly Tyrolean. The auditorium was packed with an audience that greeted these innovations with screams of delight and howls of laughter. Mr. Fiedler is showing quite some ingenuity in bringing about music appreciation for the masses.

Now if music teachers and the countless authors of music appreciation books could manage somehow to connect up circus performances with the learning and understanding of music, there would be little to worry about for the future of music.

The Lovette Choral Club, Eva Whitford Lovette, director, presented an attractive program last night at the Willard Hotel before an enthusiastic audience that filled the small ballroom.

The chorus was in fine voice and sang with a verve and enthusiasm that was unmistakably begotten of a real love of singing. Beethoven's "The Heavens are Telling," and "Evening Prayer in Brittany" (Chaminade), were performed with fervor and careful attention to the serious mood portrayed.

In lighter mood were "Elfin Dance" (Grieg), which was repeated; "The Sleigh" (Kountz-Baldwin); and "Song of the Danube," from the Johann Strauss' waltz "Tale from the Vienna Woods," which brought the program to an end. The chorus is well balanced and trained, following with care the desires of the director.

Carolyn Schulte, soprano, sang two groups of songs, and, following the second group was repeatedly recalled, giving two encores. Miss Schulte showed a freedom of fioratura in the vocal arrangement of the Strauss waltz, "Voice of Spring," with clear and resonant tones. In some of her other songs, sustained tones brought forth a slight cloudy timbre to her voice.

William T. Cameron, harpist, presented two groups of interesting works, including several novelty numbers such as "Wooden Shoe Dance" and "Dance of the Gnomes" (Rogers). One of his own compositions, "Romance," won a prolonged ovation.

The Honor Music Group and Glee Clubs of Friendship House will present two short operettas, "The Lad of Stratford" (Dorey and Treharne), and "The Seven Old Ladies of Lavender Town" (Brunner), tonight at 8:30 o'clock at Pierce Hall.

Jessie M. Olin, director of music at Friendship House, is in charge of the program, and is being assisted by Sonia de Blumenthal Gardella, dramatics; Doris Hilton and the art classes, scenery; Bernice Anderson Kendall, costumes; Ann M. Klesius, dances, and Karlien Meyer, accompanist.

The Women's Alliance and the Business and Professional Women's Club of All Souls Unitarian Church are sponsoring the program.

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

THE POPS enter the fourth week of the season under the direction of Arthur Fiedler with Jesus Maria Sanroma appearing as soloist at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Sanroma will be heard in Dohnanyi's Variations on a Nursery Air, for Orchestra and Piano Obligato.

For the rest the program will include such "Pops" favorites as Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor, Wagner's "The Ride of the Valkyries", and Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. Spanish Waltzes by Waldteufel, Berlioz' Hungarian March "Rakoczy", and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave" will also be performed on this occasion.

Monday evening's concerts contains an enlivening assortment with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticant" Fantasia, Grieg's Peer Gynt" Suite, Borodin's Polovetzkian Dances from "Prince Igor," and Youmans' "Carioca" as representative selections.

* * *

TUESDAY evening's program includes Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Dance of the Comedians from Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Largo from Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, "Violets," Waltzes by Waldteufel, and Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band."

A Fantasia on Verdi's "Aida" and Cole Porter hits of 1937 also find their place in this program.

Wednesday evening's program opens with a Sousa march and concludes with Brahms' Sixth Hungarian Dance.

In the interim Sibelius' Symponic poem, "Finlandia," Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Tchaikovsky's Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," and Saint-Saens Prelude to "The Deluge" will be heard.

Thursday evening'n concert will be given for the benefit of the summer camp of the Burroughs Newsboys' Foundation.

The appearance of the Spanish dancer, Sarita, wil be a feature of the program as will the appearnace of Peggy Sturat at the piano in the performance of a rhapsody from "Cracked Ice" of which Miss Stuart is the composer.

The program will also include Handell's "Royal Firework Suite," Sait-Saens' "Danse Macabre," Dvorak's Sixth Slavonic Dance in A flat major, Ravel's "Bolero," and Wagner's "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from "Tannhauser."

* * *

ON FRIDAY evening Jesus Maria Sanroma and Leo Litwin will appear as pianists in the ever popular and amusing "Animal's Carnival, Grand Zoological Fantasia" by Saint-Saens.

Grainger's arrangement of "The Londonderry Air," and the same composer's "Country Gardens," Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" Waltzes, a selection from "The Mikado," Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing," MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose," and Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" will also be heard in this concert.

Mr. Sanroma will again appear as soloist on Saturday evening in MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto in D minor.

The Colby Junior College Chorus will take part in this program which includes the Introduction to Act III of Wagner's "Lohengrin."

THE ORIGINAL ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 W. 19th St., NEW YORK 11, N.Y.
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860
Cir. (D 25,356) (S 22,452)

This Clipping From SANTA ANA, CALIF.
REGISTER

AUG 3 1959

Bare Legs Banned At Music Festival

LENOX, Mass., —(AP)— From now on bare legs will not be permitted at the summer concerts given here by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Thos. B. Perry, Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said last night ushers will hand out wraparound skirts to women who show up in shorts.

Tanglewood officials also said they would "prefer" that women not attend the concerts in slacks either.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

MAY 20 1937

William Lyon Phelps

Yale Professor—America's Most Interesting Commentator

The Greatest Waltz Ever Written

EXACTLY seventy years ago, in the year 1867, when the composer was 41 years old, the incomparable "Blue Danube" waltz, by Johann Strauss the younger, was performed at Vienna for the first time, with Strauss leading. The full title was "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," and its success was immediate and enormous; and its popularity has, if anything, steadily increased. As a composer of waltzes Johann Strauss Sr. was surpassed only by his son, the author of "Blue Danube," which was his Opus 314.

On Saturday night, April 17, 1937, I heard this in Boston, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in its regular concert series, which have now lasted more than fifty consecutive years. This same great orchestra had played it before, in 1911, in 1915, and in 1934, but on these occasions it was part of the campaign for pension or special funds, and not in the regular dignified series of Friday and Saturday concerts.

Thus this most popular and most beautiful of all waltzes has finally risen from extreme popularity to the distinguished fame of a classical program. Other orchestras had previously so honored it. The New Haven Symphony Orchestra some four or five years ago gave it for the first time a place on the regular program, conducted by that austere musician, David Stanley Smith, and it was greeted (as it was later in Boston) with delight by the audience.

Strauss composed the "Danube" waltzes to be sung as well as to be played. The first performance had a chorus of 150 male voices. When, in 1872, the composer made his appearance in America the "Blue Danube" was given under his direction by 2,000 players, together with a chorus of 20,000. Strauss said that the terrific noise nearly deafened him.

Both Brahms and Wagner, his great contemporaries, had enormous admiration for Strauss. Brahms, being asked for an autograph, wrote the first few bars of the "Danube" waltz, and then under it, "Alas! not Johannes Brahms!"

And Wagner wrote: "One of Strauss' waltzes as far surpass in charm, finish and real musical worth hundreds of the artificial compositions of his contemporaries as the tower of St. Stephen's surpasses the advertising columns on the Paris boulevards."

Tomorrow—"Good English."

(Copyright, 1937)

Tops at Pops

Youthful Eva Stark, who will be violin soloist at the Pops on Thursday. When the master musicians of the Boston Symphony praise a young player it is a voucher of quality like the sterling mark. She has the voucher.

[redacted]

STRAVINSKY OBJECTS

Times Apr 23/37

His Comment Evokes Some Reflections Upon the Art of Interpretation

By OLIN DOWNES

WE have before us a copy of a letter from Igor Stravinsky to Miss Eva Gauthier of this city, which, roughly translated, and with some slight elisions, reads as follows:

"Deeply touched by your charming letter. I thank you most especially * * * for sending me programs and press clippings concerning the performance of 'Persephone.' However, I should like to have more precise information on that performance * * * and the clippings that you sent me speak very little about it, and confine themselves (in their habitual deaf, provincial ignorance) to blaming the music of 'Persephone' in vague and imprecise terms."

Aside from the justice or injustice, in this particular instance, of the critical "clippings" referred to, and aside from the pardonable irritation of a composer who had reason to be disappointed in the press reaction to one of his latest works, Mr. Stravinsky's letter does point to the importance, indeed the indispensability in music, of great interpretation.

For the art of the interpreter, sometimes excessively praised, is more often underestimated. It is underestimated because the interpreter's mission is not clearly understood. A performer is usually called an interpreter, which is not necessarily the case; or he is mixed in the minds of many people with the virtuoso. Now, one man can be all these three things, while on the other hand he can be only one of them.

* * *

Thus a man can perform without interpreting. He can sound many notes with his fingers or his breath, without any particular illumination of the conception of the composer. Or he can give the performance of a virtuoso, who in the current meaning of the term is an exhibitionist addicted to exciting effects and superficial display, at the expense of deeper meanings.

This virtuoso element in music is usually the one which first attracts the great public. A new infant prodigy receives immense audiences and frantic acclaim the instant his presence is known, while a Sibelius symphony may be a quarter of a century old and still await recognition. But we are not now considering the negative virtues of an interesting and uncreative performer, or the scintillating, seductive and misleading virtuoso. We are considering the reverent and revealing interpreter, who stands at the composer's right hand, and upon whom we have to depend very largely for any complete understanding of the music.

Mr. Stravinsky, by inference, says that he would like to know precise details of the performance of "Persephone," in order, presumably, to place the blame for any failure of the work where he thinks it belongs. Here it may be said that he had good reasons for his question. The interpretation of "Persephone" in this city was inferior to an earlier one given in Boston. It was inferior, in the first place, because of limited opportunities of orchestral preparation and of the carelessness and indifference of the players of the orchestra which officiated. The audience could not obtain the same impression of the music as another audience which heard an interpretation of superb finish and exactness in Boston.

To this the writer can personally testify, and there is no question that the result, even with the most intelligent listeners, was harmful to the composition. Nor was this a catastrophe reserved for "Persephone." In how many cases has a score of value had to wait years to come into its own because of inadequate interpretation at its first hearing, and the reluctance of performers to repeat it because of its cold reception. All too much, and too evidently, does the fate of a composition, at least in its earlier career, rest with the interpreter.

* * *

Some gifted and learned musicians, expert as score-readers, claim otherwise. Give them the music pages, they say, and they will not have to rely upon the performance to learn their quality. We beg to differ. Much as a good musician may glean from a score, inescapable as the beauties of a greatly inspired work may be under this examination, it will be very seldom indeed that the score-reader, however expert, will realize the true nature and ultimate depths of the composition by visual examination.

We should try anew to recognize the greatness of the revealing interpretation and honor, in a degree only secondary to that in which we honor the composer, the sublimity of the mission of the one who undertakes in spirit and letter to recreate a masterpiece. To decipher, as the priest in the temple, the innermost meanings of the signs on the music paper is an act requiring not only learning but intuition and clairvoyance.

The moment of the act is the fusion of two minds and two spirits, of which a special manifestation is born. The music cannot be precisely what only one of the two conceived, even though one were the originator of the score. The great interpretation is in the last analysis the creation of music, every time this takes place. The great interpreter is a man of such profound sincerity, knowledge and individual power that when he conveys to us a composition which has been sounded a thousand times he achieves a new revelation.

At this time, when all America is awakening musically, it is for the rising generation to reflect upon the great need of worthy interpretive art. There is perhaps more pressure to abandon serious purpose and to forsake difficult ideals than ever before in the world. Those with talent are confronted almost immediately with the temptation of quick and easy money and the easily won reputation which never yet developed an artist of the first rank. Everything conspires to throw the idealist off his track, and on the other hand there never was such a large musical public eager for bread and easy, because of its present inexperience, to offer a stone. There never was such a need of great interpretation as at this time, or a heavier obligation on the part of the rising generation of musicians to supply it.

Unfortunately, there are entirely too few signs that this attempt is being made. A singer wishes to appear at the Metropolitan, Spring or Winter season preferred, to use the name of the organization for a profitable contract with radio, records or Hollywood or all three. The rôles of opera which are the products of centuries of European culture are studied a few months, without even a knowledge of their tradition and detailed technique, and the performer hurries onto the stage.

This is permitted, with appalling disregard of principle, by those who should know better, and be more solicitous of the true interests of eager youth entrusted to their care. Therefore we see young singers from European theatres who immediately show a superior foundation to that of their youthful American contemporaries, while the American contemporaries, who have just as much talent, have not been properly directed or encouraged to master every aspect of their work. Then there is indignation when various deficiencies, due only to superficiality of thinking and preparation, are recorded in the press, which is accused of hostility toward musical products of its own land.

* * *

We recall words of Arturo Toscanini to a friend who repeated the accusation that his programs were short of modern music. He said: "Dear friend, let me tell you this: I first conducted Sibelius's music, also the first 'La Mer,' the first 'Salome,' the first 'Petrouchka,' in Italy. I produced many other works, ultra-modern in my day, for the first time there and often for the first time in many other places. Now my years are upon me. It is time for the young men who are rising to promote the new music. I have only a few years to live.

"Above all, I want to spend them in seeing whether I can come a little nearer the truth of my Haydn and my Beethoven scores."

The quotation is a rough one, made by hearsay and memory of a conversation with a reliable person. Aside from that part of it which touches upon Toscanini's tastes, it supports the record of many, many instances when that master musician, carrying in his head every note of works a thousand times familiar to him, has nevertheless, before every repeated performance, closeted himself and his purblind eyes with the score. The line of a phrase, the fraction of a tempo, the smallest thing or the largest, that will bring the anxious ministrant a breath nearer the secret of the beauty he is attempting to capture is indicative of the indispensable ideals of interpretation that we must hold precious, an honor, and emulate in everything that in any way approaches art.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MA 20 1937

By WILLIAM LYON PHELPS

The Greatest Waltz

Exactly 70 years ago, in the year 1867, when the composer was 41 years old, the incomparable Blue Danube Waltz, by Johann Strauss the Younger, was performed at Vienna for the first time, with Strauss leading. The full title was "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," and its success was immediate and enormous; and its popularity has, if anything, steadily increased. As a composer of waltzes Johann Strauss, Senior, was surpassed only by his son, the author of "Blue Danube," which was his Opus 314.

On Saturday night, April 17, 1937, I heard this in Boston, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time in its regular series of concerts, which have now lasted more than 50 consecutive years. This same great orchestra had played it before, in 1911, in 1915, and in 1934, but on these occasions it was part of the campaign for pension or special funds, and not in the regular dignified series of Friday and Saturday concerts.

Thus, this most popular and most beautiful of all waltzes has finally risen from extreme popularity to the distinguished fame of a classical programme; other orchestras had previously so honored it. The New Haven Symphony Orchestra some four or five years ago gave it for the first time a place on their regular programme, conducted by that auster musician, David Stanley Smith; and it was greeted (as it was later in Boston) with delight by the audience.

Strauss composed the Danube waltzes to be sung as well as to be played. The first performance had a chorus of 150 male voices. When in 1872 the composer made his appearance in America, the "Blue Danube" was given under his direction by 2,000 players together with a chorus of 20,000. Strauss said that the terrific noise nearly deafened him.

Both Brahms and Wagner, his great contemporaries, had enormous admiration for Strauss. Brahms, being asked for an autograph, wrote the first few bars of the Danube Waltz, and then under it, "Alas! not by Johannes Brahms!"

And Wagner wrote, "One of Strauss' waltzes as far surpasses in charm, finish, and real musical worth hundreds of the artificial compositions of his contemporaies as the tower of St. Stephen's surpasses the advertising columns on the Paris boulevards."

(Copyright, 1937, by the George Matthew Adams Service)

MEXICO'S ORCHESTRA

FAMILIAR classics and compositions of a modernistic cast stand cheek by jowl on the majority of the ten programs arranged by Carlos Chávez for the season of ten weekly concerts of the Symphony Orchestra of Mexico, which he will conduct in Mexico City July 2 to Sept. 10. Most of the lists favor a rather set scheme whereby the first half is given over to works by masters of the past and the second half concerns itself with contemporary orchestral creations.

For instance, the initial program, which begins with the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," continues with more excerpts from that master's operas up to the intermission and thereafter continues with the more recent idiom of Stravinsky's "Firebird" suite and the First symphony of Shostakovich.

The second program likewise contrasts past and present in its two main divisions. Bach's First "Brandenburg" concerto and Mozart's symphony in E flat represent the classics here, with Johnson's "The Streets of Florence" and Copland's "Salon Mexico" contributing the element of contrast. Between the two American contributions Mr. Chávez has sandwiched Debussy's "Iberia."

Five other programs start off with a "Brandenburg" concerto, so that by the end of the season all six of them will have been heard. This seems an exemplary way in which to present the set instead of crowding these famous compositions together at a couple of concerts.

In accordance with this plan the third concert begins with the second of these concertos, followed by Haydn's "Queen's" symphony. This program is one of three in which works of the twentieth century find no place. Its concluding section consists of Franck's symphony and a suite contrived from Mussorgsky's "Khovantchina."

On the next list the Third "Brandenburg" concerto is coupled with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. Rounding out the schedule come Huizar's "Pueblerinas," Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela," the only number by that composer to be offered during the orchestra's season, and Ravel's "Spanish Rhapsody."

At later concerts Mr. Chávez, so far as standard symphonies are concerned, offers several favorite examples, such as Schubert's "Unfinished" or Tchaikovsky's Fifth. Of lesser known classics, however, he has chosen the Johann Christian Bach symphony in B flat major and Haydn's "Nocturne" for presentation in the final half of the season as well as a Vivaldi concerto grosso and a group of chorals by Buxtehude.

Among the modern selections, so far unmentioned, which will figure on the lists are Rolon's "1895," Villalobos's "Amazonas," Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler" and the conductor's own "Antigona." Milhaud's "The Creation of the World" is also to be performed. One composition by Brahms will be played.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE

MAY 25 1937

Off The Record

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S Symphony No. 6 in B Minor, the famous "Pathetique," is again available in a fine recording, this time by the Philadelphia Orchestra with Eugene Ormandy conducting. The pressing, Ormandy's first major recording with the Philadelphia Orchestra, is released by Victor in album M-337.

Victor announces that the No. 6 Symphony was requested for Ormandy as one of his best performances, despite the fact that the work was excellently done some time ago for the same company by Serge Kousevitzky and the Boston Symphony.

Ormandy already is well represented in record albums with the Minneapolis orchestra but the young conductor is just now credited with achieving full musical stature as co-leader of the Philadelphia orchestra.

The story of the Sixth Symphony is, of course, well known. It remains Tschaikowsky's last musical uterance, his "swan song" to the world.

Completed in October, 1893, it was performed for the first time at St. Petersburg, October 28, 1893 under the direction of the composer. The intolerably sad music was not acclaimed and Tschaikowzky was further depressed. When it was greeted with enthusiasm on its second playing a few weeks later—he was dead, a suicide.

This work is further unique in that it is one of the few compositions acceptably named by a person other than the composer. Tschaikowzky at first was in favor of naming it a "Program Symphony," but decided against the title. His brother, Modest, then suggested, "Tragic," which the composer rejected but the second title of Modest, "Pathetic" was agreed upon.

[68]

NOVELTIES IN PARIS

Times

PARIS.

WHENEVER the name of the the pianist Ricardo Viñes appears in Paris a large audience is sure to assemble, eager to experience the spell of his magnetic personality. The distinguished artist's long career has included the presentation of many works since become famous which Ravel, Debussy and other composers have dedicated to him. At a concert devoted to the memory of Deodate de Severac, Viñes played the suite for piano, "En Languedoc" and "Cerdana." A first hearing from an unpublished manuscript of "Les Naiades et le Faune Indiscret" for piano, together with three groups of songs by Severac, completed this unusual program.

A brilliant audience twice packed the Opera House for each of the two concerts given by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on its annual visit to Paris. Furtwaengler on these occasions obtained from his musicians an extraordinary perfection of ensemble. After the Haydn Symphony No. 104, the conductor relinquished his baton and placed himself at the piano for Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in D. Furtwaengler did not hesitate to contribute emotional warmth to his interpretation, which was one of great clarity and musicianship. At the second concert Max Reger's variations on a theme of Mozart was enthusiastically applauded, perhaps as much or more because of its superb performance by the orchestra than because of the music itself. Owing to the almost unbelievable delicacy of certain pianissimi, Furtwaengler obtained an extraordinarily wide range of nuance. "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Seventh symphony completed the program. Such an ovation followed that Furtwaengler finally responded with an encore.

Ever full of enthusiasm for new works, M. Viñes appeared again at one of the Spirale concerts to play André Jolivet's suite, "Mana." Another recent concert of the Spirale Society included a most important new work by Olivier Messiaen, "Poèmes pour Mi," for voice and piano. This is a series of nine songs, the words of which—also written by the composer—exalt the sacrament of marriage. In an age whose flux and change is reflected by an ardent search for new modes of expression, Messiaen's music not only brings an originality uncontested by his contemporaries (Auric has lately published words of high tribute for Messiaen) but rises with splendid fervor from the deep well of a fearless affirmation of faith.

E. [illegible]

GEORGES LAURENT TO GET FRENCH HONOR

Georges Laurent, the first flutist of he Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been made a chevalier de la legion 'honneur, the award that the rench government reserves for hose who have distinguished themelves either at home or abroad. As flutist M. Laurent is an excellent xample of the virtues of French raining. Moreover he has spread he fame of French music in his apacity of musical director of the lute Players' Club. He is also on he faculty of the New England Conervatory of Music.

NEW YORK N. [illegible]
HERALD TR[illegible]NE

Berkshire Concert Changes

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced yesterday that the two Sunday concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction on August 8 and 15 on the Tanglewood estate, near Lenox, Mass., will be held at 4:30 instead of in the evening to accommodate patrons from Boston, New York and elsewhere who wish to catch trains. The other concerts, on August 5, 7, 12 and 14, will be held at 8:30 as originally announced.

NEW YOR EVENIN

MAY

WORDS AN

Beethov
Not

Boston's "Pop" C

Reports from B
the "Pop" concerts
the nerves of musi
Olympian plane of D perhaps, a feeling social classes the "F said to justify their They shun the full m pail of the winter sea to the general attenti inspirations of the g great composers of al
I have never had the to attend any of the B except in spirit as their radio transmissio that the actual even jolly scene, with lady men patrons eating
while the gay and ent ductor, Arthur Fiedler derful orchestra fill th
with pleasant music.
e abhorrent to musi serious persons who connection between m more physical require istence. Yet it invoke picture in which the is not separated from the entire organism
for.
The truth is that phy and relaxation create th tal state for the recep
the heaviest and greate you have ever listened music at home or in a fr your own experience w truth of this statement.
a comfortable and over and sipping a beer or a soda you found yoursel pily attuned to the tr emotions of a late Beet et than you ever coul more formal, ascetic env concert hall. The pro ing clarified, if you rem ery involved musical i ubjective composer. Lu
e "inner person," far detriment to spiritual ion, only served to c eighten those special hich operate at the in xalted art.
The time may not be d e shall go to concerts i which we now repa lubs. That is, we sha ight and proper to ex hysical aid we can to o achinery. It may see ous at this moment e gine ourselves eating a ich during the slow m

Pops P
The

By

IN SYMPHONY H ant fashion with more ons scheduled for the
For this evening's unces the first Boston erture on a Danish n
ncerto for Four pian
Pianists Heinrich G
thel Hutchinson, Selma y and Paul Bregor
e soloists in the perfor
the latter.
The program also i e Prelude to "Lohen vorak's "Songs My M ught Me," and Tchaiko Nutcracker" Suite.
Hans Wiener and his gr

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAY 25 1937

WORDS AND MUSIC

Beethoven and Pretzels Not Unholy Combination

Boston's "Pop" Concerts Prove That Food for the Tummy Seasons That of the Soul

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Reports from Boston indicate that a lot of fun is to be had at the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall these days. Designed to relax the nerves of music lovers who have dwelt for a winter on the Olympian plane of Dr. Koussevitzky's ministrations, and to introduce, perhaps, a feeling of spring camaraderie among Boston's various social classes the "Pops" may be said to justify their informal title. They shun the full musical dinner pail of the winter season and bring to the general attention the lighter inspirations of the great and near great composers of all countries.

I have never had the good fortune to attend any of the Boston "Pops," except in spirit as a listener to their radio transmission. It is said that the actual events present a jolly scene, with lady and gentlemen patrons eating and drinking while the gay and enthusiastic conductor, Arthur Fiedler, and his wonderful orchestra fill the auditorium with pleasant music. The idea may be abhorrent to musicologists and serious persons who disdain any connection between music and the more physical requirements of existence. Yet it invokes an amiable picture in which the soul of man is not separated from his body and the entire organism is accounted for.

The truth is that physical comfort and relaxation create the very mental state for the reception of even the heaviest and greatest music. If you have ever listened to chamber music at home or in a friend's house your own experience will prove the truth of this statement. Seated on a comfortable and over stuffed sofa and sipping a beer or a whisky and soda you found yourself more happily attuned to the transcendental emotions of a late Beethoven quartet than you ever could be in the more formal, ascetic environment of a concert hall. The process of sipping clarified, if you remember, the very involved musical ideas of the subjective composer. Lubrication of the "inner person," far from being a detriment to spiritual apprehension, only served to cleanse and heighten those special faculties which operate at the instigation of exalted art.

The time may not be distant when we shall go to concerts in the spirit in which we now repair to night clubs. That is, we shall think it right and proper to extend what physical aid we can to our spiritual machinery. It may seem blasphemous at this moment even to imagine ourselves eating a ham sandwich during the slow movement of Brahms's First Symphony. Yet any unprejudiced physician will tell you that thoughtful mastication at such a time is conducive to the utmost spiritual concentration. As for myself, I am not ashamed to say that I have often derived the keenest pleasure from the music of Bach while munching salted peanuts.

CLOSING SOON

ELEANOR PHELPS

Heroine of the Yale thriller, "Naughty Naught," now in the last week of a successful run at the American Music Hall in East Fifty-fifth Street.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAY 23 1937

Recalling --

WHEN Philip Hale, Outstanding Music Critic, Became Albany Resident; Conducted Schubert Club, a Group of Male Voices

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

IN looking over an old program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the writer saw the notation in fine type: "Historical and description notes by Philip Hale."

To a great many of the younger generation of students of music in Albany, the name of Philip Hale is not known, but to the concert-goers of a generation ago his musical criticisms were as avidly read in America as those of Laurence Gilman and Olin Downes are today.

For several years Hale was a resident of Albany where his musical career began.

Born in Norwich, Vt., he came to Albany in 1880 as a lawyer, in the meanwhile taking up the study of piano and theory with one of the finest teachers Albany ever produced, the late John Kautz.

* * *

HALE was engaged by St. Peter's church as organist, which position he held from 1879 to 1882. He then went abroad for organ study with Guilmant in Paris, returning to Troy where he became organist at St. John's church from 1887 to 1889. At that time he was conductor of the Schubert club of Albany, a group of male voices similar to the present Mendelssohn club. Concerts were given two or three times a year but to all intents and purposes, the social side of membership was stressed rather than the musical side.

At the close of each rehearsal the members transferred their singing to the very famous beer gardens on Beaver street, just above the present offices of The Times-Union and conducted by a woman whom every one in Albany knew as Mrs. Engel.

In speaking to some of the men who sang with the Schubert club, it was learned that the first requisite to becoming a member was the ability to consume plenty of good beer; the musical ability was secondary. Phil Hale always was the first to arrive at Mrs. Engel's and the last to go home and used to say it was the duty of the conductor to see that the men singing under him were safely conducted to their homes.

Mr. Hale then went to Boston where he became associated with the "Post," later with "Journal" and up to the time of his death in 1934, with the "Herald."

* * *

FROM 1921 to 1933 when he retired, he anotated the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His observations on music were always lightened with a sly wit but his brilliance was not confined to music, alone. He had a vast fund of information on the most unrelated subjects and his notations of the programs kept them from being the dry, deadly things that are generally written but not read.

Again and again when his fellow critics wrote disparagingly of new musical works, Hale sensed the unapparent values and his observations of works are quotable today. He provided program notes for everything played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular concerts and his record of analyses of over 1,000 musical works is a record that stands unchallenged.

It can be said of him what Sir George Grove said of Schubert:

"There never has been one like him and their will never be another."

News of Music Here and Afield

Trans. June 2, 1937

Imminent Soloists at Pops; Alexander Kipnis to Return; a Radio Commission

Eva Stark, violinist, who, as a girl of fifteen, made her debut in Jordan Hall a few years ago, will return as soloist at the Pops concert tomorrow evening, when she will play Wieniawski's "Souvenir of Moscow" with the Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler. After leaving Boston, where she was a pupil of Nicolas Kassman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Miss Stark went to the Curtis Institute, of which she is a graduate. More recently she has been associated with the Jacques Gordon Musical Foundation in Falls Village, Conn.

On Friday evening, when the proceeds of the Pops concert will benefit the Boston Evening Clinic, the solcist will be Milo Goldstein, Parisian 'cellist. His solo piece has not yet been announced.

Ruth Culbertson, familiar Boston pianist, will play the Mozart Piano Concerto in B-flat (K. 595) at the Pops next Tuesday evening. According to advance word, it has never previously appeared on a program in Boston.

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

May 30

IN SYMPHONY HALL the Pops continue in their nonchalant fashion with more than the usual number of special attractions scheduled for the programs of the ensuing week.

For this evening's concert, Conductor Arthur Fiedler announces the first Boston performance of Tchaikovsky's Festival Overture on a Danish national anthem, to be followed by Bach's Concerto for Four pianos with orchestra.

Pianists Heinrich Gebhard, Ethel Hutchinson, Selma Pelonsky and Paul Bregor will be the soloists in the performance of the latter.

The program also includes the Prelude to "Lohengrin," Dvorak's "Songs My Mother Taught Me," and Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite.

Hans Wiener and his group of dancers will appear with the Pops Orchestra on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

A satire which Mr. Wiener has composed upon Ibert's "Divertissement" will be presented for the first time on Monday evening and repeated at Wednesday's concert together with a set of Spanish dances newly studiod.

On Tuesday Mr. Wiener and his group will repeat the dancer interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," which, when first performed at the Pops two seasons ago, won much favorable comment.

The young violinist, Eva Stark, will make her first appearance at the Pops on Thursday evening in a performance of Wieniawski's "Souvenir of Moscow," for Violin with Orchestra.

* * *

NEXT SUNDAY evening's concert, to be given for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is annual Request Night. This will be the last Sunday program of the season.

For the rest, the programs of the week contain the usual Pops assortment.

Tuesday evening brings, in addition to the Wiener dancers, Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Beethoven's Turkish March from "The Ruins of Athens," a Marche, Sambre et Meuse," by Planquette," and Strauss' "Artists' Life" Waltzes.

Wednesday evening's program includes Weber's Overture to "Der Friechutz." Tchaikovky's "Briar Rose" Waltz, and Cossacks' Dance from "Mazeppa."

Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," a Bach Air for String Orchestra, and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" add considerable interest to the same program.

* * *

THURSDAY evening's concert opens with The Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and continues with Overture to "Sakuntala" by Goldmark, Fugato on a Well Known Theme by McBride, Strauss' "Vienna Blood" Waltzes, the Finale from Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and Cole Porter's "Night and Day."

Friday evening's program finds variety by combining Wagner's "Tannhauser" Overture, Sibelius' "Valse Triste," and Cole Porter's "I've Got You Under My Skin."

Saturday's program lists works by Mozart, Pierne, Liszt, Schubert, Saine-Saens, Strauss, Gade, and Meacham.

Beethoven and Pretzels Not Unholy Combination

Boston's "Pop" Concerts Prove That Food for the Tummy Seasons That of the Soul

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF - N.Y. Post - 5/25

Reports from Boston indicate that a lot of fun is to be had at the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall these days. Designed to relax the nerves of music lovers who have dwelt for a winter on the Olympian plane of Dr. Koussevitzky's ministrations, and to introduce, perhaps, a feeling of spring camaraderie among Boston's various social classes the "Pops" may be said to justify their informal title. They shun the full musical dinner pail of the winter season and bring to the general attention the lighter inspirations of the great and near great composers of all countries.

I have never had the good fortune to attend any of the Boston "Pops," except in spirit as a listener to their radio transmission. It is said that the actual events present a jolly scene, with lady and gentlemen patrons eating and drinking while the gay and enthusiastic conductor, Arthur Fiedler, and his wonderful orchestra fill the auditorium with pleasant music. The idea may be abhorrent to musicologists and serious persons who disdain any connection between music and the more physical requirements of existence. Yet it invokes an amiable picture in which the soul of man is not separated from his body and the entire organism is accounted for.

The truth is that physical comfort and relaxation create the very mental state for the reception of even the heaviest and greatest music. If you have ever listened to chamber music at home or in a friend's house your own experience will prove the truth of this statement. Seated on a comfortable and over stuffed sofa and sipping a beer or a whisky and soda you found yourself more happily attuned to the transcendental emotions of a late Beethoven quartet than you ever could be in the more formal, ascetic environment of a concert hall. The process of sipping clarified, if you remember, the very involved musical ideas of the subjective composer. Lubrication of the "inner person," far from being a detriment to spiritual apprehension, only served to cleanse and heighten those special faculties which operate at the instigation of exalted art.

The time may not be distant when we shall go to concerts in the spirit in which we now repair to night clubs. That is, we shall think it right and proper to extend what physical aid we can to our spiritual machinery. It may seem blasphemous at this moment even to imagine ourselves eating a ham sandwich during the slow movement of Brahms's First Symphony. Yet any unprejudiced physician will tell you that thoughtful mastication at such a time is conducive to the utmost spiritual concentration. As for myself, I am not ashamed to say that I have often derived the keenest pleasure from the music of Bach while munching salted peanuts.

[69]

Hans Weiner, who will appear with his Dance Group on the Pops programs at Symphony Hall Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week.

POPS BEGIN 52D SEASON

Capacity Audience Hears 85-Piece Orchestra Under Fiedler

Agreeable music admirably played in a delightfully informal atmosphere again was the keynote that distinguished the opening of another series of Pop concerts. Actually the occasion was the beginning of the 52d season of this unique form of entertainment and a capacity audience assembled in Symphony Hall last evening to pay enthusiastic tribute to Arthur Fiedler, the well-known conductor, and the orchestra of 85 members of the Boston Symphony.

The program was a representative one, appealing to a variety of tastes. It included the first performances in Boston of Schoenherr's "Austrian Peasant Music" and of the Sibelius "Festivo," from "Historic Scenes," and played in "Tempo di Bolero." Otherwise it fell into a familiar and generally accepted pattern, opening with Rimsky-Korsakov's Procession of the Nobles from "Mlada," and closing with the "Ride of the Valkyries," from Richard Wagner's music drama. Between came pieces of Goldmark, Bolzoni, Alexander Tcherepnin, Tchaikovsky, Strauss and Kern.

These selections, and half as many more encores, were interpreted in a Symphony Hall smart - gowned in the summer costume of green and gold. The great gold chandelier hung in its accustomed place over the orchestra, chairs and tables were spread across the floor and the only real change to be found was in the size of the printed programs. These were perhaps half again as large as they had been in the past and seemed more attractive and easier to read.

Most interesting of the two new works was the Sibelius "Festivo." Written in "Bolero time," it proved to be quite different from the "Bolero" as Ravel arranged it for full orchestra and equally far away from the "Fetes" of Debussy, naturally suggested by the similarity of titles. The greatest living writer of symphonies composed his "Festivo" skillfully and intelligently, sounding a theme in the violins, echoing it in the woodwinds against a background of pizzicato strings.

In contrast came the suits of "Austrian Peasant Music" instrumented by Max Schoenherr. The program notes pointed out that the music resembled an "itinerant German band." We agree unhesitatingly The best portion was that entitled "Hog Dance." There is no need at this time to write about the excellent playing of the orchestra or the finished leadership of Mr. Fiedler. In the absence of Richard Burgin, usually away at this time, we had the talented Julius Theodorowicz as the concert master No less than five encores were given, including a repetition of Cole Porter's "I've Got You Under My Skin," in itself an indication of the general enthusiasm. Further evidence of the success of the Pops this year was to be found in the fact that the advance sale was ahead of the past few seasons. H. E.

Wiener Dance Group On Three Pops Programs

May 30 '37

The appearance of Hans Wiener and his dance group at Symphony Hall on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings is the highlight of the Pops programs this week.

Arthur Fiedler announces the following programs for the fifth week of Pops:

Sunday Evening May 30

Heroic March .... Saint-Saens
Prelude to "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Songs My Mother Taught Me" .... Dvorak
Festival Overture on the Danish National Anthem ..... Tchaikovsky
(First performance in Boston)
Concerto for Four Pianos with Orchestra .... Bach
Soloists: Heinrich Gebhard
Ethel Hutchinson
Selma Pelonsky
Paul Bregor
Largo from the Opera "Xerxes" .... Handel
Ballet Suite "Nutcracker" .... Tchaikovsky
Miniature Overture—Dance of the Sugar Fairy—Arabian Dance—Waltz of the Flowers
"Roses from the South" Waltzes .. Strauss
"Deep River" ...... Arranged by Jacchia
American Fantasy .... Herbert

Monday Evening, May 31

"High School Cadets," March ...... Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville .. Rossini
"Panaderos," Spanish Dance .... Glazounov
Hungarian Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior" .... Grossman
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Minuet (for string orchestra ...... Bolzoni
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Hans Wiener and His Dance Group
Spanish Suite:
Enticement .... De Falla
Dream .... Turina
Orgy .... Turina
hollywood div-O-rtissement, dance satire in four "takes," by Hans Wiener
Music by Ibert

Tuesday Evening, June 1

March, "Sambre et Meuse" .... Planquette.
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .. Berlioz
Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens" .... Beethoven
Fantasia, "La Boheme" .... Puccini
"Espana," rhapsody .... Chabrier
"Molly on the Shore" .... Grainger
"Artists' Life," waltzes .... Strauss
Hans Wiener dancers with orchestra
"Pictures at an Exhibition"
Moussorgsky-Ravel

Wednesday Evening, June 2

March, "Blue White" .... Schmidt
Overture to "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Waltz, "Briar Rose" .... Tchaikovsky
Cossacks' dance from "Mazeppa"
Tchaikovsky
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
Debussy
Air (for string orchestra) .... Bach
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Wagner
Hans Wiener and his dance group
Spanish suite:
Enticement .... De Falla
Dream .... Turina
Orgy .... Turina
hollywood div-O-rtissement, dance satire in four "takes," by Hans Wiener
Music by Ibert

Thursday Evening, June 3

Wedding March, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Overture to "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Fugato on a Well-Known Theme .. McBride
"Vienna Blood," Waltzes .... Strauss
Finale from the Fourth Symphony.
Tchaikovsky
"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Selections from Act III .... Wagner
"Souvenir of Moscow," for violin with orchestra .... Wieniawski
Soloist: Eva Stark
"Triana," from the Suite "Iberia."
Albeniz-Arbos
"Night and Day" .... Porter
Bacchanale from "Faust" .... Gounod

Friday Evening, June 4

"Washington Post," March .... Sousa
Overture to "Raymond" .... Thomas
"At Dawning" .... Cadman-Herbert
Gems from Gilbert and Sullivan
Arranged by Seredy
Prelude and Fugue on a Forbidden Theme.
For String Orchestra .... Danburg
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner
"Estudiantina," Waltzes ...... Waldteufel
"I've Got You Under My Skin," from "Born to Dance" .... Porter
Procession of the "Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov

Saturday Evening, June 5

Military Polonaise ...... Chopin-Glazounov
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro."
Mozart
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierne
"Les Preludes," Symphonic poem .... Liszt
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .... Nicolai
Ave Maria .... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah,"
Saint-Saens
"Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes.
Strauss
"Jealousy," Gypsy tango .... Gade
American Patrol .... Meacham
Stein Song.

Sunday Evening, June 6

REQUEST NIGHT
(Program to be announced shortly)

SYMPHONY HALL
TONIGHT 8:30
BACH—Concerto for 4 Pianos and Orchestra
Soloists—Gebhard—Hutchinson—Pelonsky—Bregor
POPS
85 Symphony Players
ARTHUR FIEDLER—Conductor
MON.—TUES.—WED.
HANS WIENER and DANCERS
WITH ORCHESTRA
TICKETS 25c to $1.00
On Sale 2 Weeks in Advance

THE DANCE

June 1

Hans Wiener

At the Pops last evening, in addition to a program of musical selections by the orchestra under the direction of Arthur Fiedler, Hans Wiener and his dancers presented two new offerings: "Spanish Suite," with music by De Falla and Turina and choreography by Mr. Wiener; and "Hollywood Div-O-Tissement," a dance satire in four "takes," with music by Jacques Ibert and choreography by Mr. Wiener. The complete program was as follows:

"High School Cadets," march ...... Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville' Rossini
"Panaderos," Spanish dance ..... Glazounov
Hungarian Czardas, "Ghost of the Warrior" .... Grossman
Suite from "Carmen" .... Bizet
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Overture to "William Tell" .... Rossini
Hans Wiener and his dance group
Spanish suite: .... De Falla
Enticement .... Turina
Dream .... Turina
Orgy
Hollywood div-O-rtissement, dance satire in four "takes," by Hans Wiener
Music by Ibert

The warmest night of the season so far was not enough to stem the energies of Hans Wiener and his dance group, presenting last evening the first of three dance programs at the Pops. Last evening saw Mr. Wiener exploring the fields of the Spanish dance and also of satire. The former, "Spanish Suite," was suggestive at times of the work of Escudero, but both choreographically and technically seemed less Andalusian than precious, as though the vigorous original were seen through a glass that both softened and diminished. This number was in three parts, the first of which, "Enticement," danced by Mr. Wiener and four attractive young women, was the most pleasing; the second, "Dream," a solo for Mr. Wiener, called for considerable stamping about and some graceful manoeuvres; the third, "Orgy," hardly lived up to its name, being a series of evolutions that were lively rather than orgiastic.

"Hollywood Div - O - Tiseement" proved a more elaborate affair, a satire, by no means subtle, on the private and public lives of Hollywood stars. Mr. Wiener, in an orange wig and a languid manner, passed frivolously from wife to leading lady, from leading lady to hat-check girl and from hat check girl to parlor-maid-turned-bathing beauty. The first two scenes—the burlesque of long-run kisses, and the circus wedding proved the most amusing, the others continued in similar vein, but were not quiet so effective. Mr. Wiener's dancing proved more resourceful than this choreography in this instance, for the production had suggestions of the Jooss, of Trudi Schoop and George Balanchine ballets and never quite achieved a unity of its own.

There was a sizable and friendly audience which applauded the dancing and found the purely orchestral portion of the concert much to its liking. Tonight Mr. Wiener and his group will give their interpretations of Mussorgsky's "Pictures At an Exhibition." E. L. H.

AY, MAY 6, 1937 —New England News

What's Going On in

Evelyn Gardiner

As the Duchess of Plaza Toro in "The Gondoliers," at the Colonial Tonight

The "Pops" Inaugurated

A warm evening in early May; Symphony Hall transformed into a conservative reproduction of a pleasure garden by the substitution of small tables for the winter seats on the floor; a judicious distribution of gold lattice and green paint on walls and around doors; deft waitresses in crisp, newly designed green and white costumes; hundreds of groups of Bostonians in relaxed mood and over all the enchantment of music supplied by some 90 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—these things connote "Pops," that Boston institution which opened its fifty-second season last night, with Arthur Fiedler again conducting.

Avowedly of less weighty material than is set forth during the regular symphony concerts of the winter season, the program nevertheless was of more than passing interest. Opening with the "Procession of the Nobles" from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Mlada" and closing with Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," Mr. Fiedler interspersed some "first performances in Boston," listing portions of a suite entitled "Austrian Peasant Music" by Schönherr and a Sibelius item, "Festivo," from his "Historic Scenes." For further novelties there were "Three Russian Dances" by Alexander Tcherepnin and Lucien Cailliet's symphonic paraphrase of Jerome Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight."

All these lent zest to a program which also included the "Sakuntala" Overture by Goldmark, the familiar "Minuet" for string orchestra by Bolzoni, Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave" and of course a Strauss waltz, this time "Tales From the Vienna Woods." Encores were frequently demanded and generously supplied, with an especially virtuoso performance of a transcription of "The Bee" by Schubert, originally for solo violin. The new works introduced by Mr. Fiedler appear destined to become valuable additions to an ever expanding repertoire, although possibly the "Festivo" was the least justified of the group. From the enthusiasm displayed by the capacity house last night, it would seem that "Pops" are off to another successful season. G. M. S.

'Gravity T

Who, Together with H
Symphony Hall Pops

Wiener an

Program of New First o

By Moses Smit

Certain features of concerts have in rece come to be expected a ly as that recurren ion itself. Among th nights," those that sted the services
Wiener and his group o ave attracted and hel
nd loyal public.
They opened a th engagement" at Symph st night under what to be uncomfortable istressing circumstan spite of the cruel we uditorium was subs lled, a large number red indoors principall ance numbers that ca
d of the Pops progra appened, there was d ard, because it was arm inside Symphony ight as it was on M etts and Huntington tside.
Mr. Wiener and his a ost of whom are evid pils, presented two n numbers last night.
em, "Spanish Suite," w g more than a series ore or less related e nticement" to music lla, and "Dream" and music of Turina. Th the episodes was a so ener, while in the o was the principal ensemble. The music
osen, was both unh
d suggestive. The d ns evolved by Mr. W h himself and his a re not precisely engr ginal. But they were with moods that th ght evoke; and this w y all that Mr. Wiener mpted to do here.
'Hollywood Div-o-rtiss
e second half of the ogram, was both mo

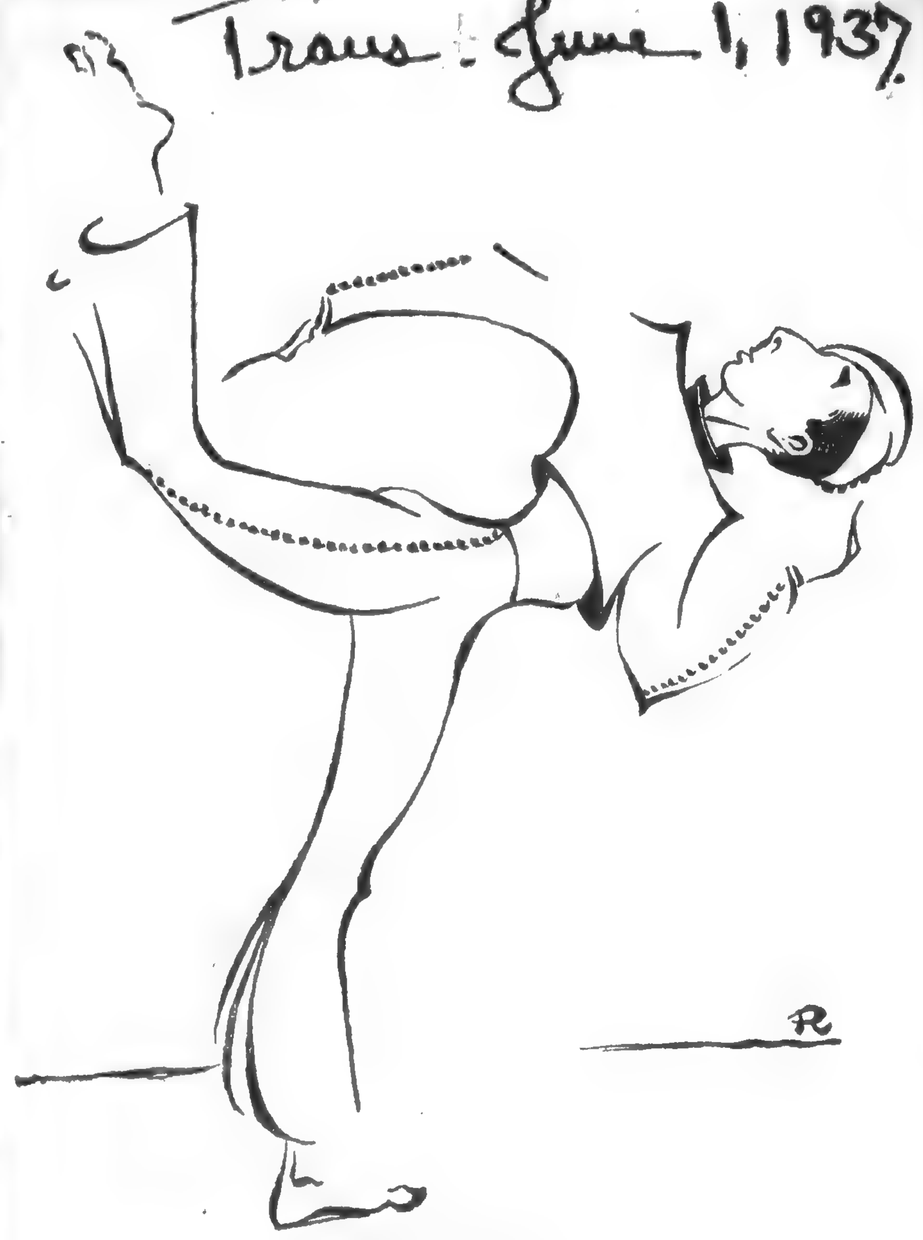
Gravity Temporarily Suspended

Trans: June 1, 1937



HANS WIENER

Who, Together with His Group of Dancers, Is to Be Seen at the Symphony Hall Pops Concerts Tonight and Tomorrow Evening

Wiener and His Group at Pops

Trans. June 1, 1937

Program of New Divertissements Presented on First of Three Appearances

By Moses Smith

Certain features of the Pops concerts have in recent years come to be expected almost as surely as that recurrent institution itself. Among the special "nights," those that have enlisted the services of Hans Wiener and his group of dancers have attracted and held a large and loyal public.

They opened a three-night "engagement" at Symphony Hall last night under what were likely to be uncomfortable and even distressing circumstances. But in spite of the cruel weather the auditorium was substantially filled, a large number obviously lured indoors principally by the dance numbers that came at the end of the Pops program. As it happened, there was double reward, because it was not so warm inside Symphony Hall last night as it was on Massachusetts and Huntington avenues outside.

Mr. Wiener and his associates, most of whom are evidently his pupils, presented two new, longish numbers last night. One of them, "Spanish Suite," was nothing more than a series of three more or less related episodes—"Enticement" to music by De Falla, and "Dream" and "Orgy" to music of Turina. The second of the episodes was a solo by Mr. Wiener, while in the other two he was the principal among an ensemble. The music, happily chosen, was both unhackneyed and suggestive. The dance-patterns evolved by Mr. Wiener for both himself and his associates were not precisely engrossing or original. But they were consistent with moods that the music might evoke; and this was probably all that Mr. Wiener had attempted to do here.

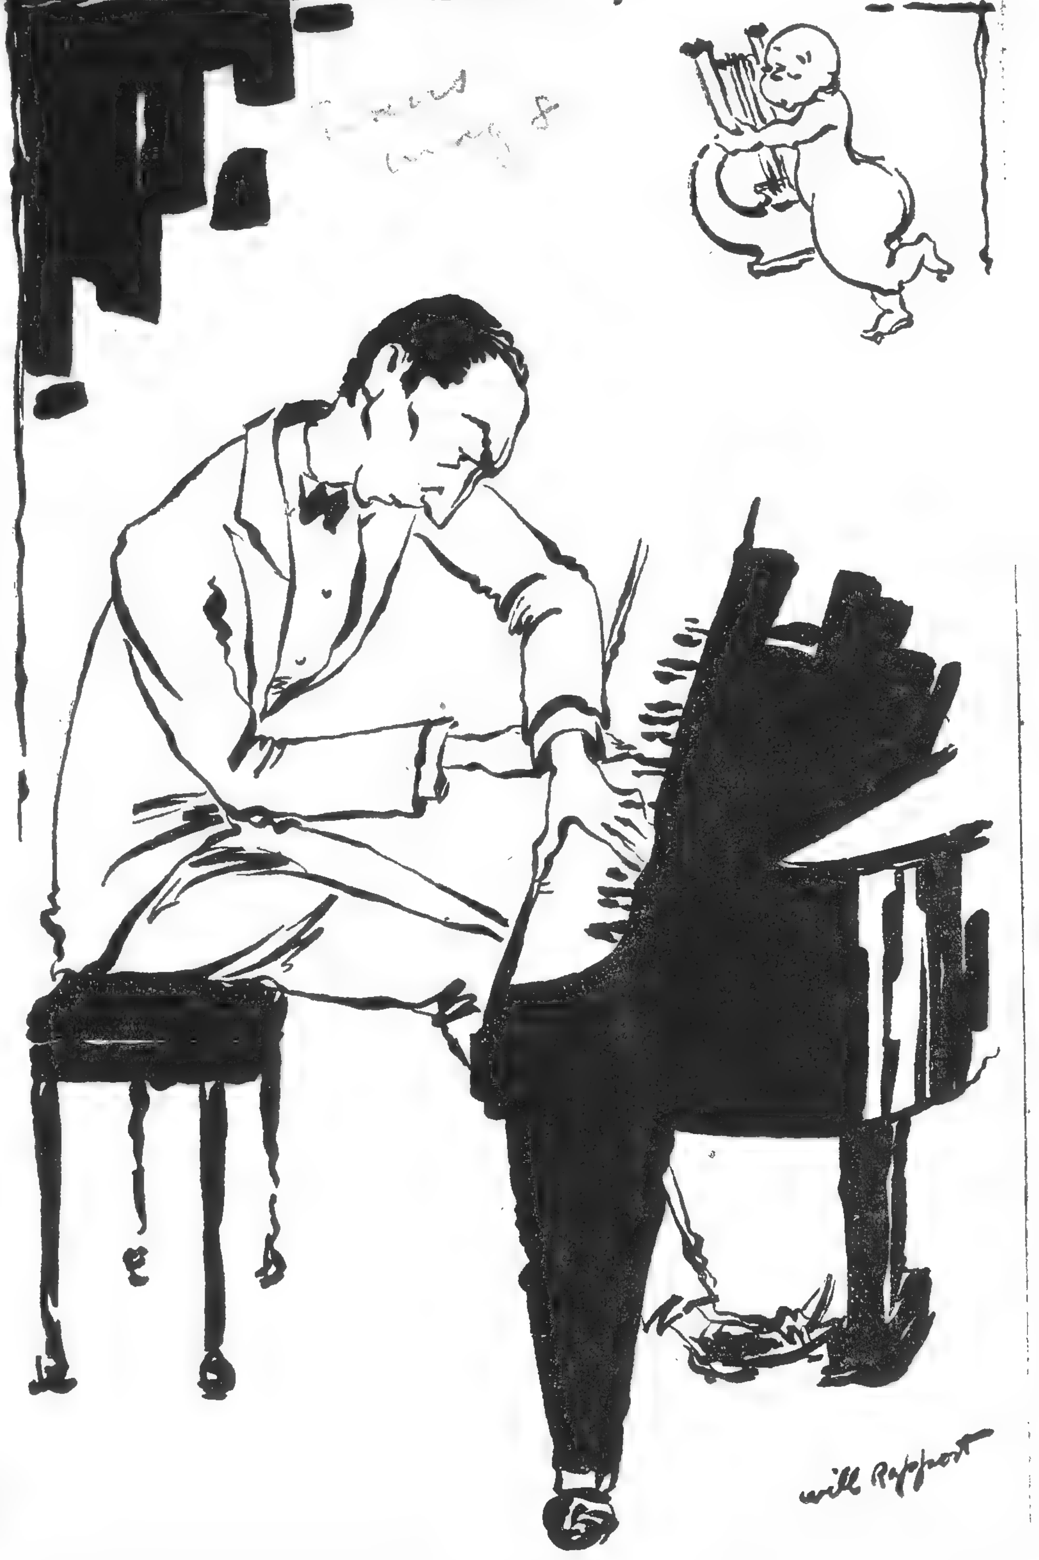
"Hollywood Div-o-rtissement," the second half of the Wiener program, was both more elaborate and entertaining. It set out to satirize a section of the amorous and marital career of a movie hero. "Section" would seem to be the right word, since within the supposedly brief time covered by the scenario the hero has married—successively—four women of varying occupations, temperaments and degrees of purity—the long-suffering wife, the cloak-an-suit girl, the vamp and the maid-servant who becomes a distinguished bathing beauty.

Along the way there are opportunities for poking fun at the wiles of the vamp, the irrepressibility of the ubiquitous camera man, the unreliability of the male star's affections, the savagery of autograph hunters and similarly typical elements of our current civilization. The satire is scarcely profound; but neither is the civilization! And the fun is reasonably good and reasonably clean.

It is the sort of thing that finds Wiener at his best. And if there is occasional, unintentional gaucherie on the part of the principal dancer and, more frequently, of the large corps of assisting dancers, varying in talent and skill, no great harm is done. Again Wiener found a score that suited his purpose, Jacques Ibert being responsible for the four-movement jazzy comment on Americana.

The musical accompaniment was in the expert hands of Arthur Fiedler and his Pops musicians, a fact that was sufficient to insure competent performand that actually resulted in spirited playing as well. Previously conductor and musicians had combined to present characteristic versions of a Sousa march, the Overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Glazounov's "Panaderos," a Czardas by Grossman, excerpts from "Carmen," Minuet by Bolzoni and the "William Tell" Overture. The audience applauded dancers and musicians most enthusiastically.

Soloist for Radcliffe Night at "Pops"



Trans May 8

Jesus San Roma, Who Will Play Weber's "Concertstuck" with Orchestra.

Radcliffe Night at the "Pops"

Two special features will be a part of the program for Radcliffe at the Pops on Tuesday night.

"Deep Forest" by Mabel Daniels, well-known alumna of the college is receiving a prominent place on the list of pieces chosen by Mr. Fiedler for that evening. The piece has been played recently at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and was heard in February at a concert of the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, D. C. Her "Pirates' Island" which was a feature of last year's Radcliffe Pops program has been used as a ballet by Ted Shawn and his male dancers, accompanied by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Both pieces were broadcast by the Great Lakes Symphony Orchestra at Cleveland last summer under the direction of Rudolph Ringwall.

Another feature will be the first Pops appearance of the season of Jesus Maria Sanroma who has chosen as his selection the Weber Konzertstuck for Piano and Orchestra.

Of particular interest to the Radcliffe audience will be the two "request" selections, based on replies sent in by former students of the college. Since this is the first time such a thing has been attempted at a Radcliffe Pops, much interest has been aroused in the outcome of the voting. Ravel's "Bolero" and the "Blue Danube" were chosen.

The rest of the program includes "Wedding March" from "Le Coq d'Oo"; Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; "The Swan of Tuonela"; "Peer Gynt" Suite; "On the Trail," and "Torch Dance" from the Suite "Henry VIII."

---

ews— May 7/37

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

Radio Night at the Symphony Hall Pops

The second evening of this season's "Pops" offered cheerful and somewhat novel entertainment to a good-sized festive audience. At it was the weekly "Radio Night," the orchestra played aginst a dramatically effective backdrop representing Mr. Rockefeller's R. C. A. building soaring in ominously shadowed crags of concrete into a murky sky, and the soothing resonance of a radio announcer's voice rumbled ever and anon from the platform, his comments rendered mercifully unintelligible by some kindly inadequacy in the amplifiers. Moreover, the concert was to benefit the Christopher Shop; and the balconies were draped in black and silver

In addition to the orchestra's (and Mr. Fiedler's) own excellently rendered contributions to the program, which included a suite from Rameau's "Dardanus,". Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, the Johann Strauss "Wine, Woman and Song" (echt-Wienerisch gespielt), and Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody," there were some interesting visitors.

Jacques Fray and Mario Braggiotti, lively and ingenious two pianists, are better known hereabouts through the radio than through appearances in the flesh. Last night's audience enjoyed seeing as well as hearing these pleasant young men in action. They played, with the orchestra, a "Spanish Rhapsody" of Mr. Braggiotti's own, in three short-linked movements—a not too original nor particularly inventive phantasia on the familiar florid Andalucian cadence by which we all, since De Falla, recognize "Spanish" music. Its rhythmic animation, harmonic color and tonal brilliance drew enthuiastic applause.

De Falla himself was represented by an arrangement of his Ritual Fire Dance from "L'Amor Brujo," and Mr. Braggiotti again, with some variations on "Yankee Doodle," in the styles of Bach, Beethoven, Chopin, Debussy and Gershwin. The tune they chose has unfortunately too much character to be easily transformed into Bach, Beethoven and Chopin, but Mr. Braggiotti did some amusing and perinent things with it—a little fugato ending in a fine pedal point, some fragmentary development à la Beethoven with echoes of the "Appassionata" et al., some nicely placed bits of Chopinesque decorative filigree.

The Gershwin parody, naturally enough, was excellent. But best of all, surprisingly, was the Debussy variation, which showed admirable comprehension of several of the great impressionist's tricks, beautifully imitated, and ending with that nostalgic ending of "Feux d'artifice," with Yankee Doodle substituted for the "Marseillaise." The players were generous with their encores, in response to rapturous and well-deserved applause.

There were some "creative interpretations of the dance" executed by Paul Draper. His curious blend of ballroom and tap dancing, applied almost without variation of style or mood, but with extraordinary pedal virtuosity, to a Handel suite, a Strauss waltz, a Malagueña by Lecuona, was scarcely a "creative interpretation" of anything. But despite its almost complete irrelevance to the music and its lack of variety, its nimbleness and grace pleased Mr. Draper's audience much; he was warmly applauded and encored.

S. S.

In the World of Music

First Symphony Pop Pleases Crowd and Startles Purists

Trans. May 6/37

By Redfern Mason

The men of the Boston Symphony enjoyed themselves last night. They played music that was carefree, piquant and beautiful, but did not impose too heavy a burden on their aesthetic consciences.

And the audience enjoyed the concert as much as did the men who made it. Many of the regulation Symphony goers were there; but they were supplemented by hundreds of music-lovers who like to take the art much as the Parisians take their petit verre.

They applauded Arthur Fiedler to the echo when he took up his baton and evoked the picturesque measures of the excerpt from Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada." Here no mental strain was involved; it was like meeting a lady who is witty and charming, but has nothing about her of the blue stocking. Folks were at their ease. If this was classical music, they were for it, a hundred per cent.

Then came the Oriental romanticism of Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala." Even folks who knew nothing about the old Hindu playwright, Kalidasa, enjoyed it. Indeed I fancy they got as much out of it as did those who have read the play.

After all the best way of understanding music is to love it. Erudition may reveal unsuspected points of interest in the score; but, if the music intoxicates you, all the wisdom of the pundits will not add a great deal to your happiness.

Every piece had a different evocation. The Bolzoni Minuet suggested Italian elegance; the Russian dances of Tsherepnin had a burly peasant exuberance; those Austrian dances arranged by Schonherr oozed geniality and good fellowship. That "Hog Dance," with its all too naturalistic grunting and its lapse into "Du, du liegst mir am Herzen" alternated between uproarious merriment and sentiment.

Mr. Fiedler played on many strings of sensibility. He gave us a Bolero by Sibelius, one of the rare compositions in which the singer of the mysterious North, turns to the warmth and gaiety of Spain. Then he stirred the audience to enthusiasm with the Marche slave, which, in spite of the reiteration of the Czarist hymn, in spite also of the ideas of Tschaikowsky, pictures the oncoming of an unconquerable multitude.

"Tales From the Vienna Woods," took us into the wonderworld of romance which is Johann Strauss, and if the audience had overturned the tables and begun to dance, it would not have surprised me a bit. And the joke on the highbrows is that these seductive strains are, in the true sense of the word, classical, though our critical exquisites would be loath to admit as much.

The "Ride of the Valkyries" was the concluding number and it went with a Wagnerian sweep that delighted even those who know not Wagner.

I have purposely left one of the most important features of the concert to the last. I allude to Mr. Fiedler's impish interpolations, which to some may have seemed unworthy of the dignity of the orchestral phalanx which he conducted. They would tolerate of course, "The Bee," played orchestrally, instead of as a solo for 'cello; they would nod assent to the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Octett, and Pierne's "Entrance of the Little Fauns," with its skirling of piccolos. But what did they think when they heard "Turkey in the Straw?" To my unregenerate self that old American tune might well have found itself into the "Pastoral" Symphony, if Beethoven had been lucky enough to know it. But the unpardonable sin, to many, must have been the playing of "I've Got You Under My Skin," the composition of Cole Porter and Bodge. Here, of course, is flat blasphemy against the divinities of the Symphony.

Yet is it? May it not be that these popular tune makers are striking an authentic American note which, a generation from now, may be hailed as the starting point of a music really belonging to these United States? In company with apparently all the rest of the audience, I enjoyed it hugely and hope that Messrs. Cole Porter and Bodge will write more of the same kind. This music and Kern's "The Way You Look Tonight" are a vast improvement on the quasi sonatas and symphonies which our learned writers compose after the European model.

But that is a matter for mature reflection. Meanwhile it is not to be forgotten that last night's concert was partly in aid of the Baldwinsville Hospital, the May School, and the Beacon Street Temple.

Tonight's concert will be given in aid of the Christopher Shop.

Sun. Globe May 2

The Pops Begin at Symphony Hall Wednesday Evening

Another month of May has arrived and with it another season of Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. The 52d year of this unique entertainment will begin Wednesday evening in the auditorium at Huntington and Massachusetts aves, which will be decorated in the cool green and bright gold of its familiar Summer decorations. The floor will be covered with tables, at which smoking and refreshments may be enjoyed.

Arthur Fiedler, whose seven seasons as conductor have brought greater popularity than ever before to the Pops, will again be in command. He will have an orchestra of about 90 Boston Symphony men. He has found new music which will be added to the favorite pieces of years gone by. The concerts will run through May and June, with Sunday Pops included during the present month.

The concert next Thursday night will not be open to the public, since it has been taken as a benefit for the Christopher Shop. Fray and Braggiotti, the pianists, and the dancer Paul Draper will then appear as guest artists.

The first Sunday program, May 9, will bring Heinrich Gebhard, the eminent Boston pianist, as soloist in the Grieg A minor Concerto.

The programs for the first week are as follows:

Wednesday, opening night. Cortege from "Mlada," Rimsky Korsakov; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Minuet (for string orchestra), Bolzoni; Russian Dances, A. Tcherepnin; Austrian Peasant Music, Schonherr; Festivo (tempo di bolero) from "Scenes Historiques," Sibelius; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky; "Tales "From the Vienna Woods," waltzes, Strauss; "The Way You Look Tonight," (orchestral paraphrase by L. Caillet), Kern; The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Friday. Marche Militaire, Schubert; "Fingal's Cave," overture, Mendelssohn; Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert; Persian Dance, Guiraud; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes, Strauss; Meditation from "Thais," solo violin, Julius Theodorowicz, Massenet; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; Victor Herbert Favorites, arr by Sanford; Deep River, arr by Jacchia; "Pomp and Circumstance," march, Elgar.

Saturday. Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser," Wagner; Suite, Corelli; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Finale from the Fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; A Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; Minuet from the Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Bolero, Ravel; "Maytime," selection, Romberg; "Roses from the South," waltzes, Strauss; Seventh Slavonic Dance, Dvorak.

Sunday. Polonaise Militaire, Chopin-Glazounov; Suite from "Dardanus" (Transcribed for orchestra by De Lamarter), Rameau; Valse Triste, Sibelius; Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; Second Suite from "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, soloist, Heinrich Gebhard, Grieg; Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," Wagner; Song of the Volga Bargemen, Arr. by Jacchia; Sailor's Dance from "Red Poppy," Gliere.

Music News and Comment

The Philadelphia Orchestra, now embarked upon a second annual coast-to-coast tour, will make but one appearance in Massachusetts—at Smith College, Northampton,

---

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Gl. May 2

The Boston Symphony Season

Every Spring brings Mayflowers, but it also brings the end of the Boston Symphony season. In truth, a melancholy time for those who would prefer to go on the year 'round listening to such remarkable fare as we are offered for 24 weeks by Dr Koussevitzky and the gentlemen of this premiere orchestra. But there is a certain compensation in looking back over the season past, and enjoying it in restrospect.

The season which ended at Symphony Hall last night with the mighty surge of Brahms' First Symphony, has again witnessed both orchestra and conductor at the height of their powers. Their prestige at home and elsewhere continues likewise. Generally speaking the programs have been distinguished for the most part by superlative performances of familiar music. The new scores, if considered in bulk, have not been such to dim the splendor of the three B's, the grace of Mozart and the exuberance of Haydn. But that was to be expected; according to the natural laws of this world, no one could hope to find even the majority of new scores of first quality.

Three occasions will stand in memory, because of glorious interpretations of three great scores—the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, the "Song of the Earth", by Mahler, and J. S. Bach's "The Passion According to St Matthew." In the case of Bach's masterpiece, Dr Koussevitzky, the orchestra and the choruses of Radcliffe girls and Harvard men have been repeating the service they did for the B minor Mass a few years ago. Which is to say, they are still in process of making it a popular favorite. As the Mass, after a number of seasons, gave joy to box office as well as audience, so, too, will the Passion, in all probability. There was better attendance at the Passion this Spring than a year ago, and commensurate increase may reasonably be looked for next season, if the work is then given.

Six scores were played for the first time in this country: The Symphony in D of Muzio Clementi (for whose ultimate survival in viable form we must thank Alfredo Casella; the Symphony proved to be engrossing work by a little known contemporary of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven, and it was well worth Dr Koussevitzky's repetition at the last concerts); Messaien's "The Forgotten Offerings"; Malipiero's Piano Concerto (which Mr Mitropoulos both played and conducted during his two weeks as guest conductor); the C minor Symphony by Yuri Shaporin; Roussel's likable "Flemish Rhapsody," and last and most important, the unique Violin Concerto by Alban Berg.

Berg's music was a challenge to listeners acclimated to more conventional types of music. Yet it seemed to bear the mark of inspiration and high talent. One fervently hopes it will be repeated here. Without exception, the other scores in this category were no more than skillfully contrived in varying degree. On Shaporin's Symphony let a veil of compassionate silence be lowered.

Of the three "first performances in Boston" the suite from Stravinsky's ballet "The Fairy's Kiss" was an amusing prank, but it was not unknown here since the composer himself conducted it in Cambridge in 1935. Nicolai Berezowsky's Third Symphony and the noisy Piano Toccata of Respighi (conducted and played by Mr Mitropoulos) will not easily be remembered. There was but one "world premiere," Werner Josten's Symphony in F, conducted by the composer. It came and vanished like an Autumn storm.

The list of soloists was impressive, though circumstances unfortunately prevented us from hearing the Russian pianist Rachmaninoff as soloist in what would have been the first local hearing of his Rhapsody.

Dimitri Mitropoulos made an amazingly forceful and favorable impression when he first conducted here as guest in the season of 1935-36. Last Winter he experienced even greater success, partly by virtue of his feats of conducting and playing the piano simultaneously. Of much more importance, however, were his other qualities that confirmed him a musician of the first order. His return is pleasurably anticipated.

So another chronicle in the history of the Boston Symphony is finished—but with a difference. When the Recording Angel seeks to balance the accounts a year hence, he will have to consider the forthcoming August festival in the Berkshires. Last Summer a beginning was made, this year what appears to be an important step forward will be taken by extending the number of concerts to six. The orchestra has been deeded an estate, plans are afoot for building an auditorium. There seems to be an unlimited artistic future for these festivals, once the physical details have been carried to a satisfactory solution.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Gardner Museum

FREE CONCERT at 2 this afternoon by Lucille Monaghan, pianist; Gertrude Ehrhart, soprano, and Leo Litwin, accompanist. The program:

Sonata in F major, Mozart; Phidylé, Duparc; La chanson de l'alouette, Lalo; Air de Leonora, from the Dramatic Symphony "Le Tasse," Godard; The Fountain of the Acqua Paola, Griffes; Nocturne in C sharp minor, Op 27, No. 1, Chopin; Mouvement, Debussy; Mayday Carol, Taylor; The Silver Cloud, Gebhard; Desire, Cowles.

Boston Conservatory

FREE CONCERT at 4 this afternoon by the orchestra and chorus of the Boston Conservatory, which is located at 26 The Fenway. The orchestra will be conducted by Jacobus Langendoen, the chorus by George C. Vich.

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

MAY 26 1937

Boston Symphony Boosts Concerts

Music Lovers Invited on Memorial Day

By INEZ M. EAMES

Music seems to appeal strongly to many people who seek relaxation after the observance of the reverent rites of Memorial Day. Perhaps this is due in some degree to the fact that in former years many towns and cities have offered a concert by its home-town band. This year the Boston Symphony has planned a special Memorial Day program to be given in the evening at the Pop Concert series at Symphony Hall. They are making this known to residents within a radius of a hundred miles inviting them to be present for at least one of the concerts of the best of its fifty-two seasons.

It is scarcely necessary to mention the effect of hearing one's favorite selections played by ninety-two master musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the brilliant direction of the dynamic young conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

There is to be one rare composition requiring four piano soloists, accompanied by 60 string instruments. This is the "Concerto for Four Pianos," by Bach. The soloists will be Heinrich Gebhard, Ethel Hutchinson, Selma Pelonsky and Paul Bregor.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

MAY 2[illegible]

BERKSHIRE CONCERTS ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced an important departure today from its schedule of other years. The Sunday concerts in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Kouseevitzky will be in the afternoon instead of the evening, thereby accommodating thousands of music lovers from New York, Boston and other large centers who wish to meet train schedules.

The concerts at beautiful "Tanglewood," permanent home of the Festival, the gift of Mrs. Gorham Brooks, will be given August 5, 7, and 8, August 12, 14 and 15. The hours of the concerts except for Sundays will be 8:30 P. M. The Sunday hours will be 4:30 P. M.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

[illegible] 1937

CONCERT TIME CHANGED

Requests of music lovers traveling to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts by train have prompted the management of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to have the concerts in the afternoon, instead of night as in th epast. The concerts will take place in August near Stockbridge, Mass.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

MAY 28 1937

Sunday Concerts To Be In Afternoon

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced an important departure from its schedule of other

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

ALBANY, GA.
DAILY HERALD

MAY 28 1937

FINLAND'S UNIVERSITY of Helsinki male chorus will make its first American tour next season appearing with the Boston Symphony orchestra. The chorus consists of fifty men and their programs will be devoted largely to Finnish music.

PT, FRIDAY, JUNE 4, 1937 Transcript

Herald, June 6

Musicians === News of the

Return of a Talented Violinist

Eva Stark Plays Wieniawski's "Souvenir of Moscow" with the Pops Orchestra

By Moses Smith

Eva Stark

Eva Stark, violinist, who left Boston a few years ago a mere slip of a girl, but already a talented violinist, appeared as soloist at last night's Pops concert in Symphony Hall, where it appeared that she is still not much more than a slip of a girl, but is now a performer of considerable poise, temperament, maturity and virtuosity.

The weather, which had served perhaps to keep the size of the audience down below the almost customary capacity dimensions, also operated to make more difficult the task of extracting a full, even, sensuous tone from a string instrument last night. It is also possible that Miss Stark was slightly afflicted with nervousness on the occasion of her re-debut in Boston, although there was no superficial evidence of such a condition.

This handicap (or handicaps) no doubt accounted for the mild uncertainty of intonation in the beginning of Miss Stark's playing of her solo piece, the good, old violinistic war-horse of Wieniawski, "Souvenir of Moscow." There were also occasional harmonics and tones high up on the fingerboard that failed to come off. But as Miss Stark proceeded — her eyes apparently glued on the conductor, Arthur Fiedler—uncertainty disappeared and artistry emerged.

In the Wieniawski work and even more in Bloch's "Nigun," which Miss Stark played as an extra number, it became evident that she regards her instrument not as a device with which to display technical and tonal facility and brilliance (all of which she possesses) but as another part of herself concerned with the problems of revealing beauty. There was a fine identification of the performer, violin and chosen music. In spite of her youth Miss Stark succeeded in reproducing the music vitally and intensely. Temperament was there, but so, too, was artistic control.

In the performance of "Nigun," with only the piano for accompaniment, these things were more consistently observable than in that of the "Souvenir" with orchestra. For even though there was an excellent accompaniment by the musicians under Mr. Fiedler, the necessarily scanty rehearsal very likely took some of the fire out of the young soloist.

An enthusiastic audience prevailed on Miss Stark to play a second encore, which sounded like a pert Kreisler transcription of an equally pert bit of Americana.

Mr. Fiedler had arranged an attractive program, beginning with the Wedding March of Mendelssohn, ending with the Bacchanale from Gounod's "Faust," and proceeding, in between, through Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, McBride's Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, "Vienna Blood" Waltzes of Strauss, the last movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, a string of excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," "Triana" of Albeniz, transcribed by Arbos, and Cole Porter's "Night and Day."

Hearing for the first time Mr. McBride's treatment of a racy bit of folk-lore, the present writer was almost as regretful of the missed opportunities as favorably impressed and amused by the numerous felicities of the score. The idea of combining musical learning with a theme of vulgar associations was of itself humorous. But Mr. McBride erred, it seemed, on the side of refinement. Here not subtlety was wanted, but broad strokes, laid on heavily.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 5 - 1937

SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL COMMITTEE MEETS

Pittsfield, June 4—With the Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra but two months away, the festival coordinating committee is busy planning to care for the thousands of persons expected for the two weekends in August. The committee met this afternoon at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge.

Located off a federal route with ample parking areas and means of entering and leaving these areas, music lovers will experience no traffic difficulties according to plans discussed at the meeting today.

At the meeting today were Sheriff J. Bruce McIntyre and Deputy Sheriff Fred Cummings of Pittsfield, in charge of parking; Lieut William V. Shimkus of the state police barracks in Northampton, in charge of traffic; Willard M. Sistare of Pittsfield, in charge of ushers; Joseph Franz of Stockbridge, in charge of the grounds; Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, festival treasurer; George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; Lester Roberts of Lenox, housing. George W. Edman of Pittsfield is general chairman.

There will be a meeting of the festival trustees with the first vice-president, Mrs Carlos M. deHeredia at Lenox. Tuesday and a meeting of community chairmen will be held the following week, with a luncheon at the Berkshire inn, Great Barrington.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

In the Worl

The fourth annual Berkshire Symphonic festival will take place from Aug. 5 to 15 on its new permanent site, "Tanglewood," a wooded, rolling 210 acre estate in the Berkshire hills between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. The festival is to consist of six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Each of three programs will be devoted to the works of a single composer, the masters thus represented being Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner. The three remaining programs are to be varied in nature, including music by Mozart, Schubert, Haydn. Tschaikowsky, Franck, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Sibelius.

"Tanglewood" was given to the Boston Symphony orchestra as a permanent home for its festival performances by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass. At one time Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in a cottage on this estate, and it was here that he wrote "Tanglewood Tales" and "The House of the Seven Gables."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JUN 1 - 1937

Berkshire Festival Concerts Changed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will depart from its schedule of others years, giving Sun-

---

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUN 1 - 1937

This Season's Festival Concerts To Be In Tent

Found Impossible to Have Permanent Music Shed Completed in Time But Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Said to Have Agreed to Play Again Under Canopy—Larger Canopy, With Seats for 5000, Will Probably be Erected This Year.

The six Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts are to be given again in a tent in August at Tanglewood, the Stockbridge estate donated by Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and her niece, Mrs. Gorham Brooks, to the Boston Symphony orchestra. It has been found impossible to have a permanent music shed completed in time for the festival this year, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, is said to have agreed to play again under the canopy. At the conclusion of last year's festival Dr. Koussevitzky was reported as having said he would not lead the musicians again under canvas.

While seats were provided in the marquee used last year for about 4000, it is understood a larger canopy with seats for 5000 will be used this year.

The Tanglewood site is on the lawn just north of the formal garden. Two large elm trees recently were removed and possibly some shrubbery and woodsheds will be eliminated. A new shell with improved acoustics is to be built near the northwest corner of the garden, toward which the lawn gently slopes. The permanent music shed probably will be located in a meadow to the left as one drives toward the house from the Lenox road, although this has not been decided. Tanglewood has been given such wide publicity that an average of a dozen cars a day are driven through the place and Supt. Ward J. Gaston has been forced to rope off part of the finely kept lawn.

The financial success of this year's festival already is practically assured, as more than 50 per cent of the budget of $10,000 has been subscribed with more than 100 boxes sold for the six concerts, which are to be given August 5, 7 and 8, 12, 14 and 15.

A new illustrated folder is being given wide publicity. It has a picture of Mahkeenac lake from the Tanglewood garden and another of the main walk through the garden together with a portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky. A new map replaces one in which the cartographer had the east terminus of the main road from Stockbridge to Tanglewood end at the lake and start again on the opposite shore, the assumption being that a ferry for motors would connect the two ends.. The lake itself also was completely turned around on the map. Otherwise it was said to be all right. Thousands of these circulars were thrown into the wastebasket, but thousands of others could not be recalled.

Executive Vice-President

Mrs. George W. Edman of 83 Dawes avenue, Pittsfield, has been elected executive vice-president of the festival organization and she has supervision of all the detailed work at the Stockbridge office. Mrs. Edman, a graduate of Smith college, is highly skilled in this kind of publicity. The Stockbridge office is receiving many letters daily. Mr. Edman is clerk of the corporation.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

JUN 4 - 1937

Boston Orchestra to Return; Patronesses Are Announced

Montclair is to have the privilege of having a return appearance next season, after an absence of seven years, of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Montclair High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, 1938, as an extra in connection with the Unity Concert Course series.

The Unity Concert Course Committee, made up of the following members, Mrs. Arthur S. Bailey, Mrs. Herbert G. Bell, Mrs. Louis A. Cerf, Carlton W. Cox, Mrs. Percival T. Gates, George T. Harris, Charles E. Holden, Samuel T. Jones, Miss Casandra Kinsman, John B. Pratt, Mrs. Edgar Stehli, Dr. M. Ernest Townsend, with Mrs. Edgar Swan Wiers as chairman, announced yesterday "that as the country is becoming more and more symphony-minded it is fitting that Montclair should have, in this field as in so many others, the best possible available."

The following persons have been asked to act as patronesses for the symphony concert:

Mrs. Thomas P. Alder, Mrs. Maxwell Barus, Mrs. Edgar A. Bates, Mrs. Hugh Black, Mrs. J. Stuart Brown, Mrs. C. Alexander Capron, Mrs. J. Graham Carswell, Mrs. Robert Christie, Mrs. Guy G. Clark, Mrs. Drury W. Cooper, Mrs. Allison Dodd, Mrs. Ernest G. Fifield, Mrs. P. Maxwell Foshay, Mrs. Herbert W. Foster, Mrs. Nathaniel Foster, Mrs. Phillip Goodell, Mrs. Robert Lyman Grant, Mrs. Richard T. Greene.

Mrs. Benjamin V. Harrison, Mrs. Leigh Harrison, Mrs. Frederick D. Herbert, Mrs. Alfred E. Hinrichs, Mrs. G. E. Huggins, Mrs. Adam Leroy Jones, Mrs. George Welwood Murray, Mrs. William E. Marcus, Mrs. Walter S. Marvin, Mrs. Andrew G. Osborne, Mrs. Frank R. Pentlarge, Mrs. Harold S. Sloan, Mrs. William E. Speers, Mrs. A. J. Steelman, Mrs. Joseph Van Vleck, Mrs. N. Conant Webb and Mrs. Percy Young.

Tickets should be reserved early at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770, 9-11 A. M.

Special Sale.

Twenty per cent off on all lamps and shades. Bogart & Hansen, Inc., 568 Bloomfield Avenue, Montclair.—Adv.

[73]

WORCESTER, MASS.
POST

MAY 26 1937

Boston Symphony Boosts Concerts

Music Lovers Invited on Memorial Day

By INEZ M. EAMES

Music seems to appeal strongly to many people who seek relaxation after the observance of the reverent rites of Memorial Day. Perhaps this is due in some degree to the fact that in former years many towns and cities have offered a concert by its hometown band. This year the Boston Symphony has planned a special Memorial Day program to be given in the evening at the Pop Concert series at Symphony Hall. They are making this known to residents within a radius of a hundred miles inviting them to be present for at least one of the concerts of the best of its fifty-two seasons.

It is scarcely necessary to mention the effect of hearing one's favorite selections played by ninety-two master musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the brilliant direction of the dynamic young conductor, Arthur Fiedler.

There is to be one rare composition requiring four piano soloists, accompanied by 60 string instruments. This is the "Concerto for Four Pianos," by Bach. The soloists will be Heinrich Gebhard, Ethel Hutchinson, Selma Pelonsky and Paul Bregor.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

MAY 28 1937

BERKSHIRE CONCERTS ON SUNDAY AFTERNOON

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced an important departure today from its schedule of other years. The Sunday concerts in August, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Kouseevitzky will be in the afternoon instead of the evening, thereby accommodating thousands of music lovers from New York, Boston and other large centers who wish to meet train schedules.

The concerts at beautiful "Tanglewood," permanent home of the Festival, the gift of Mrs. Gorham Brooks, will be given August 5, 7, and 8, August 12, 14 and 15. The hours of the concerts except for Sundays will be 8:30 P. M. The Sunday hours will be 4:30 P. M.

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

MAY 28 1937

CONCERT TIME CHANGED

Requests of music lovers traveling to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts by train have prompted the management of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to have the concerts in the afternoon, instead of night as in th epast. The concerts will take place in August near Stockbridge, Mass.

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER

MAY 28 1937

Sunday Concerts To Be In Afternoon

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival has announced an important departure from its schedule of other

---

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

ALBANY, GA.
DAILY HERALD

MAY 28 1937

FINLAND'S UNIVERSITY of Helsinski male chorus will make its first American tour next season appearing with the Boston Symphony orchestra. The chorus consists of fifty men and their programs will be devoted largely to Finnish music.

PT, FRIDAY, JUNE 4, 1937 Transcript

Musicians --- News of the

Return of a Talented Violinist

Eva Stark Plays Wieniawski's "Souvenir of Moscow" with the Pops Orchestra

By Moses Smith

Eva Stark

Eva Stark, violinist, who left Boston a few years ago a mere slip of a girl, but already a talented violinist, appeared as soloist at last night's Pops concert in Symphony Hall, where it appeared that she is still not much more than a slip of a girl, but is now a performer of considerable poise, temperament, maturity and virtuosity.

The weather, which had served perhaps to keep the size of the audience down below the almost customary capacity dimensions, also operated to make more difficult the task of extracting a full, even, sensuous tone from a string instrument last night. It is also possible that Miss Stark was slightly afflicted with nervousness on the occasion of her redebut in Boston, although there was no superficial evidence of such a condition.

This handicap (or handicaps) no doubt accounted for the mild uncertainty of intonation in the beginning of Miss Stark's playing of her solo piece, the good, old violinistic war-horse of Wieniawski, "Souvenir of Moscow." There were also occasional harmonics and tones high up on the fingerboard that failed to come off. But as Miss Stark proceeded — her eyes apparently glued on the conductor, Arthur Fiedler—uncertainty disappeared and artistry emerged.

In the Wieniawski work and even more in Bloch's "Nigun," which Miss Stark played as an extra number, it became evident that she regards her instrument not as a device with which to display technical and tonal facility and brilliance (all of which she possesses) but as another part of herself concerned with the problems of revealing beauty. There was a fine identification of the performer, violin and chosen music. In spite of her youth Miss Stark succeeded in reproducing the music vitally and intensely. Temperament was there, but so, too, was artistic control.

In the performance of "Nigun," with only the piano for accompaniment, these things were more consistently observable than in that of the "Souvenir" with orchestra. For even though there was an excellent accompaniment by the musicians under Mr. Fiedler, the necessarily scanty rehearsal very likely took some of the fire out of the young soloist.

An enthusiastic audience prevailed on Miss Stark to play a second encore, which sounded like a pert Kreisler transcription of an equally pert bit of Americana.

Mr. Fiedler had arranged an attractive program, beginning with the Wedding March of Mendelssohn, ending with the Bacchanale from Gounod's "Faust," and proceeding, in between, through Goldmark's "Sakuntala" Overture, McBride's Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, "Vienna Blood" Waltzes of Strauss, the last movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony, a string of excerpts from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," "Triana" of Albeniz, transcribed by Arbos, and Cole Porter's "Night and Day."

Hearing for the first time Mr. McBride's treatment of a racy bit of folk-lore, the present writer was almost as regretful of the missed opportunities as favorably impressed and amused by the numerous felicities of the score. The idea of combining musical learning with a theme of vulgar associations was of itself humorous. But Mr. McBride erred, it seemed, on the side of refinement. Here not subtlety was wanted, but broad strokes, laid on heavily.

Herald, June 6

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUN 5 - 1937

SYMPHONIC FESTIVAL COMMITTEE MEETS

Pittsfield, June 4—With the Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra but two months away, the festival coordinating committee is busy planning to care for the thousands of persons expected for the two weekends in August. The committee met this afternoon at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge.

Located off a federal route with ample parking areas and means of entering and leaving these areas, music lovers will experience no traffic difficulties according to plans discussed at the meeting today.

At the meeting today were Sheriff J. Bruce McIntyre and Deputy Sheriff Fred Cummings of Pittsfield, in charge of parking; Lieut William V. Shimkus of the state police barracks in Northampton, in charge of traffic; Willard M. Sistare of Pittsfield, in charge of ushers; Joseph Franz of Stockbridge, in charge of the grounds; Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, festival treasurer; George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; Lester Roberts of Lenox, housing. George W. Edman of Pittsfield is general chairman.

There will be a meeting of the festival trustees with the first vice-president, Mrs Carlos M. deHeredia at Lenox, Tuesday and a meeting of community chairmen will be held the following week, with a luncheon at the Berkshire inn, Great Barrington.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERICAN

JUN 1 - 1937

Berkshire Festival Concerts Changed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival will depart from its schedule of others years, giving Sun-

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

JUN 6 - 1937

In the Worl

The fourth annual Berkshire Symphonic festival will take place from Aug. 5 to 15 on its new permanent site, "Tanglewood," a wooded, rolling 210 acre estate in the Berkshire hills between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. The festival is to consist of six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Each of three programs will be devoted to the works of a single composer, the masters thus represented being Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner. The three remaining programs are to be varied in nature, including music by Mozart, Schubert, Haydn, Tschaikowsky, Franck, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Sibelius.

"Tanglewood" was given to the Boston Symphony orchestra as a permanent home for its festival performances by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass. At one time Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in a cottage on this estate, and it was here that he wrote "Tanglewood Tales" and "The House of the Seven Gables."

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUN 1 - 1937

This Season's Festival Concerts To Be In Tent

Found Impossible to Have Permanent Music Shed Completed in Time But Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, is Said to Have Agreed to Play Again Under Canopy—Larger Canopy, With Seats for 5000, Will Probably be Erected This Year.

The six Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts are to be given again in a tent in August at Tanglewood, the Stockbridge estate donated by Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan and her niece, Mrs. Gorham Brooks, to the Boston Symphony orchestra. It has been found impossible to have a permanent music shed completed in time for the festival this year, but Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, is said to have agreed to play again under the canopy. At the conclusion of last year's festival Dr. Koussevitzky was reported as having said he would not lead the musicians again under canvas.

While seats were provided in the marquee used last year for about 4000, it is understood a larger canopy with seats for 5000 will be used this year.

The Tanglewood site is on the lawn just north of the formal garden. Two large elm trees recently were removed and possibly some shrubbery and woodsheds will be eliminated. A new shell with improved acoustics is to be built near the northwest corner of the garden, toward which the lawn gently slopes. The permanent music shed probably will be located in a meadow to the left as one drives toward the house from the Lenox road, although this has not been decided. Tanglewood has been given such wide publicity that an average of a dozen cars a day are driven through the place and Supt. Ward J. Gaston has been forced to rope off part of the finely kept lawn.

The financial success of this year's festival already is practically assured, as more than 50 per cent of the budget of $10,000 has been subscribed with more than 100 boxes sold for the six concerts, which are to be given August 5, 7 and 8, 12, 14 and 15.

A new illustrated folder is being given wide publicity. It has a picture of Mahkeenac lake from the Tanglewood garden and another of the main walk through the garden together with a portrait of Dr. Koussevitzky. A new map replaces one in which the cartographer had the east terminus of the main road from Stockbridge to Tanglewood end at the lake and start again on the opposite shore, the assumption being that a ferry for motors would connect the two ends.. The lake itself also was completely turned around on the map. Otherwise it was said to be all right. Thousands of these circulars were thrown into the wastebasket, but thousands of others could not be recalled.

Executive Vice-President

Mrs. George W. Edman of 83 Dawes avenue, Pittsfield, has been elected executive vice-president of the festival organization and she has supervision of all the detailed work at the Stockbridge office. Mrs. Edman, a graduate of Smith college, is highly skilled in this kind of publicity. The Stockbridge office is receiving many letters daily. Mr. Edman is clerk of the corporation.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)

JUN 4 - 1937

Boston Orchestra to Return; Patronesses Are Announced

Montclair is to have the privilege of having a return appearance next season, after an absence of seven years, of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in Montclair High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, 1938, as an extra in connection with the Unity Concert Course series.

The Unity Concert Course Committee, made up of the following members, Mrs. Arthur S. Bailey, Mrs. Herbert G. Bell, Mrs. Louis A. Cerf, Carlton W. Cox, Mrs. Percival T. Gates, George T. Harris, Charles E. Holden, Samuel T. Jones, Miss Casandra Kinsman, John B. Pratt, Mrs. Edgar Stehli, Dr. M. Ernest Townsend, with Mrs. Edgar Swan Wiers as chairman, announced yesterday "that as the country is becoming more and more symphony-minded it is fitting that Montclair should have, in this field as in so many others, the best possible available."

The following persons have been asked to act as patronesses for the symphony concert:

Mrs. Thomas P. Alder, Mrs. Maxwell Barus, Mrs. Edgar A. Bates, Mrs. Hugh Black, Mrs. J. Stuart Brown, Mrs. C. Alexander Capron, Mrs. J. Graham Carswell, Mrs. Robert Christie, Mrs. Guy G. Clark, Mrs. Drury W. Cooper, Mrs. Allison Dodd, Mrs. Ernest G. Fifield, Mrs. P. Maxwell Foshay, Mrs. Herbert W. Foster, Mrs. Nathaniel Foster, Mrs. Phillip Goodell, Mrs. Robert Lyman Grant, Mrs. Richard T. Greene.

Mrs. Benjamin V. Harrison, Mrs. Leigh Harrison, Mrs. Frederick D. Herbert, Mrs. Alfred E. Hinrichs, Mrs. G. E. Huggins, Mrs. Adam Leroy Jones, Mrs. George Welwood Murray, Mrs. William E. Marcus, Mrs. Walter S. Marvin, Mrs. Andrew G. Osborne, Mrs. Frank R. Pentlarge, Mrs. Harold S. Sloan, Mrs. William E. Speers, Mrs. A. J. Steelman, Mrs. Joseph Van Vleck, Mrs. N. Conant Webb and Mrs. Percy Young.

Tickets should be reserved early at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street, telephone Montclair 2-6770, 9-11 A. M.

Special Sale.

Twenty per cent off on all lamps and shades. Bogart & Hansen, Inc. 568 Bloomfield Avenue, Montclair.—Adv.

H.

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

June 6

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

THIS EVENING in Symphony Hall, Arthur Fiedler will conduct the Pops Orchestra in the last Sunday program of the season.

The concert, which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund, is Annual Request Night and the program, as might be expected, differs but slightly from previous programs chosen after a like fashion.

Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, obviously contin[u]es to be one of the most popular diversions of Pops audiences

The list of favored selections also includes Sibelius' "Finlandia," and the same composer's "Valse Trieste"; Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes; "Largo" from Handel's "Xerxes"; the Finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, and the Old Dutch Hymn, "Prayer of Thanksgiving" (Valerius-Kremser).

Wagner is represented by the Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin" and of course Ravel's "Bolero" will be played.

* * *

MONDAY evening's program opens with Strauss' march, "Radetzky," and continues with "Morning, Noon and Night," overture by Suppe; "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," arranged by Pochon.

Puccini's "La Tosca," Fantasia, prize song from Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the Ballet of the Hours from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." Strauss' "Emperor Waltzes," and the Aragonaise from Massenet's "The Cid" will also be included.

On Tuesday evening Ruth Culbertson, pianist, will appear as soloist with the Pops Orchestra in a performance of Mozart's pianoforte concerto in B flat (K. No. 595.)

The program will also inlude Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" Suite, Brahms' Academic Festival Overture, Ravel's "Bolero," Dvorak's Seventh Slavonic Dance.

On Wednesday evening the Framingham State Teachers College Glee Club will appear with the Orchestra.

Brahms' Hungarian Dances, No. 5 and 6, Strauss Waltzes, Rossini's Overture to "William Tell" are also listed in this program.

Thursday evening is "Tufts Night" and is not open to the public.

* * *

ON FRIDAY evening Mendelssohn's Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Grainger's "Molly on the Shore," "Puccini's "Madame Butterfly" Fantasia, Ravel's "Bolero,' and Herbert's "American Fantasy" will be played.

Marjorie Church, pianist, will make her first appearance with the Pops Orchestra as soloist in Saint-Saens' Fifth Concerto in F major on Saturday evening.

There will also be songs by the New England Federation of Men's Glee Clubs.

Tchaikovsky's "Marche Solennello," Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Strauss' "Moto Perpetuo," Waldteufel's "The Skaters," Waltz, and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tumblers' Dance for Snowmaiden" are likewise to be included in this program.

Ruth Culbertson, pianist, who will be soloist at the Pops on Tuesday evening. She will play Mozart's Concerto in B flat.

Request Program To Be Given At Pops

Highlights of this week's programs at the Pops concerts at Symphony Hall will be the presentation of the request program at tonight's concert. Proceeds of the performance will benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Ruth Culbertson, pianist, will be the soloist Tuesday night and Marjorie Church will be the soloist Saturday night. With the exception of Thursday evening, which has been reserved by Tufts, all nights are open to the public.

The week's programs follow:

Sunday Evening, June 6
REQUEST PROGRAM
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin,"	Wagner
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem	Sibelius
Valse Triste	Sibelius
Finale, Fourth Symphony	Tchaikovsky
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes	Strauss
Largo from "Xerxes"	Handel
Bolero	Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue	Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma.
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango	Gade
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn	Valerius-Kremser
Monday Evening, June 7
March, "Radetzky"	Strauss
"Morning, Noon and Night," Overture	Suppe
"Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes"	Arranged by Pochon
"La Tosca," Fantasia	Puccini
Ballet Suite	Rameau-Mottl
Prize Song from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
Ballet of the Hours from "La Gioconda"	Ponchielli
"Emperor" Waltzes	Strauss
"Tambourin Chinois"	Kreisler
Aragonaise from "The Cid"	Massenet
Tuesday Evening, June 8
The Boston Normal School March	Mulrey
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"	Tchaikovsky
Aubade Printaniere	Lacombe
Academic Festival Overture	Brahms
Bolero	Ravel
Concerto for Pianoforte in B flat (K. No. 595)	Mozart
Soloist: Ruth Culbertson.
Selection, "The Fortune Teller"	Herbert
The Arkansas Traveler	Guion
Seventh Slavonic Dance	Dvorak
Wednesday Evening, June 9
"Pomp and Circumstance," March	Elgar
"In the Spring," Overture	Goldmark
Liebestraum	Liszt-Herbert
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes	Strauss
Hungarian Dances, No. 5 and No. 6	Brahms
Overture to "William Tell"	Rossini
Framingham State Teachers College Glee Club (with orchestra)
"Maytime," selection	Romberg
Mosquito Dance	White
Torch Dance from "Henry VIII"	German
Thursday Evening, June 10
TUFTS NIGHT
Friday Evening, June 11
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March	Sousa
Overture to "Fingal's Cave"	Mendelssohn
"Molly on the Shore"	Grainger
Fantasia, "Madame Butterfly"	Puccini
"In War Time," from the "Indian Suite"	MacDowell
Bolero-Ravel Valse Triste	Sibelius
"The Way You Look Tonight" (Symphonic paraphase by L. Cailliet)	Porter
"Turkey in the Straw"	Guion
American Fantasy	Herbert
Saturday Evening, June 12
Marche Solennelle	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Oberon"	Weber
Moto Perpetuo	Strauss
Austrian Peasant Music	Schonherr
Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in F major	Saint-Saens
Soloist: Marjorie Church
Songs by the New England Federation of Men's Glee Clubs
"The Skaters," Waltz	Waldteufel
Tumblers' Dance from "Snowmaiden	Rimsky-Korsakov

Transcript, June 7

Progress of the Pops

Ruth Culbertson Plays a Mozart Concerto with Mr. Fiedler's Orchestra

By Moses Smith

Ruth Culbertson, young Boston pianist who has been admired and applauded as soloist at the Pops concerts in recent seasons, was the recipient of similar acclaim last night, when she played the solo part of a Mozart Concerto in B-flat (K. 595) before an audience that filled Symphony Hall and recalled her numerous times after the end of her performances.

This Concerto, written late in Mozart's short life, was said never to have appeared on a formal concert program here previous to last night. But the advance notices from Symphony Hall carefully avoided such an outright statement. The caution would seem, in this instance, not to have been excessive. It is unlikely that a work of such charm—typically Mozartean charm — should have been entirely overlooked hereabouts. It is more likely that our admittedly inadequate concert records have been at fault.

The listener promptly recognized the first movement in last night's performance; and even a glance at the thematic excerpt of the Rondo in the recently re-published Koechal Catalogue was sufficient to establish familiarity with the principal subject, which appears half a dozen times or more during the course of the movement. All of which, of course, proves nothing in these days of radio and phonography, which have anticipated many a concert-hall "premiere."

Miss Culbertson provided an enjoyable rendering of the music, with the reservation that her presentation of the andante was a little mannered. In the fast movements her playing was neat, expressive and properly stylized, without overdoing the thing. The articulation was always clear without being brittle or abrupt. Nor was the element of bravura lacking, as happens so frequently nowadays, when musicians have a tendency to treat Mozart with excessive preciosity. The orchestral accompaniment under Mr. Fiedler was also well handled, save for a modicum of stiffness. And the novelty of revival (whichever it was) proved so pleasurable as to warrant a position in the regular symphonic repertory.

The program had other points of interest last night. There was the Brahms "Academic" Overture, especially timely in the season of Commencements, and welcome, besides, at any time. Hearing it last night, the listener was moved to describe the engaging piece as Brahms' doctoral thesis on student tunes.

There were also four movements from the enchanting "Nutcracker" Suite of Tchaikowsky. Only a tendency, on the part of Mr. Fiedler, slightly to hurry, marred an otherwise enjoyable performance. And there was the ubiquitous "Bolero" of Ravel, the principal stimulus of which, for the present writer, was to wonderment: How does the work, after innumerable repetitions, continue to excite audiences, as it did, of course, last night's company?

The rest of the numbers came from Mulrey, Lacombe, Herbert, Guion and Dvorak. The audience consisted mostly of members and friends of the Boston Teachers' Club, the Massachusetts Federated Music Clubs and the Field and Forest Club.

MUSIC

THE POPS

RUTH CULBERTSON

Ruth Culbertson, pianist, was the soloist at the Pop concert last night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler conducted; and the concert was described as 'Boston Teachers' Club Night," in which various groups took most of the tables on the floor. Miss Culbertson was the soloist in Mozart's piano concerto in B flat major (K. 595), which has been rarely, if ever, heard in Boston. The rest of the program consisted of Ravel's "Bolero," Brahm's Academic Festival Overture and other familiar pieces.

Mozart's concertos are disarmingly simple. They should be studied with a careful eye to their form, for they embody the true principles of the classical concerto. Anyone interested in such an analysis is advised to have a look at Sir Donald Tovey's third volume of essays, where he will be enlightened as to some highly important structural differences in the vast quantity of works which are lumped together under the term, "concerto." In point of fact the classical concerto was one of Mozart's great contributions to music, and in public performance these have been outrageously neglected. It was interesting, then, that this pure and very beautiful concerto in B flat should have been brought forward.

It would have been wiser if a little more attention had been lavished upon it, if its simplicity had not been taken too much for granted. Miss Culbertson, in short, did not seem to grasp the full nature of the work that, as a capable pianist in her own right, she should have brought to its interpretation. The first movement, which is the essence of the form, was played competently; the second was sentimentally distorted; the finale was beaten out with scant regard for the delicacy of its humor. In the last instance the omission of the cadenza would have helped but would still not have offset the ill-calculated vigor of the soloists's approach.

It may be argued that the character of the Pops demands a certain coarseness of attack at the beginning of each movement in order to gain the attention of the crowd. That much we readily grant to Miss Culbertson and Mr. Fiedler. Having gained that attention—as they did—we have a right to expect the best in performance. Miss Culbertson is too good a pianist to permit herself those exaggerations in the slow movement and the brusqueness of attack in the finale. After all the theme of the rondo is of the utmost simplicity and needs no extra emphasis. There is some reason for criticism of too casual a performance in a Pop concert, since so special a work as a Mozart concerto merits more than the usual attention from every point of view.

A. W. W.

---

evening division.

G

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Sunday Pops

Last night the Pops orchestra gave its Pension Fund concert, with a program of request numbers. The audience which filled Symphony Hall heartily appreciated its chosen favorites, which included works of Wagner, Sibelius, Handel and Strauss.

Mr Fiedler and the Pops orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, played Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" with sophisticated syncopation. Mr Sanroma's performance had all of its usual brilliance and finesse, and the orchestra, under Mr Fiedler's direction, performed with superb eloquence.

Another familiar work, Ravel's "Bolero," seemed to have more hypnotic power with a suggestion of the Far East, than ever before.

The "Finale" from Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony also was given a most satisfactory reading.

As usual, Mr Fiedler was generous with encores, playing Brahm's "Cradle Song," "Flight of the Bumble Bee," by Rimsky-Korsakov, and Paul White's "Mosquito Dance."

This marked the last Sunday concert of the season.

A LAST MOZART PLAYED AT POPS

Ruth Culbertson Gives Her 25th Concert in B-Flat

Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A note of distinction was lent the Pop concert of last evening through what available records disclosed as the first performance in Boston of a pianoforte concerto of Mozart. The soloist was Ruth Culbertson, well known here through her appearances in recitals and at the Pops of previous seasons. The concerto, in B-flat major, was the 25th and last which Mozart wrote for solo piano and orchestra, and was composed in 1791—the last year of his life.

When a piece by an established composer is played for the first time it is a familiar assertion that the reason for its neglect was the best one of all. To this general rule the concerto of last evening offers no pronounced exception. Save for the soundness and finish of the workmanship a certain seriousness in the first and second movements and a much more engaging Rondo with a recurring "Don Giovanni" reminiscence, this concerto might almost be dismissed as "more Mozart." Those of its predecessors which are currently played have more memorable musical ideas, and that in the long run is the thing which matters most.

It was interesting to note however the sudden awakening on the part of the members of Mr. Fiedler's orchestra when this concerto appeared. Before, whether in Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite, Brahms' "Academic Overture," or Ravel's "Bolero," how[illegible] [illegible] played these numbers, the [illegible] performed them, as it were, with one hand tied behind their respective backs. To her part in the performance Miss Culbertson brought the [illegible] perhaps the added zeal of the discoverer, and in the matter of style she proved herself to be a Mozart interpreter to the manner born. The audience received her with the enthusiasm which was her due.

COURIER

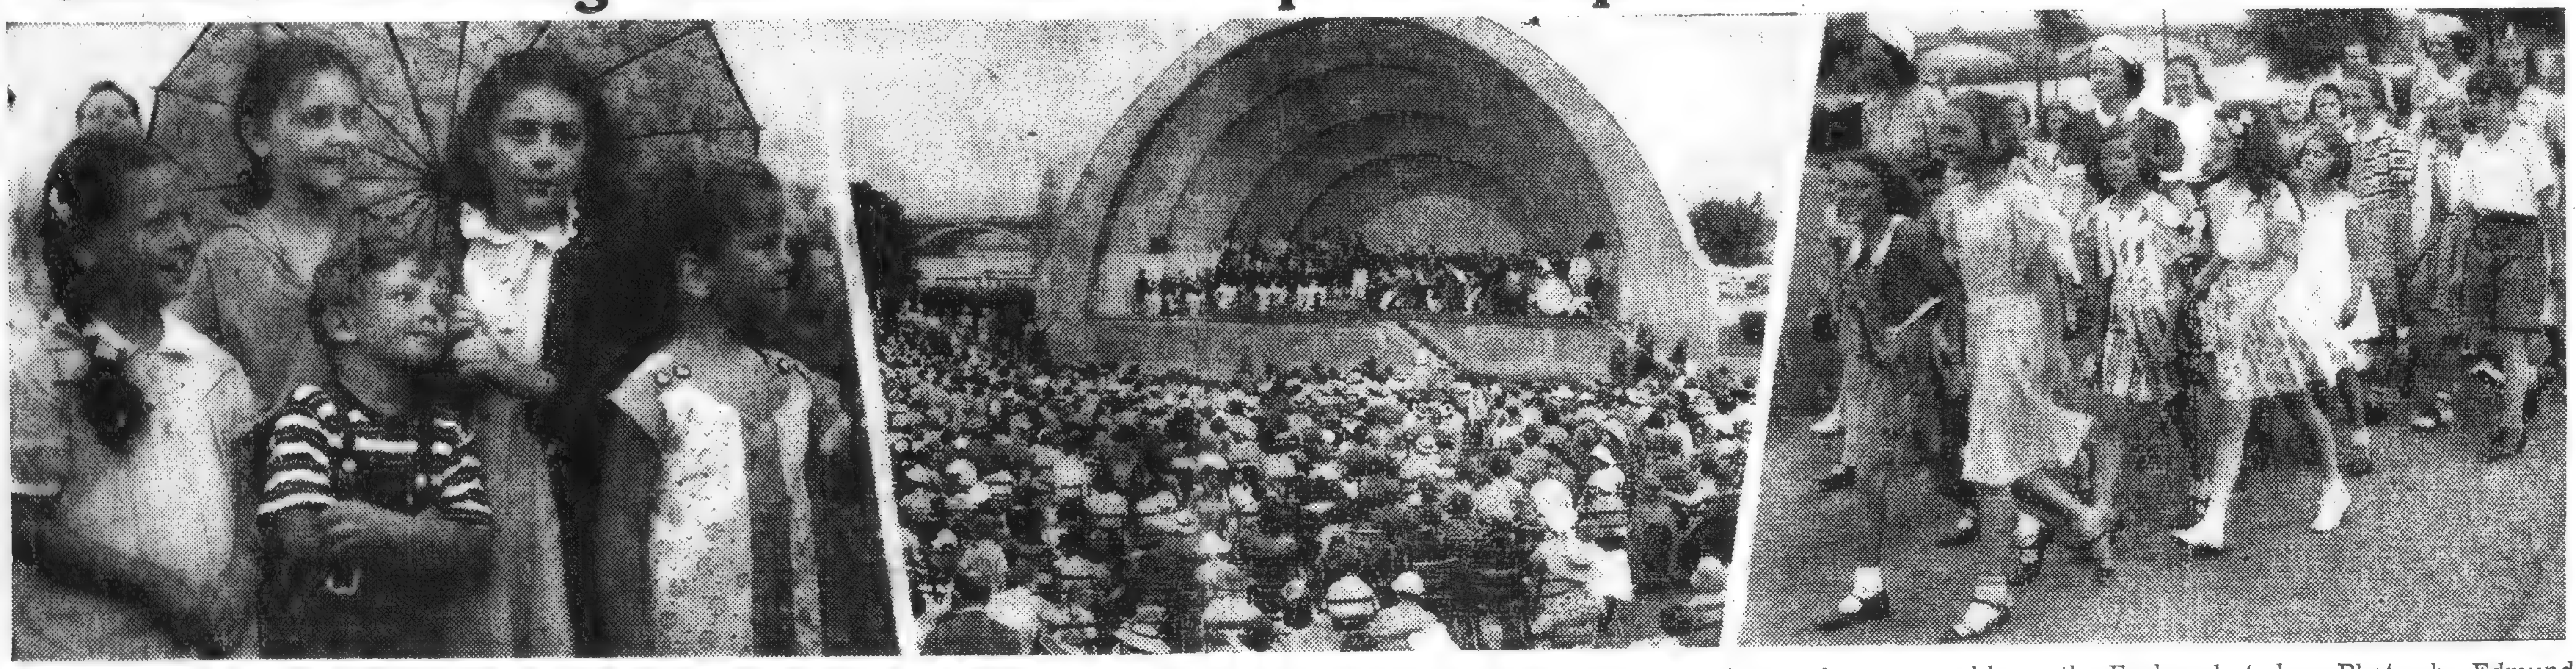
JUN 10 1937

Planting Gardens at "Tanglewood."

The Berkshire Garden Center, a community enterprise, opened in Stockbridge in 1935 by members of the Lenox Garden club, with the cooperation of the Lenox Horticultural society, the garden clubs of Richmond, Great Barrington, Pittsfield and Richmond Valley, is helping with the planting of annuals and their supervision at "Tanglewood," where the Berkshire Symphonic Festival concerts will be presented August 5, 7, 8, 12, 14, and 15.

Annuals that will bloom the first two weeks in August are being planted as fillers in the formal borders, under the supervision of A. Kenneth Simpson, horticultural director of the Garden Center. The initial labor of preparation is being carried out by students of the vocational agriculture classes in the vocational agriculture classes in the Stockbridge High school, under John Burrington. For this work the students receive credits. These formal gardens will be used as an open air foyer during the summer concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Children Braving Rain to Attend Special Esplanade Concert For Them



More than 2000 children, guests of the Boston Park Department, enjoyed the first children's program rendered by Arthur Fiedler's symphony ensemble on the Esplanade today. Photos by Edmunds E. Bond show the great crowd and groups of appreciative youngsters.

CHILDREN'S CONCERT ON THE ESPLANADE

Rain Interrupts First Lesson For Boston's Youngest Musical Generation

Boston's youngest musical generation began its education at the Esplanade shell today when Arthur Fiedler entertained more than 2000 children of all ages, races and creeds at their first outdoor concert. A sudden rainstorm which forced curtailment of the program was the only reason for dampening the juvenile enthusiasm.

The children came from all parts of the city with parents, aunts, teachers and even fathers. They showed varying degrees of interest in the music.

The average age was between 3 and 10. The typical listener was one of the 1500 children from the city playgrounds who had answered the invitation of Arthur L. Gould, superintendent of Boston schools, Nathaniel J. Young, director of playgrounds, and Julia A. Murphy, superintendent in charge of Boston playgrounds.

Youngest Listener, 14 Months

Both Mr. Gould and Mr. Young attended the concert in person, together with the four supervisors of playground districts, Elizabeth S. Devlin, Louise J. Chambers, Marian Gilman, Mary Matthes and Catherine Day.

One of the youngest listeners was little Carol Hazel Baizley, 14 months old, of Pinckney st. Little Miss Baizley devoted her attention to amusing the spectators by dropping and retrieving her crumpled program.

Probably the most musical listeners present were the twin children of Albert Bernard, who plays first viola in the orchestra. Young M. Francois and Mlle. Michelle, aged 3½ years, sat in the front row with their mother to watch their father play.

Besides the school children and those who came from outlying districts with mothers and friends there were about 500 from various settlement houses and community centers throughout the city, among them the Elizabeth Peabody House, the Lincoln House, West End Community House, the East Boston Center and Robert Gould Shaw House.

Size of Crowd Disappointing

The front rows paid close attention to the gay music and Mr. Fiedler's comments. The outskirts of the crowd were a little restive. Puerile energy was released in games of tag and constant complaints to teachers, such as "I'm getting tired of this music" or "Do you think this music is nice?"

Still the applause was generous and interspersed with enthusiastic whistles from the boys. Mr. Fiedler, who was disappointed by the size of the crowd at first, consoled his orchestra with the thought that "It's a start any way."

The crying of a little curly-haired girl who answered to the name of Jenny but refused to talk to anyone but her own sister nearly forced a postponement of the opening selection until the child was rescued.

Rain Ends Program

Then Mr. Fiedler stepped to the platform to lead the orchestra in the familiar march "Pomp and Circumstance" by Sir Edward Elgar. There followed the first movement of the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, because, as Mr. Fiedler said, "Four movements are a little long on a warm morning."

An encore, "Turkish March" by Beethoven, Mozart's "The Sleigh Ride," two exerpts from the suite "Peer Gynt" by Grieg, Handel's Largo from "Xerxes" and "Two Miniatures" by White were the selections which Mr. Fiedler could complete before the rain storm.

The hardy stood courageously in their places and helpfully tapped their feet as Mr. Fiedler led the orchestra in the spirited march "The Stars and Stripes Forever" and conducted the singing of "The Star Spangled Banner." Others fled to automobiles and the subway.

Braving the elements of nature is nothing to Mr. Fiedler. He has been dodging rain ever since the Esplanade season opened. At the close of the concert he announced his intention of having concerts on Wednesday, July 20 and July 27, both at 10 o'clock.

The Boston Globe
Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY Boston, Mass.
242 Washington St. (Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct 14, 1877.)

TUESDAY, JUNE 8, 1937

RADIO-EAT-ORCHESTRA

Each time the spade of the archaeologist turns up some fragment of ancient sculpture carved with a subtlety which no modern artist could equal without four centuries of a continuous artistic development to help him, comes the thought like a shadow: "Yes, and will a day come when fragments of our symphonic phonograph records—pieces as big as a wedge of pie—will be treasured as jealously as specimens of a lost art, with learned scholars making guesses at who the composer might have been?"

The barbarians, as Macaulay predicted, are in our midst, and their name is machinery. There is little question but that democracy is on its way. The question is, rather, whether it is to be achieved at a high level or at a low level, and to no one is that question of greater moment than to the multitude who stand to be the beneficiaries of the high level. The spinning jenny, invented in 1767, put this question to the integrity of hand craftsmanship, and now a blight similar to that which the moving picture machine spread over the spoken drama seems to threaten the concert stage from competition by radio.

If there is a city in North America able to support a resident symphony orchestra, it ought to be New York. Yet the announcement that Signor Toscanini, one of its former conductors and now the most eminent of living orchestral leaders, is engaged to give a series of orchestral concerts next season over the radio is heard by the sponsors of the New York Philharmonic with outspoken dismay. They evidently think it might be the mace-blow to their orchestra.

Managements of other orchestras are frank to say that they do not yet know for certain whether broadcasting their concerts helps them or hinders. The Metropolitan Opera House in New York believes that broadcasts have helped their box office business, but concert artists are equally sure that radio has hurt theirs. These are private problems. The public one is more grave. It is whether mechanized transmission of an art-form may kill the living art at its roots. Suppose we did establish a great broadcasting orchestra which played at given intervals weekly none but the finest music, lucidly expounded beforehand by able lecturers. At first this would seem to be a great advance. More tardily it would be noticed that the one big tree sucked all the nourishment from the roots of the lesser ones; next, that for the maintenance of an art in a living and growing condition you need many orchestras, just as you need many repertory theatres and concert halls, for the training of performers and as experiment stations for composers. Thousands of amateur musicians and the court and theatre orchestras of petty princelings were the garden in whose soil the splendid flowers of modern symphonic music were four centuries growing in Europe, but mainly in Germany.

Thus the blight of mechanization now begins to cast its shadow over the supreme art of the modern world, that one art in which our age surpasses every other age in history—the orchestral symphony. Such blights can work fast. It is conceivable that people now living might survive to look back at this time with regret, remembering that in 1937 it was still possible to go and hear in person a resident orchestra play weekly a huge and various repertory of the classics from centuries of musical literature. In Anatole France's "Thais," a novel set in the second century, A D, one of the Alexandrians laments that stage shows have degenerated into pantomimic spectacles, but that he can remember when the tragedies of the Attic poets were acted in the theatres.

Portrait painting was not killed by the camera, and after years of temporary ted in coun-school halls

an art as inborn as mimicry, and song is as spontaneous as speech. No machine can kill them. But good husbandry might prevent machines from stunting their growth. That art best flourishes when the most people practice it, amateurs as well as professionals.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

A Goodly Company

N.Y. Her. Trib. June 9

By Royal Cortissoz

WILLIAM J. HENDERSON—Billy, as his intimates were wont to call him—is the last to go of a musical group with which I had peculiarly warm ties. The others were Dick Aldrich, who died in Rome only the other day, and Jimmie Huneker and "Papa" Krehbiel. If I think of them individually with affection I think of them also as a memorable quartet, the comrades of other years. It was an intense pleasure to forgather with them anywhere, but as I look back I recall especially meetings in the press room at the Metropolitan Opera House. It was a unique sanctum. Much hard work was done there, but there seemed always to be time for a certain amount of talk. Krehbiel was the Jovian leader of the four, exacting in his judgments, very searching in analysis and possessed of an astounding memory. Once when I had the honor of meeting Paderewski he asked me to name the most tenacious of memories. "The musical memory," I replied. "Oh, no," said the great man. "It is the memory of taste. I remember the flavor of some cherries that I ate when I was seven."

* * *

Nevertheless the musical memory takes hold and Krehbiel had it in a high degree, remembering not only the music but this or that performance of it. Jovian and learned though he was, he had great geniality besides. We went together to the first performance of "Parsifal" here and I can remember how he enlightened me as it went on. I remember likewise how in the intermission we adjourned to Browne's chop house across the way and tinctured philosophy with beer, history with gayety. They were a merry crew, my beloved Four. Jimmie was the chartered wit. Only he could have invented the telegram he sent to his uncle, Archbishop Gibbons, from whom he derived his second name, when that dignitary was elevated to the Cardinalate: "Dear Uncle. Where did you get that hat? Affectionately, Jimmie."

They knew how to laugh, the Four. To this day I can hear their shouts at a dinner given at Lüchow's by the critical fraternity in honor of Felix Mottl. He described for us, waving an invisible baton, the behavior of Hans von Bülow conducting some "snide" opera, like "Zampa," with a listlessness that bordered on somnolence. Suddenly there was a whisper from one of the friends in a nearby box: "Bülow! After the opera. At the Golden Cross. Beer!" Up and down went the baton in a frenzy and "Zampa" was carried to a race-horse finish. Lüchow's echoed with the delight of the diners, "Papa" Krehbiel beaming upon them and upon Mottl.

* * *

But I go back to the press room, where even the irrepressible Jimmie would presently yield to the predominant air of studious calm. It had an edifying atmosphere. They all had scholarship and enthusiasm, and, praise be, they all served a noble art with beautiful devotion. They knew nothing about routine. Their work was, instead, a continuous adventure, a continuous probing for the secret of great things. I remember feeling their sense of justice, their desire to get at the truth. Krehbiel, for example, would rejoice in the artistry of Toscanini, but he would wonder if the maestro could penetrate to the essentially Germanic core of "Die Meistersinger." Huneker, with his incomparable flair, his extraordinarily sensitive impressionism, was always in pursuit of the last, subtlest, most elusive nuance. It was so with the others. The Four were dedicated men.

Billy Henderson had, besides this spiritual fervor, a matchless poise. He was, among other things, incarnate common sense. In criticism of the art of singing he had a place apart. "The Voice," he would begin, as a writer or as a talker, and then would follow an exquisite dissection of the particular voice in question—and the wise or unwise use made of it. He was a connoisseur of vocalism if ever there was one and what was fascinating about his exposition of the subject was his avoidance of esoteric, too technical expedients and the simple, limpid manner in which he drove his point home. And what voices he had heard, what an epoch he had traversed! I can remember in my boyhood the reverberations of the Italian regime, with Italo Campanini singing Lohengrin. Then came the Germans under Leopold Damrosch and in due course the first American performance of "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," under Anton Seidl. Lehmann and Niemann were in their latish period but still puissant. The Isolde of the former remains a glorious landmark. Followed such voices as Nordica, Fremstad, Ternina, Farrar, Eames, Sembrich, Calvé, the De Reszkes, Caruso and so on, until we come to the superb Flagstad of today. Henderson weighed them all in a magic scale. None was too great to receive admonition from him when occasion invited it. He had an uncanny gift for the precise evaluation of a voice and for the detection of the slightest departure from an ideal standard.

Yes, they had a lofty standard, the Four, and that is one reason why I have ventured to sit down and commune with them in a fragmentary way. I wonder if it is widely enough realized how momentous was the service they rendered to their contemporaries, writing not just favorable or unfavorable "notices," but reviews that went to the heart of the matter, clarifying and illuminating it. They knew—Krehbiel and Henderson, Huneker and Aldrich, and what they knew they passed on to a host of readers to stabilize judgment and purify taste. They knew and they were open-minded, as keenly aware of new music as they were reverent toward the old. The singers and the orchestra gave the audience unbounded joy. The next day many a member of that audience was enriched by the Four with fuller knowledge of what had been received the night before. The Four were guardians of a kind of sacred trust. They never failed it. Don't think of them as the writers of fugitive articles in the newspaper, here today and gone tomorrow. They were among the master builders of a musical public.

* * *

I have visualized them in the press room at the opera, but heaven knows there were other places made memorable by great performances. Rafael Joseffy would play the E flat major concerto in such wise that the house rustled with an excitement that could hardly wait for the moment permitting applause. Hans von Bülow would all play the sonatas of Beethoven at a Broadway theater. At a session of the short-lived Wagner Society Seidl would sit at the piano and play the music of the Rhine daughters, while Lehmann and Brandt and Seidl-Krauss sang it—and later "Papa" Krehbiel would talk to us about Wagner. Down in old Steinway Hall Arthur Nikisch would conduct the Boston Orchestra and do things anticipating the splendors of Toscanini. Jimmie Huneker, writing to me about the difficulties confronting an ambitious voice in New York, once designated the city as "this hell's kitchen of music." But he and the rest of the Four found it, on the whole, a celestial domain. Right valiantly they ministered to a celestial Muse, carrying on the cause which their successors now serve. I loved them, "Papa" Krehbiel, Jimmie Huneker, Dick Aldrich and Billy Henderson. It is with grateful remembrance that I call up their shining names.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION June 10

Berkshire Festival Will Attract Many Prominent Men and Women in August

Norman H. Davis, America's ambassador at large; Miss Mabel Choate daughter of Joseph H. Choate, late ambassador to Great Britain; Ernest B. Dane, treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Edward Taft, trustee of the orchestra; Albert Spalding, America's eminent violinist and Mrs. Alta Rockefeller Prentice of Williamstown and New York are but a few of the many patrons for the fourth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be held in August. Only a limited number of boxes remain, according to the acting president, Mrs. Carlos M. de Heredia, of Lenox and New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will play six concerts, Aaug. 5, 7, and 8; Aug. 12, 14 and 15, at beautiful "Tanglewood," 210 acre estate between Lenox and Stockbridge presented as a permanent home for the festival, by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline.

"The thousands we expect for the concerts will be representative of all kinds of people in this country and Canada," said Mrs. de Heredia, whose lovely summer home is not far from "Tanglewood." "We have but a limited number of boxes remaining and hope that music lovers wishing to make reservations will do so at once to avoid disappointment."

RT
OPS
s Her Flat

MITH
the Pop gh what the first pianoforte oist was wn here itals and
ns. The the 25th for solo composed ife.
hed com-ime it is eason for f all. To o of last exception.
finish of riousness nents and o with a iniscence, dismissed its pred-y played al ideas, the thing

however, e part of orchestra
Before, utcracker" rture," or ell played performed hand tied To her s Culberttinct plus verer, and roved her-ter to the received h was her nglewood."

Center, a opened in members of ith the coorticultural Richmond sfield and g with the heir super-where the stival con-
ugust 5, 7,

n the first are being ormal borision of A. ultural dinter. The n is being f the vocas in the ses in the under John work the These for-as an open mmer conmphony or-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

The Boston Globe
Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY Boston, Mass.
242 Washington St. (Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issued March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 1877.)
TUESDAY, JUNE 8, 1937

RADIO-EAT-ORCHESTRA

Each time the spade of the archaeologist turns up some fragment of ancient sculpture carved with a subtlety which no modern artist could equal without four centuries of a continuous artistic development to help him, comes the thought like a shadow: "Yes, and will a day come when fragments of our symphonic phonograph records—pieces as big as a wedge of pie—will be treasured as jealously as specimens of a lost art, with learned scholars making guesses at who the composer might have been?"

The barbarians, as Macaulay predicted, are in our midst, and their name is machinery. There is little question but that democracy is on its way. The question is, rather, whether it is to be achieved at a high level or at a low level, and to no one is that question of greater moment than to the multitude who stand to be the beneficiaries of the high level. The spinning jenny, invented in 1767, put this question to the integrity of hand craftsmanship, and now a blight similar to that which the moving picture machine spread over the spoken drama seems to threaten the concert stage from competition by radio.

If there is a city in North America able to support a resident symphony orchestra, it ought to be New York. Yet the announcement that Signor Toscanini, one of its former conductors and now the most eminent of living orchestral leaders, is engaged to give a series of orchestral concerts next season over the radio is heard by the sponsors of the New York Philharmonic with outspoken dismay. They evidently think it might be the mace-blow to their orchestra.

Managements of other orchestras are frank to say that they do not yet know for certain whether broadcasting their concerts helps them or hinders. The Metropolitan Opera House in New York believes that broadcasts have helped their box office business, but concert artists are equally sure that radio has hurt theirs. These are private problems. The public one is more grave. It is whether mechanized transmission of an art-form may kill the living art at its roots. Suppose we did establish a great broadcasting orchestra which played at given intervals weekly none but the finest music, lucidly expounded beforehand by able lecturers. At first this would seem to be a great advance. More tardily it would be noticed that the one big tree sucked all the nourishment from the roots of the lesser ones; next, that for the maintenance of an art in a living and growing condition you need many orchestras, just as you need many repertory theatres and concert halls, for the training of performers and as experiment stations for composers. Thousands of amateur musicians and the court and theatre orchestras of petty princelings were the garden in whose soil the splendid flowers of modern symphonic music were four centuries growing in Europe, but mainly in Germany.

Thus the blight of mechanization now begins to cast its shadow over the supreme art of the modern world, that one art in which our age surpasses every other age in history—the orchestral symphony. Such blights can work fast. It is conceivable that people now living might survive to look back at this time with regret, remembering that in 1937 it was still possible to go and hear in person a resident orchestra play weekly a huge and various repertory of the classics from centuries of musical literature. In Anatole France's "Thais," a novel set in the second century, A D, one of the Alexandrians laments that stage shows have degenerated into pantomimic spectacles, but that he can remember when the tragedies of the Attic poets were acted in the theatres.

Portrait painting was not killed by the camera, and after years of temporary eclipse the [illegible] drama sprouted in country barns, wharf sheds, high school halls and college theatres. Music is an art as inborn as mimicry, and song is as spontaneous as speech. No machine can kill them. But good husbandry might prevent machines from stunting their growth. That art best flourishes when the most people practice it, amateurs as well as professionals.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

A Goodly Company

N.Y. Her. Trib.
June 9

By Royal Cortissoz

WILLIAM J. HENDERSON—Billy, as his intimates were wont to call him—is the last to go of a musical group with which I had peculiarly warm ties. The others were Dick Aldrich, who died in Rome only the other day, and Jimmie Huneker and "Papa" Krehbiel. If I think of them individually with affection I think of them also as a memorable quartet, the comrades of other years. It was an intense pleasure to forgather with them anywhere, but as I look back I recall especially meetings in the press room at the Metropolitan Opera House. It was a unique sanctum. Much hard work was done there, but there seemed always to be time for a certain amount of talk. Krehbiel was the Jovian leader of the four, exacting in his judgments, very searching in analysis and possessed of an astounding memory. Once when I had the honor of meeting Paderewski he asked me to name the most tenacious of memories. "The musical memory," I replied. "Oh, no," said the great man. "It is the memory of taste. I remember the flavor of some cherries that I ate when I was seven."

* * *

Nevertheless the musical memory takes hold and Krehbiel had it in a high degree, remembering not only the music but this or that performance of it. Jovian and learned though he was, he had great geniality besides. We went together to the first performance of "Parsifal" here and I can remember how he enlightened me as it went on. I remember likewise how in the intermission we adjourned to Browne's chop house across the way and tinctured philosophy with beer, history with gayety. They were a merry crew, my beloved Four. Jimmie was the chartered wit. Only he could have invented the telegram he sent to his uncle, Archbishop Gibbons, from whom he derived his second name, when that dignitary was elevated to the Cardinalate: "Dear Uncle. Where did you get that hat? Affectionately, Jimmie."

They knew how to laugh, the Four. To this day I can hear their shouts at a dinner given at Lüchow's by the critical fraternity in honor of Felix Mottl. He described for us, waving an invisible baton, the behavior of Hans von Bülow conducting some "snide" opera, like "Zampa," with a listlessness that bordered on somnolence. Suddenly there was a whisper from one of the friends in a nearby box: "Bülow! After the opera. At the Golden Cross. Beer!" Up and down went the baton in a frenzy and "Zampa" was carried to a race-horse finish. Lüchow's echoed with the delight of the diners, "Papa" Krehbiel beaming upon them and upon Mottl.

* * *

But I go back to the press room, where even the irrepressible Jimmie would presently yield to the predominant air of studious calm. It had an edifying atmosphere. They all had scholarship and enthusiasm, and, praise be, they all served a noble art with beautiful devotion. They knew nothing about routine. Their work was, instead, a continuous adventure, a continuous probing for the secret of great things. I remember feeling their sense of justice, their desire to get at the truth. Krehbiel, for example, would rejoice in the artistry of Toscanini, but he would wonder if the maestro could penetrate to the essentially Germanic core of "Die Meistersinger." Huneker, with his incomparable flair, his extraordinarily sensitive impressionism, was always in pursuit of the last, subtlest, most elusive nuance. It was so with the others. The Four were dedicated men.

Billy Henderson had, besides this spiritual fervor, a matchless poise. He was, among other things, incarnate common sense. In criticism of the art of singing he had a place apart. "The Voice," he would begin, as a writer or as a talker, and then would follow an exquisite dissection of the particular voice in question—and the wise or unwise use made of it. He was a connoisseur of vocalism if ever there was one and what was fascinating about his exposition of the subject was his avoidance of esoteric, too technical expedients and the simple, limpid manner in which he drove his point home. And what voices he had heard, what an epoch he had traversed! I can remember in my boyhood the reverberations of the Italian regime, with Italo Campanini singing Lohengrin. Then came the Germans under Leopold Damrosch and in due course the first American performance of "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," under Anton Seidl. Lehmann and Niemann were in their latish period but still puissant. The Isolde of the former remains a glorious landmark. Followed such voices as Nordica, Fremstad, Ternina, Farrar, Eames, Sembrich, Calvé, the De Reszkes, Caruso and so on, until we come to the superb Flagstad of today. Henderson weighed them all in a magic scale, None was too great to receive admonition from him when occasion invited it. He had an uncanny gift for the precise evaluation of a voice and for the detection of the slightest departure from an ideal standard.

Yes, they had a lofty standard, the Four, and that is one reason why I have ventured to sit down and commune with them in a fragmentary way. I wonder if it is widely enough realized how momentous was the service they rendered to their contemporaries, writing not just favorable or unfavorable "notices," but reviews that went to the heart of the matter, clarifying and illuminating it. They knew—Krehbiel and Henderson, Huneker and Aldrich, and what they knew they passed on to a host of readers to stabilize judgment and purify taste. They knew and they were open-minded, as keenly aware of new music as they were reverent toward the old. The singers and the orchestra gave the audience unbounded joy. The next day many a member of that audience was enriched by the Four with fuller knowledge of what had been received the night before. The Four were guardians of a kind of sacred trust. They never failed it. Don't think of them as the writers of fugitive articles in the newspaper, here today and gone tomorrow. They were among the master builders of a musical public.

* * *

I have visualized them in the press room at the opera, but heaven knows there were other places made memorable by great performances. Rafael Joseffy would play the E flat major concerto in such wise that the house rustled with an excitement that could hardly wait for the moment permitting applause. Hans von Bülow would all play the sonatas of Beethoven at a Broadway theater. At a session of the short-lived Wagner Society Seidl would sit at the piano and play the music of the Rhine daughters, while Lehmann and Brandt and Seidl-Krauss sang it—and later "Papa" Krehbiel would talk to us about Wagner. Down in old Steinway Hall Arthur Nikisch would conduct the Boston Orchestra and do things anticipating the splendors of Toscanini. Jimmie Huneker, writing to me about the difficulties confronting an ambitious voice in New York, once designated the city as "this hell's kitchen of music." But he and the rest of the Four found it, on the whole, a celestial domain. Right valiantly they ministered to a celestial Muse, carrying on the cause which their successors now serve. I loved them, "Papa" Krehbiel, Jimmie Huneker, Dick Aldrich and Billy Henderson. It is with grateful remembrance that I call up their shining names.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS. June 10
EVENING UNION

Berkshire Festival Will Attract Many Prominent Men and Women in August

Norman H. Davis, America's ambassador at large; Miss Mabel Choate daughter of Joseph H. Choate, late ambassador to Great Britain; Ernest B. Dane, treasurer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Edward Taft, trustee of the orchestra; Albert Spalding, America's eminent violinist and Mrs. Alta Rockefeller Prentice of Williamstown and New York are but a few of the many patrons for the fourth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be held in August. Only a limited number of boxes remain, according to the acting president, Mrs. Carlos M. de Heredia, of Lenox and New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will play six concerts, Aaug. 5, 7, and 8; Aug. 12, 14 and 15, at beautiful "Tanglewood," 210 acre estate between Lenox and Stockbridge presented as a permanent home for the festival, by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline.

"The thousands we expect for the [75]

MUSIC'S OLD GUARD ARE GONE

June 13 — Post

News of the World of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE past few days have witnessed the passing of the two last survivors of what might be called the old guard of music criticism in America, Richard Aldrich and William J. Henderson. Mr. Aldrich at the time of his death was what could be termed critic emeritus of the New York Times, with which he had been connected since 1902. Mr. Henderson, who joined the staff of the Sun in the same year, died in harness, and died tragically. The coterie to which these men belonged might be likened in its own field to the members of the Concord school in American letters or to the five American poets so familiarly pictured together. Three of these men, Henry Edward Krehbiel, Henry T. Finck and our own Philip Hale, were born in 1854, and the birthdate of Mr. Henderson was but a year later. The group should include James Gibbons Huneker, who was born in 1860. Mr. Aldrich, who at the time of his death was close on 74, was the youngest.

It is fruitless to compare these men with their successors. As virtual pioneers they had the chance to further the appreciation and understanding of music in America to an extent now not possible. And they may be said to have lived through a period of creative activity in music which, so far as we can see, greatly surpassed its present equivalent. It is interesting to note that the current volume of "Who's Who in America" lists Mr. Henderson as an author rather than as a critic. And save for Mr. Aldrich, who still had to his credit two Wagnerian "guides" and a critical volume entitled "Musical Discourse," these men all wrote extensively for media other than the newspapers, where that which is written today is likely to be forgotten tomorrow.

The list of Mr. Henderson's works is sufficiently illustrative of his breadth of viewpoint to bear quoting in full. The volumes are these: "The Story of Music," "Preludes and Studies," "Sea Yarns for Boys," "Afloat With the Flag," "Elements of Navigation," "The Last Cruise of the Mohawk," "What is Good Music?," "How Music Developed," "The Orchestra and Orchestral Music," "Richard Wagner, His Life and His Dramas," "Modern Musical Drift," "Pipes and Timbrels" (poems), "The Art of the Singer," "Some Forerunners of Italian Opera," "The Soul of a Tenor" (a novel), and "Early History of Singing." He was also the librettist of Walter Damrosch's operas, "The Scarlet Letter" and "Cyrano de Bergerac."

As a critic Mr. Henderson, up to the last word he wrote, yielded nothing to any of his active colleagues either in brilliance and aptness of expression or in freshness of approach. Mr. Krehbiel, with his hatred of Debussy, Mr. Finck with his dislike of Strauss and Brahms, had their "blind spots," their reactionary tendencies. Not so Mr. Henderson, who to the end could see what was good in anything that was good, no matter how modern, radical or revolutionary. At the same time he was ready to denounce whatever might come under the head of sham, pose or charlatanism. Mr. Aldrich, too, although perhaps less brilliant and forceful in his manner of expression, was an equable critic, given neither to violent enthusiasms nor to equally strong antipathies. Such men do service in a field where it is so easy to take sides, to be for this school or composer and against some other. While, to return to Mr. Henderson, his ability to receive fresh impressions in his 83d years is so phenomenal as to be accounted among the miracles.

* * * *

The English take their musical pleasures less lightly than do we. At the London Promenade Concerts, for which our Pops were first named, the most popular composer is Bach. And the weekly all-Bach programmes pack them in to suffocation. To Symphony Hall in the summer, however, the great Johann Sebastian is a rare, a very rare visitor, represented, if ever, by the miscalled Air for the G string. On the programme of next Saturday evening he will nevertheless be represented, and for the second time this season, by a Concerto for four pianos with orchestra; the first occasion was one of the solemner Sunday evening concerts. The soloists Saturday will be Verona Durick, Susan Godoy, Jesus Maria Sanroma and Donald Currier. The above announcement loses some of its news value when it is admitted that the New England Conservatory has taken a part of the hall for that evening and is supplying the soloists, among whom should also be mentioned Frances Brockman, violinist, who will be heard in the first movement of Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. Two special nights are listed at the Pops this week, Old-Timers' Night on Tuesday and Children's Night on Wednesday. Tomorrow evening the entire hall will be taken by Bosto University.

Globe, Sun, June 13

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Seventh Week of Symphony Hall Pop Concerts

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall are in their seventh week under the direction of their popular conductor, Arthur Fiedler. Except for Monday night, which is taken over by Boston University, each night will be open to the public.

Tuesday will bring the annual Old-Timers' Night, at which the audience will take part singing popular songs from the past as the orchestra plays. On Wednesday there will be the children's program, with music designed for the entertainment of the young and adults no less. On Saturday, there will be four soloists in Bach's Concerto for Four Pianos, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Verona Durick, Donald Currier, and Susan Godoy.

The programs of the week follow:

Tuesday, Old-Timers' Night — March, "Our Director," Bigelow; Overture to "Orpheus in Hades," Offenbach; "Traumerei," Schumann; "The Lost Chord," Sullivan; "A Hunt in the Black Forest," descriptive episode, Voelker; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," old Dutch hymn, Valerius-Kremser; Songs of the Old Days; "Jolly Fellows," waltzes, Volstedt; Die Dorfmusik, "The Village Band," Fryberg; old-time favorites.

Wednesday, Children's Night — "Stars and Stripes Forever," march, Sousa; Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, McBride; Soviet Iron Works, Mossolov; "The Animals' Carnival," grand zoological fantasia, Saint-Saens, piano soloists, J. M. Sanroma, L. Litwin; "A Hunt in the Black Forest," descriptive episode, Voelker; Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" suite, Grofe; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Thursday — "Marche Heroique," Saint-Saens; Finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "Divertissement," Ibert; Irish Rhapsody, Herbert; Prelude to "The Deluge," Saint-Saens, violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz; Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes, Strauss; American Fantasy, Herbert.

Friday — March, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa; Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Dance of the Comedians, Smetana; Victor Herbert Favorites, arranged by Sanford; Largo from "Xerxes," Handel; Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; "Espana" Waltzes, Waldteufel; University Songs; "Wintergreen for President," "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin.

Saturday—Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, McBride; Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, Lalo, soloist, Frances Brockman; Capriccio Espagnole, Rimsky-Korsakov; concerto for four pianos, with orchestra, Bach, soloists, Verona Durick, Susan Godoy, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Donald Currier; "Voices of Spring," waltzes, Strauss; Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Music News and Comment

The death in New York of William J. Henderson has removed the last of the great figures in American musical criticism during the past 50 years. He was a contemporary and a colleague of James Gibbons Huneker, H. E. Krehbiel, Philip Hale, Henry T. Finck, Richard Aldrich (who died but a few days ago) and H. T. Parker. Mr Henderson outlived them all, and at the age of 81 his weekly articles and daily reviews suggested the keen perception, love of life and great art, urbanity and sheer vigor of a man in middle age.

In this respect Mr Henderson's closing years were astonishing. Up to a few weeks ago, when seized with illness, he pursued the exacting and exhausting round of the New York musical season. One of the last of his reviews which this writer has carefully preserved was that of Hindemith's "Schwandreher" Concerto, performed only last April. Mr Henderson's review surpassed those carried by all the other great New York dailies.

Mr Henderson is said to have prided himself more on the fact that he was "a reporter with a specialty—music" than on his vast musical erudition. He was probably America's pre-eminent authority on the human voice, the technic, style and history of singing. A versatile mind he had indeed. He was an expert yachtsman and wrote a book on navigation which is said to be a standard text. He wrote brightly, with warmth and wit, though as a stylist he did not equal the scintillating qualities of Huneker and Hale. His judgment of music and performance, however, proclaimed him the best critic of them all. He will be sorely missed.

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

June 13 Ad.

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

THE POPS, continuing nightly in Symphony Hall under the direction of their immensely popular conductor, Arthur Fiedler, enter the seventh week of the current season with tomorrow evening's concert.

The program, however, has been taken over by Boston University and the general public will not be admitted.

Tuesday brings "Old Timers' Night," an annual event, at which it is the custom for the audience to participate in singing popular songs of the past to the orchestra's accompaniment.

In addition the program lists the well-worn march, "Our Director," by Bigelow; the overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus in Hades," Schumann's "Traumerei," Sullivan's "The Lost Chord," "Jolly Fellows," waltzes by Volstedt, etc.

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY evening there will be a children's program, in which Jesus Maria Sanroma and Leo Litwin will appear as piano soloists in the performance of Saint Saens' Grand Zoological Fantasia, "The Animals' Carnival."

Other selections to be included in the same program are Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" by Bizet, Meacham's "American Patrol," "A Hunt in the Black Forest," Descriptive Episode by Voelker, "On the Trail," from Grofe's "Grand Canyon" Suite and "Soviet Iron Works," by Mossolov.

"On Thursday evening the ever-popular Prelude to Saint-Saens' "The Deluge" will be performed with Julius Theodorowics playing the violin solo.

The program opens with the same composers' "Marche Heroique," and continues wth such a number of things as the Finale of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazad," Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," Ibert's "Divertissement, Irish Rhapsody" by Herbert, and the "Wine, Woman and Song" waltzes of Strauss.

Friday evening's program is likewise typical of Pops fare.

* * *

FROM the Sousa March, "Semper Fidelis," it proceeds through Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the Intermezzo from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." "Dance of the Comedians," by Smetana, Victor Herbert Favorites arranged by Sanford, Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody, University Songs, and Gershwin's "Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I sing."

On Saturday evening the Bach Concerto for Four Pianos with Orc?hestra will be repeated with Verona Durick, Susan Godoy, Jsus Maria Sanroma and Donald Currier as soloists.

Frances Brockman will appear as soloist in the same program playing the violin part of the First movement of Lalo's "Symphonic Espagnole" for Violin and Orchestra.

The program also lists the Prelude to Bizet's "Carmen," Fugato on a Well-Known Theme by McBride, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capricio Espagnole," Strauss Waltzes and selection from Kreisler and Gershwin.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

TIMES

June 13th

The Sunday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be held at Tanglewood, Mass., in August, will be given at 4:30 P. M. instead of at night, in order to accommodate attendants from distant centers desiring to meet train schedules. The festival dates are Aug.

Progress of the Pops

Marjorie Church, Soloist in Saint-Saens Piano Concerto, Provides a Welcome Surprise

By Moses Smith

Occasionally something happens to disturb the pleasant routine of the Pops, so that from being an agreeable place for a springtime rendezvous with musical accompaniment, Symphony Hall is for the moment turned back into its more familiar guise—a place where music is made vitally, intensely and for the sake of the enrichment of the spirit.

Such an occurrence consumed one-third of the program of Saturday evening, when Marjorie Church, Boston pianist, played the Saint-Saens Fifth Concerto in F major, the same work which she played with the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at a Monday night concert a couple of seasons ago.

The intensity of the music was not so much in the intrinsic composition as in the way in which Miss Church played it. It is a likeable work, without the expected degree of rhodomontade from the composer at his slickest and with considerably more emphasis on quiet, music lyricism. But the appeal remains largely superficial; when you begin to get under the surface of the music you run into something like a vacuum that makes you gasp for want of air.

So that music seemed, at any rate, to one who had not heard the earlier performance and who has not heard the concerto (if at all) for many years. But Miss Church succeeded in dispelling one's doubts while she was playing. Indubitably she herself believes in the music. If she doesn't, it is almost impossible to explain the persuasiveness of her utterance. Obviously the performance could not have made its mark as it did without the pianist's assurance, which from the very beginning announced that the performance would be impeccable from a digital and rhythmic standpoint. In addition, though, the performance always came from within the artist. The quieter passages were unfurled with an ingratiating and quite irresistible charm. The more portentous—and pretentious—periods carried such evidence of inner conviction, as Miss Church played them, that only a born sceptic could resist them, and then not entirely.

The quality of the performance was quite above that of the customary Pops soloist—and no slur is intended on the latter. The intention is rather to point out that Miss Church exhibited a quality of spirit that the run-of-the-mill musician, regardless of proficiency, does not ordinarily reveal.

Her playing must have had the implied effect on Arthur Fiedler and his musicians; because the orchestral accompaniment seemed to be the best this writer has heard from the same forces in a long while. Earlier in the program the orchestra had played Tschaikowsky's "Marche Solenelle," Weber's "Oberon" Overture, "Moto Perpetuo" by Strauss and a suite of "Austrian Peasant Music" by Schoenherr. At the end came Waldteufel's "Skaters' Waltz" and the "Tumbler's Dance" from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snowmaiden."

In addition, Mr. Fiedler led a chorus of the New England Federation of Men's Glee Clubs through spirited and well-sung versions of numbers by Bach, Purcell, Sullivan and Handel. Most of the seats at the tables and in the balconies had been taken by members and guests of the Glee Clubs, the United Order of True Sisters Noemi, Chapter No. 11, and the alumnae of the Girls' Latin School.

Tonight's Pops

The concert of the Pops Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler in Symphony Hall this evening has been taken over by Boston University. Admission to the general public will not be available.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

TIMES

JUN 13 1937

Many Patrons of Music Subscribe for Boxes At August Berkshire Symphonic Festival

Many patrons of music who are identified with society in this city and the Berkshires have subscribed to boxes for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be presented in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The festival will consist of six concerts, to be presented on Aug. 5, 7, 8, 12, 14 and 15 at Tanglewood, which has been presented as a permanent home for the festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline. Mrs. Carlos M. de Heredia of this city and Lenox is acting president of the festival.

Among the subscribers are Mrs. E. Parmalee Prentice, Norman H. Davis, Miss Mabel Choate, Ernest B. Dane, Edward Taft, Albert Spalding, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, Miss Ellen Bullard, Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane, Mr. and Mrs. Owen Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Blodgett, Mr. and Mrs. John Bross Lloyd, Mrs. de Heredia, Mr. and Mrs. Norval H. Busey Jr., Giraud Foster, Granville L. Winthrop, Mr. and Mrs. R. Jay Flick, Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop M. Crane, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Clark Feathers, Mrs. Cornelia Colton Hollister, Mrs. Arthur Frederic Schermerhorn, Mrs. Edwards Spencer and Mrs. James H. Andrews.

Also Miss Gertrude Watson, Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. William Marshall Bullitt, Mr. and Mrs. Carl de Gersdorff, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Griswold, Mr. and Mrs. Bernhard Hoffmann, Mr. and Mrs. Ramsay C. Hoguet, Mr. and Mrs. James Lawson Karrick and Mr. and Mrs. Percy Musgrave.

Others are Mr. and Mrs. John Barry Ryan, Mr. and Mrs. John Butler Swann, Mr. and Mrs. Heaton I. Treadway, Professor and Mrs. Philip Marshall Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Walter A. Atherton, Mrs. Elisabeth C. T. Miller, Mrs. Herbert Scoville, Mrs. E. E. Whitney, Mrs. Evelyn W. Adams, Mrs. Arnold Whitridge, James E. Leath, Mr. and Mrs. Frank C. Smith, Mrs. Mathew John Whittal, Mrs. R. B. Danielson and Mr. and Mrs. Adolf A. Berle Jr.

[76]

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE

JUN 15 1937

FAMOUS FESTIVAL REVERSES TRENDS

There Is No Wish Among Event's Backers To Make A Profit

Stockbridge, Mass. (AP)—The Berkshire symphonic festival, which opens August 5 for its fourth summer, is reversing almost every "trend" in the festival giving business.

For one thing, this curious festival will never make any money for anybody. This will shock many European festival bodies; Salzburg, especially, where the annual summer gathering of eager musical seekers is a financial success, but where the municipal theatre has had to close down in poverty.

The Berkshires take everything quite seriously, even their beauty. So that the festival although more successful than most, will always turn back any surplus for improvement. This same serious spirit has, for example, kept every inch of the main road between Stockbridge and Lenox free of gasoline stations.

Secondly, the socially and musically prominent among the festival's backers apparently do not want to do anything "monumental." No neo-Gothic or pseudo-classic buildings are likely to dwarf the magnificent hemlock hedges and soaring pines of "Tanglewood," the property Mrs. Gorham Brooks has given the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the festival.

To Design Home

Eliel Saarinen, who has been commissioned to design a permanent home for the festival will not decide on a final form until he has seen a crowd on the estate, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. Probably the building will be as inconspicuous as possible, designed to merge with the "country" atmosphere and tradition

Originally the 210-acre estate where Hawthorne worked and first told his "Tanglewod Tales" was part of an Indian council ground; an Indian fireplace still stands on the lake shore, an enormous tree having grown up in the middle of it

Chief Konkapot of the Stockbridge tribe of Mohican Indians held council on the shore of Lake Mahkeenic; although many writers connect Abraham Lincoln's famous rhymed epitaph with a Kickapoo Indian, some believe it refers to this same chief:

"Here lies poor Johnny Kongapod,
"Have mercy on him, gracious God
"As he would do if he were God
"And You were Johnny Kongapod."

Last year's third festival was visited and approved, incidentaly by (literally) the last of the Mohican chiefs. He is the Rev. Samuel Miller, an impresive 50-year-old Congregational minister from Gresnam, Wis., and his Indian name is Uhm-Pa-Tuth.

Thirdly, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and artistic director of the festival, has no intention of duplicating anybody elses project. He has doubled its size this year, but only because last year so many wanted to attend that one week was not enough.

Symphonics Only

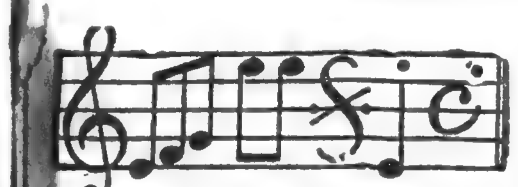
This year only symphonic concerts will be given. Perhaps a large chorus will take part next year. If money can be found to give opera in a finished (and not "festival"), manner, that may be done. Dr. Koussevitzky is playing also with the idea of a school on the big estate—not another Curtis Institute or Julliard School, but one which does not touch any other field—perhaps for the advanced study of the symphonic literature and conducting.

And lastly, neither Dr. Koussevitzky nor the Berkshire backers has the least intention of interfering with the large number of cultural activities already under way in the neighborhood. In fact, the festival announcement carries free mention of 13 other enterprises ranging from the well established Berkshire playhouse in Stockbridge to Ted Shawn's dance recitals at Jacob's Pillow, West Becket.

Believe it or not—in four years the symphonic festival never has had a quarrel with one of its neighbors.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

JUN 15 1937



The Smith College Summer School of Music will begin its ninth session in less than two weeks, beginning June 28 and closing August 6. A variety of courses will be offered in music education and in piano, organ violin, cello and voice. The school is open to both men and women. It is directed by Wilson T. Moog, professor of music at Smith.

Members of the department who will conduct courses include: Solon Robinson, Ross Lee Finney and Wilson T. Moog. Visiting members include: Marion Kahn Berkley, piano and accompanying, now giving courses in accompanying at the Institute of Musical Art; Harold Berkley, violin, faculty of institute of musical art at the Juillard School; William Durieux, violoncello, former professor at the royal conservatory, The Hague; Victor Prahl, voice, soloist with Paris Symphony Orchestra, and the Geneva Opera; Theodore M. Finney, history, head of music department, University of Pittsburgh; M. Alice Butterfield, theory, pupil of Harold Bauer; Agnes E. Fay, school music, head of music department of Great Neck (N. Y.) public schools; Priscilla E. Rose, school music, faculty of Julius Hartt School of Music, Hartford.

Although the Berkshire Symphonic Festival to be held at Stockbridge, in August will be devoted entirely to programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is probable that next season choral works and even operas may be presented. Operatic performances, however, will not be attempted unless money enough can be raised to give them in a finished manner.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra and artistic director of the festival, also is considering the idea of establishing a school on the property which Mrs. Gorham Brooks has given the orchestra as a permanent home for its annual event. The school's curriculum may consist largely of the advanced study of symphonic literature and the art of conducting.

Emil Saarinen, the architect commissioned to design an auditorium for the festival, will not decide on final plans until he has witnessed one of the festival gatherings, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. The building probably will be as inconspicuous as possible, so that it will merge into and harmonize with the country character of its surroundings.

Those who read "Beloved Friend," the story of Tschaikowsky and Mme. Nadjeda von Beck, his patroness, will be interested in the outcome of the essay contest held in connection with it. Miss Elizabeth L. Mann won the first prize of a baby grand piano with the following analysis of the strange situation between composer and noblewoman:

"The authors of 'Beloved Friend' suggest that the cause of the abrupt severance of connection between Mme. von Beck and Tschaikowsky was the mortal illness of her son Vladimir and her remorse at having neglected him. It is possible, however, since the facts are not fully known, to construct another plausible explanation. Suppose she had never heard, until 1890, that Tschaikowsky was a pervert. If the rumor of his abnormality had not reached her ears by 1879, when she made her confession of jealousy of his wife, she may have remained in innocence for a much longer time. An accident, at last, may have brought the rumor to her ears at the very time when the illness of her son had already induced the physical and mental collapse which Pahulsky reported.

"Unusually imaginative and sympathetic as she was in the world of music, eccentric in some aspects of social behavior, she was nevertheless conventional in her moral code; this knowledge about someone so dear to her might have shocked her deeply. Furthermore, she might have felt emotionally outraged at the memory of having secretly dreamed of a closer relationship than the safe one which she and Tschaikowsky had actually maintained. She may even have doubted that a man with his disability could have been sincere in his protestations of affection toward any woman, and that the tenderness of his letters—platonic as it was—had been a hypocritical pretense motivated by his need of her money. Open protest or accusation was impossible. All she could do, in her tumult of nerves, was to retreat behind a cold and impenetrable barrier."

Arthur V. Berger, editor of the Musical Mercury, writes an interesting article on Alban Berg's violin concerto, which was heard at Smith by the Boston Symphony orchestra this year. In Mr. Berger's opinion, Berg was born too late in that the music of the 12-tone system had already reached its logical impasse as was inevitable in the development of chromaticism.

Tonalism, says the author, is the inevitable basis for artistic expression in music, except occasionally for such things as atmosphere, color and some special cases of mood. Development and harmony cannot be disassociated in composition as, he maintains, they have been by the Schoenberg school. Harmonic and thematic relationships are inseparable, he insists.

Mr. Berger goes on to say that unity is inevitably lost in the music of the 12-tone system and that monotony results. In demonstration, he cites numerous examples from the Berg concerto which, in his opinion, are quite pointless because of their monotony.

Tomorrow night will be children's night at the Boston "Pops" concerts. The program will be as follows:

"A Hunt in the Black Forest,' Descriptive Episode, Voelker
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet
On the Trail, from the "Grand Canyon" Suite, Grofe
American Patrol, Meacham

Thursday evening:
Marche Heroique, Saint-Saens
Finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov
The Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner
Divertissement, Ibert
Irish Rhapsody, Herbert
Prelude to "The Deluge," Saint-Saens
Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz
Fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet
"Wine, Woman and Song' Waltzes, Strauss
American Fantasy, Herbert

Friday evening:
March, "Semper Fidelis,' Sousa
Overture to "Oberon," Weber
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Dance of the Comedians , Smetana
Victor Herbert Favorites, Arr. by Sanford
Largo from "Xerxes," Handel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt
"Espana" Waltzes Waldteufel
Wintergreen for President Gershwin

Saturday evening:
Prelude to "Carmen," Bizet
Overture to "Sakuntula,' Goldmark
Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, McBride
Syphonie Espagnole, for Violin and orchestra (First Movement) Lalo
Soloist, Frances Brockman
Capriccio Espagnole Rimsky-Korsakov
Concerto for Four Pianos, with Orchestra, Bach
Soloists: Verona Durick, Susan Godoy, Jesus Maria Sanroma, Donald Currier
"Voices of Spring,' Waltzes, Strauss
Tambourin Chinois, Kreisler
Strike Up the Band, Gershwin
"Stars and Stripes Forever," March, Sousa
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai
Fugato on a Well-Known Theme, McBride
Soviet Iron Works, Mossolov
The Animal's Carnival, Saint-Saens
Piano soloists: J. M. Sanroma and L. Litwin

Transcript Thu. June 18

Music Notes

The annual concert of the New England Conservatory of Music, participated in exclusively by members of the senior class, will be given this evening in Jordan Hall, beginning at 8.15. The program will include music for organ, piano, violin and voice. Admission will be free.

Tomorrow night's Pops concert in Symphony has been taken over largely by the New England Conservatory of Music. On stage there will also be considerable evidence of the institution. Frances Brockman, concert-mistress of the Conservatory orchestra, will be the soloist in the first movement of Lalo's "Spanish" Symphony. The four piano soloists in the performance of the Bach Concerto are all associated with the Conservatory—Jesus Maria Sanroma and Verona Durick as members of the faculty, Susan Godoy and Donald Currier as students. In the Pops orchestra, meanwhile, four former Conservatory students will play cadenzas in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice Espagnole" (as well as any other measures that fall to their lot); Minot Beale, violinist; George Madsen, flutist; Manuel Valerio, clarinetist, and Elford Caughey, harpist.

Tonight's Pops

March, "Semper Fidelis" ....Sousa
Overture to "Oberon" ......Weber
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Dance of the Comedians ...Smetana
Victor Herbert Favorites Arranged by Sanford
Largo from "Xerxes" ......Handel
Second Hungarian Rhapsody..Liszt
"Espaffa" Waltzes ......Waldteufel
University Songs
"Wintergreen for President," from "Of Thee I Sing" ......Gershwin
Conductor: Arthur Fiedler

MALDEN, MASS.
NEWS

JUN 21 1937

MAN OF THE MOMENT

ALBION METCALF

Organist at First Baptist Who Will Be Piano Soloist at Boston Symphony Pops Friday.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST GAZETTE

JUN 15 1937

MRS. THAW HEADS ORCHESTRA GROUP

Plans Are Announced For Series of Concerts.

The Pittsburgh Orchestra Association yesterday announced the names of officers recently elected for the 1937-38 season and reported plans for a series of six Syria Mosque concerts.

Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., was chosen president. Other officers named were Mrs. Alexander Laughlin, first vice president; Frederic Schaefer, second vice president; Mrs. Nathaniel Spear, secretary; Moorehead B. Holland, treasurer, and May Beegle, manager.

Members of the board include Mrs. Oliver J. Keller, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, Mrs. James G. Pontefract, Mrs. J. Hanson Rose, Mrs. George J. Willock, Horace Forbes Baker, Joseph H. Bialas, Leon Falk, Jr., William L. Monro, Sr., and Charles J. Ramsburg.

Concerts have been scheduled as follows: November 2, Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conducting; December 11 and 12, Boston Symphony Orchestra, and January 8 and 9 and March 15, Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

CHICAGO, ILL.
June NEWS 16th

Berkshire Music Festival Attracts Many Chicagoans

To music lovers throughout the country the Berkshire Symphonic festival held annually near Stockbridge, Mass., is one of the outstanding events of the year. The Boston Symphony orchestra plays six concerts—this year they are from Aug. 5 to Aug. 12—in the beautiful Tanglewood estate where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote his "Tanglewood Tales" and "House of the Seven Gables." It has been donated as a permanent home for the festival by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Metz (she is Mrs. Frederick Haskell's sister), who now spend most of their time in their lovely home at Lenox, Mass., are regular devotees of the festival. Miss Kate Buckingham, who is another, went east Monday. Her estate, located on Baldhead Dome, the highest mountain in that part of the Berkshires, and the Metz' home, are almost next door neighbors to Tanglewood.

Mrs. Frederick T. West, now in her Pittsfield (Mass.) home, also attends Berkshire concerts. Her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Mahlon Ogden West, left yesterday to spend the summer with her.

Among the patrons of this year's festival—this is the fourth—are Mrs. E. Parmelee Prentice of New York, Rockefeller Prentice's mother; Norman H. Davis, America's ambassador at large, and Albert Spalding.

Sunday Post, June 20

AFRO-AMERICAN TUNES BY THE POPS ORCHESTRA

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

TWO of the programmes prepared by Arthur Fiedler for the Pops this week have a racial cast. Hardly a new departure is the Italian night planned for Wednesday, with its numbers from the pens of Gabetti, Rossini, Boccherini, Puccini, Paganini, Donizetti, Casella, Wolf-Ferrari, Arditi and Verdi. But the programme designed for tomorrow, featuring composers and soloists of African descent, is novel indeed, at least so far as Boston is concerned.

To retell a tale many times told, during the brief period when Antonin Dvorak was a resident of this country he was strongly convinced that the basis for a new instrumental music existed in the so-called colored spirituals. To prove his point he used themes of such derivation or affinity in the symphony "From the New World" and in the string quartet, Opus 96. In so doing he believed himself to be setting an example for the American composer; and by token of John Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre" and Gilbert's Comedy Overture on Negro Themes, that is exactly what he did.

At the Pops tomorrow evening, however, Boston will hear for the first time part of a composition which should prove more authentic than those of Dvorak, Powell and Gilbert; two movements from the Afro-American Symphony of William Grant Still. Besides this item from the pen of a colored composer Mr. Fiedler has chosen three others: Wooten's "Autumn Serenade," a colored dance from the "Bandanna Sketches" of Clarence Cameron White, and the familiar tenor aria, "Onaway, Awake, Beloved," from Coleridge Taylor's melodious cantata, "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast." Burleigh's "Deep River" as orchestrated by Jacchia is in reality a double transcription, and hence falls in another category.

Add to these pieces the ballet music from "Aida" and "The Banjo" from the almost forgotten New Orleans composer, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, and Mr. Fiedler's African references, direct or oblique, are complete—yet not complete. For there is still a selection from Gershwin's "Of Thee I Sing." To be sure, a similar gleaning from the same composer's "Porgy and Bess" would have been more to the point. But if we are to pay tribute to Africa's contribution to American music, we can do it by performing any piece which makes use of the idiom successively described as ragtime, jazz and swing. Were it not for the colored people, our popular music, and what is now the popular music of most of Europe as well, would not exist. We and others call jazz our representative American music, our most distinctive contribution to the tonal art. That today it represents in a limited way the complex racial mixture which we may call White America is true. It is also true that not the Anglo-Saxon, the Celt, the Gael, the Latin, the Slav, the Magyar or the Czech would have or could have been its actual creator.

* * * *

The two soloists in the concert above described are Wallace Thompson, tenor, and Doris Dandridge-Harris, who will play the first movement of the Piano Concerto of Grieg. On Wednesday Clotilde Zappala, soprano, will sing the Mad Scene from "Lucia." The other soloists of the week are again pianists. On Thursday Mr. Sanroma will play once more the piano part in Dohnanyi's amusing "Variations on a Nursery Air," and on the following evening Albion Metcalf will be the pianist in one of the rare performances nowadays of Liszt's "Dance of Death."

THE POPS PROGRAMMES

MONDAY EVENING, JUNE 21

Wedding March from "The Golden Cock"	Rimsky-Korsakov
Ballet Music from "Aida"	Verdi
Autumn Serenade	Wooten
Negro Dance from the "Bandanna Sketches"	White
"Onaway, Awake Beloved" from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast"	Coleridge-Taylor
Soloist, Wallace Thompson, Tenor
Afro-American Symphony (Two movements)	Still
"Deep River"	Burleigh-Jacchia
Piano Concerto (First movement)	Grieg
Soloist, Doris Dandridge-Harris
Selection, "Of Thee I Sing"	Gershwin
"The Banjo"	Gottschalk
"The Ride of the Valkyries"	Wagner

TUESDAY EVENING, JUNE 22

(Entire house taken)

WEDNESDAY EVENING, JUNE 23

Marcia Reale Italiana	Gabetti
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"	Rossini
Minuet (String Orchestra)	Boccherini
Fantasia, "La Tosca"	Puccini
Moto Perpetuo	Paganini
(The solo part by the combined first violins)
Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor"	Donizetti
Soloist, Clotilde Zappala
"Italia," Rhapsody	Casella
Dance of the Camorrists from "The Jewels of the Madonna"	Wolf-Ferrari
Waltz, "Il Bacio"	Arditi
Triumphal March from "Aida"	Verdi

THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 24

Marche Solennelle	Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"	Glinka
"Roses of the South," Waltzes	Strauss
Variations on a Nursery Air, for Piano and Orchestra	Dohnanyi
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"La Source," Ballet Suite	Delibes
Ritual Fire Dance	de Falla
Invitation to the Waltz	Weber-Berlioz
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite	Grofe
"Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," from "Tannhauser"	Wagner

FRIDAY EVENING, June 25

"On the Mall," March	Goldman
"Carnival," Overture	Dvorak
Nocturne in C minor	Chopin
(Arranged for Orchestra by W. R. Spalding)
"Carmen," Fantasia	Bizet
"The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Introduction to Act III	Wagner
Bolero	Ravel
"Dance of Death," Paraphrase on the Dies Irae, for Piano and Orchestra	Liszt
Soloist, Albion Metcalf
"Estudiantina," Waltzes	Waldteufel
Prelude in C sharp minor	Rachmaninoff
Czardas	Delibes

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 26

March, "Schechenyi Indulo"	Fahrbach
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia"	Delibes
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers"	Pierne
Two Styrian Peasant Dances	Schonherr
Italian Caprice	Tchaikovsky
Largo from "Xerxes"	Handel
Five Miniatures	White
"Maytime," Selection	Romberg
"Night and Day"	Porter
"Sailors' Dance," from "Red Poppy"	Gliere

THE THEATRE CALENDAR

A COMPANY from New York will begin performances of the play "Moon Over Mulberry Street" at the Columbia Theatre, in the South End, tomorrow night.

The Yiddish language company of the Federal Theatre Project will present "Her Confession," the work of one of the members of the troupe, beginning Thursday evening, at the Majestic Theatre.

SYMPHONY HALL

Last Week (But One)

NO CONCERT TONIGHT

POPS

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

TOMORROW 8:30

Featuring Negro Music and Artists

TUESDAY, JUNE 22

ENTIRE HOUSE TAKEN BY HARVARD CLASS 1912

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 23

ITALIAN PROGRAM

THURSDAY, JUNE 24

SANROMA—PIANO

MONDAY, JUNE 28

REPEAT REQUEST

Sun. Advertiser, June 20

Pops Programs For This Week

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

A PROGRAM featuring Negro composers and soloists will open the last week but one of the Pops season at tomorrow evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

Conductor Arthur Fiedler has announced selections for the occasion, which include Still's Afro-American Symphony, Negro Dance from White's "Bandanna Sketches," "Deep River," arranged for orchestra by Jacchia, and "The Banjo," by Gottschalk.

Doris Dandridge-Harris will be the soloist in the performance of the First Movement of the Grieg Piano Concerto; Wallace Thompson, tenor, will be heard in "On, Away, Awake, Beloved" from Taylor's arrangement of Coleridge's "Hiawatha's Feast."

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," the Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'Or," and Ballet Music from Verdi's "Aida" add sufficient variety.

The entire house has been taken on Tuesday evening by the Harvard Class of 1912.

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY evening Clotilde Zappala will appear as soloist in an all-Italian program singing the Mad Scene from Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."

The program will open with "Marcia Reale Italiana," by Gabetti, and will include the Overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Minuet for String Orchestra by Boccherini, "La Tosca" Fantasia by Puccini, Waltz "Il Bacio" by Arditi, etc.

Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear with the orchestra on Thursday evening in the performance of Dohnanyi's "Variations on a Nursery Air" for Piano and Orchestra.

Tchaikovsky's "Marche Solonelle," the Overture to Glinka's "Russian and Ludmilla," Strauss' "Roses from the South," Waltzes, "On the Trail" from Grofe's "Grand Canyon" Suite, and "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg" from "Tannhauser" are to be included in the same program.

* * *

ALBION METCALF will make his first appearance as Pops soloist on Friday evening in the performance of Liszt's "Dance of Death," a paraphrase on the "Dies Irae," for Piano and Orchestra.

The program will also include Spalding's arrangement of the Chopin Nocturne in C minor, Ravel's "Bolero," Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor, Dvorak's "Carnival" Overture, and the Introduction to Act III of Wagner's "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Saturday evening's program will include such miscellany as March, "Schechenyi Indule" by Fahrhach, Ballet Suite, from "Coppelia" by Delibes, "March of the Little Lead Soldiers" by Pierne, Two Styrian Peasant Dances by Schonherr, Italian Caprice by Tchaikovsky, and the Largo from Handel's "Xerxes."

NEW YORK, N. Y.

TIMES

JUN 2

With the announcement of the fourth Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will inaugurate Aug. 5 in "Tanglewood," come hints of interesting plans for the future. Heretofore the concerts have been devoted to purely orchestral works. But the success of the festival has been such that Dr. Koussevitzky hopes next season to extend the scope of the enterprise to include important choral works and even opera.

In respect to opera, however, it has been emphasized in advance that unless it can be produced in a manner comparable in quality to the orchestral performances, it will not be produced at all. Meaning, naturally, that unless sufficient funds can be raised, opera must go by the board.

Dr. Koussevitzky is also considering the idea of a school, to be established on the "Tanglewood" estate, in which the staples of the curriculum shall be the advanced study of symphonic literature and the art of conducting.

The Berkshire Festival seems slowly but surely to be fulfilling the hopes of its founders: that it take its place as the first American music festival comparable in scope to the most important in Europe.

PITTSBURGH, PA.

June 20 PRESS

Festival To Feature Boston Symphony As Week-End Attraction

Music Patron Gives Vast Estate For Pavilion Where Concerts Will Be Regular Attractions

By RALPH LEWANDO

Press Music Critic

OUT IN Western Massachusetts where the picturesque section known as the Berkshire Hills gladdens the eyes of all who pass that way a notable non-profit music project is evolving

I refer to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival that has been held annually for the past three years at Stockbridge, Mass., and which will be held this year on Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays of the first two weekends in August with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by its conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as the artistic magnets of the event.

Mr. Lewando

Last season the common undertaking of the Boston Orchestra and Berkshire Festival Association attained the highest point in artistic achievement since the festival's founding, scoring an emphatic success. Fifteen thousand persons attended the three performances, every one of which was a complete sell-out. Final accounting showed the Festival was out of the red by a wide margin.

The business success of this musical venture resulted from many happy contributing factors, executive skill and administrative efficiency.

The guiding genius, though, is Festival President Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge and New York City, whose vision, courage and artistic sense have won many to a great musical cause.

* * *

PROBABLY THE most important proponent of the Berkshire Festival and what it stands for is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Orchestra. Enthralled with its possibilities, he dreams and plans great things which when realized will make the Berkshire Festival as famous in America as that of Salzburg is in Europe.

Last year Mrs. Margaret Emerson's estate was the scene of memorable accomplishment. It was offered for sale to the Festival Association but sufficient funds could not be raised to purchase the property. Moreover, the committee was unable to find another likely location that could be bought at a figure within the limit of the Association's exchequer. For a time it looked as if the festival was doomed.

* * *

FINALLY, a backer appeared in the person of Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, Mass., who by one act of generosity set at rest forever all fears for a festival site. She offered as a gift to the Boston Symphony Orchestra her 210-acre estate, "Tanglewood," situated between Stockbridge and Lenox overlooking the mirror-like surface of Stockbridge Bowl (Lake Mahkeenac).

Mrs. Brooks' gift is in the nature of a memorial to her mother and father. Thus the first of Dr. Koussevitzky's requests had been fulfilled. Next came the problem of erecting a suitable pavilion for the performances this year.

Ideally located, "Tanglewood" was established in 1849 by William Tappan of Boston. The estate extends from West Street in Lenox to Lake Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. On this site in earlier days Chief Konkapot and the Stockbridge Indian Tribe held their pow-wows.

At "Tanglewood" Nathaniel Hawthorne resided while in the Berkshires. Here, in the little red cottage, burned 46 years ago, Hawthorne first related his "Tanglewood Tales" and wrote "The House of Seven Gables."

* * *

NEXT CAME the problem of erectin ga suitable pavilion for the festival performances.

This architectural assignment was given to Eliel Saarinen and when the opening concert day rolls around a pavilion accommodating 5000 persons will have been completed with the utmost attention given to matters of acoustic, comfort and artistic appearance.

Interest in the Berkshire Festival is running high. It is estimated that there will be an attendance of 30,000. The membership campaign that closed a few days ago exceeded the quota with a total of 1775.

* * *

The fifth year of the Schenley Lawn "Pop" Concerts will be inaugurated by the Little Symphony Orchestra led by Victor Saudek on Tuesday night, June 29.

The concerts will be given on Tuesday and Friday evenings of each week up to and including July 30. In event of rain the concerts will be transferred to the Schenley Ballroom.

* * *

Concert Leader

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, eminent conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a series of concerts that will feature the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., in August.

June 20 MUSIC

Soloists and Special Nights at Pops Thi

The Pop concerts in S Hall will enter upon their but one of their 52d seaso row night in Symphony Ha Fiedler and the symphony will present tomorrow
the first time a program
Negro composers, music an Tuesday's concert has be over by the Harvard class but every other night is op public. On Wednesday t be an all Italian progr
Clotilde Zappala, soprano,
On Thursday Jesus Maria will appear with the orc Dohnanyi's "Variations on a Air." Albion Metcalf will first appearance as solois Pops, in Liszt's "Dance o for piano and orchestra, ne evening.
The programs of the wee
Monday—Wedding March f
Golden Cook," Rimsky-Korsak
Music from "Aida," Verdi;
Serenade, Wooten; Negro Danc
"Bandanna Sketches," White;
Awake Beloved," from "Hiawa ding Feast," Coleridge-Taylo Wallace Thompson, tenor; A can Symphony (two moveme
"Deep River," Burleigh-Jacch
Concerto (first movement), Gri

June 20 MUSIC AND MUSICIANS Globe

Soloists and Special Nights at Pops This Week

The Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will enter upon their last week but one of their 52d season tomorrow night in Symphony Hall. Arthur Fiedler and the symphony orchestra will present tomorrow night for the first time a program featuring Negro composers, music and soloists.

Tuesday's concert has been taken over by the Harvard class of 1912, but every other night is open to the public. On Wednesday there will be an all Italian program with Clotilde Zappala, soprano, as soloist. On Thursday Jesus Maria Sanroma will appear with the orchestra in Dohnanyi's "Variations on a Nursery Air." Albion Metcalf will make his first appearance as soloist at the Pops, in Liszt's "Dance of Death" for piano and orchestra, next Friday evening.

The programs of the week follow:

Monday—Wedding March from "The Golden Cook," Rimsky-Korsakov; Ballet Music from "Aida," Verdi; Autumn Serenade, Wooten; Negro Dance from the "Bandanna Sketches," White; "On, Away, Awake Beloved," from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," Coleridge-Taylor, soloist: Wallace Thompson, tenor; Afro-American Symphony (two movements), Still; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; Piano Concerto (first movement), Grieg, soloist: Doris Dandridge-Harris; Selection, "Of Thee I Sing," Gershwin; "The Banjo," Gottschalk; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

Wednesday—Marcia Reale Italiana, Gabetti; Overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; Minuet (string orchestra), Boccherini; Fantasia, "La Tosca," Puccini; Moto Perpetuo, Paganini (the solo part by the combined first violins); Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti, soloist: Clotilde Zappala; "Italia," Rhapsody, Casella; Dance of the Camorrists from "The Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari; Waltz, "Il Bacio," Arditi; Triumphal March from "Aida," Verdi.

Thursday—March Solennelle, Tchaikovsky; Overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," Glinka; "Roses from the South" waltzes, Strauss; variations on a nursery air, for piano and orchestra, Dohnanyi (soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma; "La Source," Ballet Suite, Delibes; Ritual Fire Dance, de Falla; Invitation to the Waltz, Weber-Berlioz; "On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" suite, Grofe; "Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg," from "Tannhauser," Wagner.

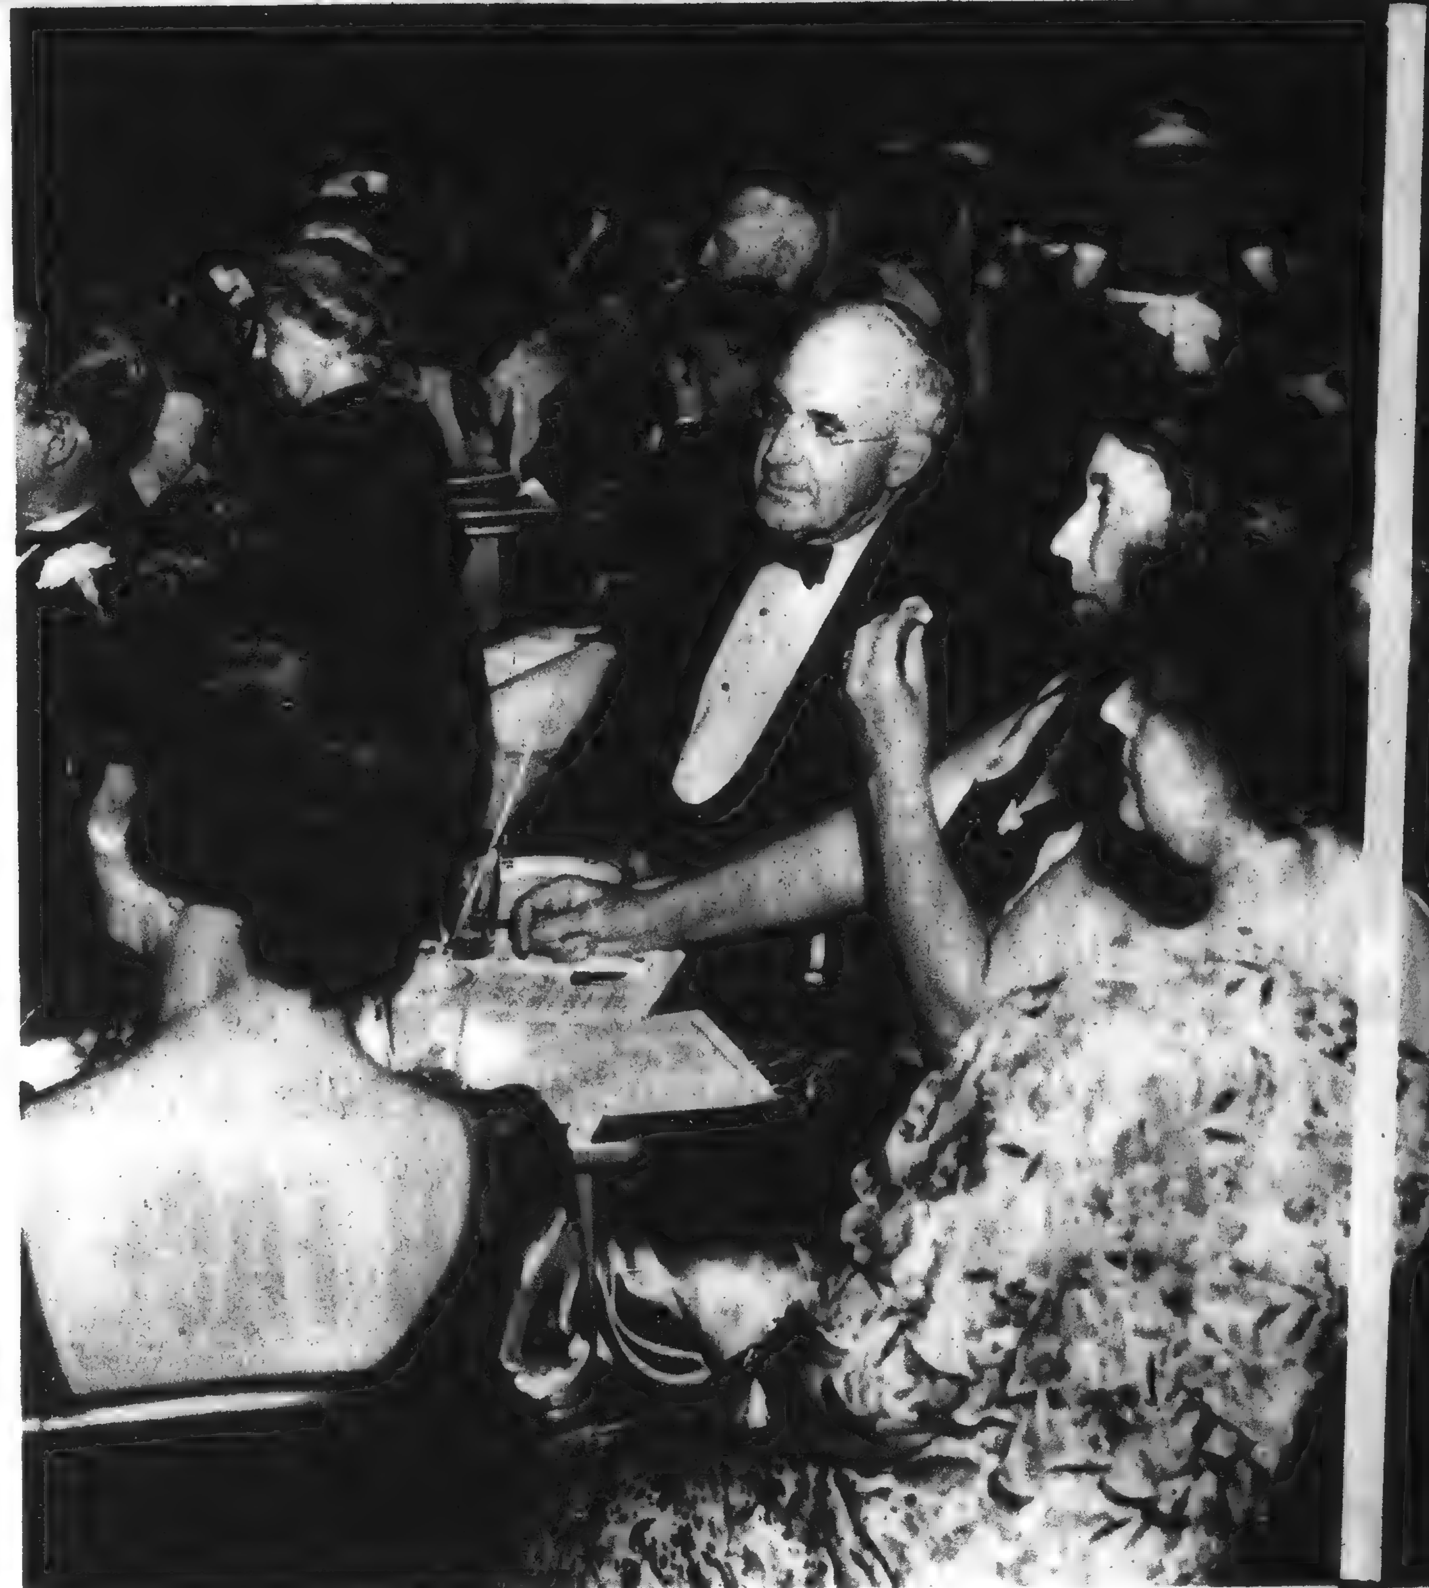
Friday—"On the Mall," March, Goldman; "Carnival" Overture, Dvorak; Nocturne in C minor, Chopin (arranged for orchestra by W. A. Spalding); "Carmen," Fantasia, Bizet; "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," introduction to Act III, Wagner; Bolero, Ravel; "Dance of Death," Paraphrase on the Dies Irae, for piano and orchestra, Liszt (soloist, Albion Metcalf); "Estudiantina" waltzes, Waldteufel; Prelude in C sharp minor, Rachmaninoff; Czardas, Delibes.

Saturday—March, "Schechenyi Indule," Fahrbach; Ballet Suite, "Coppelia," Delibes; "March of the Little Lead Soldiers," Pierne; Two Styrian Peasant

The Boston Sunday Globe
ROTOGRAVURE SECTION
JUNE 27, 1937

B.U. at Pops

CONDUCTOR Arthur Fiedler about to play "Hail Boston University."



THE PRESIDENT ATTENDS—Dr Daniel L. Marsh and Mrs Marsh enjoy the evening. Mrs. Joslyn of Idaho, mother of one of the graduating class, sits between them as their guest.

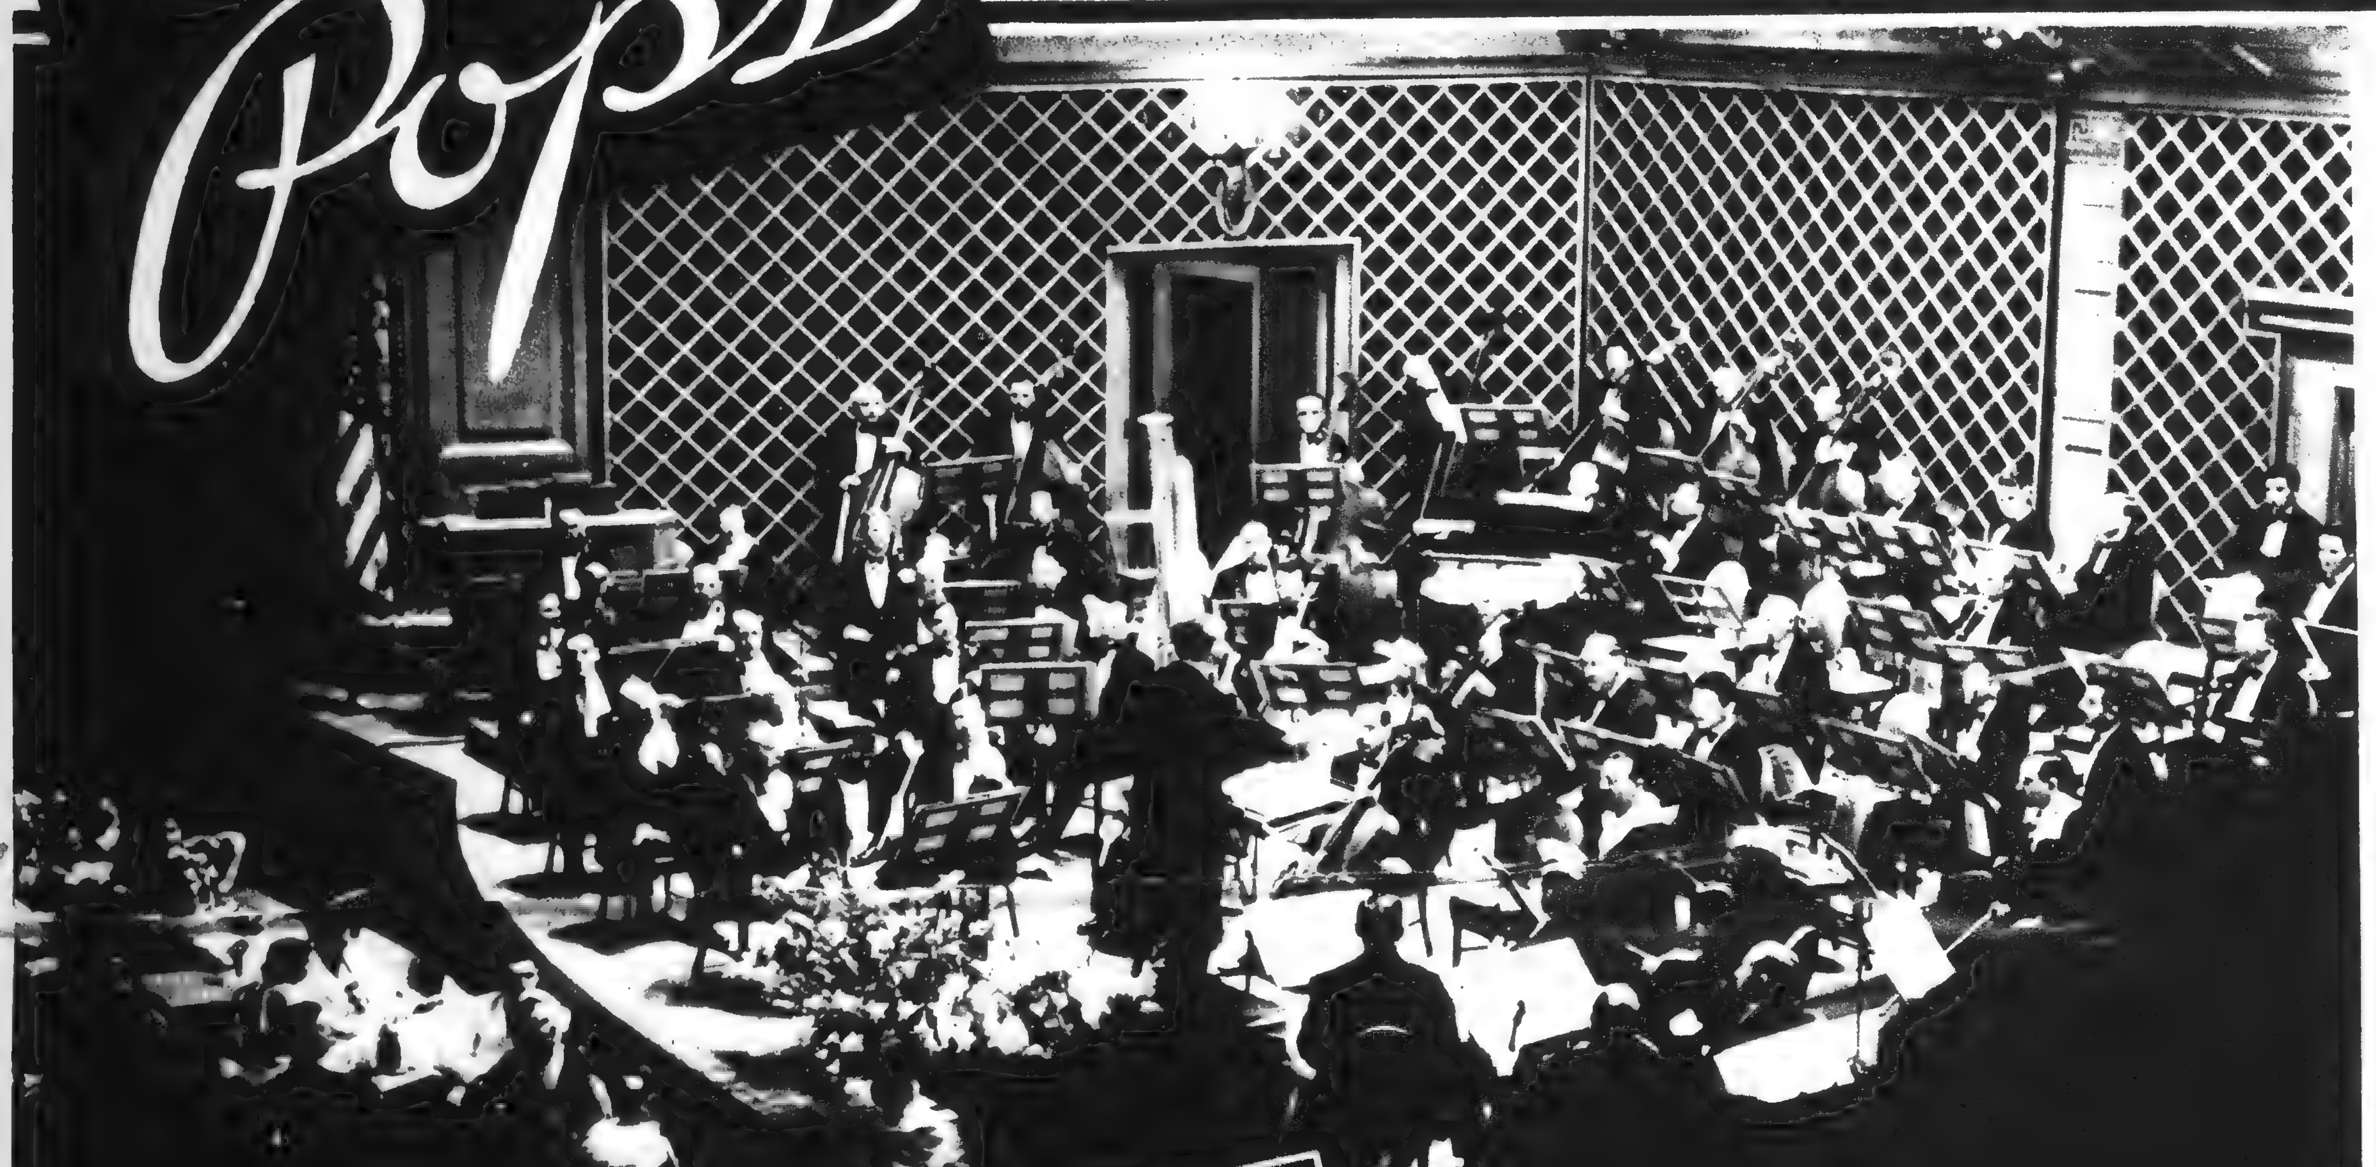
[illegible] IN ACTION—The orchestra is snapped from the [illegible] of Sargent College and the College [illegible] in the background.

TIME OUT—Cadet Robert Williams of West Point and Florence Chapman of Wellesley College step up to the soda fountain on the second floor.

THE POPS were introduced 52 years ago to enable the management of the Symphony Orchestra to extend annual contracts from 30 to 40 weeks and thus retain the finest of musicians. From this dubious beginning, they have grown into a municipal institution, unique to Boston and famed throughout the country. They were successful from the start. Bostonians flocked on warm, Spring evenings to sip wine or beer, smoke and listen to the music. Only once have they faltered in more than half a century, and that back in 1890, when the Music Hall was refused a license to sell light wines and beers, and Conductor Wilhelm Gericke feared the music alone would prove a financial burden. However, when prohibition came Pops were so firmly entrenched that they flourished throughout the era of speak-easies and bootleggers. The seasons of 1936 and 1937 are the most successful on record. The nickname, "Pops," is an abbreviation of "Popular Concerts," which are presented in contrast to the classical music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its formal Winter season of 30 weeks. There are those, however, who prefer to derive it from the popping of champagne corks in the pre-war age of elegance. The trick was, they say, to pull the cork on the exact beat of the kettle drum and [illegible]. The elegance may have waned, but the popularity of [illegible] which is recorded on this page by Boston Globe cameraman, Arthur Griffin.

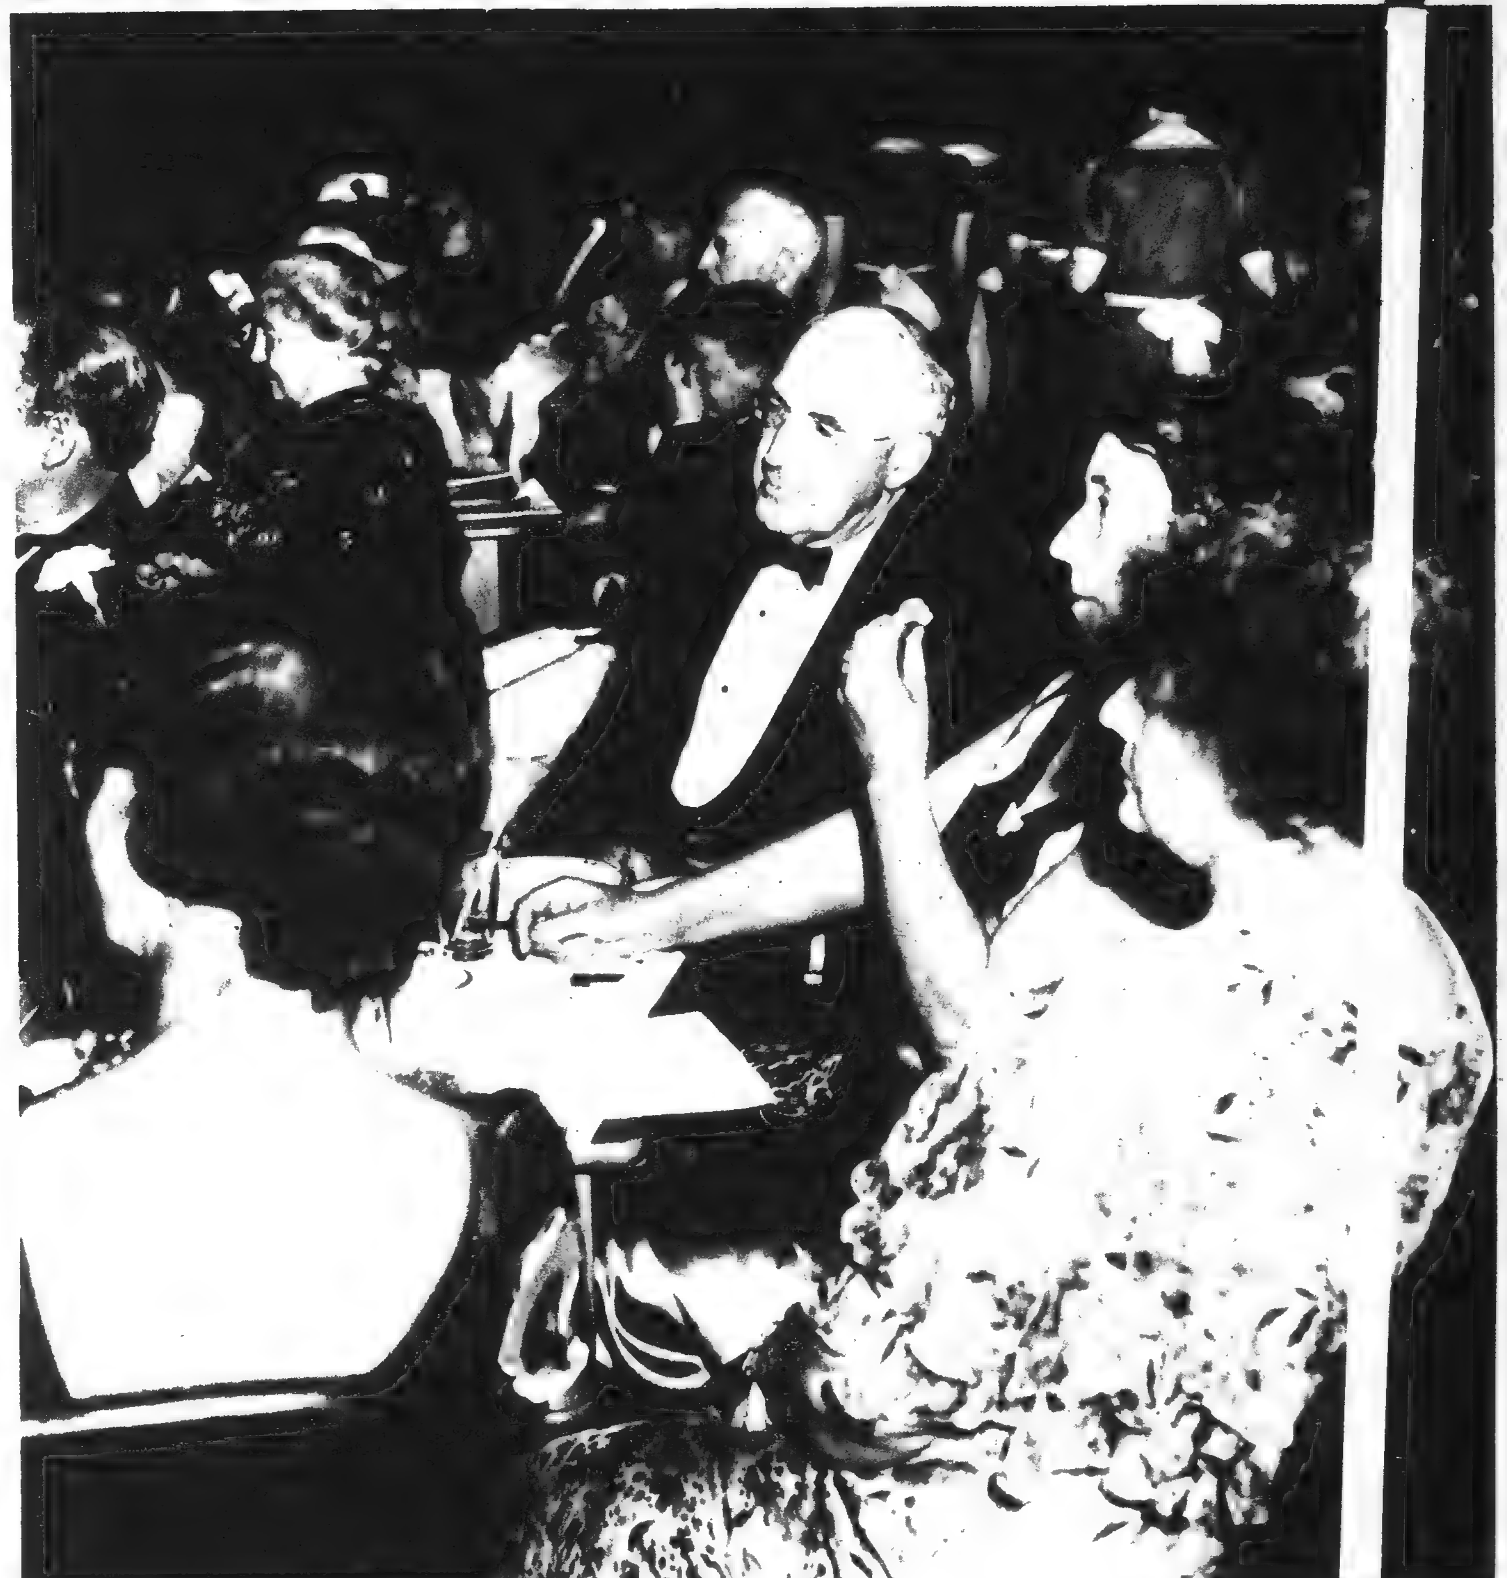
The Boston Sunday Globe
ROTOGRAVURE SECTION
JUNE 27, 1937

B.U. at Pops



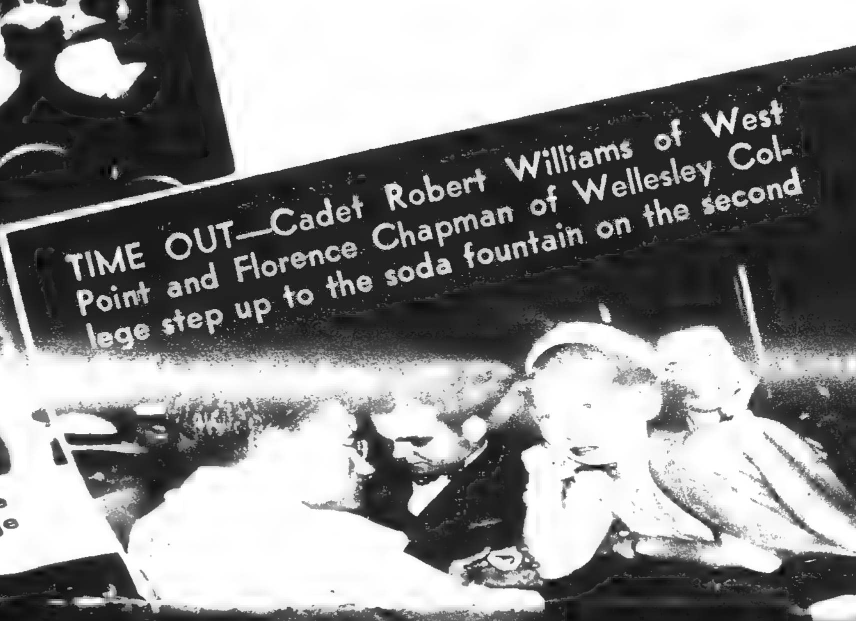
CONDUCTOR Arthur Fiedler about to play "Hail Boston University."

THE PRESIDENT ATTENDS—Dr Daniel L. Marsh and Mrs Marsh enjoy the evening. Mrs. Joslyn of Idaho, mother of one of the graduating class, sits between them as their guest.



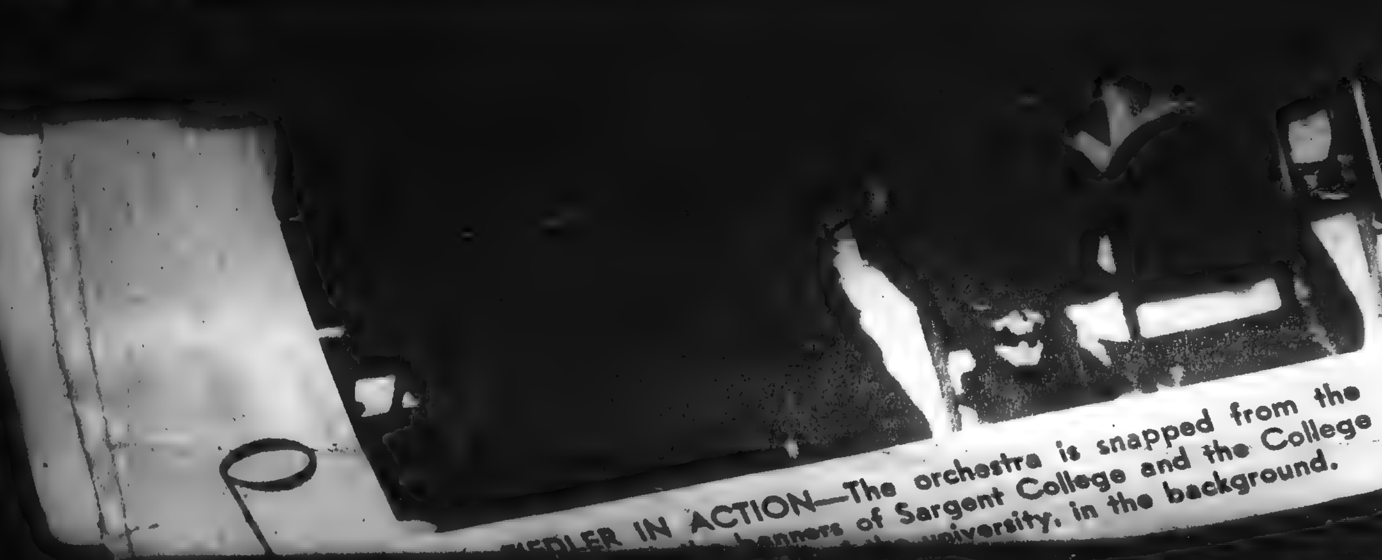
COLLEGE OF MUSIC

FIEDLER IN ACTION—The orchestra is snapped from the [illegible] banners of Sargent College and the College [illegible] University, in the background.



TIME OUT—Cadet Robert Williams of West Point and Florence Chapman of Wellesley College step up to the soda fountain on the second

THE POPS were introduced 52 years ago to enable the management of the Symphony Orchestra to extend annual contracts from 30 to 40 weeks and thus retain the finest of musicians. From this dubious beginning, they have grown into a municipal institution, unique to Boston and famed throughout the country. They were successful from the start. [illegible] Spring evenings to sip wine or bee[illegible] listen to th[illegible] [illegible] a century, and [illegible] when the Music Hall was refused a license to sell ligh[illegible] and beers, and Conductor Wilhelm Gericke feared the music alone would prove a financial burden. However, when prohibition came Pops were so firmly entrenched that they flourished throughout the era of speak-easies and bootleggers. The seasons of 1936 and 1937 are the most successful on record. The nickname, "Pops," is an abbreviation of "Popular Concerts," which are presented in contrast to the classical music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its formal Winter season of 30 weeks. There are those, however, who prefer to derive it from the popping of champagne corks in the pre-war age of elegance. The trick was, they say, to pull the cork on the exact beat of the kettle drum and [illegible] may have waned, but the popularity of the concerts [illegible] increase[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Night," which is recorded on this page by Boston Globe cameraman, Arthur Griffin.



FIEDLER IN ACTION—The orchestra is snapped from the … banners of Sargent College and the College … the university, in the background.

TIME OUT— … Point and Florence Chap… lege step up to the soda fountain … floor.

into a municipal institution, unique to Boston and famed throughout the country. They were successful from the start. Bostonians flocked on warm, Spring evenings to sip wine or beer, smoke and listen to the music. Only once have they faltered in more than half a century, and that back in 1890, when the Music Hall was refused a license to sell light wines and beers, and Conductor Wilhelm Gericke feared the music alone would prove a financial burden. However, when prohibition came Pops were so firmly entrenched that they flourished throughout the era of speak-easies and bootleggers. The seasons of 1936 and 1937 are the most successful on record. The nickname, "Pops," is an abbreviation of "Popular Concerts," which are presented in contrast to the classical music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its formal Winter season of 30 weeks. There are those, however, who prefer to derive it from the popping of champagne corks in the pre-war age of elegance. The trick was, they say, to pull the cork on the exact beat of the kettle drum and pass unnoticed. The elegance may have waned, but the popularity of the concerts ever increases. Typical of the special informal evenings was the recent "Boston University Night," which is recorded on this page by Boston Globe cameraman, Arthur Griffin.

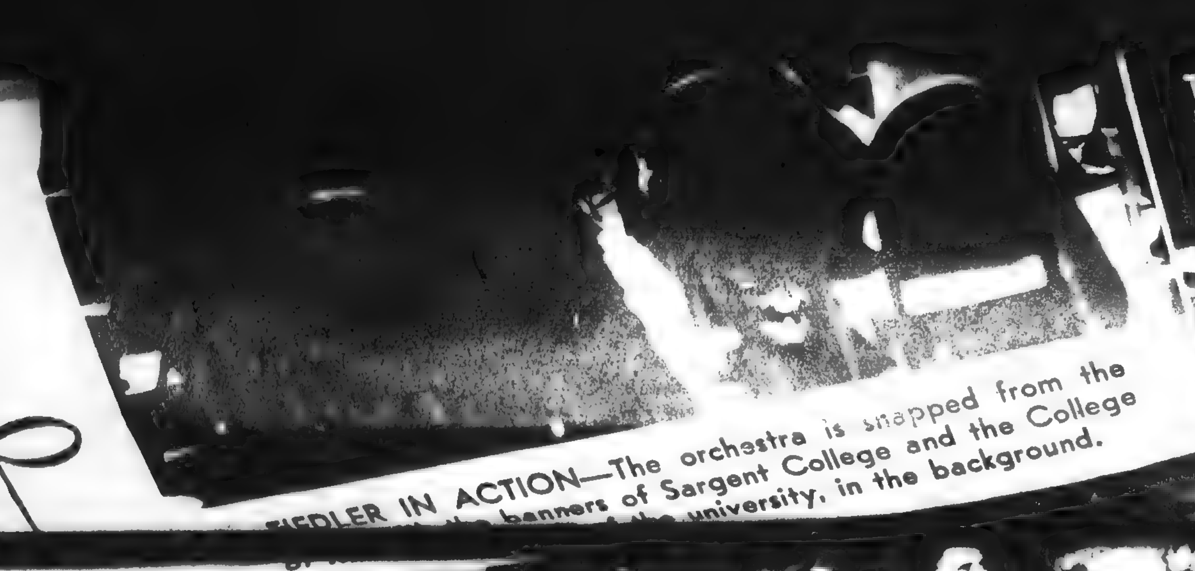
"CLARISSIMA"—B. C. Patterson, 1911, and Mrs Patterson. Mr Patterson, now principal of Wrentham High School, composed "Clarissima," one of the Boston University songs played by the orchestra. Christy Kyle and Rachel Kangas, Wrentham seniors, are their guests.

APPLAUSE—Betty Cook, Helene Spencer, Harrison Myrick and John H. Judge, all class of '37, applaud the prelude to "Carmen."

MUSIC ONLY—Those who go to Pops solely to hear the orchestra sometimes prefer the balcony.

RELAXATION—Members of the orchestra chatting and resting during an intermission. Some of them step back into the wings, others stretch their legs in the lobby.

into a municipal institution, unique to Boston and famed throughout the country. They were successful from the start. Bostonians flocked on warm, Spring evenings to sip wine or beer, smoke and listen to the music. Only once have they faltered in more than half a century, and that back in 1890, when the Music Hall was refused a license to sell light wines and beers, and Conductor Wilhelm Gericke feared the music alone would prove a financial burden. However, when prohibition came Pops were so firmly entrenched that they flourished throughout the era of speak-easies and bootleggers. The seasons of 1936 and 1937 are the most successful on record. The nickname, "Pops," is an abbreviation of "Popular Concerts," which are presented in contrast to the classical music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its formal Winter season of 30 weeks. There are those, however, who prefer to derive it from the popping of champagne corks in the pre-war age of elegance. The trick was, they say, to pull the cork on the exact beat of the kettle drum and pass unnoticed. The elegance may have waned, but the popularity of the concerts ever increases. Typical of the special informal evenings was the recent "Boston University Night," which is recorded on this page by Boston Globe cameraman, Arthur Griffin.



FIEDLER IN ACTION—The orchestra is snapped from the banners of Sargent College and the College university, in the background.

TIME OUT— Point and Florence Chap lege step up to the soda fountain on floor.

"CLARISSIMA"—B. C. Patterson, 1911, and Mrs Patterson. Mr Patterson, now principal of Wrentham High School, composed "Clarissima," one of the Boston University songs played by the orchestra. Christy Kyle and Rachal Kangas, Wrentham seniors, are their guests.

APPLAUSE—Betty Cook, Helene Spencer, Harrison Myrick and John H. Judge, all class of '37, applaud the prelude to "Carmen."

MUSIC ONLY—Those who go to Pops solely to hear the orchestra sometimes prefer the balcony.

RELAXATION—Members of the orchestra chatting and resting during an intermission. Some of them step back into the wings, others stretch their legs in the lobby.

Gl Jun 27

Last Week of "Pop" Concerts-

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Hall Pop Concerts Begin Last Week Tomorrow

Only six nights remain of the 52d season of Pop concerts which, under the direction of Arthur Fiedler in Symphony Hall, have set a new record in attendance. Tomorrow night the Request Program will be repeated.

On Thursday, Charles O'Connell, associate conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra during its Spring tours of the last two seasons, will appear for the first time as guest conductor at the Pops. Friday, the Old Timers' program, in which the audience is invited to sing with the orchestra, will be repeated. Next Saturday night, July 3d, will bring the season to a close.

The programs of the week follow:

Tomorrow, Repeat Request Program—Introduction to Act 3, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "Finlandia," symphonic poem; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; finale, "Fourth Symphony," Tchaikovsky; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes, Strauss; largo from "Xerxes," Handel; "Bolero," Ravel; "Rhapsody in Blue," Gershwin; soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma; "Jealousy," gypsy tango, Gade; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," old Dutch hymn, Valerius-Kremser.

Tuesday—Coronation march from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; "Cradle Song," Brahms (arranged by George H. L. Smith); fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; Kammenoi Ostrov ("Reve Angelique"), Rubinstein; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Wine, Woman and Song," waltzes, Strauss; "Song of the Volga Bargemen," arranged by A. Jacchia; "Procession of the Sirdar," Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Wednesday—Entrance of the Gladiators, Fucik; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; largo from "Xerxes," Handel; Soviet Iron Works, Mossolov; "The Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "Deep River," arranged by A. J. Jacchia; "Tales From the Vienna Woods," waltzes, Strauss; ballet from "Faust," Gounod; "On the Trail," from the "Grand Canyon" suite, Grofe; "Strike Up the Band," Gershwin.

Gardner Museum Concert

The last of the season's weekly free concerts at the Isabella Stewart Gardner Museum will be given at 2 this afternoon. Albion Metcalf, pianist; Gaston Elcus, violinist, and Reginald Boardman, accompanist, will be heard. While the museum will remain open during July, there will be no musical programs. The museum will be closed in August. The program for today:

The King's Hunting Jig, Bull; Capriccio in E minor, Op 16, No. 2, Mendelssohn; Rhapsodie in G minor, Op 79, No. 2, Brahms; two movements from Sonata for Piano and Violin, Franck; Fantaisie in F minor, Op 49, Chopin; Romance, Op 28, Faure; Minstrels, Debussy; Moto Perpetuo, Burleigh.

Thursday—Two Canadian marches, "The Land of the Maple," "Laurentian March," Laurendeau; ballet suite, Rameau-Mottl; "Finlandia," symphonic poem, Sibelius; Sixth Hungarian Dance, Brahms; "Caprice Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov; Charles O'Connell, guest conductor; prelude in E major, Bach-Cailliet; "Come, Sweet Death," Bach-O'Connell; "Rhumba," from "Rhumba Symphony," McDonald; "The Mill," Gillet-Cailliet; chorale and fugue, Zemachson.

Friday, Old-Timers' Night—March, "Our Director," Bigelow; overture to "Orpheus in Hades," Offenbach; Traumerei, Schumann; "The Lost Chord," Sullivan; "A Hunt in the Black Forest," descriptive episode, Voelker; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," old Dutch hymn, Valerius-Kremser; "Songs of the Old Days," "Jolly Fellows," waltzes, Volstedt; "Shine On, Harvest Moon," Bayes-Norworth; old-time favorites.

Saturday, Closing Night—"Stars and Stripes Forever," march, Sousa; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; "Minuet" (string orchestra), Bolzoni; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," waltzes, Strauss; meditation from "Thais," Massenet; violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz; prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; "Prayer of Thanksgiving," old Dutch hymn, "Valerius-Kremser; "American Fantasy," Herbert.

CHARLES O'CONNELL

Guest Conductor at the Pops Concert in Symphony Hall Next Thursday Evening

As the fifty-second season of Pops concerts comes to a close next week the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler will make numerous phonograph recordings for the Victor Company under the supervision of Charles O'Connell, who will be guest conductor of part of next Thursday's program.

Pops Programs for The Ensuing Week

27

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

Glo

TOMORROW EVENING in Symphony Hall Arthur Fiedler will open the last week of the fifty-second season of the Pops with a repetition of the all-request program performed with such favorable results several weeks ago.

Typical of that which has come to be more or less standard Pops fare, it includes the introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"; Sibelius' "Finlandia," and "Valse Triste"; finale of Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony; Strauss' "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" waltzes; largo from Handel's "Xerxes," and Ravel's Bolero."

The feature of the occasion will be, of course, Jesus Maria Sanroma's performance as soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," an event for which the Boston public appears to entertain a tireless enthusiasm.

Tuesday evening's program opens with the Coronation March from Meyerbeer's "The Prophet," and includes the Overture to "Mignon," Brahms' Cradle Song, arranged by George Smith, and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite.

* * *

ON WEDNESDAY EVENING "Entrance of the Gladiators" by Fucik, Overture to "Poet and Peasant" by Suppe, Mossolov's "Soviet Iron Works," Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," "Deep River," Strauss waltzes, and Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band" will be heard.

Charles O'Connell, associate conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra during its spring tours of the last two seasons, will appear for the first time as guest conductor of the Pops on Thursday evening.

Mr. O'Connell announces a program which includes two Canadian marches, "The Land of the Maple" and "Laurentian March," by Laurendeau; Sibelius' "Finlandia," Brahms' Sixth Hungarian Dance; and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice Espagnole."

The latter half of the program to be conducted by Mr. O'Connell lists a more unusual group and includes the Bach Prelude in E major arranged by Cailliet, O'Connell's own arrangement of Bach's "Come, Sweet Death," "Rhumba" from McDonald's "Rhumba Symphony," "The Mill" by Gillet arranged by Cailliet, and Chorale and Fugue by Zemachson.

* * *

ON FRIDAY evening, "Old-Timers' Night" will be repeated and as is customary the audience will be invited to participate in singing familiar favorites of other years.

The program for Saturday evening, which is closing night, opens with "Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," closes with Herbert's "American Fantasy" and includes the Overture to Rossini's "Barber of Seville," Minuet for String Orchestra by Bolzoni, Strauss waltzes, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave."

POPS TO GET A GUEST LEADER

News of the World of Music

27

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THIS, the 52d season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall, which comes to a close on Saturday evening, has set a new record for attendance. Moreover, the same has been true of each of its immediate predecessors. Whatever other factors may be involved, Arthur Fiedler may well plume himself upon this fortunate outcome. His programmes, his conducting and his personality have steadily pleased the public. No more seems to be necessary.

This week Mr. Fiedler shares his labors with another. On Thursday evening Charles O'Connell, making his first appearance in Symphony Hall as conductor, although he has been there often in connection with phonograph recordings, will lead the orchestra through part of the programme. Mr. O'Connell, a conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra on its last two spring tours, an official of the RCA Victor Co., and the author of that valuable guide to orchestral music, the Victor Book of the Symphony, appeared as guest conductor of one of the Esplanade concerts last summer.

The pieces Mr. O'Connell conducts on Thursday are redolent of Philadelphia, the city of orchestral transcriptions. In detail, they are these: Prelude in E major, Bach-Cailliet; "Come, Sweet Death," Bach-O'Connell; Rhumba from the "Rhumba Symphony," McDonald; "The Mill," Gillet-Cailliet; Chorale and Fugue, Zemachson. Lucien Cailliet, already known to the Pops as transcriber, is a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra. Harl McDonald is a Stokowskian discovery still unknown to Boston. His "Rhumba Symphony" has been heard in Manhattan as well as in the Quaker city.

* * * *

Richard Strauss' "Salome," one of the few great operas of the 20th century and once banned in Boston, is shortly to be presented at the Lewisohn Stadium in New York before a presumably vast and certainly "popular" audience. It is to be doubted whether any of that company will depart corrupted from hearing the perverted daughter of Herodias apostrophize the severed head of John the Baptist in some of the most magnificent music ever penned.

In 1882 Musical America reported that "despite the repulsiveness of the story," Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," now universally recognized as the noblest of all lyric love-tragedies, had created a profound impression upon its first London audience. The French have a saying to the effect that the more it changes, the more it is the same thing.

* * * *

To return to the Pops, two "special nights" are to be repeated in this final week. Tomorrow brings a repetition of the "request" programme, and Friday, of the Old-Timers' night. At the latter, as before, the audience will sing the popular songs of the past to the accompaniment of the orchestra.

Compl
Final V

Guest Condu Soloist and of Specia

Next week will the fifty-second
Symphony Hall
conducted these s
Arthur Fiedler wi
ing and ever-inc
When the books a Saturday night, ac will show that t
for this season ha previous record, wh lished last seas houses have been rule rather than t

The final week will open on Mo repetition of the "
gram, with Jesus M
as the soloist in win's "Rhapsody in
H. L. Smith, whose of the Brahms L played on Tuesday occasionally contr
music columns of t
Charles O'Connell,
over half of Thu concert as the on ductor of the seaso ciate conductor of phia Orchestra and man-of-all-work f
Phonograph Comp day night there wi
tion of the "Old
gram.

The programs of low in detail:

Monday Ev

Introduction to Act grin" ....
"Finlandia," Sympho

Valse Triste ....
Finale, Fourth Symp

"By the Beautiful Bl
Waltzes ....
Largo from "Xerxes"
Bolero ....
Rhapsody in Blue ...
Soloist: Jesus Mar
"Jealousy," Gypsy Ta
"Prayer of Thanksgi
Dutch Hymn ..Val

Tuesday Ev

Coronation March fr Prophet" ....
Overture to "Mignon"
Cradle Song ....
(Arranged by George Fantasia, "Carmen" ..
Kammenoi Ostrov ...
Ave Maria ....
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..

Tonight's

Arthur Fiedler w
Boston Pops Orches
the following progra phony Hall this even

March, "Schechenyi I

Ballet Suite, "Coppelia
"March of the Little Le

Two Styrian Peasant

Italian Caprice ......
Largo from "Xerxes"
Five Miniatures ......
"Maytime," Selection ..
"Night and Day" ......
Sailors' Dance from "F

[82]

Transcript June 26

Complete Programs for the Final Week of Pops Concerts

Guest Conductor, Single Soloist and a Round of Special Nights

Next week will be the last of the fifty-second season of the Symphony Hall Pops concerts, conducted these several years by Arthur Fiedler with accompanying and ever-increasing vogue. When the books are closed next Saturday night, accordingly, they will show that the attendance for this season has exceeded the previous record, which was established last season. Sold-out houses have been this spring the rule rather than the exception.

The final week of the season will open on Monday with a repetition of the "Request" program, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as the soloist in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." George H. L. Smith, whose arrangement of the Brahms Lullaby will be played on Tuesday evening, has occasionally contributed to the music columns of the Transcript. Charles O'Connell, who will take over half of Thursday night's concert as the only guest conductor of the season, is an associate conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra and accomplished man-of-all-work for the Victor Phonograph Company. On Friday night there will be a repetition of the "Old Timers'" program.

The programs of the week follow in detail:

Monday Evening

Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" .... Wagner
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem Sibelius
Valse Triste .... Sibelius
Finale, Fourth Symphony Tchaikovsky
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
Largo from "Xerxes" .....Handel
Bolero .... Ravel
Rhapsody in Blue ...... Gershwin
Soloist: Jesus Maria Sanroma
"Jealousy," Gypsy Tango ....Gade
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn ..Valerius-Kremser

Tuesday Evening

Coronation March from "The Prophet" .... Meyerbeer
Overture to "Mignon" .... Thomas
Cradle Song .... Brahms
(Arranged by George H. L. Smith)
Fantasia, "Carmen" ....Bizet
Kammenoi Ostrov .....Rubinstein
Ave Maria .... Bach-Gounod
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .... Grieg
"Wine, Woman and Song," Waltzes .... Strauss
Song of the Volga Bargemen Arranged by A. Jacchia
Procession of the Sardar Ippolitov-Ivanov

Wednesday Evening

Entrance of the Gladiators..Fucik
Overture to "Poet and Peasant" Suppe
Largo from "Xerxes"......Handel
Soviet Iron Works ......Mossolov
The Ride of the Valkyries. Wagner
Deep River Arranged by A. Jacchia
"Tales from the Vienna Woods," Waltzes .... Strauss
Ballet from "Faust"......Gounod
"On the Trail" from the "Grand Canyon" Suite ....Grofe
Strike Up the Band.....Gershwin

Thursday Evening

Two Canadian Marches—"The Land of the Maple," "Laurentian March".Laurendeau
Ballet Suite .... Rameau-Mottl
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem Sibelius
Sixth Hungarian Dance..Brahms
"Caprice Espagnole" Rimsky-Korsakov
Charles O'Connell, guest conductor
Prelude in E major...Bach-Cailliet
Come Sweet Death Bach-O'Connell
"Rhumba" from the "Rhumba Symphony" .... McDonald
"The Mill" .... Gillet-Cailliet
Chorale and Fugue ... Zemachson

Friday Evening

March, "Our Director"....Bigelow
Overture to "Orpheus in Hades" Offenbach
Traeumerei .... Schumann
The Lost Chord .... Sullivan
A Hunt in the Black Forest Voelker
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn..Valerius-Kremser
"Songs of the Old Days"
"Jolly Fellows," Waltzes..Volstedt
*Shine On, Harvest Moon Bayes-Norworth
*Old-Time Favorites
*Audience and Orchestra

Saturday Evening

"Stars and Stripes Forever," March .... Sousa
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" .... Rossini
Minuet .... Bolzoni
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" Bizet
"By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Waltzes .... Strauss
Meditation from "Thais" Massanet
Violin solo: Julius Theodorowicz
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner
Marche Slave ...... Tchaikovsky
"Prayer of Thanksgiving," Old Dutch Hymn..Valerius-Kremser
American Fantasy ...

Tonight's Pops

Arthur Fiedler will lead his Boston Pops Orchestra through the following program in Symphony Hall this evening:

March, "Schechenyi Indulo" Fahrbach
Ballet Suite, "Coppelia"....Delibes
"March of the Little Lead Soldiers" Pierne
Two Styrian Peasant Dances Schoenherr
Italian Caprice ......Tchaikovsky
Largo from "Xerxes" .....Handel
Five Miniatures .... White
"Maytime," Selection ....Romberg
"Night and Day" .... Porter
Sailors' Dance from "Red Poppy" Gliere

MUSIC

Gl. June 9

SYMPHONY HALL

The Pops

The vast treasury of Mozart's music holds many a piece unfamiliar to modern concert-goers: such a one—the Piano Concerto in B-flat (K 595)—was performed at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night, with Ruth Culbertson as soloist.

So far as Boston is concerned, this Concerto is a rarity. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not played it, nor are there available records of local performance otherwise in recent years. Finished early in January, 1791, this was the last Piano Concerto Mozart ever wrote. That year was Mozart's last, for he died in December; it saw composition of the operas "The Magic Flute" and "The Clemency of Titus," and so much of the Requiem as he was able to finish.

Mozart, extraordinary child of fortune, perhaps never wrote anything dull in his whole life. Certainly with death beckoning only 11 months beyond, he managed to fill this Concerto with his customary delicacy and zest. Yet there is a persistent undercurrent of seriousness, not more so in the tender andante than in the two allegros, that gives a sense of effort. Eric Blom found the right phrase when he wrote in his neat little biography of Mozart: ". . . a truly valedictory work, with a kind of chastened mood occasionally verging on a feeling of oppressive foreboding."

As usual there is a wealth of melodic material, most of it distinguished. Miss Culbertson, an admirable player of Mozart, left nothing to be desired by way of skill, clarity or smoothness of style. She was graciously applauded.

The evening was dedicated to the Boston Teachers' Club, and the hall was packed. Groups of tables also had been taken by the Massachusetts Federated Music Clubs, and the Field and Forest Club. The program included Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, the Ravel "Bolero" and miscellaneous pieces of Tchaikovsky, Lacombe, Herbert, Guion and Dvorak. C. W. D.

CHARLES O'CONNELL
Guest Conductor at Pops
SYMPHONY HALL~THURSDAY

GET EST
ER

World ic 27 REY SMITH

n of Pop Con-
Hall, which Saturday eve-cord for atten-same has been nmediate pre-other factors
r Fiedler may this fortunate nmes, his consonality have
lic. No more ler shares his

On Thursday
nnell, making n Symphony hough he has nnection with will lead the t of the pro-il, a conductor chestra on its an official of nd the author to orchestral of the Symest conductor nade concerts

nnell conducts lent of Philarchestral tranhey are these:
Bach-Cailliet;
Bach-O'Con-
he "Rhumba
; "The Mill," and Fugue, ailliet, already transcriber, is iladelphia Or-ald is a Stol unknown to a Symphony"
hattan as well

alome," one of the 20th cenin Boston, is nted at the New York bet and certainly
It is to be of that com-orrupted from daughter the severe tist in some t music ev

nerica report siveness of t
"Tristan a ally recognized lyric love-trag-
ofound impres-
ndon audience.
ying to the ef-changes, the hing.

e Pops, two o be repeated morrow brings
"request" proof the Old-latter, as be-sing the popu-to the accomstra.

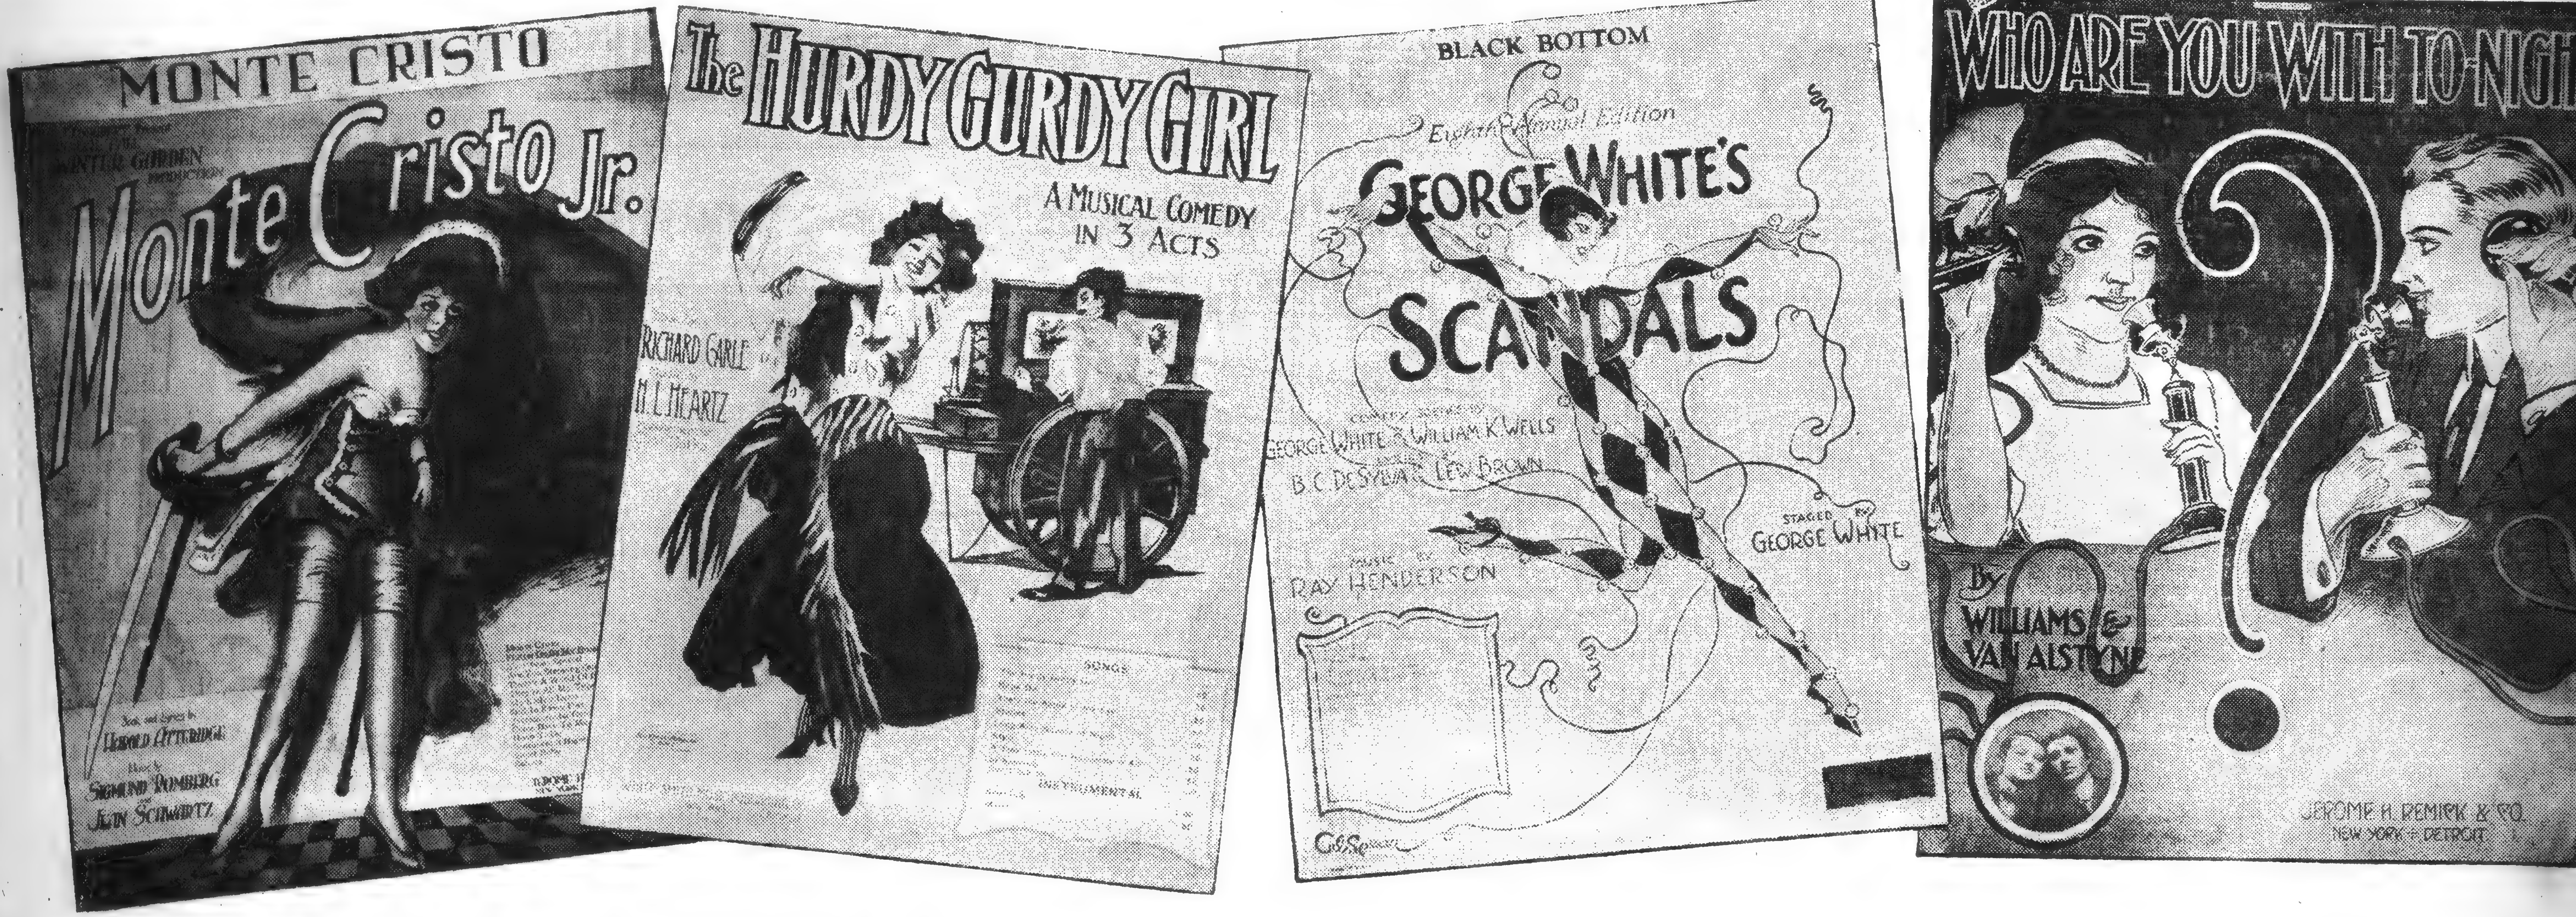
[83]



MONTE CRISTO
Monte Cristo Jr.
Winter Garden Production
Book and Lyrics by Harold Atteridge
Music by Sigmund Romberg
Jean Schwartz
The HURDY GURDY GIRL
A Musical Comedy in 3 Acts
Richard Carle
H. L. Heartz
Songs Instrumental BLACK BOTTOM
Eighth Annual Edition
GEORGE WHITE'S SCANDALS
George White & William K. Wells
B. C. DeSylva Lew Brown
Music by Ray Henderson
Staged by George White
WHO ARE YOU WITH TO-NIGHT?
By Williams & Van Alstyne
Jerome H. Remick & Co.
New York - Detroit

Songs You Remember---by Arthur Fiedler

Noted Boston Musician, Conductor of Pops and Esplanade Concerts, Lists His Best 25 Popular Airs of Last 25 Years

Years ago, in late June, the calliopes at Revere Beach steamed out the most popular songs of the era. Every Bostonian knew, for example, when "Alexander's Ragtime Band" was the hit-song.

Times have changed in a quarter of a century—and songs have changed, too.

Today Arthur Fiedler, Boston's best known musician, a distinguished conductor who has made a lifelong study of music and of audiences, gives Boston Sunday Post readers a rare treat:

He selects for them—from his own memory—the best 25 popular songs of the last 25 years.

Suggestions for the programme of Old-Timers' Night at the Pops, to be held this Friday, have also aided Mr. Fiedler in reminding him of former popular tunes.

Modestly he points out that he is no authority on popular music—and adds that he doesn't want to be.

He sets forth his selection with the following comment:

"If these songs remind you of former days, of happier days,

BY ARTHUR FIEDLER

(Conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra, Esplanade Concerts, Boston Sinfonietta, Cecilia Society Chorus)

Let me make it perfectly clear that I do not consider myself to be an authority on popular songs. But I do have my own peculiar taste, my personal preferences and also a fairly good memory.

Perhaps it would be well to emphasize these factors: I become acquainted with a popular song long after the typical Bostonian runs into them. My professional musical duties are such that I can spend little time listening to popular songs on the radio, at the theatre or in ballrooms and night clubs.

ARTHUR FIEDLER'S LIST
of the
Best 25 Popular Songs of Last 25 Years

1912	Alexander's Ragtime Band	Irving Berlin
1913	El Choclo	Valloldo
1914	Missouri Waltz	Logan
1915	There's a Long, Long Trail	S. K. Elliott
1916	Keep Your Head Down, Fritzy Boy	Murphy-David
1917	Over There	George M. Cohan
1918	K-K-K-Katy	Geoffrey O'Hara
1919	Dardanella	Bernard-Black-Fisher
1921	[illegible]	[illegible]
1922	Kiss in the Dark	DeSylva-Herbert
1923	Yes, We Have No Bananas	Silver-Cohen
1924	Indian Love Call	Friml
1925	Tea for Two	Harbach-Youmans
1926	Black Bottom	DeSylva-Brown-Henderson
1927	Sonny Boy	DeSylva-Brown-Henderson
1928	I Kiss Your Hand, Madame	Erwin-Ratten
1929	Just a Gigolo	Leonello Cassuci
1930	Sing Something Simple	Herman Hupfeld
1931	When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain	Smith-Johnson-Woods
1932	Brother, Can You Spare a Dime?	Harburg-Gorney
1933	Who's Afraid of the Doin' It Now" (Doin' What? Turkey Trot); today the swing-time songs are beginning to have a vogue.

Therefore, if you can foretell the dances, you have a fairly good chance of writing some of the songs of that nation. One good way of getting attention by means of a popular song—even though a best seller may not result—is by keeping abreast of the news. So, when a Lindbergh flies the Atlantic, write a song that night and it will get attention. A great many Lindy songs were written, but how many are remembered now?

A SMASH-HIT OVERNIGHT

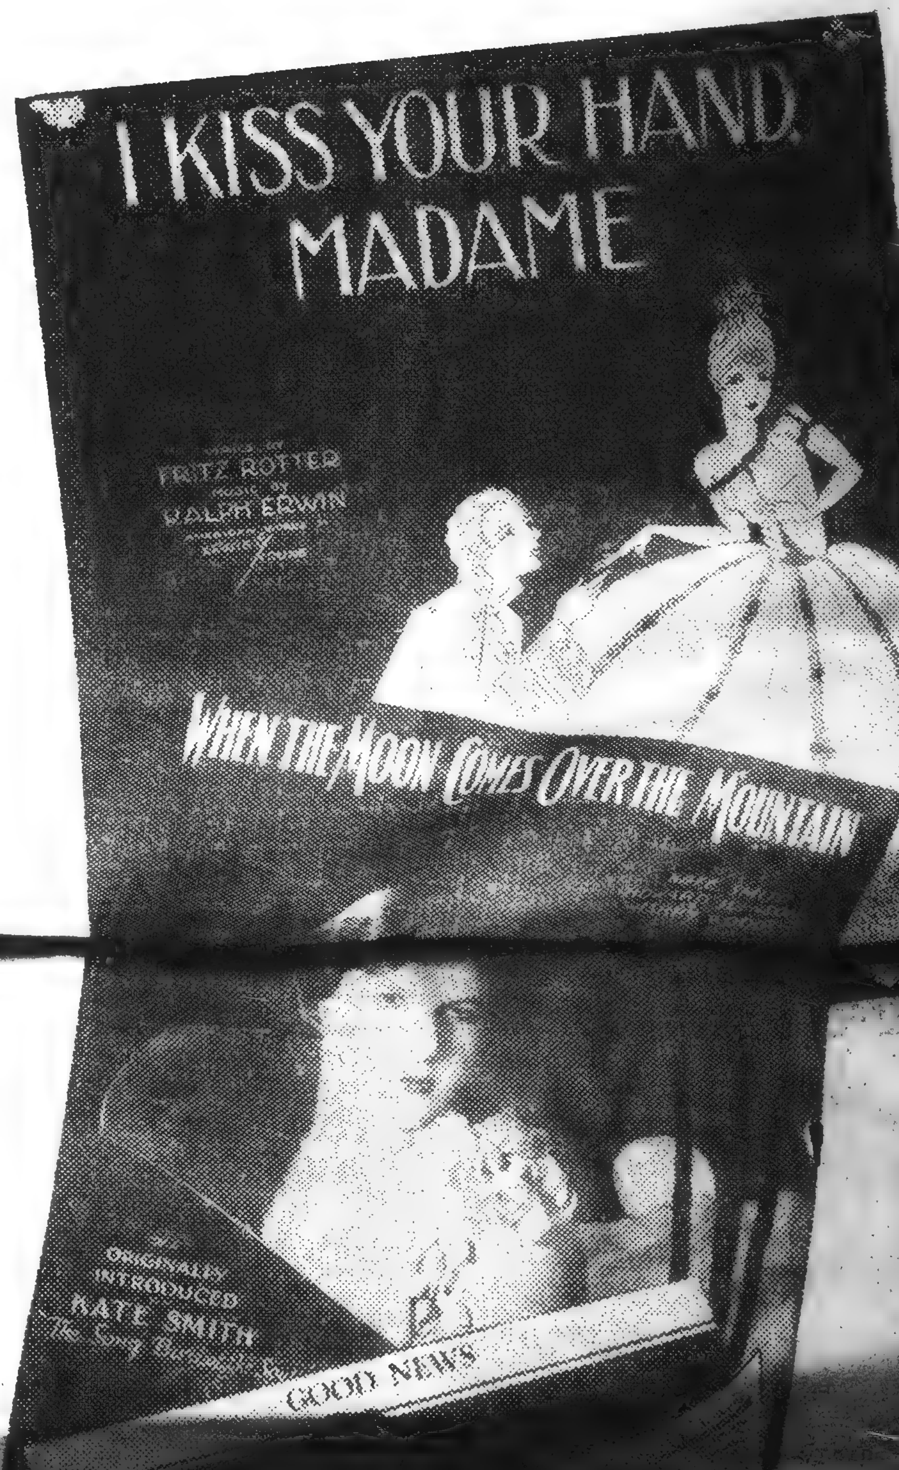
Still, it is perfectly true that George M. Cohan wrote "Over There" in one evening and it became a smash-hit. It would seem that songs based on current labor conditions would attract attention. Come to think of it, there was a "sit down" song not long ago. And I believe that Jean Harlow's death recently inspired a couple of song writers.

There are song cycles dictated by changing manners as well [illegible] period, a cake-walk surge, a "mammy" decade, a "follies" series.

Gene Buck wrote most of the Ziegfeld "Follies" songs, and while no one song may ever have been the best of the year, his contributions to American popular songs are significant. It was of Buck that Victor Herbert, another great writer of popular songs (several of which have become semi-classical) said, "I think God made Gene Buck and then sat around feeling good all day."

Sometimes if you have a "big" name, you can write a lot of songs which become popular because you wrote them. In other words, the offerings of song writers like Irving Berlin, George M. Cohan, Rudolf Friml, George Gershwin, Victor Herbert, Jerome Kern, Sigmund Romberg, Oley Speaks, Cole Porter, Moss Hart will always receive attention.

CARUSO PLUGGED ONE, TOO



I KISS YOUR HAND, MADAME
Fritz Rotter
Ralph Erwin
WHEN THE MOON COMES OVER THE MOUNTAIN
Originally Introduced
Kate Smith
Good News

steamed out the most popular songs of the era. Every Bostonian knew, for example, when "Alexander's Ragtime Band" was the hit-song.

Times have changed in a quarter of a century—and songs have changed, too.

Today Arthur Fiedler, Boston's best known musician, a distinguished conductor who has made a lifelong study of music and of audiences, gives Boston Sunday Post readers a rare treat:

He selects for them—from his own memory—the best 25 popular songs of the last 25 years.

Suggestions for the programme of Old-Timers' Night at the Pops, to be held this Friday, have also aided Mr. Fiedler in reminding him of former popular tunes.

Modestly he points out that he is no authority on popular music—and adds that he doesn't want to be.

He sets forth his selection with the following comment: If these songs remind you of former days, of happier days,

BY ARTHUR FIEDLER

(Conductor of Boston Pops Orchestra, Esplanade Concerts, Boston Sinfonietta, Cecilia Society Chorus)

Let me make it perfectly clear that I do not consider myself to be an authority on popular songs. But I do have my own peculiar taste, my personal preferences and also a fairly good memory.

Perhaps it would be well to emphasize these factors: I become acquainted with a popular song long after the typical Bostonian runs into them. My professional musical duties are such that I can spend little time listening to popular songs on the radio, at the theatre or in ballrooms and night clubs.

'Twere best to make such confessions early, for any person who has the temerity to select the best 25 popular songs of the last 25 years is sure to start an argument. Still—I am perfectly willing to start a controversy over music at any time.

I'd much prefer that people would become all stirred up over symphonies or over classical music, but anything which I can do to make people interested in music I consider effort well expended. Besides a tremendous number of persons who are interested in popular songs are also interested in classical music.

That's something which couldn't have been said a decade ago—except as wishful thinking. Yet in the last 10 years, because of radio and talking pictures, the public's musical intelligence has been raised appreciably.

So that, I honestly believe that there are fewer musical illiterates in the United States today than at any time in our history.

Also the request programmes for Pops concerts reveal an astonishing change in Bostonian musical taste. And the Esplanade concerts, presented before a cross-section of our townspeople, reveal that the heavier and headier musical selections are beginning to appeal to tremendous multitudes. Increased attendance both at Pops and at the Esplanade prove this conclusively.

But about popular songs:

Twenty-five years ago the American scene and American life were so different from what they are today that, to stare back into this near-past, is almost like looking back 100 years. The automobile had not yet changed a nation's living habits: the airplane was a puny infant ("It will never amount to much":) the phonograph was prominent only in the "parlors" of the wealthy; radio had not yet been born; the movies were still more interesting because the images moved than because of the story which they told.

It was every family's ambition to own a piano. That instrument indicated definitely that a family had reached the upper middle class income brackets. It did not, however, necessarily prove that the purchasers had suddenly become musical. That is to say, a vast number of pianos were bought as furniture showpieces.

Back in 1912 a popular song was really popular. And it is easy to select the most popular song of that year or for the next few years. In fact, the only problem in selection is finding "the" most popular song of 1912—for that same song may also have been the most popular song of 1910.

Gene Buck, one of the nation's great song writers and president of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers, accounted for change in that condition as follows:

"In the old days it took three or four years for an American song to sink into the hearts of the American people. Today 600 broadcasting stations can kill a song in six weeks."

It took a lot of parlor singing to make a song popular 25 years ago. A song introduced in New York in 1911 might become popular by 1912. Take "Alexander's Ragtime Band," for example. That song appeared in New York in 1911. The next year every steam calliope in Revere Beach beeped and blatted the tune.

Until after the war, you could tell the most popular tune and song locally by listening to what they played at the beach. In those days, a visit to Revere was an event and if somebody rode on the ferris wheel, he remembered not only that, but also the song which the steam organ played as he went up and over.

ARTHUR FIEDLER'S LIST
of the
Best 25 Popular Songs of Last 25 Years

1912	Alexander's Ragtime Band	Irving Berlin
1913	El Choclo	Valloldo
1914	Missouri Waltz	Logan
1915	There's a Long, Long Trail	S. K. Elliott
1916	Keep Your Head Down, Fritzy Boy	Murphy-David
1917	Over There	George M. Cohan
1918	K-K-K-Katy	Geoffrey O'Hara
1919	Dardanella	Bernard-Black-Fisher
1921	Say It With Music	Irving Berlin
1922	Kiss in the Dark	DeSylva-Herbert
1923	Yes, We Have No Bananas	Silver-Cohen
1924	Indian Love Call	Friml
1925	Tea for Two	Harbach-Youmans
1926	Black Bottom	DeSylva-Brown-Henderson
1927	Sonny Boy	DeSylva-Brown-Henderson
1928	I Kiss Your Hand, Madame	Erwin-Ratten
1929	Just a Gigolo	Leonello Cassuci
1930	Sing Something Simple	Herman Hupfeld
1931	When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain	Smith-Johnson-Woods
1932	Brother, Can You Spare a Dime?	Harburg-Gorney
1933	Who's Afraid of the Big, Bad Wolf	Ann Ronell
1934	Love in Bloom	Robin-Rainger
1935	When I Grow Too Old to Dream	Hammerstein-Romberg
1936	Beautiful Lady in Blue	Lewis-Coots

HOW TIMES HAVE CHANGED

In 1912 you could walk the length of Revere Beach and hear "Alexander's Ragtime Band" from one end to another. Today things are very different. Not long ago "The Music Goes 'Round and 'Round" was a smash hit. Radio stations played the tune more than 100 times daily. Over-playing killed that song in three weeks. Yet if that song had been written in 1912, it might have lasted for years.

Which brings up the very difficult question of what makes a song popular. It is fairly easy, I believe, to take any song and to explain—after it reaches the peak—why it is popular. It is an entirely different thing to say at any given time what sort of song will take the nation physically by the ears.

There is some general belief that if you write a song about "Mother" or about "I Love You" that you can't miss. The simple truth of the matter is that a mother or "love" song has the smallest chance of becoming a hit—even though it may have the best chance of being published. There are more than 300 songs entitled "Mother," and more than 200 entitled "I Love You"—but how many of them can you sing?

A nonsense song, you might believe, would become popular at any time. "Yes, We Have No Bananas," published in 1923, a prize bit of nonsense, sold more than 3,000,000 copies. Today, "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off"—not too different from the banana business—is also a smash hit. Still, during the 14-year interval, how many nonsense songs were written and how few became enduring national favorites?

SOME RARE OLD NONSENSE SONGS

Some of the old-time nonsense songs were quickly forgotten. Who remembers today the song entitled "Who Threw the Overalls in Mistress Murphy's Chowder?" "Said the Naughty Little Bird on Nellie's Hat," "Heinz Is Pickled Again," "How Would You Like to Be the Ice Man?" or "A Little Bit Off the Top"?

So you can't say that a nonsense song is an inevitable "tops." Sometimes a dancer will set the style for tunes, and during the era when Maurice dictated the American ballroom dance and when Gaby desLys and the Vernon Castles had a tremendous vogue, they influenced popular songs to the same extent that Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers do today.

The 25-year era which we are considering is marked by sensational changes in the dance. In 1912, the quadrille was being challenged by rag-time. The turkey trot, rags, waltz, two-step, one-step, jazz, tango and swing eras have appeared since. And as each dance variant became known, the songs of the day were influenced. Twenty-five years ago it was "Everybody's time songs are beginning to have a vogue.

Therefore, if you can foretell the dances, you have a fairly good chance of writing some of the songs of that nation. One good way of getting attention by means of a popular song—even though a best seller may not result—is by keeping abreast of the news. So, when a Lindbergh flies the Atlantic, write a song that night and it will get attention. A great many Lindy songs were written, but how many are remembered now?

A SMASH-HIT OVERNIGHT

Still, it is perfectly true that George M. Cohan wrote "Over There" in one evening and it became a smash-hit. It would seem that songs based on current labor conditions would attract attention. Come to think of it, there was a "sit down" song not long ago. And I believe that Jean Harlow's death recently inspired a couple of song writers.

There are song cycles dictated by changing manners as well songs. There was a "blues" period, a cake-walk surge, a "mammy" decade, a "follies" series.

Gene Buck wrote most of the Ziegfeld "Follies" songs, and while no one song may ever have been the best of the year, his contributions to American popular songs are significant. It was of Buck that Victor Herbert, another great writer of popular songs (several of which have become semi-classical) said, "I think God made Gene Buck and then sat around feeling good all day."

Sometimes if you have a "big" name, you can write a lot of songs which become popular because you wrote them. In other words, the offerings of song writers like Irving Berlin, George M. Cohan, Rudolf Friml, George Gershwin, Victor Herbert, Jerome Kern, Sigmund Romberg, Oley Speaks, Cole Porter, Moss Hart will always receive attention.

CARUSO PLUGGED ONE, TOO

Then again, a singer can make a song famous. Fritzi Scheff, Fannie Brice, Nora Bayes, Dennis King, John McCormack, Jules Bledsoe, Paul Robeson, John Charles Thomas, Roland Hayes and many others "plugged" songs to success. Perhaps the most famous song plugger of all time was Enrico Caruso who, in 1909, won lasting success for Pestalozza's "Ciribiribin" by singing it.

Everyone will recall, during the days when the movie mansions vied with each other in the purchase and installation of super-super console grand organs, how, between movie epic and news-reel, somebody would come on the stage and "plug" a song.

Many a song was made popular by movie house pluggers, by vaudevillains and by organists. That, of course, was in the pre-talkie era and before radio became an important industry. The song plugger has not disappeared even now. Rudy Vallee plugged the "Maine Stein Song" to fame as well as several others. Present-day pluggers are, besides Vallee, Paul Whiteman, Kate Smith, Phil Spitalny, Wayne King and George Olsen.

I don't know that there are more popular songs today than there have been. That there are more songs is obvious, but that they are more popular than the old-timers is greatly to be doubted. Means for exploiting songs are much more adequate today. A song which is a smash-hit in New York becomes a hit the same night in Boston—if it has been broadcast.

There are many things which affect a man's judgment. In agreeing to put together my list of 25 bests, I thought that the task would be easy. All there was to do was to write down the songs which I remembered best, check on the date of issuance and select one for each year.

The task became much more complicated than that once I began it. I discovered by listing the songs which came to my mind that there was a tendency to bunch them by periods—the war period, the dry era and so on.

Then, when I checked on the list of all popular songs published since 1912, I discovered scores of songs which, I knew instantly, were better than those which I had listed off-hand. Then the problem became one of selecting from among many—one annual song, to be called my favorite. This was difficult because in some years there were no songs which were exactly top-knotch while, in other years, there were several.

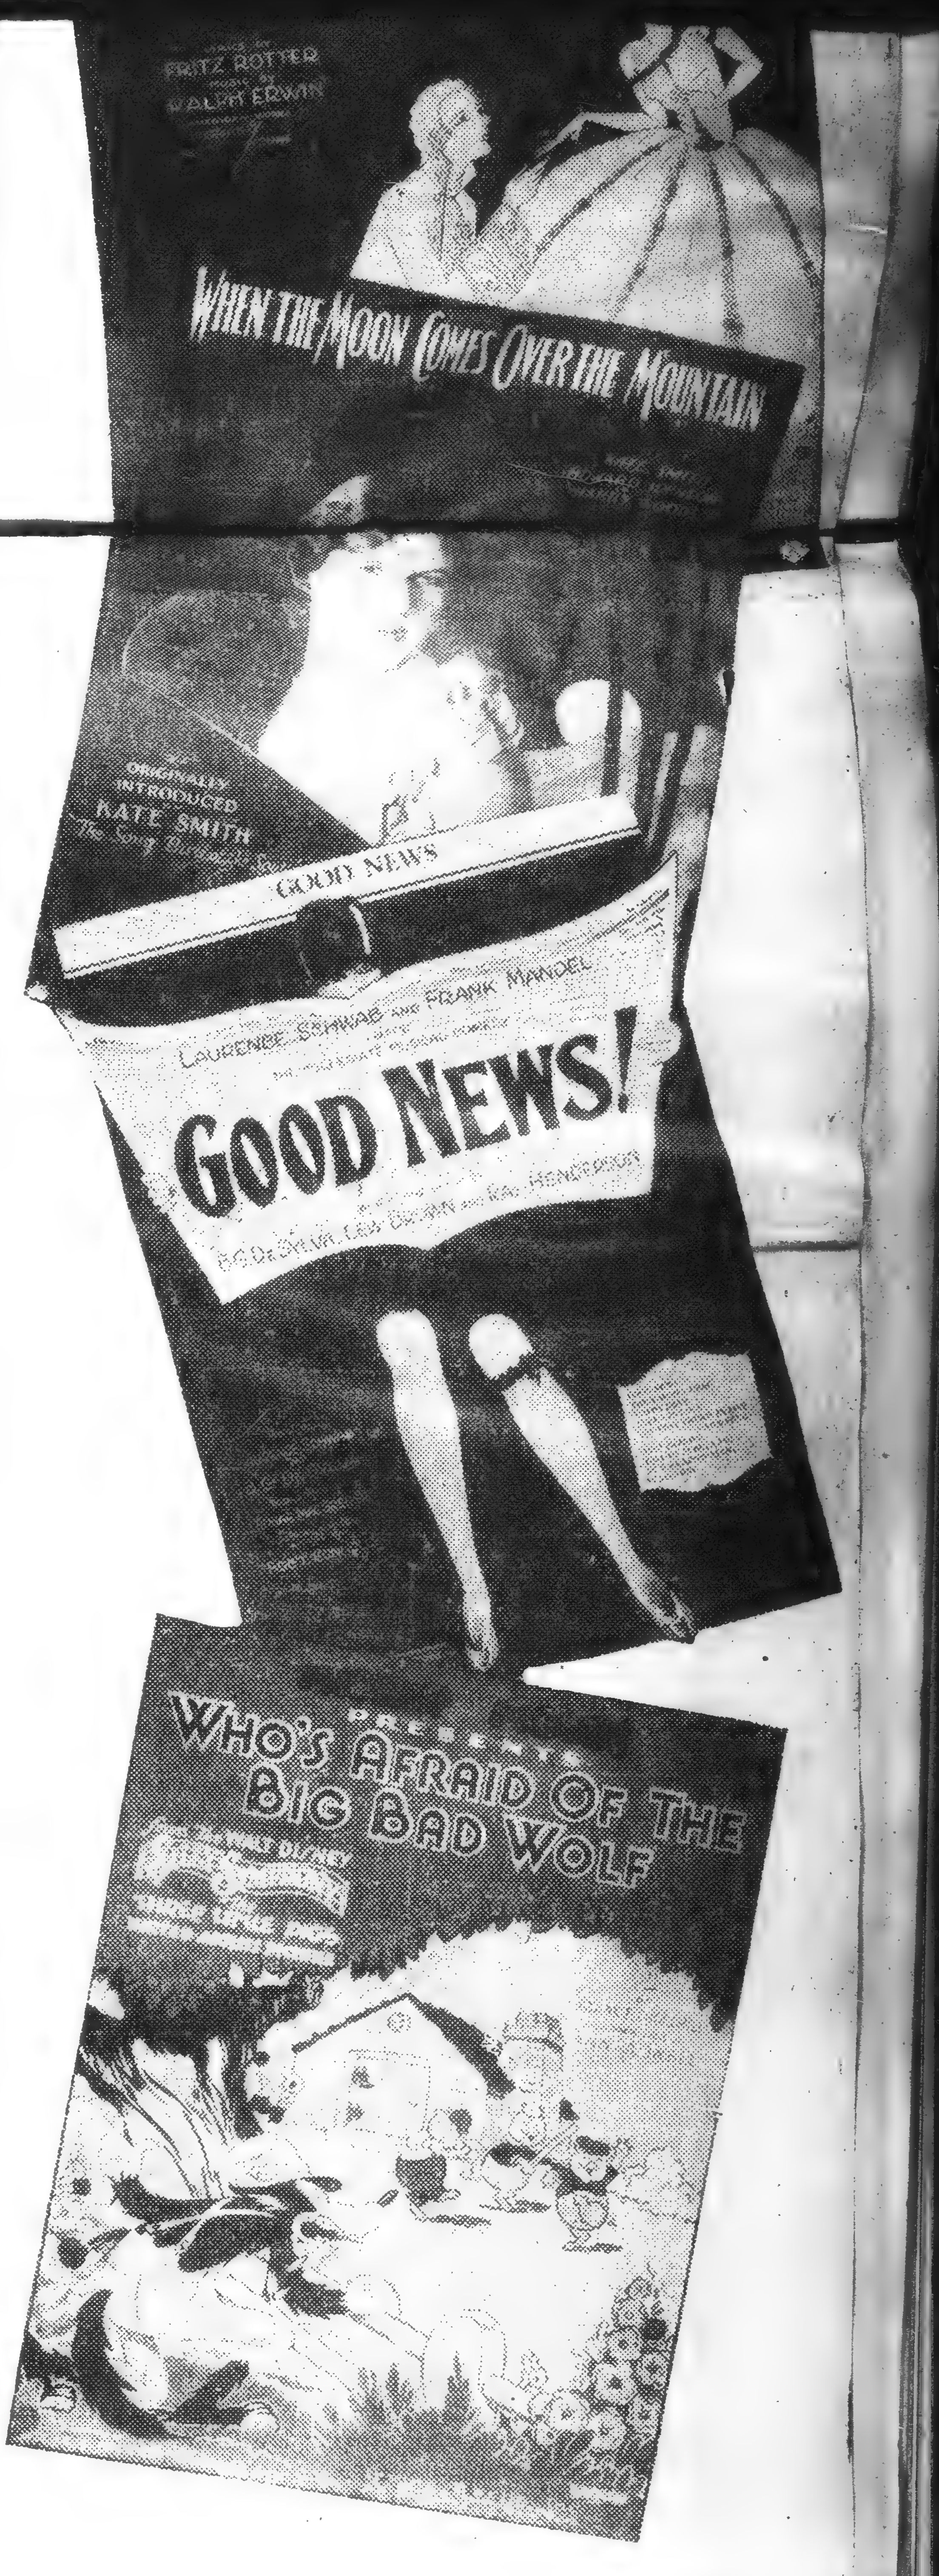
It would have been easier, I learned quickly, to list my 25 favorite songs of the past 25 years without respect to any given year. But the problem set before me was to select one for each of the 25 years.

So all I can say is that I have done my best. If I had known how much work there was to the assignment, I wouldn't have done it.

Also, if I had known that I was to make myself slightly miserable because of debates with myself, I wouldn't have done it. In the last analysis, however, I believe that the listing—however inadequate it may be; however much it may disagree with your opinions (and I am the first to insist that your ideas may be better than mine) still does indicate a trend in popular musical history.

If these songs remind you of former days, of happier days, of your passing youth, of fun—then, I think, they have achieved their purpose.

It is in this spirit that I offer you my list of the 25 "bests" of the last 25 years.



Fritz Rotter
Ralph Erwin
When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain
Originally introduced Kate Smith
Good News
Laurence Schwab and Frank Mandel
Good News!
Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Wolf
Walt Disney

How many of them do you remember? Jackets of the songs you sang yesteryear. (Courtesy of the Boston Music Company.)

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 62

BSO

1937 - 1938

Ward's
STATIONERS
57-61 FRANKLIN ST.
BOSTON

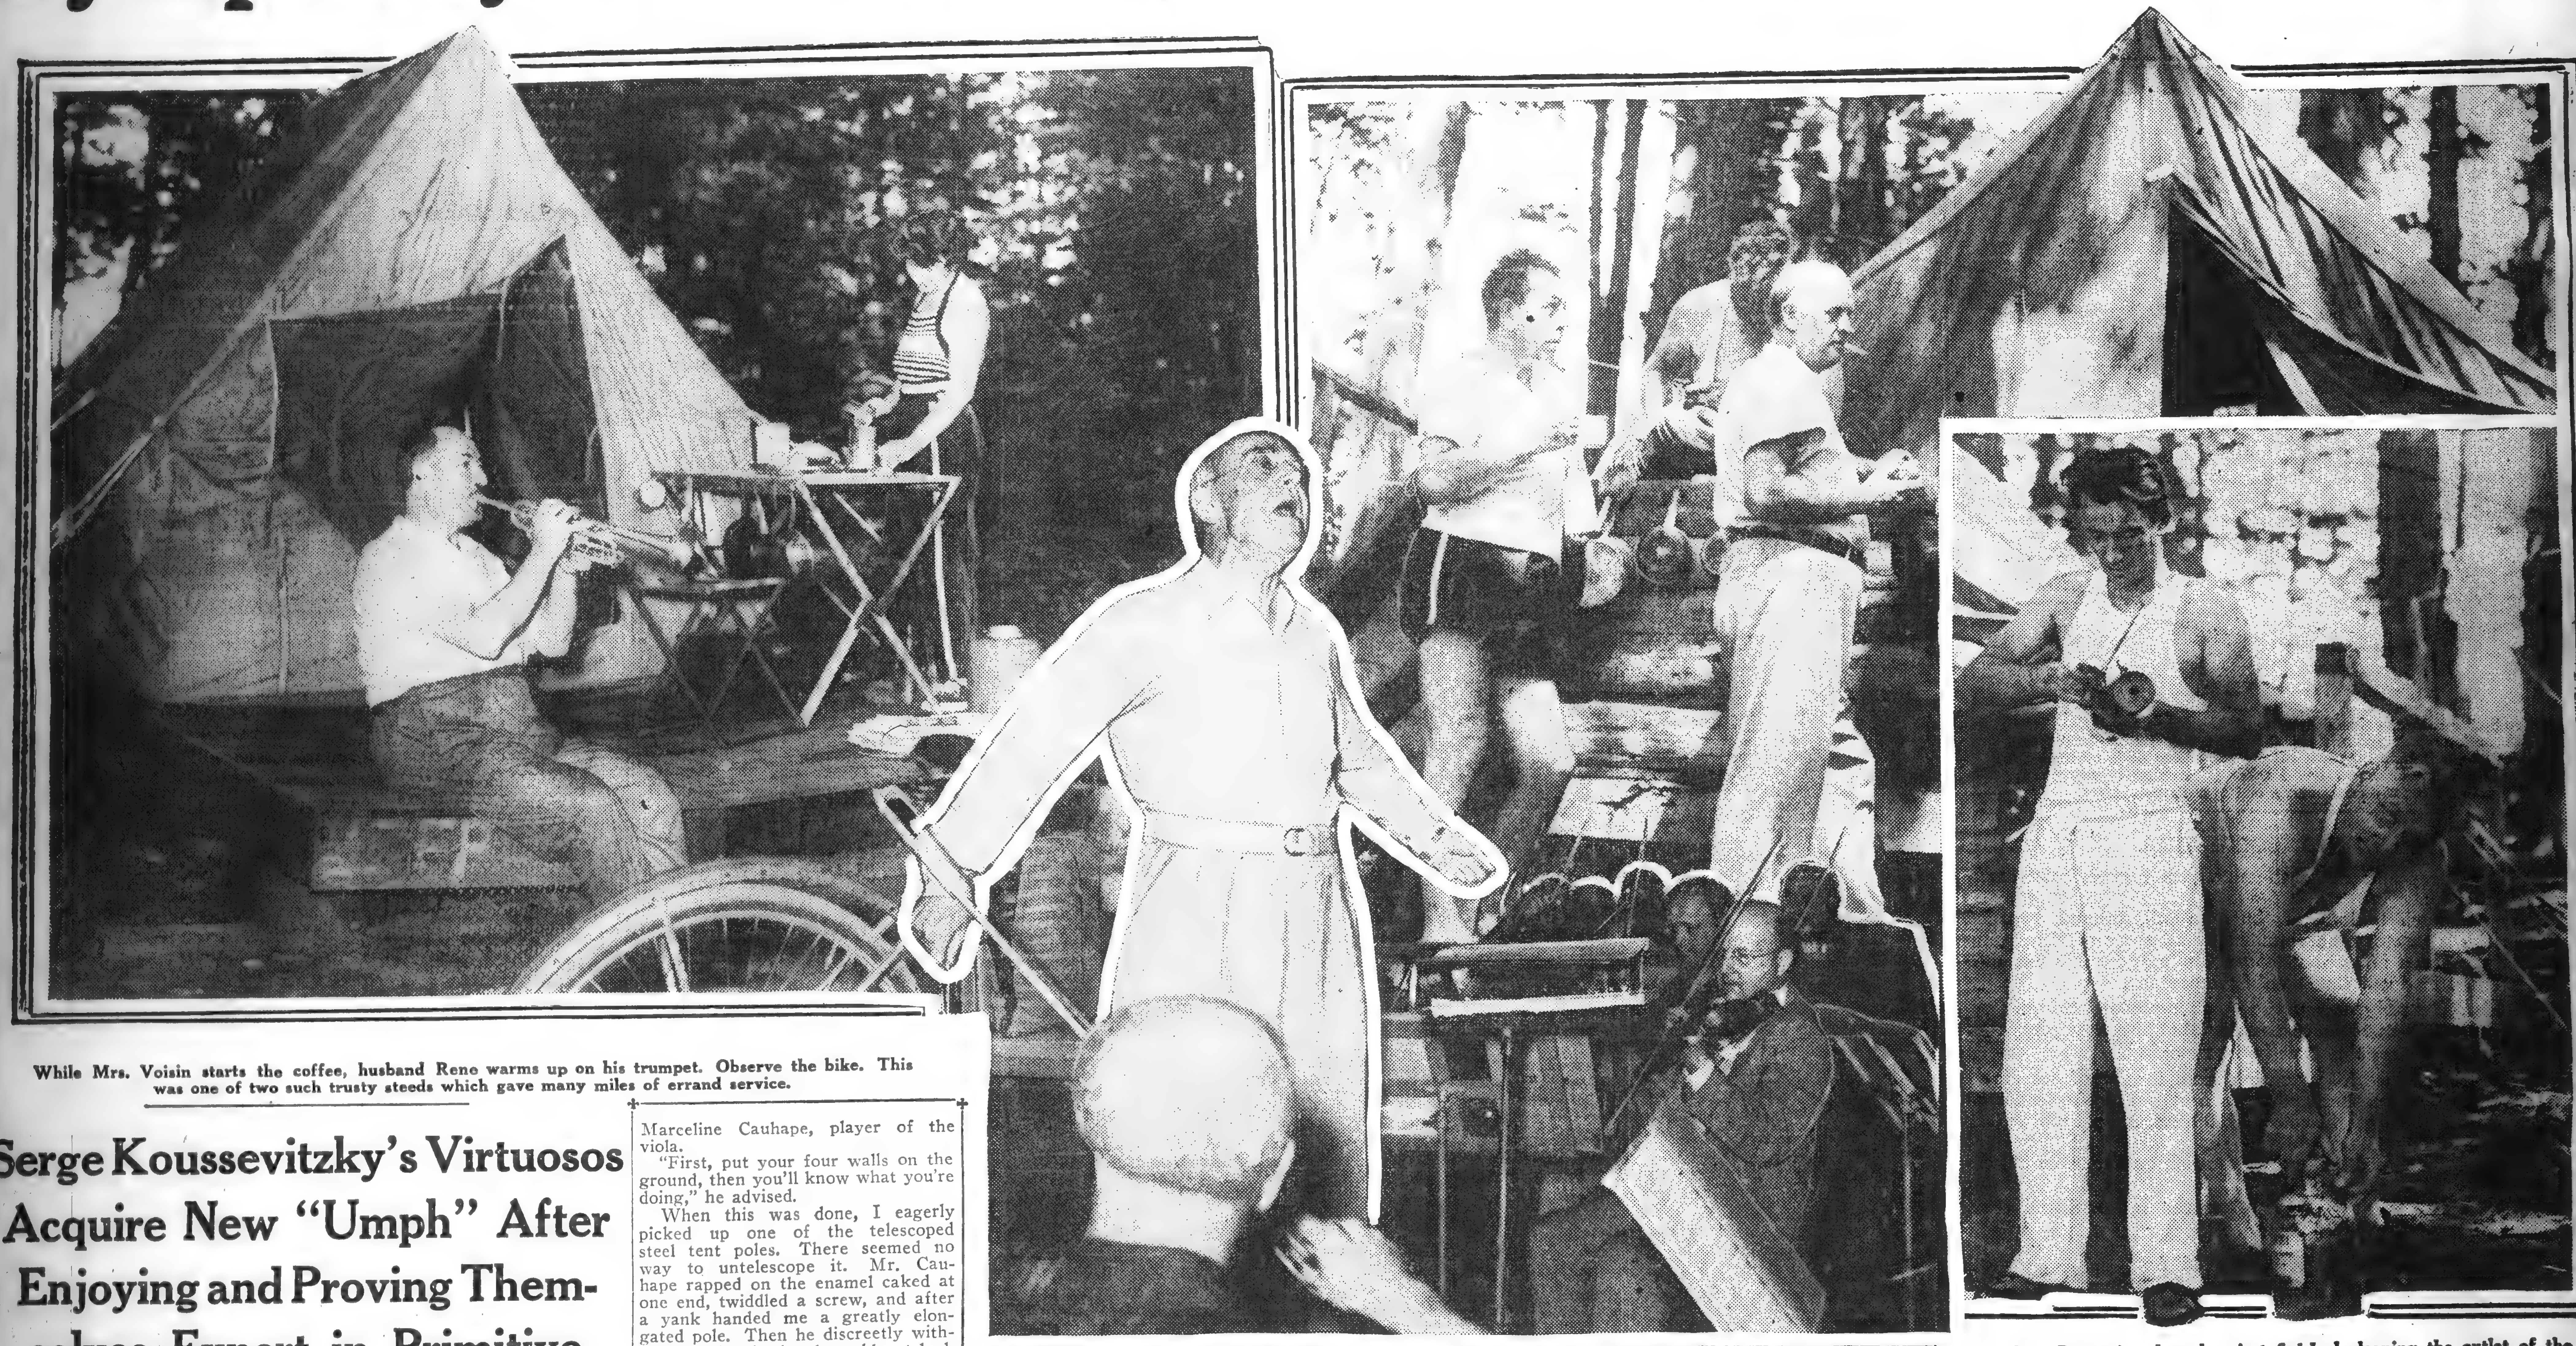
+ 911

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Symphony Men Rough It in Wilderness Tents



While Mrs. Voisin starts the coffee, husband Rene warms up on his trumpet. Observe the bike. This was one of two such trusty steeds which gave many miles of errand service.

Upper insert—Siegfried Gerhardt, viola (in centre), reaches for the water jug for Rene Jacob, viola (at left). Henry Stanislaus, English horn, is about to munch an apple. The sound of a friend's auto horn makes the latter two cock their ears and eyes to identify the horn.

Lower insert—When Koussevitzky signaled for more "umph" at a concert, the campers led in giving plenty of umph. Incidentally, this shows the great conductor, famous for the tailoring perfection of his formal attire, as he looked when the heat of the acoustic shell made him conduct in his shirtsleeves for the first time in his life in public.

Jean Devergie, oboe, has just finished cleaning the outlet of the tank of his gasolene stove. Siegfried Gerhardt starts to give him some fuel, then looks up to be sure no one has a lighted match or cigarette near by.

Serge Koussevitzky's Virtuosos Acquire New "Umph" After Enjoying and Proving Themselves Expert in Primitive Camp Life in Berkshires

BY ROBERT HUME

If you were to be marooned on a desert island with your choice of just two sets of companions, would life be easier with a squad of Boy Scouts, or with three viola players, two trumpeters, an English horn player and an oboist from the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Be careful in your decision.

The Symphony men would have the edge on the Boy Scouts.

Marceline Cauhape, player of the viola.

"First, put your four walls on the ground, then you'll know what you're doing," he advised.

When this was done, I eagerly picked up one of the telescoped steel tent poles. There seemed no way to untelescope it. Mr. Cauhape rapped on the enamel caked at one end, twiddled a screw, and after a yank handed me a greatly elongated pole. Then he discreetly withdrew so that husband would not look too helpless to wife.

With feigned assurance, I drove the tent pegs, while Mrs. Hume steadied the ridgepole as she stood inside the canvas.

"I'll tighten these ropes, and then we'll be all set," I called elatedly. With a good heave I grasped a rope, and the tent came over with it.

"You should have studied the viola!" came a feminine voice from a figure weirdly festooned in canvas.

The tent was soon up again. When a heavy rainstorm burst, all the tents remained staunch, and their inhabitants dry. As soon as the flood stopped, the drenched firewood artificial lures, the fisherman decided to try worms.

Knowing that his tent-mate was interested in Indian relics, he reminded him that there was supposed to be an Indian council-place near venient "side-kick" to Roger in camping—as was his mother.

Rene proved to be a very able carpenter, building a compact cooking shanty. Here Mrs. Voisin performed culinary wonders with a kerocanoeing and swimming—to say nothing of finishing the day at an outdoor banquet table.

Under the trying conditions of a concert repeatedly interrupted by the noise of heavy rain on the roof of the pavilion, the orchestra astonished the audience by playing brilliantly, instead of being a prey to nervous slip-ups. A good deal of the credit should go to the open air life at Lake Mahceenac.

Koussevitzky himself thinks that the camp life was good for his virtuosos.

"What could be better," he remarked to me, after a tour of observation at the camp, "than for musical artists to live close to nature, such a great source of musical inspiration? I would like to do it myself next year, if I could find the time away from my duties.

"Next year, I think at least half the orchestra will demand to live in tents."

Serge Koussevitzky's Virtuosos Acquire New "Umph" After Enjoying and Proving Themselves Expert in Primitive Camp Life in Berkshires

BY ROBERT HUME

If you were to be marooned on a desert island with your choice of just two sets of companions, would life be easier with a squad of Boy Scouts, or with three viola players, two trumpeters, an English horn player and an oboist from the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Be careful in your decision.

The Symphony men would have the edge on the Boy Scouts.

That is my conviction after sampling the camping abilities of the musicians mentioned, by camping with them for 11 days.

When the orchestra arrived at Lenox to play in the Berkshire festival, which ended last Sunday, these men pitched tents on the shore of Lake Mahkeenac. They made themselves so comfortable there, and thrived so well on their own campfire cooking, that they were envied by their colleagues who came from hotels to visit them.

CAME A STORM

On a Thursday at 2 o'clock, the orchestra's great conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, had called a rehearsal. The musical campers drove their cars 180 miles from Boston to Lenox as well equipped for life in the open as a squad of seasoned Maine guides.

In jig-time they pitched their tents beside Lake Mahkeenac, and, reporting promptly at the huge concert pavilion a mile away, put in an intensive rehearsal. The session served as a laboratory test of the sound-projecting qualities of the plywood acoustic shell within which they were to play inside the pavilion.

Koussevitzky turned the orchestra over to Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor, while he listened out front. Then he conducted and Burgin listened. As a result, the men received important special instructions as to how much tone each group of instruments should deliver in relation to each other group, for proper tonal balance as controlled by the acoustic shell.

Soon after the rehearsal ended, the campers were busy perfecting their camping arrangements. A storm was coming up.

The Way to Do It

This reporter, who had never taken charge of hoisting a tent, was wallowing in canvas and uncertainty as he and his wife attempted to get a roof over their heads before the storm broke. The number of corners he encountered in unpacking the tent seemed unbelievable. What the corners belonged to—roof, wall, floor-edge, front, back—was a baffling problem. But it was all very clear to tent-neighbor Jean Louis Marceline Cauhape, player of the viola.

"First, put your four walls on the ground, then you'll know what you're doing," he advised.

When this was done, I eagerly picked up one of the telescoped steel tent poles. There seemed no way to untelescope it. Mr. Cauhape rapped on the enamel caked at one end, twiddled a screw, and after a yank handed me a greatly elongated pole. Then he discreetly withdrew so that husband would not look too helpless to wife.

With feigned assurance, I drove the tent pegs, while Mrs. Hume steadied the ridgepole as she stood inside the canvas.

"I'll tighten these ropes, and then we'll be all set," I called elatedly. With a good heave I grasped a rope, and the tent came over with it.

"You should have studied the viola!" came a feminine voice from a figure weirdly festooned in canvas.

The tent was soon up again. When a heavy rainstorm burst, all the tents remained staunch, and their inhabitants dry. As soon as the flood stopped, the drenched firewood was abandoned, and suppers were cooked over gasolene stoves and one kerosene burning seaman's stove.

Swift Transitions

Clad in bathing trunks, the campers washed their dishes in the lake and withdrew inside their tents. Soon they emerged in dress suits. Going to the concert pavilion early so as to warm up on their instruments, they gave magnificent performances throughout an all-Beethoven programme.

It was a dazzling display of versatility to see those men make such swift and cool-headed transitions from woodcraft to musical virtuosity and back again on that first day of the festival. And they kept it up with as much unconcern as ducks alternating between water and land. No camper ever mixed up his camping and his orchestral functions so far as to fail to arrive early at rehearsals and concerts.

After rehearsal on the second day, the tent colony had light lunches, then they boated, canoed, fished and swam. Toward dusk, food preparations were started by the cooking experts—Jean Devergie, oboe; Henry Stanislaus, English horn; Jean Cauhape, viola. Their tent-mates went foraging for firewood—Leslie Rogers, librarian of music; Siegfried Gerhardt, viola; Rene Jacob, viola.

Soon in front of the tents there was the crackle of flames, the bubbling of coffee pots perched on them, the simmer of thick iron kettles dangling from cross bars above them, the sizzle of frying pans. Nostrils were regaled with the tang of wood smoke shot through with odors of coffee, stew, bacon.

Where did those born in Europe get their American camping technique? They were initiated by Yankee members of the orchestra and the experience "took" for good.

The English-born Stanislaus—usually called "Stanny"—went in for plain and hearty fare. Devergie, native of Marseilles, produced what can only be summed up as some of the most complicated culinary compositions known to the camp. Perhaps the greatest of his compositions was spaghetti a la Marseillaise. A present of some of it aroused the enthusiasm of Mrs. Hume. She sent me over to its creator's tent to get the recipe.

"Oh, you will have to sit down while I explain that," Devergie said. "I cook it in olive oil, I put in dried mushrooms and carrots, and—"

"And everything that grows," Rogers finished for him.

"For that you will now wash all the dishes," the affronted chef told his tent-mate. "I am going fishing."

Champion Fisherman

Devergie was the champion fisherman of the camp. He produced some pretty good specimens of bass and pickerel. Perhaps some of his success, however, should be attributed to ethnological maneuvres. Although supplied with very handsome artificial lures, the fisherman decided to try worms.

Knowing that his tent-mate was interested in Indian relics, he reminded him that there was supposed to be an Indian council-place near their tent, and urged him to dig for arrow heads. This suggestion was acted upon by Rogers. Devergie waited a little, then salvaged the fishworms turned up by the excavation.

Hearing of Rogers' quest for Indian relics, I dropped in on him. He was moodily chewing his pipestem.

"Make any finds?" I asked eagerly.

"Mmm! Dug down two feet—and found an olive bottle!"

Cauhape was very resourceful in his cooking arrangements. From a big round rock, not too thick and not so thin as to crack in the fire, he made a grill with which he worked wonders. With a long iron rod to which he added a wooden grip, he cooked the most delicious roast chicken on-the-spit. His omelet with croutons also was splendid.

Converts to Camp Life

Every so often one pair of tenters would invite his neighbors in camp, or some of his hotel-dwelling colleagues to dine. At these banquets many converts were made to camp life. They would vow that that was the life for them at next year's festival.

The first convert to suit action to words was Roger Voisin, 19-year-old trumpeter. After a visit to the camp, he rushed to Pittsfield with his parents, and went shopping for supplies and a tent, which was soon up. His father, Rene, who plays beside him in the orchestra was a very convenient "side-kick" to Roger in camping—as was his mother.

Rene proved to be a very able carpenter, building a compact cooking shanty. Here Mrs. Voisin performed culinary wonders with a kerosene stove. It was the handsomest stove in camp. With its handsome enamel and streamlining, it aroused queries as to whether it had short-wave radio reception and a record-playing attachment. The cooking department of Roger's camping remained in the hands of his mother, assisted by his father. But he made a big contribution to camp life by rowing across the lake daily to fill water jugs with excellent spring water.

Camp Alarm Clock

On the first morning he awoke in his tent, Roger elected himself to the position of camp alarm clock, by a powerful trumpet performance of reveille. Some severe remarks issued from the other tents. And about 2 o'clock the following morning, from a tent near Roger's, there came blasting and blatting a viola player's attempt to play reveille on a trombone. It was something to hear, and impossible to forget. Roger gave up functioning as camp alarm clock after that.

Speaking of music in the camp, an unforgettable pleasure was hearing the liquid tones of Devergie's oboe, coming through the night as some of us sat by the embers of a fire, while he went a little distance among the trees—as if to obtain the separation between stage and audience—and played solos for us.

The presence of friends in the camp served to stimulate many other players to spend hours boating, canoeing and swimming—to say nothing of finishing the day at an outdoor banquet table.

Under the trying conditions of a concert repeatedly interrupted by the noise of heavy rain on the roof of the pavilion, the orchestra astonished the audience by playing brilliantly, instead of being a prey to nervous slip-ups. A good deal of the credit should go to the open air life at Lake Mahceenac.

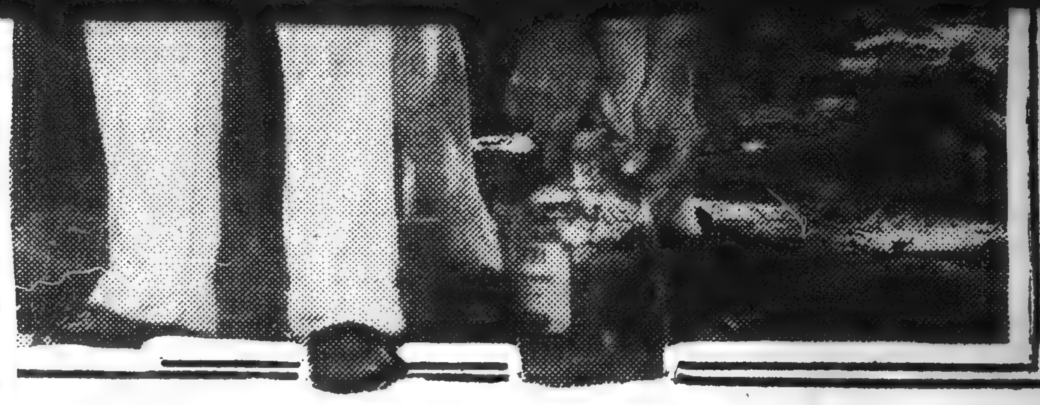
Koussevitzky himself thinks that the camp life was good for his virtuosos.

"What could be better," he remarked to me, after a tour of observation at the camp, "than for musical artists to live close to nature, such a great source of musical inspiration? I would like to do it myself next year, if I could find the time away from my duties.

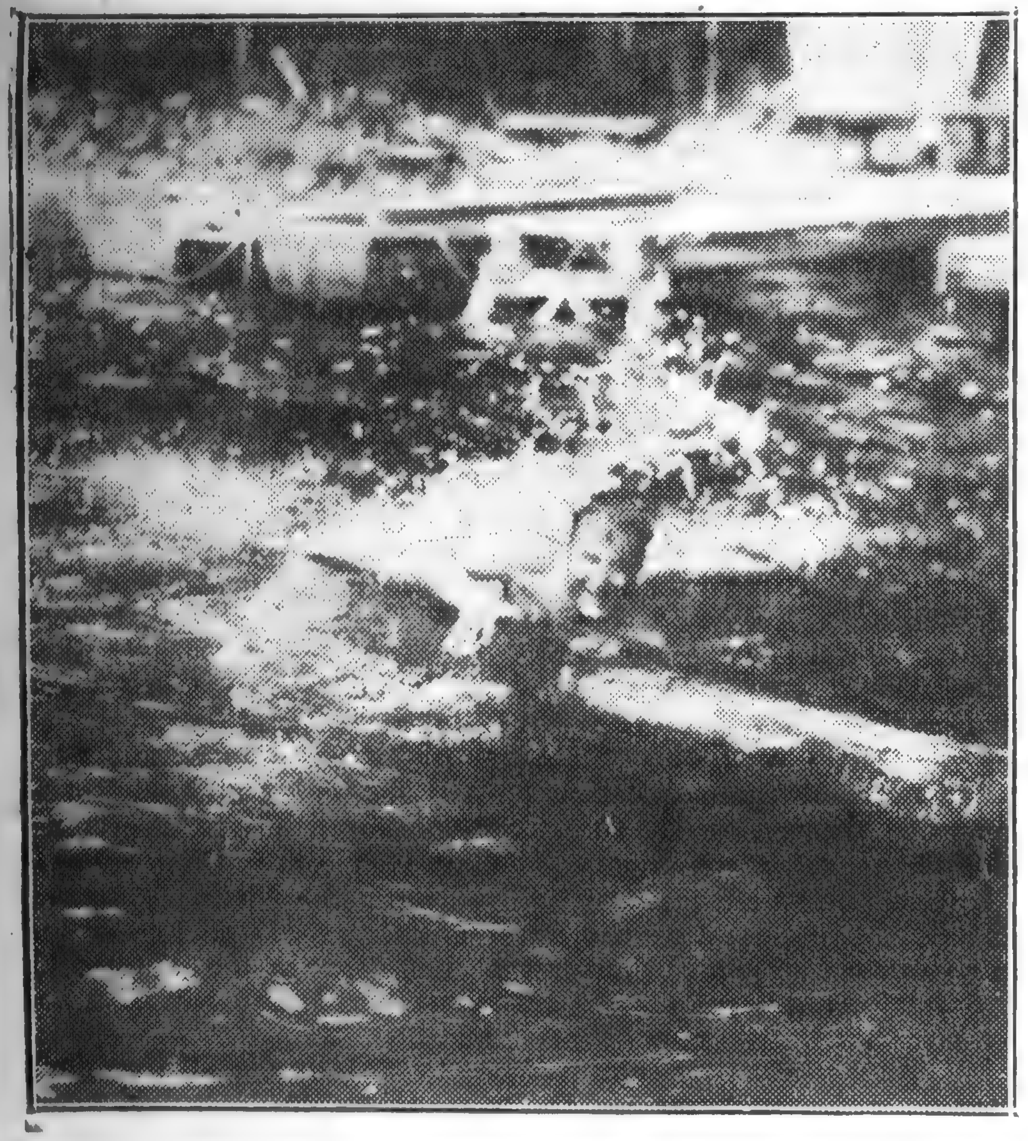
"Next year, I think at least half the orchestra will demand to live in tents."

Upper insert—Siegfried Gerhardt, viola (in centre), reaches for the water jug for Rene Jacob, viola (at left). Henry Stanislaus, English horn, is about to munch an apple. The sound of a friend's auto horn makes the latter two cock their ears and eyes to identify the horn.

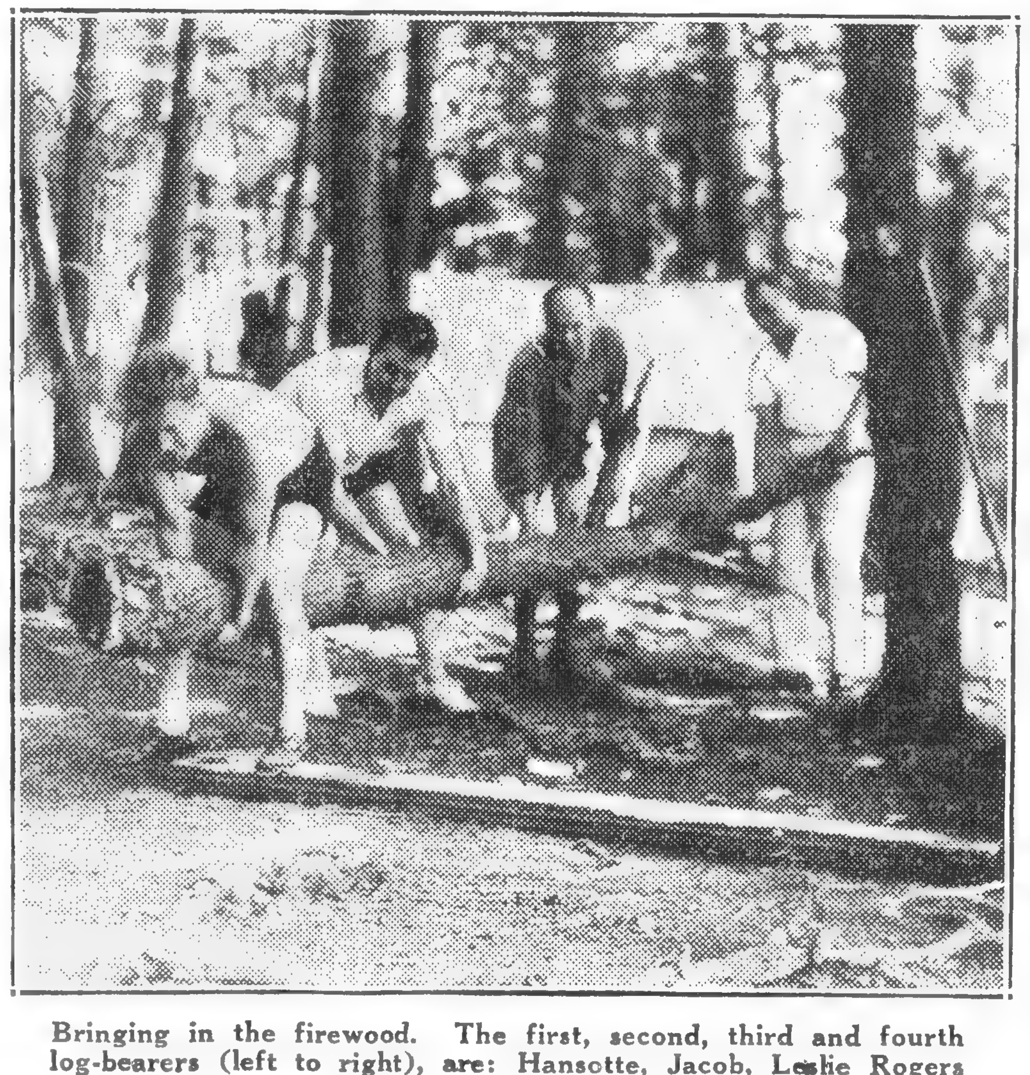
Lower insert—When Koussevitzky signaled for more "umph" at a concert, the campers led in giving plenty of umph. Incidentally, this shows the great conductor, famous for the tailoring perfection of his formal attire, as he looked when the heat of the acoustic shell made him conduct in his shirtsleeves for the first time in his life in public.



Jean Devergie, oboe, has just finished cleaning the outlet of the tank of his gasolene stove. Siegfried Gerhardt starts to give him some fuel, then looks up to be sure no one has a lighted match or cigarette near by.



Down goes the trombone! Hansotte sends the water of Lake Mahkeenac flying as he fails to ride the log.



Bringing in the firewood. The first, second, third and fourth log-bearers (left to right), are: Hansotte, Jacob, Leslie Rogers (librarian), Marcel Lannoye (French horn).

Gay Dirndl, New Dance Dress, Lets That "S. A." Loose Again

BY ELEANOR ROBERTS

Gentlemen! The next time you open your morning mail and find a bill in it for:

1 DIRNDL.
1 PAIR PADOVA BOOTS.
1 RIBBON CORSELET.

Calm yourself. Don't—feed the cat to the canary in a fit of frenzy; don't—call up "mine host" of last evening and inquire WHAT in the name of Cho-Cho-San he put into those Carioca Coolers!

For it's only the itemized statement for your wife's or daughter's new evening outfit. It does mean, however, that you will:

a—Have to brush up on your waltzing.

b—Make Sir Walter Raleigh look like an Edgar Rice Burroughs cave man, so chivalrous, so gallant, so chaw-ming will you be.

And if you want to try a left toe-hold, in the parlance of the wrestling ring on the originator of this fashion (wait till you see the price tag), page Schiaparelli, address, Paris, France.

For Your Edification

The dirndl, for your edification, has wrought a drastic change in fashion, for it has heralded the return of the shorter skirt, and skirts are to be definitely just a few inches below the knee this fall.

Never, since the furore caused by the introduction of the knee-length flapper skirt (remember those war-time days when the motif of fashion seemed to be "They shall not sit," so tight were the skirts?) have styles been so fraught with interest. Almost—since Madame Defarge, Paris' No. 1 fashion expert, knitted that going-away jacket for Sidney Carton.

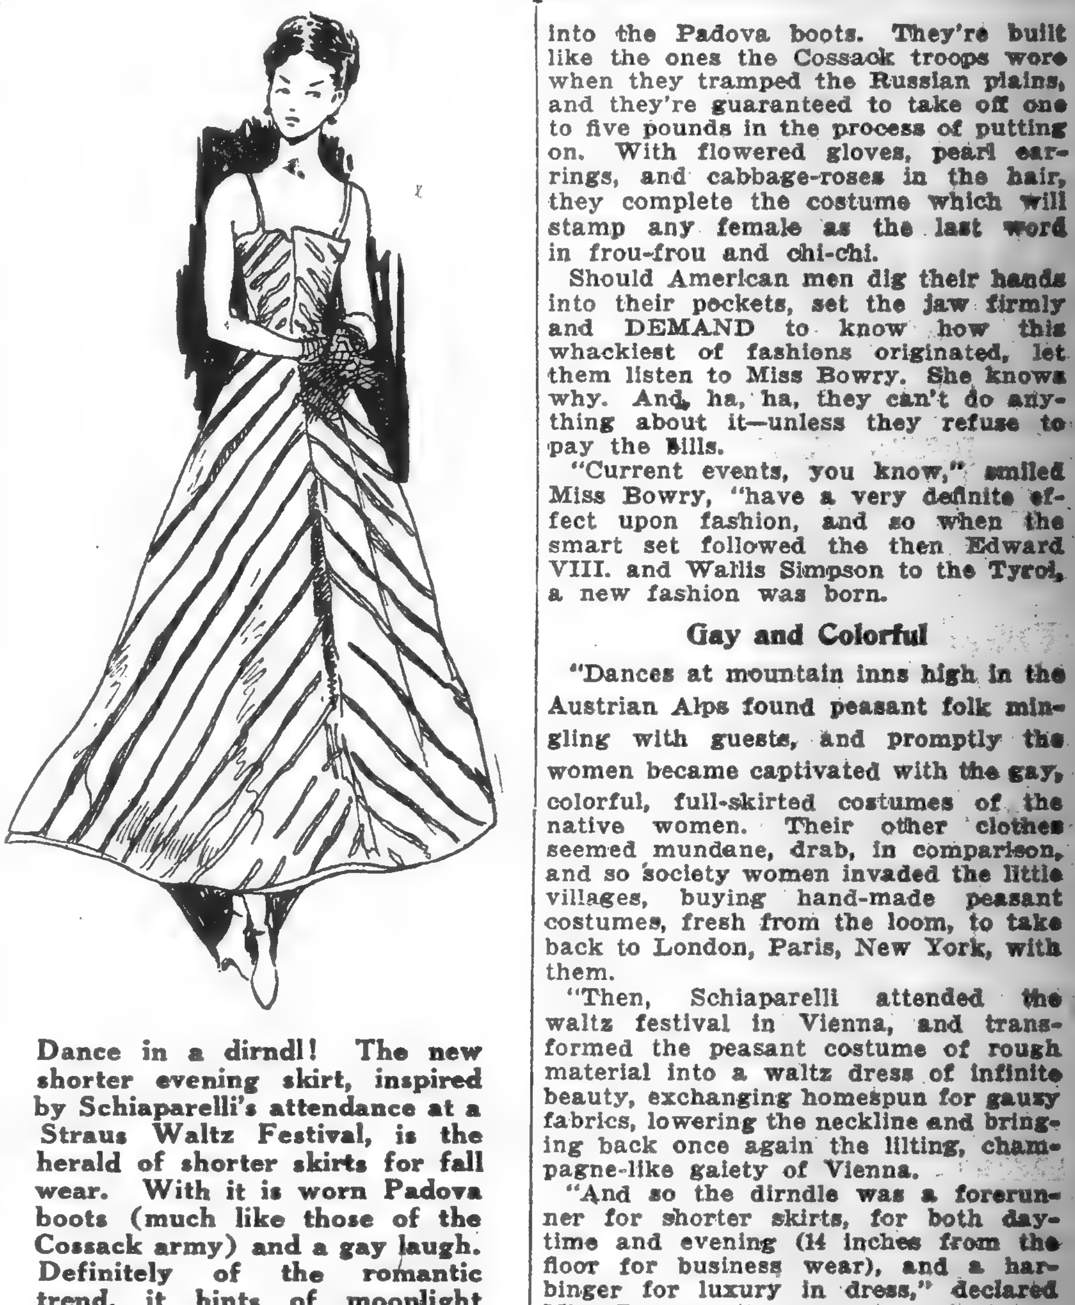
AND—get that town crier—man's reaction to it is that it has lots of sex appeal, according to Beatrice Bowry, well-known Boston stylist, and member of the Fashion Group in New York. Miss Bowry, who studied with Callech, in New York, is one of the foremost fashion experts today, and hers is the last word in the world of feminine frills.

Just so's you won't be kept in suspense as to whether a dirndl is animal, vegetable or mineral, here's the description in the glowing language of the Parisian couturiers.

"A soubrette dress—it has a ravishing short skirt, about 10 inches from the ground, is moulded close at the hips, and pirouettes out in petits-tours," so that when the ladies waltz, they look like something out of Berard's ballet.

"If she feels like Camille, the bodice will look like a 1912 camisole held up by virtue of a couple of grosgrain straps; if she's peasant-minded, the bodice will be full and laced down the centre; ultra-ultra individuals go in for a 'corset' bodice, which is—just what it is.

The head of the family digs down into his jeans to the extent of anywhere from $85 to $225 for a dancing dirndl, depending on the material, cut, where it's bought, and whether or not it is an "original."



Dance in a dirndl! The new shorter evening skirt, inspired by Schiaparelli's attendance at a Straus Waltz Festival, is the herald of shorter skirts for fall wear. With it is worn Padova boots (much like those of the Cossack army) and a gay laugh. Definitely of the romantic trend, it hints of moonlight nights on roof gardens, gallant gentlemen, and champagne.

Five yards of material—for that's about all it takes to make a waltz dress, at the price of a round trip to Europe. Whoops! They're seen swirling on the roof-tops of the swankiest hotels in Boston and New York, but sshh! One enterprising young woman bought five yards of dotted swiss curtain material in the 10-cent store, and took her dirndl dancing at a crowded and popular ballroom where the tariff was only 75 cents per head—and created a furore.

Any woman who wishes to appear soignee underneath a dirndl has to wrap herself in a ribbon corselet, and a really well-dressed woman, like, for instance, Mrs. Harrison Williams, would, without a doubt, lace herself into one. The new "ballet-skirts" are wasp-waisted and decollete (low-necked, to you) and require a corselet to give that "poured into" look.

The Believe-It-Or-Not man might want to investigate how the ladies get into the Padova boots. They're built like the ones the Cossack troops wore when they tramped the Russian plains, and they're guaranteed to take off one to five pounds in the process of putting on. With flowered gloves, pearl earrings, and cabbage-roses in the hair, they complete the costume which will stamp any female as the last word in frou-frou and chi-chi.

Should American men dig their hands into their pockets, set the jaw firmly and DEMAND to know how this whackiest of fashions originated, let them listen to Miss Bowry. She knows why. And, ha, ha, they can't do anything about it—unless they refuse to pay the bills.

"Current events, you know," smiled Miss Bowry, "have a very definite effect upon fashion, and so when the smart set followed the then Edward VIII. and Wallis Simpson to the Tyrol, a new fashion was born.

Gay and Colorful

"Dances at mountain inns high in the Austrian Alps found peasant folk mingling with guests, and promptly the women became captivated with the gay, colorful, full-skirted costumes of the native women. Their other clothes seemed mundane, drab, in comparison, and so society women invaded the little villages, buying hand-made peasant costumes, fresh from the loom, to take back to London, Paris, New York, with them.

"Then, Schiaparelli attended the waltz festival in Vienna, and transformed the peasant costume of rough material into a waltz dress of infinite beauty, exchanging homespun for gauzy fabrics, lowering the neckline and bringing back once again the lilting, champagne-like gaiety of Vienna.

"And so the dirndle was a forerunner for shorter skirts, for both daytime and evening (14 inches from the floor for business wear), and a harbinger for luxury in dress," declared Miss Bowry.

When you dance in your dirndl and you feel ever so gay, just as the famed Viennese beauties did, your escort may whisper to you, "Hast mi a bisserl gern?" Which means, "Do you love me a little?" and you can reply, "Ja Ja." There—is your dirndl vocabulary, which goes with every whacky waltz dress.

To the ladies who are "so magnanimous—especially around the hips," you CAN wear the dirndl. Full-skirted, that's the reason why. After all, was there ever a peasant woman who was brought up on a diet of lettuce and melba toast?

There should be no more need for charm schools with the new dress contour, for like the G-men they'll "get their man" every time, Miss Bowry opines.

"There's lots of sex appeal to the dresses this year. Tight-waisted, the silhouette stresses the round, natural contour, the fabrics are soft, rich-looking and gorgeously draped or fitted. The colors are luscious, and there's a swishing, whirling, rhythmical movement that ought to prove bewitching," she revealed.

BLANK PAGE

Clippings for Boston
Symphony Season of 1937 + 1938

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR-TRIBUNE

937

Lawrence White, Famed American Virtuoso, Says Career Result of Luck, Hard Work

Here to Conduct R. I. Concert Orchestra, Musician Tells Own Story of Success.

By THOMAS A. MULVANY
(Staff Writer)

His teachers and all the musical people he met in Boston wondered why anyone would come all the way from Salmon, Idaho, to study the snare drum at the New England Conservatory, but Lawrence White showed them in just two years.

Only 20 when he was invited by Dr. Koussevitzky to demonstrate the possibilities of the marimba to Maurice Ravel, famous French composer, he graduated from the Conservatory and received his first contract with the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra by the time he was old enough to vote.

White is spending a week in Providence, where he is acting as guest conductor of the Rhode Island Concert Orchestra in the absence of Edouard Caffier. Resting after a rehearsal for tonight's and Tuesday's Federal Music Project broadcasts, he seemed very well pleased with the orchestra, which includes most of the finest local musicians. He was especially appreciative of their responsiveness to his flexible, driving baton.

CONDUCTOR AT 6

His world-wide fame as one of the most sensational young American virtuosi has certainly not spoiled him, and he didn't seem to regard his career as anything more than the result of luck and thousands of hours of hard work.

White's musical career was predestined. He made his first appearance at the age of 4 by singing a solo at a ball game, perched on his father's arm. At 6, able to stand on his own feet, he grabbed the baton and conducted the local band through a concert overture. A few years later he had exhausted the two local piano teachers and his father's good right arm, which had been the greatest incentive to practise. From then on he played here and there, "wherever the refreshments made it worth the trouble", but became disgusted with the idea of making a profession of music by the fact that he got only 50 cents a Sunday for pumping the church organ.

Then one day when he was discovered thumping an inverted lard pail with a couple of sticks of kindling wood he announced gravely that he was going to make a life work of drumming. He learned the tympani, xylophone, and all the other drums himself, and played all through high school at rodeos and country fairs, gaining much valuable experience.

Lawrence White conducting his orchestra during a rehearsal. (Star-Tribune Photo.)

PLAYS FOR PADEREWSKI

One piece of luck after another favored his career as a drummer. A friend bought a huge concert marimba-xylophone, only to find it too large for his living quarters, and the weather too cold to practise it in his [illegible]. White accepted the gift, and in a few months, after literally hundreds of hours practise, was able to tour all the mountain states as marimba soloist.

It was in 1925 that Lawrence White decided he had enough self-teaching, and came East to the New England Conservatory at Boston. In 1928 he was a graduate and a member of the Boston Symphony. In 1930 he played marimba solos at a birthday party for Ignace Paderewski, given at Ernest Schelling's home on Lake Geneva. Fritz Kreisler and Schelling both played accompaniments for White's transcriptions of their own works that evening.

White began conducting—not counting his first conducting job at six years of age—at the New England Conservatory. He has presented several series of chamber music concerts, including many modern works for small groups, with the Phi Mu Alpha, honorary musical fraternity of that school. He has made several radio appearances with many groups in Boston. With the orchestra of the Conservatory he has conducted accompaniments to most of the standard concertos for the main solo instruments.

ON COLLEGE FACULTY

With the exception of a summer of study and observation at the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, where he was the guest of Dr. Karl Muck—the greatest Wagnerian conductor in the world, and long the director of the Boston Symphony—White's entire musical training and background is American.

For the last few years, Lawrence White has been a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory, where he surprised them all "by coming all the way from Salmon, Idaho", and is also associated with the New England Summer Band School at Tufts College and the composition classes of many New England colleges.

In his spare time, when there is any, he reads, and writes sophisticated jazz for his wife's revue lyrics. He is waiting for New York to get a few more publishing firms, so he can "get thrown out of some new places."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

Berkshire Festival Important Factor in America's Music

The ruling powers of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival—the officials of the festival corporation and of the Boston Symphony orchestra—seem to be following the theory of slow but steady development. Last year the Boston orchestra took part for the first time at the festival. This year the festival that was ended last Sunday was doubled in length. Next year the programs may be larger in scope, although the season will remain six concerts spread over two long week-ends. There is some talk of doing a large work like Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

Whether Mr. Koussevitzky and the authorities decide to do other than purely symphonic works, the festival will take another step forward. It will have a permanent music shed. That is, assuming that $100,000 is raised. If that sum is not forthcoming, there will be no festival. There is little doubt that the money will be raised. Before the campaign had been launched in earnest, there were pledges of $16,000 This yearly festival in the Berkshires has developed into a highly important factor in the country's musical life.

MUSIC

NEW YORK, Sept. 11. (AP) The living arts, especially music, have had a good summer.

Music has attracted audiences estimated (somewhat uselessly) at from 5 to 25 millions. A higher percentage of ventures has paid out than for many years, and some have set records.

And they have produced a number of oddities.

Of the summer music ventures perhaps St. Louis' monumental and incredibly popular "Muny" opera is the most important so far as public pleasure goes.

This has once again broken all records: 774,958 people saw its 86 performances 25,000 over last summer. This figure was reached without including standees, of which there were many.

There is therefore a surplus in St. Louis, and since Muny opera [illegible] not make a profit, this must be put into productions, into plant, or into salaries.

Artistically, the musical palm probably should be awarded the six remarkable performances which consisted the fourth Berkshire Symphonic festival—all played by the full Boston Symphony, all conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, all given in a huge tent on the festival's new home estate, "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.

Oddly, this venture also paid its way. Next summer a simple but permanent shelter probably will replace the tent.

So called "serious opera" began one of its perennial "wanings" this summer. Excepting the Zoo company in Cincinnati and the chautaqua group in western New York, there was little opera and it was not important.

The most curious music ventures probably was a performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pinafore" on a real schooner, anchored in the eel grass alongside a golf and swimming club in Westport, Conn. The audience of 4000 sat on shore, some with feet hanging over the water.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

9 1937

Music Appeal This Summer Sets Records

BY JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

NEW YORK, Sept. 18 (AP)—The living arts, especially music, have had a good summer.

Music has attracted audiences estimated (somewhat uselessly) at from 5,000,000 to 25,000,000. A higher percentage of ventures has paid out than for many years, and some have set records.

And they have produced a number of oddities.

Of the summer music ventures perhaps St. Louis' monumental and incredibly popular "Muny" opera is the most important so far as public pleasure goes.

This has once again broken all records: 774,958 people saw its 86 performances—25,000 over last summer. This figure was reached without including standees, of whom there were many.

There is, therefore, a surplus in St. Louis, and since Muny opera may not make a profit, this must be put into productions, into plant, or into salaries. Chorus boys and girls (they still draw these from St. Louis and they are first class) already have been given a bonus.

Concerts by Koussevitzky Outstanding

Artistically, the musical palm probably should be awarded the six remarkable performances which comprised the fourth Berkshire symphonic festival—all played by the full Boston symphony, all conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, all given in a huge tent on the festival's new home estate, "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.

Oddly, this venture also paid its way. Next summer a simple but permanent shelter probably will replace the tent.

So-called "serious opera" began one of its perennial "wanings" this summer. Excepting the Zoo company in Cincinnati and the Chautauqua group in western New York, there was little opera and it was not important.

The Zoo undertaking, continued out of a plush (but vanished) pre-depression background by musicians anxious for their summer's work, likewise was successful. Unique because of its setting among the birds and beasts and twisting reptiles, it also was of artistic interest.

No great quantities of cash changed hands, but productions were kept carefully and tastefully within their modest frame, and the accompanying orchestra of 50 Cincinnati symphony men would make the Metropolitan's orchestra do a little blushing.

The most curious music venture probably was a performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pinafore" on a real schooner, anchored in the eel grass alongside a golf and swimming club in Westport, Conn.

The audience of 4000 sat on shore, some with feet hanging over the water. These last became so absorbed as the performance advanced, and Radio Star James Melton sang in the intermission, that the rising tide escaped notice.

Before anybody knew what was happening the tide had wet several hundred pairs of feet.

Even after the decks had been cleared of most sailing equipment, space aboard the floating "Pinafore" was rather limited. A number of bets that chorus members would fall overboard were lost.

SEP 17 1937

Woman To Lead Boston Symphony

BOSTON—For the first time in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57-year history, a woman, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin in Paris, will be a guest conductor during the coming season, it was announced this week.

Gershwin studied under Mlle. Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, about the time he wrote his famed "American in Paris."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR-TRIBUNE

SEP 1 1 1937

1

Lawrence White, Famed American Virtuoso, Says Career Result of Luck, Hard Work

Here to Conduct R. I. Concert Orchestra, Musician Tells Own Story of Success.

By THOMAS A. MULVANY
(Staff Writer)

His teachers and all the musical people he met in Boston wondered why anyone would come all the way from Salmon, Idaho, to study the snare drum at the New England Conservatory, but Lawrence White showed them in just two years.

Only 20 when he was invited by Dr. Koussevitzky to demonstrate the possibilities of the marimba to Maurice Ravel, famous French composer, he graduated from the Conservatory and received his first contract with the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra by the time he was old enough to vote.

White is spending a week in Providence, where he is acting as guest conductor of the Rhode Island Concert Orchestra in the absence of Edouard Caffier. Resting after a rehearsal for tonight's and Tuesday's Federal Music Project broadcasts, he seemed very well pleased with the orchestra, which includes most of the finest local musicians. He was especially appreciative of their responsiveness to his flexible, driving baton.

CONDUCTOR AT 6

His world-wide fame as one of the most sensational young American virtuosi has certainly not spoiled him, and he didn't seem to regard his career as anything more than the result of luck and thousands of hours of hard work.

White's musical career was predestined. He made his first appearance at the age of 4 by singing a solo at a ball game, perched on his father's arm. At 6, able to stand on his own feet, he grabbed the baton and conducted the local band through a concert overture. A few years later he had exhausted the two local piano teachers and his father's good right arm, which had been the greatest incentive to practise. From then on he played here and there, "wherever the refreshments made it worth the trouble", but became disgusted with the idea of making a profession of music by the fact that he got only 50 cents a Sunday for pumping the church organ.

Then one day when he was discovered thumping an inverted lard pail with a couple of sticks of kindling wood he announced gravely that he was going to make a life work of drumming. He learned the tympani, xylophone, and all the other drums himself, and played all through high school at rodeos and country fairs, gaining much valuable experience.

Lawrence White conducting his orchestra during a rehearsal. (Star-Tribune Photo.)

PLAYS FOR PADEREWSKI

One piece of luck after another favored his career as a drummer. A friend bought a huge concert marimba-xylophone, only to find it too large for his living quarters, and the weather too cold to practise it in his garage. White accepted the gift, and in a few months, after literally hundreds of hours practise, was able to tour all the mountain states as marimba soloist.

It was in 1925 that Lawrence White decided he had enough self-teaching, and came East to the New England Conservatory at Boston. In 1928 he was a graduate and a member of the Boston Symphony. In 1930 he played marimba solos at a birthday party for Ignace Paderewski, given at Ernest Schelling's home on Lake Geneva. Fritz Kreisler and Schelling both played accompaniments for White's transcriptions of their own works that evening.

White began conducting—not counting his first conducting job at six years of age—at the New England Conservatory. He has presented several series of chamber music concerts, including many modern works for small groups, with the Phi Mu Alpha, honorary musical fraternity of that school. He has made several radio appearances with many groups in Boston. With the orchestra of the Conservatory he has conducted accompaniments to most of the standard concertos for the main solo instruments.

ON COLLEGE FACULTY

With the exception of a summer of study and observation at the Bayreuth Festspielhaus, where he was the guest of Dr. Karl Muck—the greatest Wagnerian conductor in the world, and long the director of the Boston Symphony—White's entire musical training and background is American.

For the last few years, Lawrence White has been a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory, where he surprised them all "by coming all the way from Salmon, Idaho", and is also associated with the New England Summer Band School at Tufts College and the composition classes of many New England colleges.

In his spare time, when there is any, he reads, and writes sophisticated jazz for his wife's revue lyrics. He is waiting for New York to get a few more publishing firms, so he can "get thrown out of some new places."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

7/13/37

Berkshire Festival Important Factor in America's Music

The ruling powers of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival—the officials of the festival corporation and of the Boston Symphony orchestra—seem to be following the theory of slow but steady development. Last year the Boston orchestra took part for the first time at the festival. This year the festival that was ended last Sunday was doubled in length. Next year the programs may be larger in scope, although the season will remain six concerts spread over two long week-ends. There is some talk of doing a large work like Bach's "St. Matthew Passion."

Whether Mr. Koussevitzky and the authorities decide to do other than purely symphonic works, the festival will take another step forward. It will have a permanent music shed. That is, assuming that $100,000 is raised. If that sum is not forthcoming, there will be no festival. There is little doubt that the money will be raised. Before the campaign had been launched in earnest, there were pledges of $16,000 This yearly festival in the Berkshires has developed into a highly important factor in the country's musical life

---

MUSIC

NEW YORK, Sept. 11.—(AP)—The living arts, especially music, have had a good summer.

Music has attracted audiences estimated (somewhat uselessly) at from 5 to 25 millions. A higher percentage of ventures has paid out than for many years, and some have set records.

And they have produced a number of oddities.

Of the summer music ventures perhaps St. Louis' monumental and incredibly popular "Muny" opera is the most important so far as public pleasure goes.

This has once again broken all records: 774,958 people saw its 86 performances—25,000 over last summer. This figure was reached without including standees, of which there were many.

There is therefore a surplus in St. Louis, and since Muny opera may not make a profit, this must be put into productions, into plant, or into salaries.

Artistically, the musical palm probably should be awarded the six remarkable performances which consisted the fourth Berkshire Symphonic festival—all played by the full Boston Symphony, all conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, all given in a huge tent on the festival's new home estate, "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.

Oddly, this venture also paid its way. Next summer a simple but permanent shelter probably will replace the tent.

So called "serious opera" began one of its perennial "wanings" this summer. Excepting the Zoo company in Cincinnati and the chautauqua group in western New York, there was little opera and it was not important.

The most curious music ventures probably was a performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pinafore" on a real schooner, anchored in the eel grass alongside a golf and swimming club in Westport, Conn. The audience of 4000 sat on shore, some with feet hanging over the water.

PORTLAND, ORE.
OREGONIAN

SEP 1 9 1937

Music Appeal This Summer Sets Records

BY JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

NEW YORK, Sept. 18 (AP)—The living arts, especially music, have had a good summer.

Music has attracted audiences estimated (somewhat uselessly) at from 5,000,000 to 25,000,000. A higher percentage of ventures has paid out than for many years, and some have set records.

And they have produced a number of oddities.

Of the summer music ventures perhaps St. Louis' monumental and incredibly popular "Muny" opera is the most important so far as public pleasure goes.

This has once again broken all records: 774,958 people saw its 86 performances—25,000 over last summer. This figure was reached without including standees, of whom there were many.

There is, therefore, a surplus in St. Louis, and since Muny opera may not make a profit, this must be put into productions, into plant, or into salaries. Chorus boys and girls (they still draw these from St. Louis and they are first class) already have been given a bonus.

Concerts by Koussevitzky Outstanding

Artistically, the musical palm probably should be awarded the six remarkable performances which comprised the fourth Berkshire symphonic festival—all played by the full Boston symphony, all conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, all given in a huge tent on the festival's new home estate, "Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass.

Oddly, this venture also paid its way. Next summer a simple but permanent shelter probably will replace the tent.

So-called "serious opera" began one of its perennial "wanings" this summer. Excepting the Zoo company in Cincinnati and the Chautauqua group in western New York, there was little opera and it was not important.

The Zoo undertaking, continued out of a plush (but vanished) pre-depression background by musicians anxious for their summer's work, likewise was successful. Unique because of its setting among the birds and beasts and twisting reptiles, it also was of artistic interest.

No great quantities of cash changed hands, but productions were kept carefully and tastefully within their modest frame, and the accompanying orchestra of 50 Cincinnati symphony men would make the Metropolitan's orchestra do a little blushing.

The most curious music venture probably was a performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's "Pinafore" on a real schooner, anchored in the eel grass alongside a golf and swimming club in Westport, Conn.

The audience of 4000 sat on shore, some with feet hanging over the water. These last became so absorbed as the performance advanced, and Radio Star James Melton sang in the intermission, that the rising tide escaped notice.

Before anybody knew what was happening the tide had wet several hundred pairs of feet.

Even after the decks had been cleared of most sailing equipment, space aboard the floating "Pinafore" was rather limited. A number of bets that chorus members would fall overboard were lost.

Jewish Transcript
Seattle Wash.

SEP 17 1937

Woman To Lead Boston Symphony

~~BOSTON—For the~~ first time in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57-year history, a woman, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin in Paris, will be a guest conductor during the coming season, it was announced this week.

Gershwin studied under Mlle. Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, about the time he wrote his famed "American in Paris."

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, SEPTEMBER 12,

(2)

Harvard Men Will Rush Radcliffe College Classes to Attend Lectures by Noted Mme. Nadia Boulanger

BY ROBERT HUME

A list is forming for Harvard men to attend Radcliffe this winter.

They are very eager to study there.

And that is the first time in the history of Radcliffe that the tables have been turned, so that Harvard students have wanted to make formal application to study at Radcliffe, instead of Radcliffe girls seeking enrollment in a course with a popular Harvard professor.

Furthermore, although male professors do lecture at Radcliffe, the Harvard students are signing up to hear a feminine lecturer. She is Juliette Nadia Boulanger, French composer and teacher of composers. For a decade or more she has been one of the most striking and influential musical figures in Europe.

She has wielded particular influence in America.

She Helped Mold American Music

The men from this country whom she has taught have molded the course of contemporary American composition. Leaders who brought high-spirited youth, vision, energy, earnestness and American individuality to our music, they enthusiastically acknowledge their indebtedness to the teachings of the Frenchwomen. They found in her the relentless taskmaster and disciplinarian, and the counsellor without sham, who was the great need of the young American composer. In her, they found endless energy and interest in life which drew out those same presumably American traits in themselves.

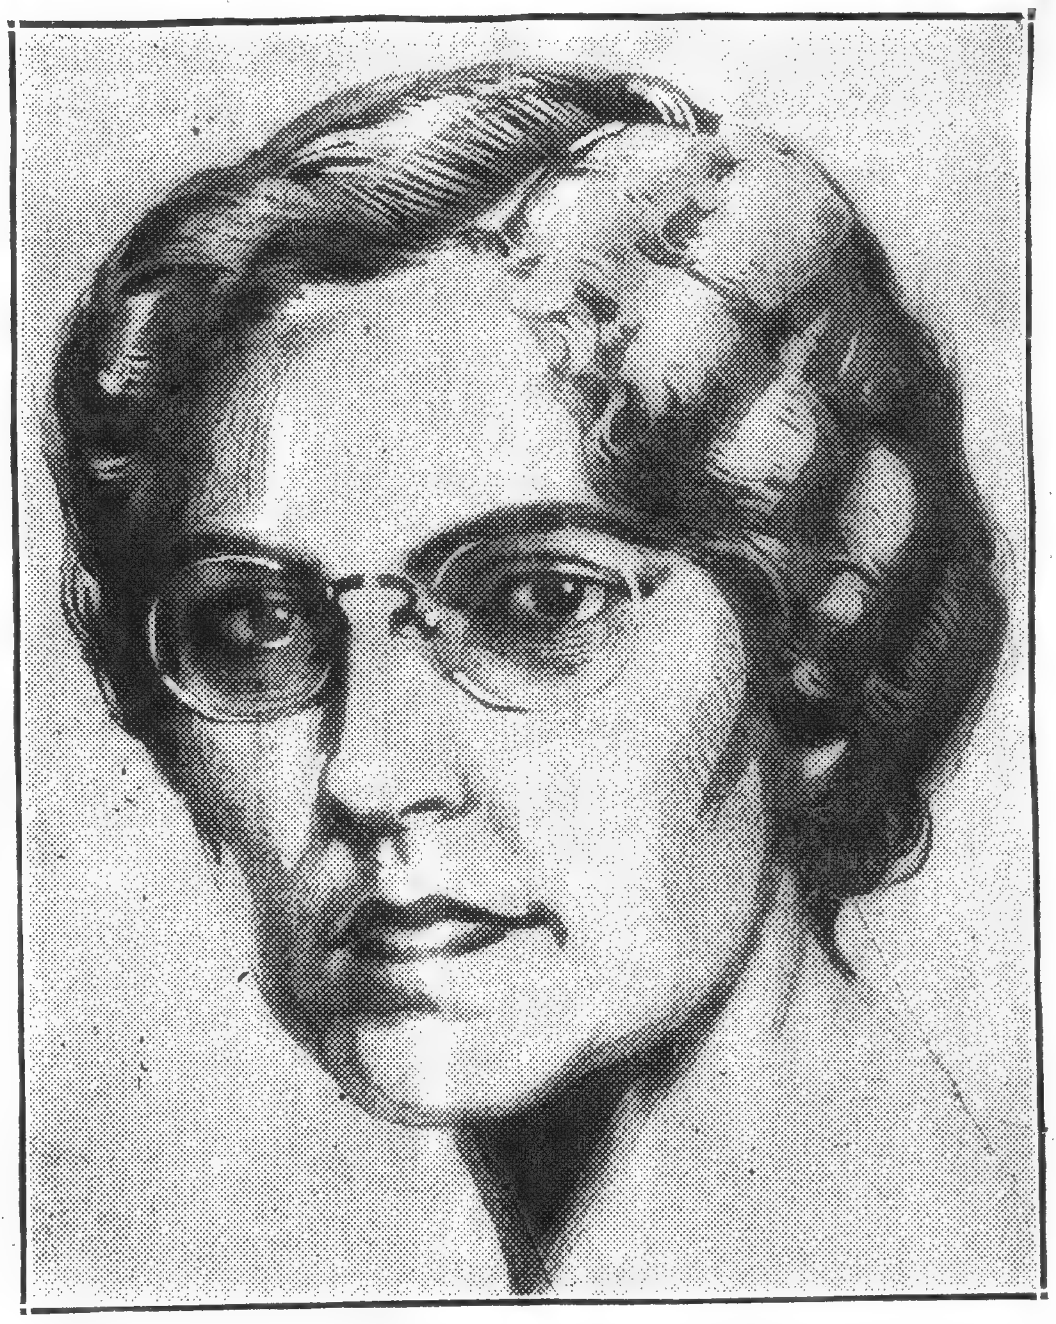
Hence, with her 50th birthday falling next Thursday, Nadia Boulanger already has attracted about a dozen young men who hope that they may become writers of significant American compositions—by joining her Radcliffe course.

Breaking another tradition while she is about it, Miss Boulanger will be the first woman to appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its 57 years.

Joined Paris Conservatory Staff

The breaking of traditions is an old habit of Nadia and was also one of her sister, Lili, the late splendid composer. Lili was the first woman in the history of the Paris Conservatory to be awarded the First Grand Prize of Rome, conferring expenses of travel, maintenance and tuition in the Italian capital, for a course of graduate study. Behind the award was the tutelage and discipline of Nadia in her sister's formative stage.

Nadia went through the Paris Conservatory industriously gathering up prizes in harmony, counterpoint, fugue and organ. Then she shattered tradiiton by becoming assistant to Henri Dallier, professor of harmony at the conservatory—she, a woman faculty member of that august institution of France, land where the abilities of women are not usually thought of as approaching very near to those of men. In more recent years she has been co-director of the Paris Normal School, with Igor Stravinsky, the spectacular Russian modernist who settled in France. It is understood that she bears the brunt of the work, since teaching irks her associate.



Nadia Boulanger, noted French teacher of American men composers. (Sketch by Bacon.)

Guided Copland

Sixteen years ago America began to profit by Nadia Boulanger's arre power to help composers find themselves. In 1921, the 21-year-old fledgling New York composer, Aaron Copland, went to pursue finishing studies in composition with Miss Boulanger. The following year, he made his biggest stir until then in the musical world with his "Cortege Macabre," for orchestra. For three years he studied with the Frenchwoman. At the end of that time, Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Copland's "Music for the Theatre." Critics declared that this showed increased individuality in the youth's work. His Piano Concerto, produced a little later, showed a further gain. Boulanger had set Copland on the path of discovering his individual style, and he had kept on going.

She Aided Hub Man to Fame

Roger Sessions of Brooklyn took brief guidance of Boulanger during part of several years' European sojourn. It is worthy of note that his most significant compositions followed.

The Maine-born and Boston-bred Walter Piston was studying with the Frenchwoman in 1926. He had intended to become a painter, and was an art school student in Boston. But after taking up violin and piano as a hobby, he had made a serious study of harmony, theory and counterpoint at Harvard. In May of 1926, his work with the noted instructress resulted in the first public programme appearance of the name of Piston as composer, with the performance of chamber-music work of his in Paris. Two years later, Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his "Symphonic Piece." Meanwhile, he had joined the music faculty at Harvard, where he is assistant professor today.

New Symphony to Honor Her

In 1932, Piston was accorded praise and blame for harmonic radicalism in his "Orchestral Suite," presented by Stokowski. His works, including also a symphonic poem, and smaller pieces for string quartet and for woodwind instruments, have won him high rank among American modernists of strong individuality. And his book on harmonic analysis is dedicated to Nadia Boulanger.

Very high in importance among our serious young composers stands Roy Harris, born 39 years ago in a log cabin in Oklahoma, then for 26 years a Californian, and now a resident of New Jersey. He has written two symphonies, both performed by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in addition to composing a piano concerto, smaller works for instruments, and an unaccompanied chorus, "Song for Occupations." Some musical observers believe that he has the most brilliant of prospects for becoming the great American composer. He was started on that road by four years of study with Boulanger, from 1926 to 1930. He intends to dedicate to her his Third Symphony, with which he now is busy.

Gershwin, Too

The jazz-making of George Gershwin was bringing him a peak of popular adulation toward 1928, and with it, a high tide of profitable offers for his services in connection with shows and films. He had become steadily more ambitious to make his mark in serious music. So, turning his back on allurements for "popular stuff," he went to study with Boulanger. "An American in Paris," for piano and orchestra, was written during this period. Those who had seen serious potentialities in Gershwin were elated at the new mastery of craftsmanship shown in this. Three years later, the music he wrote for his brother Ira's libretto, "Of Thee I Sing," brought the Pulitzer prize for the first time to a musical comedy. Furthermore, not only the public, but the critics, declared this to be Gershwin's greatest show music up to then. Gershwin was held to have outdone his characteristic best. For that, the counsels of Miss Boulanger doubtless should share a measure of credit.

What explains the singular power of Nadia Boulanger of Paris to take the talents of American composers in tow, and send them back more American and more individual? An incisive analysis was presented by Roy Harris in an exclusive interview for the Boston Sunday Post while he was visiting a friend in New York over the week-end.

Composer Harris Analyzes Her

"I would say that the outstanding characteristic of Nadia Boulanger is drive," her famous American pupil said with his persisting Western drawl. "That's one thing that appeals specially to Americans, who think that drive is a strong national trait of theirs.

"She gives hard-working attention to her teaching, and demands equal effort of her pupils. Teaching is her life—not just a livelihood. She is very sympathetic, as well as extremely conscientious.

"I think what Mademoiselle Boulanger does for composers who can take it is to impose a discipline which demands that they write what is really music. If they cannot write music, she wants to find out what is wrong with their craftsmanship. She picks out the weak spots in their craftsmanship and concentrates on them. In the end, the composer either is given a fine craftsmanship, or it has been demonstrated to him that he has not the talent to acquire it."

"But, Mr. Harris, how does she preserve and enhance a man's individuality, as she has shown such extraordinary ability to do?"

"She points out when a composer has repeated what someone else has done—what she calls 'memory writing'—and by process of elimination shows him his own vein.

"Her happiest experience is to have it mentioned that the men she has trained have molded the course of contemporary American composition."

How Men May Enroll

The coming of this great figure to Radcliffe is, of course, very gratifying to Miss Ada Comstock, president of the college. Also the eagerness of Harvard men to enroll for the Frenchwoman's course. At first this situation was mentioned almost as a pleasant fancy that would not attain realization. But it is all official now. Speaking with a tinge of gusto in her voice, President Comstock gave the Sunday Post man this statement on male enrolment:

"Mademoiselle Boulanger's graduate seminar at Radcliffe will be open to graduate students of music at Harvard on the same terms as those by which some of the graduate courses at Harvard are open to advanced students at Radcliffe."

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

SEP 14 1937

Music and The Drama

WOMAN TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Nadia Boulanger, French musician, is going to appear as guest conductor of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, and she will be the first woman ever to do so, writes Moses Smith in the Boston Transcript. When Symphony Hall announced its plans Friday, it laid no special stress on the talents of the modest Frenchwoman whose visit will break a tradition fifty-six years old.

Mlle. Boulanger has been a pianist and organist as well as an occasional conductor. Faure's "Requiem," which she will present at Symphony, she conducted a few months ago in London and, before that, in France.

She has been in Boston before. Once, some years ago, she was organ soloist with the Boston Symphony. Last year she came, on an educational mission for the French government, to give concerts and lectures here.

She has done some composing, is an amateur musicologist and is highly regarded as such. But her principal importance is as a teacher of composers. A whole school of writers, particularly American ones, has grown up under her instruction and influence. Two of the leading American composers, for example—Roy Harris and Aaron Copland—were her pupils.

Women conductors, almost unknown a generation ago, have made some headway in America in recent years. The first of any inmportance, Ethel Leginska, made her start in Boston. A gifted pianist, Miss Leginska took up conducting at a time when a woman conductor courted either ridicule or abuse. She established the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra—made up of men—here a decade and more ago, and gave concerts in Mechanics Building. Miss Leginska has also conducted opera in Boston.

Mlle. Boulanger probably doesn't care to be classed as a "professional" conductor. More likely she prefers to be regarded as a sincere musician who undertakes the direction of a world-famous symphony orchestra in the course of the day's work. It is unlikely that conducting, or anything else, could ever mean as much to her as her teaching.

Her principal reason for coming here next season is to conduct classes at Radcliffe and Wellesley. At Radcliffe she may have an opportunity to break a tradition far more rigid than any that prevails at the concerts of the Boston Symphony—the exclusively feminine character of the classes.

When the girls at Radcliffe, where the courses more or less duplicate those given at Harvard, want to pursue a subject not given at their own college they are permitted, under certain conditions, to enroll in the desired course at Harvard. Thus far the opportunity has never arisen for Radcliffe to reciprocate. But with Mlle. Boulanger teaching at Radcliffe and not at Harvard, there are bound to be some students in the Harvard music department who will be eager to study under her. They will have to go to Radcliffe to do it—if the faculty permits it.

LEADER

Boston

Frenchwoman To Wield Boston Symphony Baton

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted for the first time in its history by a woman, — at one of the regular concerts in February, when Mme. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, will wield the baton as guest conductor in a presentation of the Requiem of Faure.

Madame Boulanger, who besides her renown as a composer, organist and conductor in France has taught many noted American musicians studying in Europe, is to be in Boston for several months as guest instructor in the music departments of Radcliffe and Wellesley.

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER

SEP 17 1937

By RUBY K. BROWN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra gave 200 concerts last year which sets a record for orchestral activity. A suggestion from Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, is to the effect that the final rehearsal of each concert be open at a small admission to children of the Boston high schools. Mr. Judd schools. Mr. Judd, the orchestra's manager said "many of these children will form part of the future symphony audience, and the better they are acquainted with good music the better for the general culture of Boston. We might even have an audience of music teachers from the schools. That would be genuine education."

ARRIVE HOME ON FRE

No paper or date

Yves Cha[illegible]don, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, wi Cha[illegible] their children, Christine, 3, Roland, 8, and Alain, right, passengers on the French liner.

3

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 19 1937

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

Boston Symphony Novelties—Soloists for National Ensemble—Other Items

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra enters its fifty-seventh season in Symphony Hall, Oct. 8. This will be Serge Koussevitzky's fourteenth year as conductor. The new season will include twenty-four pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and a double series of six Monday evenings and six Tuesday afternoon concerts. The orchestra will visit, for single concerts or series, the following cities: New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Cincinati, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Providence, New Haven, Hartford, Rochester, Ann Arbor, Toledo, New Brunswick, Montclair (N. J.), Northampton, Springfield and Worcester.

Dr. Koussevitzky has announced that he will present many works of Mozart and Beethoven, and will introduce a number of important compositions, American and European.

Many novelties and much unfamiliar music figure on the lists. The Second suite from the ballet "Bacchus et Arianne," by the late Albert Roussel, will be among these, as will Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kijé," that composer's "Overture on Russian Themes" and his Second violin concerto, the latter of which will be given with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Also included among these new offerings will be Malipiero's Second symphony, Bartok's "Music for Strings and Percussion," a "Concerto for Orchestra," by Michael Starokadomsky, and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "The Card Game."

American works to be presented include Edward Burlinghame Hill's new Third symphony; [illegible] Copland's "Statements," and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby. The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland will feature two little known works by Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen."

Among the soloists will be Walter Gieseking, in the Beethoven "Emperor" concerto; Sergei Rachmaninoff, in his own "Rhapsody"; Yehudi Menuhin, in the Brahms concerto and the newly unearthed concerto by Schumann. A concerto for viola and orchestra, by Paul Hindemith, will be played with the composer as soloist. Emma Boynet will perform a Mozart piano concerto.

Two guest conductors will appear in midseason. They are Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer and virtuoso, and Daniele Amfitheatrof, a Russian of Italian schooling, who makes his first American bow this season. Each will take over the baton for one week. At one of the concerts Nadia Boulanger will conduct Fauré's "Requiem."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR

SEP 20 1937

Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, announces five pairs of concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, with the exception of one Friday evening.

The dates are Nov. 18 and 20; Jan. 6 and 8; Feb. 11 and 12; March 10 and 12; March 31 and April 2.

Among the scores to be heard for the first time at these concerts will be the second suite from the ballet, "Bacchus et Arianne," Albert Rousse.

Mr. George Gershwin will be remembered by "An American in Paris." Prokofieff's music for the film, "Lieutenant Kije," and his overture on Russian themes will be played, with his second violin concerto, employing Mr. Jascha Heifetz.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SE[illegible]

Hub Concerts Open Oct. 8

Symphony Orchestra To Play New Music

Serge Koussevitzky announces notable new music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its pending 57th season, the 14th under his conductorship. The program for the opening concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 8 and 9 will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

Koussevitzky will introduce these scores for first hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Second Suite from the Ballet "Bacchus et Arianne," by Albert Roussel, the French composer who died last month, will be performed, together with a repetition of the Symphony in G Minor No. 3 which Roussel dedicated to this orchestra. George Gershwin will be remembered by his performance of "An American in Paris." Prokofieff's music for the film, "Lieutenant Kije," and his Overture on Russian Themes will be played, together with his Second Violin Concerto (Heifetz as soloist). A second symphony of Francesco Malipiero will have its first hearing in America. There also will be Bartok's Music for strings and percussion, a Concerto for Orchestra by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer, and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Card Game." Scores by American composers will include the new Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland's "Statements," and a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby, in which the composer will play the organ part. Two choral works, still unknown, in America, by Sibelius . . . "The Origin of Fire" and "Captive Queen," will be performed by this orchestra in conjunction with the Helsinki University Chorus.

A concerto for viola and orchestra, by Paul Hindemith, will be performed with the composer as soloist. Emma Boynet will appear in a Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, by Mozart. Nadia Boulanger, a distinguished visitor from France, will conduct Faure's "Requiem."

There will be two guest conductors in midseason—George Enesco, the famous Roumanian composer and virtuoso, and Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor of Russian birth and Italian training who is about to make his first visit to America.

Lowell Courier-Citizen - Sept. 22/37

The Symphony Season.

Serge Koussevitzky will assemble, in the course of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season, the great symphonic works of the past and present. The foremost concertos for pianists and violinists will be heard, introducing such artists as Walter Gieseking, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Emma Boynet, Jascha Heifetz and Yehudi Menuhin.

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist, will conduct a pair of concerts. A new guest conductor will be Daniele Amfitheatroff of Russia, coming to America for the first time. And, as already announced, the distinguished French musician, Nadia Boulanger, who is to lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley this season, will conduct Faure's "Requiem." Paul Hindemith will make his first appearance with the orchestra playing viola in his own concerto. The Helsingfors University Chorus from Finland will also be heard in two notable works by Sibelius.

There will also be the first performances in America of a Concerto for Orchestra by a young Soviet composer, Michael Starokadomsky, the Second Symphony of Malipiero and three works of Prokofieff. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct the first performance of a new symphony by the American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1937 C l Musicians --- News of

B. Trans

Recent Phonograph Records

Some Notable Orchestral Releases from Both Symphonic and Jazz Sources

By Moses Smith

Not all of the great music or performing is confined to the more pretentious albums of the phonograph companies. Several more modest recent ventures command the attention of this department. First on what should be a roll of honor must come the two-record album of the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn, played by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Toscanini (Victor set M-355; two twelve-inch records), because of the exceptional combination of noble music, splendid recording and a superlatively brilliant and sensitive performance. Only the beginning is a little "cold," on the side of mechanical reproduction, even though this is fairly adequate. Therafter nothing but superlatives suffice for description.

Music sharply contrasting with the foregoing in its quiet lyricism but played with equal sensitiveness is the Introduction to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" (Victor 14415; twelve-inch record), for which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the ideal interpreters. The exquisite rendering of this work by the Bostonians is familiar to symphony concert patrons. The only flaw in the present recording is that the whispered ending—so wondrous in the concert hall—is scarcely audible above the inevitable surface noise of a metallic needle.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

SEP 22 1937

Plans are getting under way for the concert classes annually held in this vicinity. Springfield has already announced a series to be known as the Wagner concerts. Aaron Richmond has announced five attractions for Boston. Before long courses will be announced from Mt. Holyoke and Smith colleges and the Springfield Community concert series will soon get under way.

The soloists engaged under the Wagner concert course include the Wagner Festival Singers, directed by Richard Hageman, former conductor of the Royal Opera of Amsterdam and for 14 years conductor of the Metropolitan Opera of New York; Gieseking, famous pianist; Jussi Bioerjng, tenor, and Orlando Baera the young Italian violinist; and Gertrude Pitzinger, contralto, with Ruda Firkusny, pianist.

The Boston course, as tentatively announced, will include five major attractions: Kirsten Flagstad, famous operatic soprano; the Don Cossack Russian male chorus; Marian Anderson, Negro contralto; the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Eugene Ormandy; and Shan-Kar, with his Hindu ballet.

The Ballet Russe will appear for a five-day engagement beginning Tuesday evening, Nov. 2. The Vienna Choir Boys will give two concerts on Saturday and Sunday afternoons, Oct. 30 and 31. Numerous other recitals of wide interest will also be given.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will, of course, give a full season of concerts under the direction of Dr Serge Koussevitzky. The programs will undoubtedly be noteworthy for their introduction of new works, for Dr. Koussevitzky has earned a name for discovering new and modern talent.

Debussy was none too firmly established in the musical world at large when Koussevitzky gave an invaluable impetus to his name and fame by inviting him to appear in Moscow as guest conductor of Koussevitzky's own orchestra, in an entirely Debussyan program. The "Afternoon of a Faun," is tremendously popular now with all lovers of fine music, yet Koussevitzky had to contend with whistling and catcalls when he first had what was termed the "audacity" to play it.

He had to fight restility again when he played Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," "Petrouchka," and "The Fire-Bird." Similar revolt was shown to his introduction of works by Scrisbin, Ravel, Prokofieff, Honneger, Roussel and Berg.

It is a striking fact that compositions which Koussevitzky has seen as permanent additions to the orchestral repertory have become so. Works which he abandoned after a fair period of trial have failed to gain permanence. He has continually sought the new and good.

This season he will continue that quest and will give the first performance in America of a Concerto for Orchestra by a young Soviet composer, Michael Starokadomsky. Offering contrast to this newcomer's efforts will be first performances of two choral works of Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire," and "The Captive Queen." Other American premieres will be: Second Symphony, by Malipiero; Viola Concerto, by Paul Hindemith; and three works of Prokofieff, Second Violin Concerto, Music from the Film, "Lieutenant Kije," Overture on Hebrew Themes.

Koussevitzky will also conduct the first performance of a new symphony of our own American composer, Edward Burlingame Hill.

Local residents who heard Edwin Franko Goldman's famous band at the Mt. Holyoke college centennial exercises last spring, will be interested in learing that henceforth Mr. Goldman will be assisted by his son, Richard Franko Goldman. Mr. Goldman, Sr., founded the band 25 years ago and has been its sole conductor ever since.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP [illegible] 1937

GIFTS INDICATE INTEREST IN FESTIVAL MUSIC SHED

Chairman England Reports Contributions From Doctors, Insurance Men, Wholesalers and Others—Solicitors Still at Work

Returns reported to Monroe B. England, chairman of a business men's committee soliciting funds for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's projected music shed at Tanglewood, indicate a genuine interest in Pittsfield, Mr. England said today.

"Means Something"

"There is no question about the artistic merit of the Festival with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as attractions," said Mr. England today. "Neither should there be any question of the economic benefits of a venture which brings to Berkshire hundreds of people of taste and culture to spend several days or two weeks. If our hotels are filled as they were this year, doesn't that mean something. This business eventually permeates the entire county."

The solicitors have not completed their work but contributors include doctors, insurance men, wholesalers, restaurants.

List of Contributors

The list of contributors to date includes the Carr Hardware Company, C. T. Brigham & Company, Pittsfield Paint and Wallpaper Company, Hashim's Corner Store, Pittsfield Morris Plan Bank, the Flower Shop Inc., F. H. Goodrich, the Butler Flour Company, Enzo Marinaro, C. S. Hayward.

Also, Gale-Flournoy, Charles N. Weeks Jr., Federal Loan Company, W. T. Butler, Dr. Ralph D. Head, Dr. W. L. Tracy, P. E. Burkhardt, James M. Rosenthal, Dr. Arthur B. Bissaillon, Dr. J. B. Thomes, George M. Galt, Hayes' Market, Aaron J. Moyer, Rosa Restaurant and Simpson's Package Store.

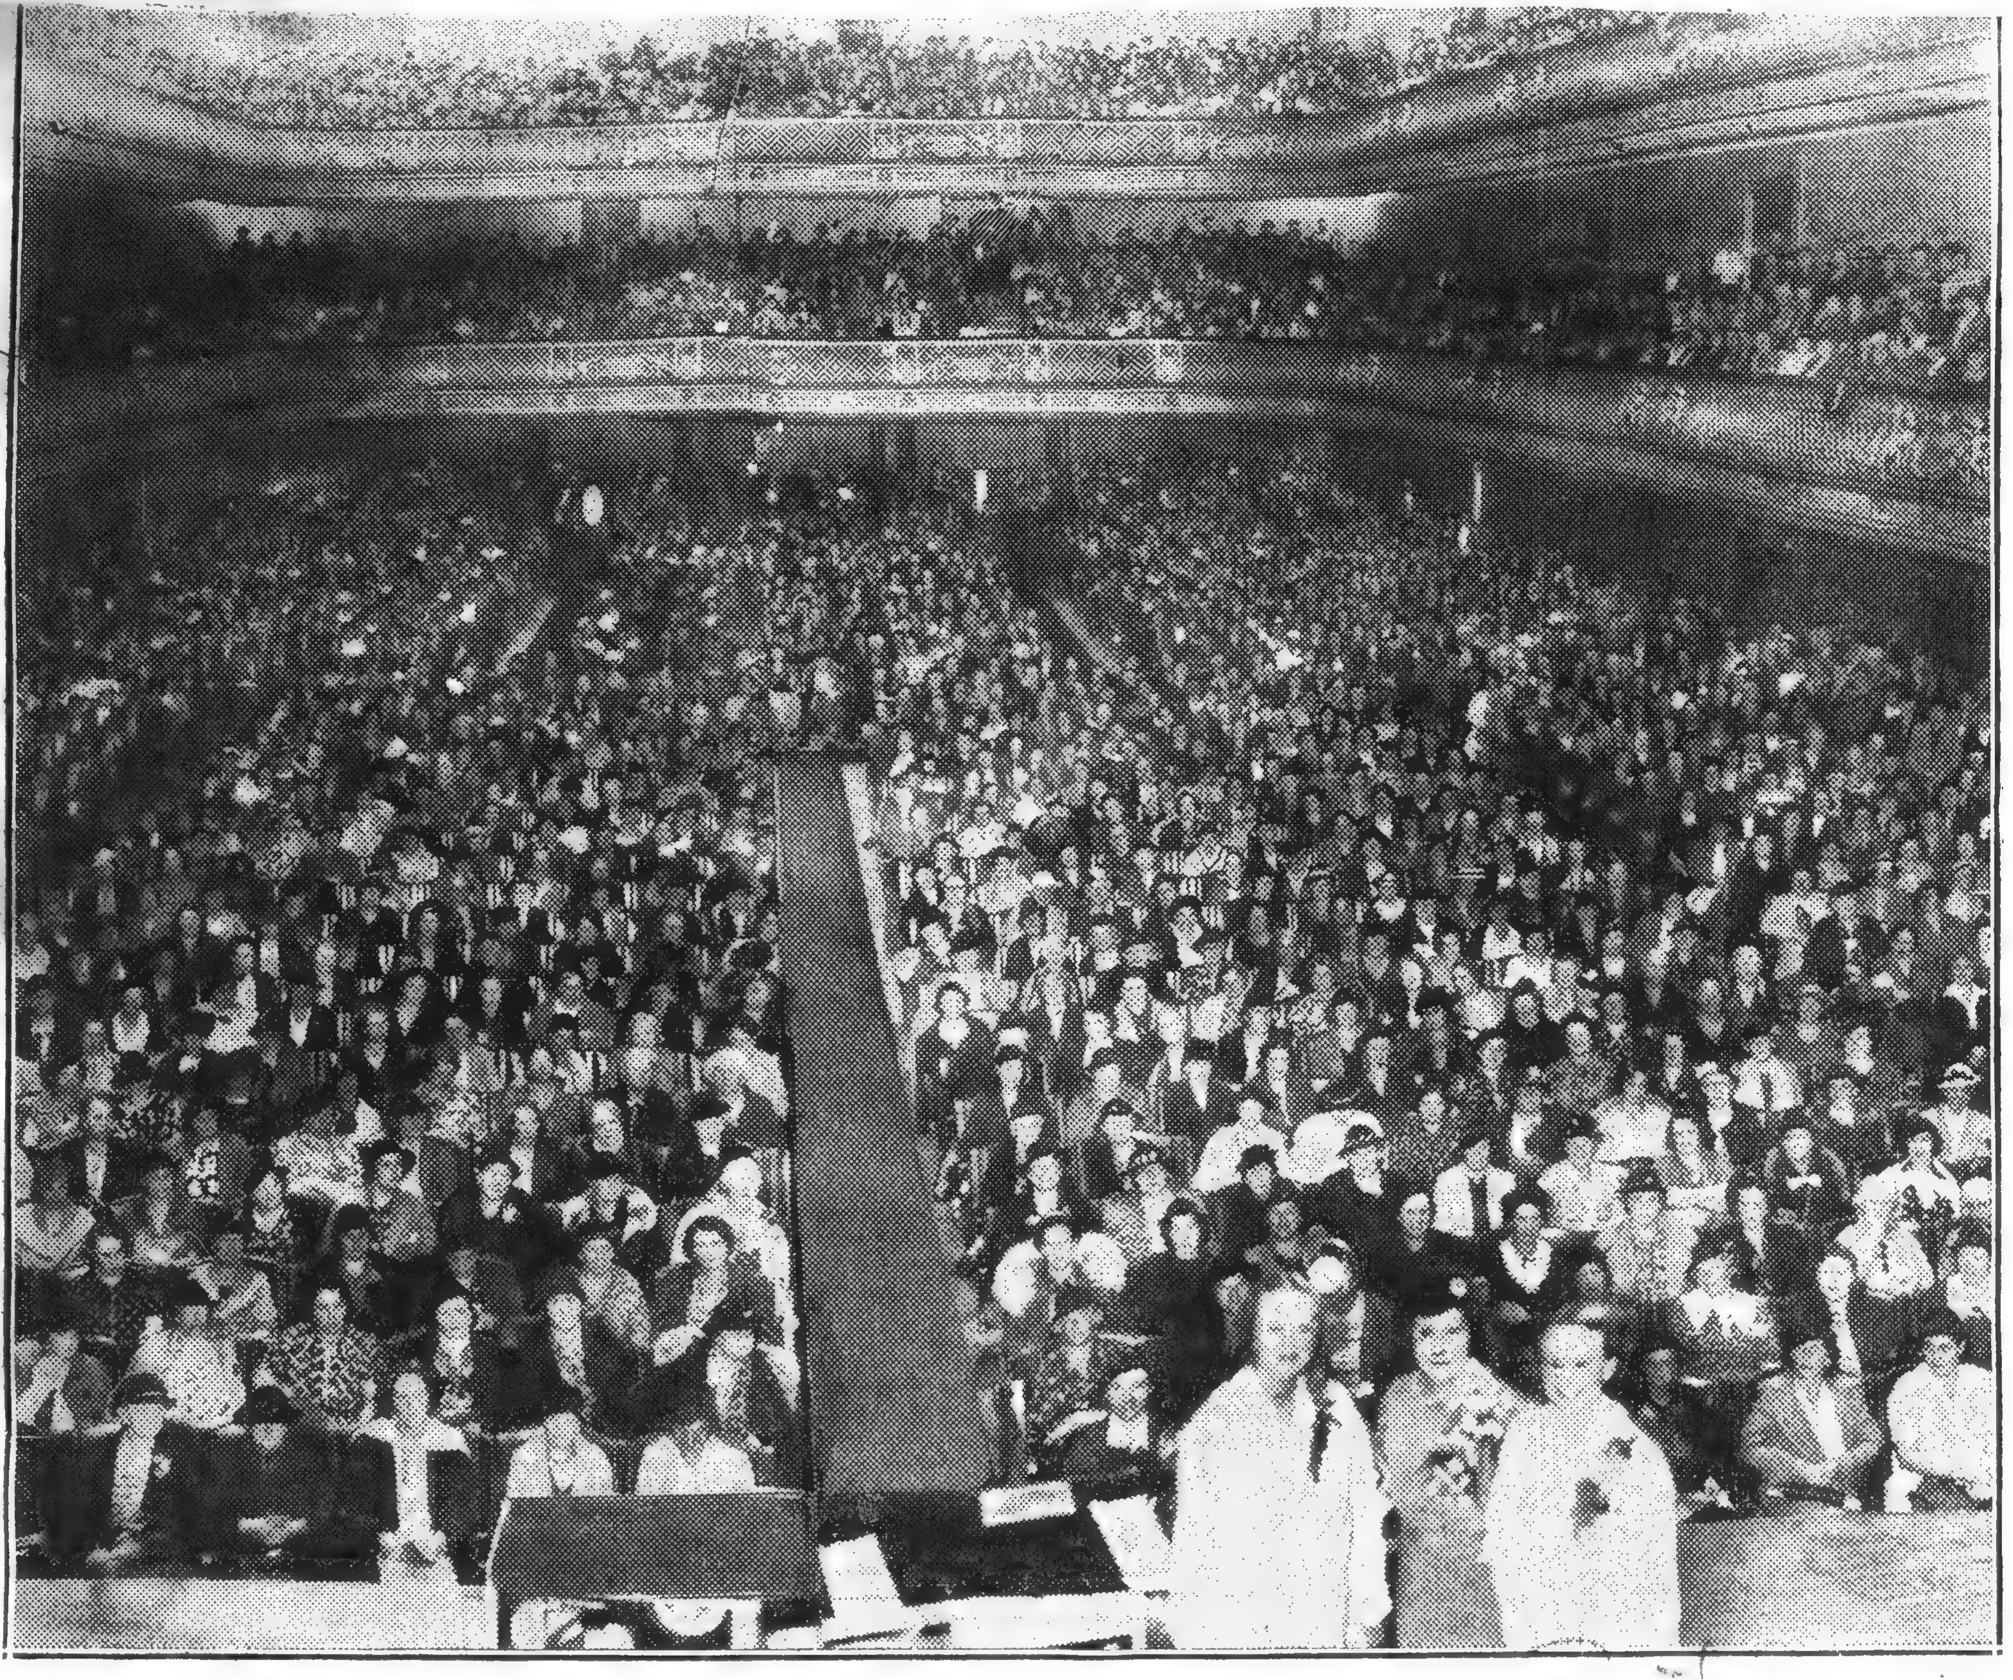
No report has been submitted yet by a committee of which Laurence R. Connor is chairman. Bruce Crane of Dalton is general chairman of the solicitation.

However, previously reported are gifts from Simon and Daniel England, Kelton B. Miller, The Berkshire Eagle, Mrs. D. M. Collins, Mr. and Mrs. Bruce Crane and Mrs. W. Rockwood Gibbs from Pittsfield and vicinity.

Prospects fo

Some New Events for the Calendar and Fresh Data About Others

Beethoven's "Missa Solennis," unheard here since the Symphony Hall Beethoven Festival ten years ago and for many years before that, will be given at a special choral concert in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky sometime in the spring. No further details are yet available.



SYMPHONY HALL FILLED FOR THE BOSTON POST COOKING SCHOOL

A view from the stage during yesterday's session of the Boston Post Cooking School at big Symphony Hall. Note the great crowd that filled, not only the floor, but both great balconies. Housewives from throughout Greater Boston attended the session, avidly seeking knowledge which enables them to become better culinary artists.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1937

of the Music Season --- Further Det

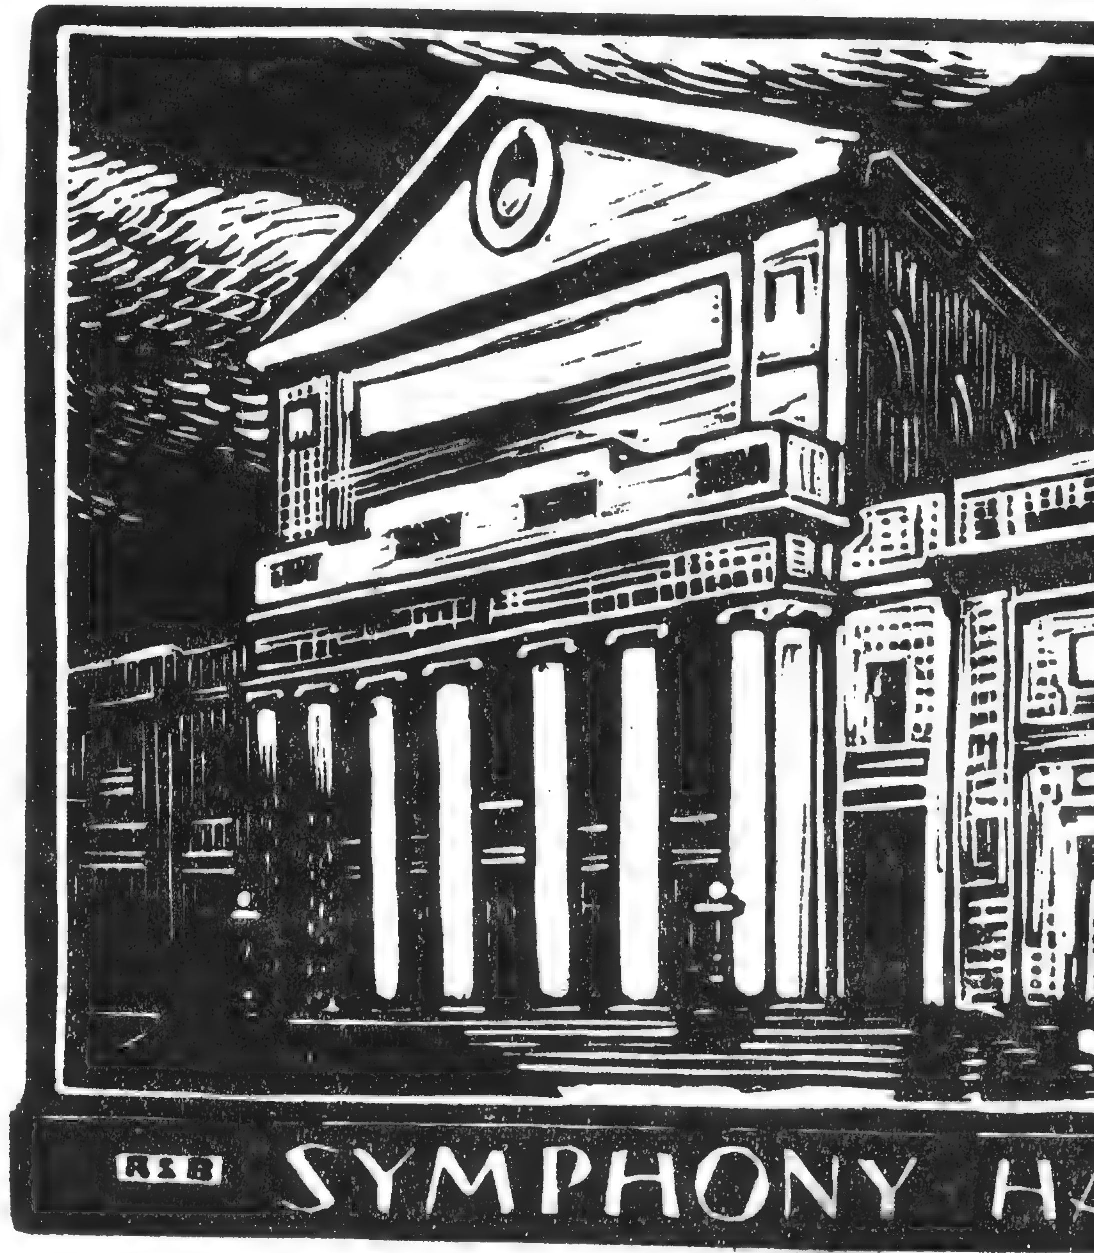
Classic Frame for Enterpe's Modern Dwelling



SYMPHONY HALL

From a new linoleum block print done by Robert Sears Bacon of the staff of the Orchestra's Management.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

SEP 26 1937

Woman to Conduct Boston Symphony

Boston—(AP)—For the first time in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57-year history, a woman, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin in Paris, will be a guest conductor during the coming season, George E. Judd, orchestra manager, announced tonight.

Gershwin studied under Mademoiselle Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, about the time he wrote his famed "American in Paris."

The visiting Frenchwoman who will be identified with the music departments of Wellesley and Radcliffe Colleges this winter, will appear at Symphony Hall in February to conduct Faure's Requiem.

She performed here several years ago as organ soloist with the Boston Symphony in Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra, and since has earned a reputation abroad as a conductor.

LORBEER, AFTER 46 YEARS SERVICE, QUITS SYMPHONY

French Horn Player Holds Record for Tenure with Boston Orchestra—Will Be On Call

After more than half a century of horn-playing, most of it in the service of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry E. Lorbeer thinks it's about time to retire. The management, to whom he confided his wish some time ago, thinks otherwise. Mr. Lorbeer has been asked to be available for occasions when the score requires eight French horns. Since these occasions are not frequent during the course of a season Mr. Lorbeer has agreed to keep himself, so to say, in readiness.

Mr. Lorbeer's fifty-odd years must constitute close to a world's record for an instrument like the French horn. Certainly his continuous tenure of forty-six years is the record in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's history for any instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra itself was only ten years old when Mr. Lorbeer came to play fourth horn. He was engaged by Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra, who had preceded him by a couple of years, coming from Leipzig, where Mr. Lorbeer had also played under him. Mr. Lorbeer consented to come to America after some persuasion.

Asked whether he had any regrets about coming here, Mr. Lorbeer admitted he had some, but they were not serious now. One of them, at first, was due to the lack of profusion of varieties of German beer, though he made some discoveries after he had been in Boston for a while. Another, he says, was the matter of pension. If he had stayed on in Germany he would have had a much larger pension from the Government, than is the case in Boston.

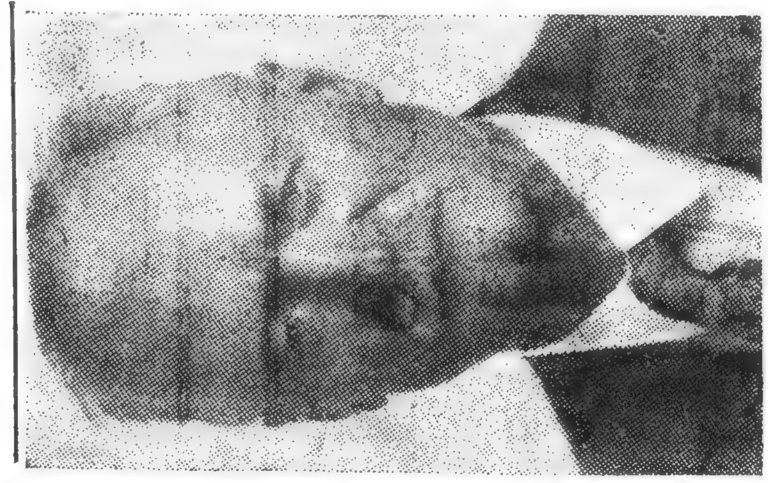
Mr. Lorbeer had to leave schol at the age of fourteen and soon made his way to Essen as a horn player. After a year there he went to Leipzig, where Nikisch was conductor at the opera. Mr. Lorbeer also studied

Continued on Page 2—Column 2

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 26 1937

Lays Horn Down



HENRY E. LORBEER

Who Leaves the Boston Symphony Orchestra After Forty-six Years of Continuous Service

Lorbeer Leaves Boston Symphony

Continued from Page One

for five years at the Leipzig Conservatory on a scholarship.

In Boston, Mr. Lorbeer has served continuously in the Symphony Orchestra and has played under every conductor except one, George Henschel. Gericke, the second, came back for another term later. Mr. Lorbeer played fourth horn for a couple of years, then was shifted to second horn, where he remained over thirty years, and finally back to fourth horn.

Witnessed Many Changes

Mr. Lorbeer has witnessed many changes in the years he has been with the Symphony Orchestra. Only one other player, he says, has seen more. That's Joseph Mann, trumpeter, who no longer plays in the orchestra, but does music copying.

When Mr. Lorbeer came the orchestra was predominantly German in make-up. Now there is a mere handful (not counting Austrians). Most of them left at the time of the great war, when German aliens were not popular. Mr. Lorbeer stayed on because he had become an American citizen.

He wants to take it easy from now on. And even though he has consented to be available "on call" he doesn't expect to work hard any more, although his health is good. He lives with his wife in Jamaica Plain, which has long been a haven for members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Symphonic Season Will Open Oct. 8

Boston Orchestra to Put Works of Beethoven, Mozart to Fore

BOSTON, Sept. 25.—(AP)—One of the world's outstanding protagonists of modern music, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor, will place special emphasis this year on the works of Mozart and Beethoven during the orchestra's 57th season opening Oct. 8.

While not overlooking new works, the orchestra will point to the classics, the annual announcement said tonight. To this end, Walter Gieseking will appear as piano soloist in the Beethoven Emperor concerto; Emma Boynet, in a Mozart piano concerto, and Jascha Heifetz in a Beethoven violin concerto.

Woman to Conduct

On the other side of the ledger, however, the major innovation will be the first female conductor in the orchestra's history — Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, of France—and the first performances in America of the Helsinki Chorus, which will introduce two notable works of Sibelius.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught the late George Gershwin orchestration in Paris nine years ago when the latter wrote his "American in Paris," will conduct only one selection, Faure's Requiem, in February.

Other soloists will be Serge Rachmaninoff, playing his own piano rhapsody; Yehudi Menuhin, who will give the recent posthumously released Schumann violin concerto, and Paul Hindemith, German composer, who will play his own viola concerto.

Two guest conductors will appear for a week each in mid-season—Georges Enesco, Rumanian, and Daniele Amfitheatroff, Russian, who will make his first visit to America.

Personnel Little Changed

The personnel of the orchestra will show few changes. Heinrich Lorbeer, a 72-year-old horn player, has retired after 45 consecutive years, a record orchestra officials said was unsurpassed. He will be replaced by Paul Kearney, 25-year-old Boston youth. There also will be a new second harpist.

The orchestra will play concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., Ann Arbor, Mich.; Toledo and Cincinnati, O.; Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, Pa.; New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J.; Northampton, Springfield, Worcester, and Cambridge, Mass.; Providence; and New Haven and Hartford, Conn.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 26 1937

6

Martha Baird to Appear With Boston Symphony

LOCAL PIANIST WILL PLAY ON NOV. 9

Retired Artist Slated to Play Concerto By Mozart on Program

MARTHA BAIRD

Retired Providence Artist Will Be Heard with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra in Concert Here in November.

The Providence audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have opportunity this season to hear a noted local musician as soloist with the orchestra.

Martha Baird (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen) will play the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor at the orchestra's second concert here, Nov. 9, it was announced last night. Miss Baird will be one of four soloists who will perform with the orchestra in this city. The others are Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, its first violoncellist, who will play the Brahms double concerto Jan. 25, and Raya Garbousova, Russian woman violoncellist, who will play a concerto, not yet decided upon, on March 1. The other concerts of the series will be Oct. 19 and April 5. All will be Tuesday evenings.

The Providence appearance will be Miss Baird's third with the orchestra.

Miss Baird will also play at three concerts for young people to be given by the Providence Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan theatre on the Saturday afternoons Dec. 4, Jan. 15 and Feb. 19.

Because she has retired from active professional life, she finds it "all the more gratifying, and thrilling, that Dr. Koussevitzky should have asked me to play." She is pleased, too, that a Mozart concerto should have been chosen, for Mozart is one of her favorite composers, "appealing to the very young, who have an instinctive appreciation of form, and also to the well-versed, who understand his full merit." She observed that famous composers of today and of former times have expressed the highest regard for Mozart.

Miss Baird is busy daily with her practising, although she does not have regularly scheduled hours. The music room in her residence on Upton avenue is provided with soundproof doors, so that she can play late or early as she wishes.

The Boston season of the orchestra opens on a Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 14th consecutive season as conductor, the longest service of any in the orchestra's history. The program will comprise the Third, or "Eroica," symphony of Beethoven and the second of Sibelius.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SEP 26 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS FIFTY-SEVENTH SEASON

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give two series of twenty-four concerts each in Symphony hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings beginning on the 8th and 9th of October, and ending on the 29th and 30th of April.

Two short series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given in monthly pairs through the year.

Season tickets for all series are now on sale at the box office, Symphony hall (telephone: Com. 1492). Seating plans showing prices will be mailed upon request.

A season of great music has been planned by the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will assemble in the course of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season the great symphonic works of the past and the present—those which are familiar by the warrant of their greatness, and those which deserve more familiarity by the qualities they possess.

The foremost concertos, too, will have their place, and these afford the opportunity to hear to the very finest advantage the world's first pianists and violinists. The following will appear with the orchestra: Walter Gieseking, in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, Sergei Rachmaninoff in his own Rhapsody, Emma Boynet in a concerto of Mozart, Jascha Heifetz in Beethoven's Concerto and the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Yehudi Menuhin in the concerto of Brahms.

George Enesco, the highly esteemed Roumanian composer, conductor, and violinist, will be the guest conductor of a pair of concerts. Another guest will be Daniele Amfitheatroff, a Russian conductor of rising European reputation who is to make his first visit to America. The distinguished French musician Nadia Boulanger will conduct Fauré's "Requiem."

Paul Hindemith will make his first appearance with the orchestra, playing the viola in a concerto of his own. The Helsingfors University Chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius.

Dr. Koussevitzky will place particular emphasis upon the orchestral works of Sibelius, of Mozart, and of Beethoven. Such music attains its highest beauty when performed by an orchestra of tonal magnificence and virtuosity not to be matched in the world of concerts.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 26 1937

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

THE OPEN season for America's great orchestras will be on in a fortnight with Boston leading the way. It is the 57th season for the band and the 14th for Dr. Koussevitsky; the opening program on October 8th and 9th is carried over from the Berkshire Festival, comprising Beethovens "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius' Second.

An interesting list of contemporary works has been announced by the gallant Russian conductor together with an imposing lineup of soloists. Albert Roussel, distinguished French composer, and George Gershwin will be represented in memoriam, the former by two symphonies and the latter by his "An American in Paris." Film music is to be played in a suite arranged from Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" which has not been seen or heard in America. Also Prokofieff will be given attention by his Overture on Russian Themes and his Second Violin Concerto, with Heifetz as soloist. A second Symphony by Francesco Malipiero will have it first hearing in America. Bela Bartok's music for strings and percussion, a Concerto by Michael Starokadomsky of the Soviet Union and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's "The Card Game" covers central Europe's contribution to the Boston season.

American music has a chapter with Edward Burlingame Hill's new Third Symphony, Aaron Copland's "Statements" and a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby on the list. Two choral works, still unknown in America, by Sibelius should arouse interest, especially since the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland will be on hand to furnish the vocal art. Soloists for the season include Nadia Boulanger, Paul Hindemith, Emma Boynet, Rachmaninoff, Gieseking, Menuhin, and Amfitheatroff. Dr. Koussevitsky will have a vacation as usual, turning over the baton to the noted Georges Enesco for a fortnight.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader

SEP 26 1937

Catching the Beat in Music World Today

By INA WICKHAM.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra promises a number of novelties as well as the introduction of important new American and European works in its 57th season to begin on Oct. 8. This is Serge Koussevitsky's 14th year with the orchestra and he will have the assistance during the season of two guest conductors, George Enesco and Daniele Amfitheatrof, a young Russian.

Dr. Koussevitsky will present standard works as well, stressing the compositions of Mozart and Beethoven, in the season which will run for about six months.

AMONG THE NOVELTIES

. . . will be the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Arienne;" Prokofieff's Overture on Russian Themes and the music written for the film "Lieutenant Kije." Heifetz will be soloist in Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto. Other novelties will be Malipiero's Second Symphony, Martok's "Music for Strings and Precussion," Starkadomsky's "Concerto for Orchestra" and a suite from "The Card Ballet" by Stravinsky.

FOR AMERICAN WORKS

. . . Koussevitsky wil present Edward Burlingame Hill's "Third Symphony;" "Statements" by Aaron Copeland and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby. Two little known works by Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire," and "The Captive Queen" will be presented during the season. Soloists will include Geiseking, Rachmaninoff, Menuhin and Heifetz.

MUSIC AND

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 57th season, and the 14th under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, Friday and Saturday, Oct 8 and 9. The initial program will consist of the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony by Sibelius.

Once again 24 concerts each will be presented on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings during the season, and there will be two series of six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. A notably increased demand for season tickets is reported from the Symphony Hall box office.

Word comes that Beethoven's great choral masterpiece, the Missa Solennis, will be performed by the Boston Symphony at a special concert in the Spring. Despite its rank as an artwork, the Missa Solennis is rarely heard nowadays, because of its exceeding difficulty and its demands upon the singing voices. It was presented in Boston by the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, a decade ago, in March, 1927, during an observance of the 100th anniversary of Beethoven's death.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
SEP 30 1937

Music and The Drama

LORBEER, FRENCH HORN PLAYER, QUITS BOSTON SYMPHONY AFTER 46-YEAR STAY

After more than half a century of horn-playing, most of it in the service of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry E. Lorbeer thinks it's about time to retire, says the Boston Transcript. The management, to whom he confided his wish some time ago, thinks otherwise. Mr. Lorbeer has been asked to be available for occasions when the score requires eight French horns. Since these occasions are not frequent during the course of a season Mr. Lorbeer has agreed to keep himself, so to say, in readiness.

Mr. Lorbeer's fifty-odd years must constitute close to a world's record for an instrument like the French horn. Certainly his continuous tenure of forty-six years is the record in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's history for any instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra itself was only ten years old when Mr. Lorbeer came to play fourth horn. He was engaged by Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra, who had preceded him by a couple of years, coming from Leipzig, where Mr. Lorbeer had also played under him. Mr. Lorbeer consented to come to America after some persuasion.

Asked whether he had any regrets about coming here, Mr. Lorbeer admitted he had some, but they were not serious now. One of them, at first, was due to the lack of profusion of varieties of German beer, though he made some discoveries after he had been in Boston for a while. Another, he says, was the matter of pension. If he had stayed on in Germany he would have had a much larger pension from the Government, than is the case in Boston.

Mr. Lorbeer had to leave school at the age of fourteen and soon made his way to Essen as a horn player. After a year there he went to Leipzig, where Nikisch was conductor at the opera. Mr. Lorbeer also studied for five years at the Leipzig Conservatory on a scholarship.

In Boston, Mr. Lorbeer has served continuously in the Symphony Orchestra and has played under every conductor except one, George Henschel, Gericke, the second, came back for another term later. Mr. Lorbeer played fourth horn for a couple of years, then was shifted to second horn, where he remained over thirty years and finally back to fourth horn.

Witnessed Many Changes

Mr. Lorbeer has witnessed many changes in the years he has been with the Symphony Orchestra. Only one other player, he says, has seen more. That's Joseph Mann, trumpeter, who no longer plays in the orchestra, but does music copying.

When Mr. Lorbeer came the orchestra was predominantly German in make-up. Now there is a mere handful (not counting Austrians). Most of them left at the time of the great war, when German aliens were not popular. Mr. Lorbeer stayed on because he had become an American citizen.

He wants to take it easy from now on. And even though he has consented to be available "on call" he doesn't expect to work hard any more, although his health is good. He lives with his wife in Jamaica Plain, which has long been a haven for member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sept. 26, 1937 THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY Journal

METROPOLITAN THEATRE — FIVE TUESDAY EVENINGS AT 8:15
OCT. 19 NOV. 9 JAN. 25 MARCH 1 APRIL 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

— SOLOISTS —

GARBOUSOVA
'CELLO

MARTHA BAIRD
PIANO

RICHARD BURGIN
VIOLIN

JEAN BEDETTI
'CELLO

Season Ticket Sale Opens Mon., Oct. 4, at the Avery Piano Co., 256 Weybosset St. $12, $10, $7.50, $5, (no tax)—Mail Orders Now

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 25 1937

CONCERT RECORDS

Albums—And a New Tenor

MANY of the old, familiar double-faces are showing themselves again in new recordings or reissues of earlier releases. Beethoven's second symphony, directed by Sir Thomas Beecham, has become Columbia set 302, superseding set 45, which also was Beethoven's second symphony, led by Sir Thomas. The new set isn't a reissue. It's a recent job by Sir Thomas and the London Philharmonic, and one of the best of all Beethoven albums. The previous Beecham edition of the symphony was a masterpiece of its sort; this one is just as good as a performance, and sixteen (possibly seventeen) times better as a recording. List it as the No. 1 album of Beethoven's No. 2.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has appeared in a fresh presentation by the Boston Symphony, in charge of Serge Koussevitzky (Victor album M-347). Victor's other album of "Romeo and Juliet" was by Mr. Stokowski and The Philadelphia Orchestra (album M-46), and although some three hundred albums have been made between Romeos, the Philadelphia offering still issues pleasantly from the loudspeaker. The Boston set, however, is one of the finest recording demonstrations to date, and as Mr. Koussevitzky turns in one of his top jobs, the choice

SEPTEMBER 25, 1937

---

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
SEP 26 1937

Boston Symphony To Visit 17 Cities

The Boston Symphony Orchestra which opened its fifty-seventh season
h Serge Kousse-
the fourteenth
een cities during oncerts or series.
has announced
many works of n as well as in-important Amer-
n compositions.
whose works will
le Hill, Copland
Helsinki Univer-
esent two littlelius: "The Origin
aptive Queen."
will be Gieseking,
hin, Hindemith—
of his own com-
Boynet.
Daniele Amfitheanger will be guest

PASTE OVER

6

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 26 1937

Martha Baird to Appear With Boston Symphony

LOCAL PIANIST WILL PLAY ON NOV. 9

Retired Artist Slated to Play Concerto By Mozart on Program

MARTHA BAIRD

Retired Providence Artist Will Be Heard with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra in Concert Here in November.

The Providence audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have opportunity this season to hear a noted local musician as soloist with the orchestra.

Martha Baird (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen) will play the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor at the orchestra's second concert here, Nov. 9, it was announced last night. Miss Baird will be one of four soloists who will perform with the orchestra in this city. The others are Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, its first violoncellist, who will play the Brahms double concerto Jan. 25, and Raya Garbousova, Russian woman violoncellist, who will play a concerto, not yet decided upon, on March 1. The other concerts of the series will be Oct. 19 and April 5. All will be Tuesday evenings.

The Providence appearance will be Miss Baird's third with the orchestra.

Miss Baird will also play at three concerts for young people to be given by the Providence Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan theatre on the Saturday afternoons Dec. 4, Jan. 15 and Feb. 19.

Because she has retired from active professional life, she finds it "all the more gratifying, and thrilling, that Dr. Koussevitzky should have asked me to play." She is pleased, too, that a Mozart concerto should have been chosen, for Mozart is one of her favorite composers, "appealing to the very young, who have an instinctive appreciation of form, and also to the well-versed, who understand his full merit." She observed that famous composers of today and of former times have expressed the highest regard for Mozart.

Miss Baird is busy daily with her practising, although she does not have regularly scheduled hours. The music room in her residence on Upton avenue is provided with soundproof doors, so that she can play late or early as she wishes.

The Boston season of the orchestra opens on a Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 14th consecutive season as conductor, the longest service of any in the orchestra's history. The program will comprise the Third, or "Eroica," symphony of Beethoven and the second of Sibelius.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SEP 26 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS FIFTY-SEVENTH SEASON

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give two series of twenty-four concerts each in Symphony hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings beginning on the 8th and 9th of October, and ending on the 29th and 30th of April.

Two short series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given in monthly pairs through the year.

Season tickets for all series are now on sale at the box office, Symphony hall (telephone: Com. 1492). Seating plans showing prices will be mailed upon request.

A season of great music has been planned by the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will assemble in the course of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season the great symphonic works of the past and the present—those which are familiar by the warrant of their greatness, and those which deserve more familiarity by the qualities they possess.

The foremost concertos, too, will have their place, and these afford the opportunity to hear to the very finest advantage the world's first pianists and violinists. The following will appear with the orchestra: Walter Gieseking, in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, Sergei Rachmaninoff in his own Rhapsody, Emma Boynet in a concerto of Mozart, Jascha Heifetz in Beethoven's Concerto and the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Yehudi Menuhin in the concerto of Brahms.

George Enesco, the highly esteemed Roumanian composer, conductor, and violinist, will be the guest conductor of a pair of concerts. Another guest will be Daniele Amfitheatroff, a Russian conductor of rising European reputation who is to make his first visit to America. The distinguished French musician Nadia Boulanger will conduct Fauré's "Requiem."

Paul Hindemith will make his first appearance with the orchestra, playing the viola in a concerto of his own. The Helsingfors University Chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius.

Dr. Koussevitzky will place particular emphasis upon the orchestral works of Sibelius, of Mozart, and of Beethoven. Such music attains its highest beauty when performed by an orchestra of tonal magnificence and virtuosity not to be matched in the world of concerts.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 26 1937

30-31

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

THE OPEN season for America's great orchestras will be on in a fortnight with Boston leading the way. It is the 57th season for the band and the 14th for Dr. Koussevitsky; the opening program on October 8th and 9th is carried over from the Berkshire Festival, comprising Beethovens "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius' Second.

An interesting list of contemporary works has been announced by the gallant Russian conductor together with an imposing lineup of soloists. Albert Roussel, distinguished French composer, and George Gershwin will be represented in memoriam, the former by two symphonies and the latter by his "An American in Paris." Film music is to be played in a suite arranged from Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" which has not been seen or heard in America. Also Prokofieff will be given attention by his Overture on Russian Themes and his Second Violin Concerto, with Heifetz as soloist. A second Symphony by Francesco Malipiero will have it first hearing in America. Bela Bartok's music for strings and percussion, a Concerto by Michael Starokadomsky of the Soviet Union and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's "The Card Game" covers central Europe's contribution to the Boston season.

American music has a chapter with Edward Burlingame Hill's new Third Symphony, Aaron Copland's "Statements" and a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby on the list. Two choral works, still unknown in America, by Sibelius should arouse interest, especially since the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland will be on hand to furnish the vocal art. Soloists for the season include Nadia Boulanger, Paul Hindemith, Emma Boynet, Rachmaninoff, Gieseking, Menuhin, and Amfitheatroff. Dr. Koussevitsky will have a vacation as usual, turning over the baton to the noted Georges Enesco for a fortnight.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader

SEP 26 1937

Catching the Beat in Music World Today

By INA WICKHAM.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra promises a number of novelties as well as the introduction of important new American and European works in its 57th season to begin on Oct. 8. This is Serge Koussevitsky's 14th year with the orchestra and he will have the assistance during the season of two guest conductors, George Enesco and Daniele Amfitheatrof, a young Russian.

Dr. Koussevitsky will present standard works as well, stressing the compositions of Mozart and Beethoven, in the season which will run for about six months.

AMONG THE NOVELTIES

. . . will be the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Arienne;" Prokofieff's Overture on Russian Themes and the music written for the film "Lieutenant Kije." Heifetz will be soloist in Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto. Other novelties will be Malipiero's Second Symphony, Martok's "Music for Strings and Precussion," Starkadomsky's "Concerto for Orchestra" and a suite from "The Card Ballet" by Stravinsky.

FOR AMERICAN WORKS

. . . Koussevitsky will present Edward Burlingame Hill's "Third Symphony;" "Statements" by Aaron Copeland and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby. Two little known works by Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire," and "The Captive Queen" will be presented during the season. Soloists will include Geiseking, Rachmaninoff, Menuhin and Heifetz.

Sept 26

MUSIC AND

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 57th season, and the 14th under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, Friday and Saturday, Oct 8 and 9. The initial program will consist of the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony by Sibelius.

Once again 24 concerts each will be presented on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings during the season, and there will be two series of six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. A notably increased demand for season tickets is reported from the Symphony Hall box office.

Word comes that Beethoven's great choral masterpiece, the Missa Solennis, will be performed by the Boston Symphony at a special concert in the Spring. Despite its rank as an artwork, the Missa Solennis is rarely heard nowadays, because of its exceeding difficulty and its demands upon the singing voices. It was presented in Boston by the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, a decade ago, in March, 1927, during an observance of the 100th anniversary of Beethoven's death.

Sept. 26, 1937 THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY Journal

METROPOLITAN THEATRE — FIVE TUESDAY EVENINGS AT 8:15
OCT. 19 NOV. 9 JAN. 25 MARCH 1 APRIL 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

— SOLOISTS —

GARBOUSOVA
'CELLO

MARTHA BAIRD
PIANO

RICHARD BURGIN
VIOLIN

JEAN BEDETTI
'CELLO

Season Ticket Sale Opens Mon., Oct. 4, at the Avery Piano Co., 256 Weybosset St. $12, $10, $7.50, $5, (no tax)—Mail Orders Now

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 25 1937

CONCERT RECORDS

Albums—And a New Tenor

MANY of the old, familiar double-faces are showing themselves again in new recordings or reissues of earlier releases. Beethoven's second symphony, directed by Sir Thomas Beecham, has become Columbia set 302, superseding set 45, which also was Beethoven's second symphony, led by Sir Thomas. The new set isn't a reissue. It's a recent job by Sir Thomas and the London Philharmonic, and one of the best of all Beethoven albums. The previous Beecham edition of the symphony was a masterpiece of its sort; this one is just as good as a performance, and sixteen (possibly seventeen) times better as a recording. List it as the No. 1 album of Beethoven's No. 2.

Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" has appeared in a fresh presentation by the Boston Symphony, in charge of Serge Koussevitzky (Victor album M-347). Victor's other album of "Romeo and Juliet" was by Mr. Stokowski and The Philadelphia Orchestra (album M-46), and although some three hundred albums have been made between Romeos, the Philadelphia offering still issues pleasantly from the loudspeaker. The Boston set, however, is one of the finest recording demonstrations to date, and as Mr. Koussevitzky turns in one of his top jobs, the choice

SEPTEMBER 25, 1937

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
SEP 26 1937

Boston Symphony To Visit 17 Cities

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
which opened its fifty-seventh season
Serge Kousse-
the fourteenth
een cities during oncerts or series.
has announced
many works of n as well as in-important Amer-compositions.
whose works will
le Hill, Copland
Helsinki Univer-
esent two littlelius: "The Origin
'aptive Queen,"
will be Gieseking,
hin, Hindemith—
of his own com-
Boynet.
aniele Amfithea-
nger will be guest

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
SEP 30 1937

Music and The Drama

LORBEER, FRENCH HORN PLAYER, QUITS BOSTON SYMPHONY AFTER 46-YEAR STAY

After more than half a century of horn-playing, most of it in the service of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry E. Lorbeer thinks it's about time to retire, says the Boston Transcript. The management, to whom he confided his wish some time ago, thinks otherwise. Mr. Lorbeer has been asked to be available for occasions when the score requires eight French horns. Since these occasions are not frequent during the course of a season Mr. Lorbeer has agreed to keep himself, so to say, in readiness.

Mr. Lorbeer's fifty-odd years must constitute close to a world's record for an instrument like the French horn. Certainly his continuous tenure of forty-six years is the record in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's history for any instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra itself was only ten years old when Mr. Lorbeer came to play fourth horn. He was engaged by Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra, who had preceded him by a couple of years, coming from Leipzig, where Mr. Lorbeer had also played under him. Mr. Lorbeer consented to come to America after some persuasion.

Asked whether he had any regrets about coming here, Mr. Lorbeer admitted he had some, but they were not serious now. One of them, at first, was due to the lack of profusion of varieties of German beer, though he made some discoveries after he had been in Boston for a while. Another, he says, was the matter of pension. If he had stayed on in Germany he would have had a much larger pension from the Government, than is the case in Boston.

Mr. Lorbeer had to leave school at the age of fourteen and soon made his way to Essen as a horn player. After a year there he went to Leipzig, where Nikisch was conductor at the opera. Mr. Lorbeer also studied for five years at the Leipzig Conservatory on a scholarship.

In Boston, Mr. Lorbeer has served continuously in the Symphony Orchestra and has played under every conductor except one, George Henschel, Gericke, the second, came back for another term later. Mr. Lorbeer played fourth horn for a couple of years, then was shifted to second horn, where he remained over thirty years and finally back to fourth horn.

Witnessed Many Changes

Mr. Lorbeer has witnessed many changes in the years he has been with the Symphony Orchestra. Only one other player, he says, has seen more. That's Joseph Mann, trumpeter, who no longer plays in the orchestra, but does music copying.

When Mr. Lorbeer came the orchestra was predominantly German in make-up. Now there is a mere handful (not counting Austrians). Most of them left at the time of the great war, when German aliens were not popular. Mr. Lorbeer stayed on because he had become an American citizen.

He wants to take it easy from now on. And even though he has consented to be available "on call" he doesn't expect to work hard any more, although his health is good. He lives with his wife in Jamaica Plain, which has long been a haven for member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PASTE OVER

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 26 1937

6

Martha Baird to Appear With Boston Symphony

LOCAL PIANIST WILL PLAY ON NOV. 9

Retired Artist Slated to Play Concerto By Mozart on Program

MARTHA BAIRD

Retired Providence Artist Will Be Heard with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra in Concert Here in November.

The Providence audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have opportunity this season to hear a noted local musician as soloist with the orchestra.

Martha Baird (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen) will play the Mozart piano concerto in D-minor at the orchestra's second concert here, Nov. 9, it was announced last night. Miss Baird will be one of four soloists who will perform with the orchestra in this city. The others are Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, and Jean Bedetti, its first violoncellist, who will play the Brahms double concerto Jan. 25, and Raya Garbousova, Russian woman violoncellist, who will play a concerto, not yet decided upon, on March 1. The other concerts of the series will be Oct. 19 and April 5. All will be Tuesday evenings.

The Providence appearance will be Miss Baird's third with the orchestra.

Miss Baird will also play at three concerts for young people to be given by the Providence Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan theatre on the Saturday afternoons Dec. 4, Jan. 15 and Feb. 19.

Because she has retired from active professional life, she finds it "all the more gratifying, and thrilling, that Dr. Koussevitzky should have asked me to play." She is pleased, too, that a Mozart concerto should have been chosen, for Mozart is one of her favorite composers, "appealing to the very young, who have an instinctive appreciation of form, and also to the well-versed, who understand his full merit." She observed that famous composers of today and of former times have expressed the highest regard for Mozart.

Miss Baird is busy daily with her practising, although she does not have regularly scheduled hours. The music room in her residence on Upton avenue is provided with soundproof doors, so that she can play late or early as she wishes.

The Boston season of the orchestra opens on a Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 14th consecutive season as conductor, the longest service of any in the orchestra's history. The program will comprise the Third, or "Eroica," symphony of Beethoven and the second of Sibelius.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SEP 26 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA OPENS FIFTY-SEVENTH SEASON

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give two series of twenty-four concerts each in Symphony hall on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings beginning on the 8th and 9th of October, and ending on the 29th and 30th of April.

Two short series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given in monthly pairs through the year.

Season tickets for all series are now on sale at the box office, Symphony hall (telephone: Com. 1492). Seating plans showing prices will be mailed upon request.

A season of great music has been planned by the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will assemble in the course of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season the great symphonic works of the past and the present—those which are familiar by the warrant of their greatness, and those which deserve more familiarity by the qualities they possess.

The foremost concertos, too, will have their place, and these afford the opportunity to hear to the very finest advantage the world's first pianists and violinists. The following will appear with the orchestra: Walter Gieseking, in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, Sergei Rachmaninoff in his own Rhapsody, Emma Boynet in a concerto of Mozart, Jascha Heifetz in Beethoven's Concerto and the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Yehudi Menuhin in the concerto of Brahms.

George Enesco, the highly esteemed Roumanian composer, conductor, and violinist, will be the guest conductor of a pair of concerts. Another guest will be Daniele Amfitheatroff, a Russian conductor of rising European reputation who is to make his first visit to America. The distinguished French musician Nadia Boulanger will conduct Fauré's "Requiem."

Paul Hindemith will make his first appearance with the orchestra, playing the viola in a concerto of his own. The Helsingfors University Chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius.

Dr. Koussevitzky will place particular emphasis upon the orchestral works of Sibelius, of Mozart, and of Beethoven. Such music attains its highest beauty when performed by an orchestra of tonal magnificence and virtuosity not to be matched in the world of concerts.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 26 1937

30-31

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johnson

THE OPEN season for America's great orchestras will be on in a fortnight with Boston leading the way. It is the 57th season for the band and the 14th for Dr. Koussevitsky; the opening program on October 8th and 9th is carried over from the Berkshire Festival, comprising Beethovens "Eroica" Symphony and Sibelius' Second.

An interesting list of contemporary works has been announced by the gallant Russian conductor together with an imposing lineup of soloists. Albert Roussel, distinguished French composer, and George Gershwin will be represented in memoriam, the former by two symphonies and the latter by his "An American in Paris." Film music is to be played in a suite arranged from Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" which has not been seen or heard in America. Also Prokofieff will be given attention by his Overture on Russian Themes and his Second Violin Concerto, with Heifetz as soloist. A second Symphony by Francesco Malipiero will have it first hearing in America. Bela Bartok's music for strings and percussion, a Concerto by Michael Starokadomsky of the Soviet Union and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's "The Card Game" covers central Europe's contribution to the Boston season.

American music has a chapter with Edward Burlingame Hill's new Third Symphony, Aaron Copland's "Statements" and a Concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby on the list. Two choral works, still unknown in America, by Sibelius should arouse interest, especially since the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland will be on hand to furnish the vocal art. Soloists for the season include Nadia Boulanger, Paul Hindemith, Emma Boynet, Rachmaninoff, Gieseking, Menuhin, and Amfitheatroff. Dr. Koussevitsky will have a vacation as usual, turning over the baton to the noted Georges Enesco for a fortnight.

MUSIC AND

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its 57th season, and the 14th under the leadership of Dr Serge Koussevitzky, Friday and Saturday, Oct 8 and 9. The initial program will consist of the "Eroica" Symphony of Beethoven and the Second Symphony by Sibelius.

Once again 24 concerts each will be presented on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings during the season, and there will be two series of six concerts each on Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons. A notably increased demand for season tickets is reported from the Symphony Hall box office.

Word comes that Beethoven's great choral masterpiece, the Missa Solennis, will be performed by the Boston Symphony at a special concert in the Spring. Despite its rank as an artwork, the Missa Solennis is rarely heard nowadays, because of its exceeding difficulty and its demands upon the singing voices. It was presented in Boston by the orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, a decade ago, in March, 1927, during an observance of the 100th anniversary of Beethoven's death.

DAVENPORT, IA.
Democrat & Leader

SEP 26 1937

Catching the Beat in Music World Today

By INA WICKHAM.

THE Boston Symphony orchestra promises a number of novelties as well as the introduction of important new American and European works in its 57th season to begin on Oct. 8. This is Serge Koussevitsky's 14th year with the orchestra and he will have the assistance during the season of two guest conductors, George Enesco and Daniele Amfitheatrof, a young Russian.

Dr. Koussevitsky will present standard works as well, stressing the compositions of Mozart and Beethoven, in the season which will run for about six months.

AMONG THE NOVELTIES

. . . will be the Second Suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Arienne;" Prokofieff's Overture on Russian Themes and the music written for the film "Lieutenant Kije." Heifetz will be soloist in Prokofieff's Second Violin Concerto. Other novelties will be Malipiero's Second Symphony, Martok's "Music for Strings and Precussion," Starkadomsky's "Concerto for Orchestra" and a suite from "The Card Ballet" by Stravinsky.

FOR AMERICAN WORKS

. . . Koussevitsky will present Edward Burlingame Hill's "Third Symphony;" "Statements" by Aaron Copeland and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby. Two little known works by Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire," and "The Captive Queen" will be presented during the season. Soloists will include Geiseking, Rachmaninoff, Menuhin and Heifetz.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
SEP 30 1937

Music and The Drama

LORBEER, FRENCH HORN PLAYER, QUITS BOSTON SYMPHONY AFTER 46-YEAR STAY

After more than half a century of horn-playing, most of it in the service of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Henry E. Lorbeer thinks it's about time to retire, says the Boston Transcript. The management, to whom he confided his wish some time ago, thinks otherwise. Mr. Lorbeer has been asked to be available for occasions when the score requires eight French horns. Since these occasions are not frequent during the course of a season Mr. Lorbeer has agreed to keep himself, so to say, in readiness.

Mr. Lorbeer's fifty-odd years must constitute close to a world's record for an instrument like the French horn. Certainly his continuous tenure of forty-six years is the record in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's history for any instrument.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra itself was only ten years old when Mr. Lorbeer came to play fourth horn. He was engaged by Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra, who had preceded him by a couple of years, coming from Leipzig, where Mr. Lorbeer had also played under him. Mr. Lorbeer consented to come to America after some persuasion.

Asked whether he had any regrets about coming here, Mr. Lorbeer admitted he had some, but they were not serious now. One of them, at first, was due to the lack of profusion of varieties of German beer, though he made some discoveries after he had been in Boston for a while. Another, he says, was the matter of pension. If he had stayed on in Germany he would have had a much larger pension from the Government, than is the case in Boston.

Mr. Lorbeer had to leave school at the age of fourteen and soon made his way to Essen as a horn player. After a year there he went to Leipzig, where Nikisch was conductor at the opera. Mr. Lorbeer also studied for five years at the Leipzig Conservatory on a scholarship.

In Boston, Mr. Lorbeer has served continuously in the Symphony Orchestra and has played under every conductor except one, George Henschel, Gericke, the second, came back for another term later. Mr. Lorbeer played fourth horn for a couple of years, then was shifted to second horn, where he remained over thirty years and finally back to fourth horn.

Witnessed Many Changes

Mr. Lorbeer has witnessed many changes in the years he has been with the Symphony Orchestra. Only one other player, he says, has seen more. That's Joseph Mann, trumpeter, who no longer plays in the orchestra, but does music copying.

When Mr. Lorbeer came the orchestra was predominantly German in make-up. Now there is a mere handful (not counting Austrians). Most of them left at the time of the great war, when German aliens were not popular. Mr. Lorbeer stayed on because he had become an American citizen.

He wants to take it easy from now on. And even though he has consented to be available "on call" he doesn't expect to work hard any more, although his health is good. He lives with his wife in Jamaica Plain, which has long been a haven for member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sept. 21, 1937 THE PROVIDENCE SUNDAY Journal

METROPOLITAN THEATRE — FIVE TUESDAY EVENINGS AT 8:15
OCT. 19 NOV. 9 JAN. 25 MARCH 1 APRIL 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

— SOLOISTS —

GARBOUSOVA
'CELLO

MARTHA BAIRD
PIANO

RICHARD BURGIN
VIOLIN

JEAN BEDETTI
'CELLO

Season Ticket Sale Opens Mon., Oct. 4, at the Avery Piano Co., 256 Weybosset St. $12, $10, $7.50, $5, (no tax)—Mail Orders Now

---

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
SEP 26 1937

Boston Symphony To Visit 17 Cities

The Boston Symphony Orchestra
which opened its fifty-seventh season
h Serge Kousse-
the fourteenth
een cities during oncerts or series.
has announced
many works of n as well as in-important Amer-
n compositions,
whose works will
le Hill, Copland
Helsinki Univer-
esent two littlelius: "The Origin
aptive Queen."
will be Gieseking,
hin, Hindemith—
of his own com-
Boynet.
aniele Amfithea-
nger will be guest

SEPTEMBER 25, 1937

of Serge Koussevitzky (Victor album M-347). Victor's other album of "Romeo and Juliet" was by Mr. Stokowski and The Philadelphia Orchestra (album M-46), and although some three hundred albums have been made between Romeos, the Philadelphia offering still issues pleasantly from the loudspeaker. The Boston set, however, is one of the finest recording demonstrations to date, and as Mr. Koussevitzky turns in one of his top jobs, the choice is M-347.

Several Victor two-record publications have been shoved into albums and reissued in the Musical Masterpieces series. Ravel's Bolero, done by Mr. Koussevitzky and his fellows, becomes M-352, with Debussy's orchestration of Satie's third Gymnopédie filling out the fourth side. Fritz Busch's exceptional projection of Strauss's "Don Juan," first released as Victor records 11983-4, has been promoted to be album M-351. Deserved it, too.

Meanwhile, the albums once sold under the auspices of the Sibelius Society are being made available to the proletariat as regulation Victor sets. Victor M-344 is a trade edition of the third Society set. So if you want Georg Schneevoigt's fine performance of the sixth Sibelius symphony, along with the Budapest String Quartet's expert playing of "Voces Intimae," you may have them both without becoming an enrolled Sibelian.

THERE have been two recent productions of Beethoven's sonata quasi una fantasia, Op. 27, No. 2, slangily known as the "Moonlight" Sonata. One is by Ignace Jan Paderewski (Victor album M-349), and it's one of his most representative recordings. Mr. Paderewski completes the album with his popular encore—his own Minuet in G, which he handles in a fashion suggesting that he isn't familiar with the traditional tempi of the composition. He doesn't make it a hop-skip-and-jump, which will be a disappointment to my neighbor, who used to practice it that way every morning at eight, punctually. The second "Moonlight" is by Egon Petri (Columbia album X-77), a clean, sound, rather detached affair. For good measure, Mr. Petri goes to town handsomely with Liszt's D-flat concert study.

Chopin collectors will have an or-

PASTE OVER

SYMPHONY Soloists

SEPTEMBER 26, 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON starts Friday and Saturday, October 8 and 9, under the masterful direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, shown at the left. Many of the world's outstanding concert artists will appear as guest soloists on the orchestra's programs during the year. Below is an interesting study of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who will play his own "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini."

GEORGE ENESCO, composer and violinist, will be the guest conductor during the season in a pair of concerts.

(Lipnitzki, Paris)

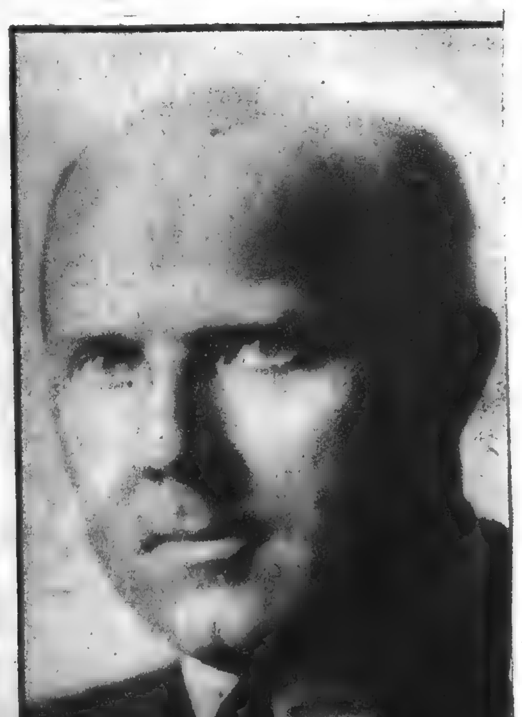
(Lipnitzki, Paris)

EMMA BOYNET, below, will be the soloist in a Mozart Concerto for piano.

YEHUDI MENUHIN will return after two years' retirement from public appearances to play the Brahms Concerto.

(De Bellis)

JASCHA HEIFETZ, soloist in Beethoven's Concerto and the new concerto by Prokofieff.



WALTER GIESEKING, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

(Ossip Garber, N. Y.)

SYMPHONY Soloists

SEPTEMBER 26, 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON starts Friday and Saturday, October 8 and 9, under the masterful direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, shown at the left. Many of the world's outstanding concert artists will appear as guest soloists on the orchestra's programs during the year. Below is an interesting study of Sergei Rachmaninoff, who will play his own "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini."

GEORGE ENESCO, composer and violinist, will be the guest conductor during the season in a pair of concerts.
(Lipnitzki, Paris)

(Lipnitzki, Paris)

EMMA BOYNET, below, will be the soloist in a Mozart Concerto for piano.

YEHUDI MENUHIN will return after two years' retirement from public appearances to play the Brahms Concerto.
(De Bellis)

JASCHA HEIFETZ, soloist in Beethoven's Concerto and the new concerto by Prokofieff.

WALTER GIESEKING, who will play Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.
(Ossip Garber, N. Y.)

1

Symphony Plans; Dramatic News

B. Herald - Sept. 26/37

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR-TRIBUNE

OCT 1 - 1937

Soloist at Metropolitan

MARTHA BAIRD

SYMPHONY SETS DATES

Boston Orchestra to Make Second Showing Here Oct. 19

Martha Baird, concert pianist and wife of Arthur M. Allen of this city, will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its second appearance at the Metropolitan Theatre of the ensuing season, starting Oct. 19, it was announced today.

The orchestra's scheduled dates for Providence performances are: Oct. 19, Nov. 9, Jan. 25, March 1 and April 5, to complete the annual series of five appearances.

Mrs. Allen will play the Mozart piano concerto in D minor, (K.466) on Nov. 9 in the third concert. Richard Burgin, concert master, and Jean Bedetti, first violoncellist, will be joint soloists in the great double concerto of Johanus Brahms, on Jan. 28. For the fourth concert, Raya Garbousova, noted woman violoncellist, will appear in a concerto yet to be determined upon.

Eleven days before opening of the Providense season, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, will start the orchestra's 57th season at Symphony Hall, Boston. The occasion, Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, also will mark opening of his 14th consecutive season as conductor.—the longest service of any conductor in the history of the orchestra. The opening program at Boston will be constituted from Beethoven's Eroica and the second symphony of Jan Sibelius.

Georges Enesco, celebrated Rumanian composer, conductor and violinist, who will be a guest conductor with the Boston Symphony orchestra during the coming season, which starts at Symphony Hall on Oct. 8.

An Unusual Season Promised By Boston Symphony Plans

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The annual announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now some time off the press, and Dr. Koussevitzky's plans for new works give promise of an exceptionally interesting season. In one important particular there will be a change from the policy of the last two years. Then it was remarked that Dr. Koussevitzky presented only about a dozen new works a season in marked contrast to his early years with the orchestra. This recent policy has been wise on the principle that there are more first performances than there are second and third. Most writers agree on the maxim that 10th editions are more valuable to them than first. So, too, it is irksome for a composer to hear his music once and then to have it callously neglected.

A policy of consolidation and of broadening the base of the symphonic repertoire has been pursued by Dr. Koussevitzky. Now, apparently, he will again welcome a larger number of new scores, although there is no likelihood that he will abandon his other policy. The announcement that the music of Mozart, Beethoven and Sibelius will receive special emphasis indicates that nothing very radical is afoot. Sibelius' 2d Symphony is now nearly as familiar to Bostonians as Beethoven's "Eroica," both of which open the 57th season on Oct. 8 and 9. But Mozart's and Haydn's symphonies, with a few famous exceptions, are not really well known and provide one of the easiest and best ways of enlarging the regular repertoire. We are also to hear revivals of such works as Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and Mahler's 5th Symphony.

NEW SCORES

Already some 15 new works have been announced for performance during the season, all of them for the first time in Boston and some probably for the first time in America or the world. These are Prokofieff's film music, "Lieutenant Kije," and an overture on Rusian themes; the second suite from the late Albert Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Arianne"; the 2d Symphony by Malipiero; Edward Burlingame Hill's new 3d Symphony; Aaron Copland's "Statements"; a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby; a suite from Stravinsky's most recent ballet, "The Card Game"; Bela Bartok's music for strings and percussion; an orchestral concert by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer; Prokofieff's new violin concerto; two unfamiliar choral works by Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen"; a viola concerto by Paul Hindemith. There will also be a performance of "An American in Paris" in memory of George Gershwin. Roussel's notable 3d Symphony will be revived as additional evidence of the loss the musical world has suffered in his death. Whether the recent death of Gabriel Pierne will also be noticed officially by the Boston Symphony has not yet been announced. This list of modern works is quite an expansion from the last two seasons; nor does it include any of the new music that the guest conductors may offer us.

The season is also remarkable for the number and distinction of the visitors who will be associated with the orchestra. Of the mid-season guest conductors Georges Enesco is the more distinguished. The Roumanian composer has been heard with the Boston Symphony as a violin soloist, and he is a very great violinist. Last season he conducted the New York Philharmonic for two weeks, and it is certainly fitting that he should visit Boston in the capacity of conductor. We may hope that he will present some of his own music, for it is not at all well known here. The second guest conductor, Daniele Amfitheatroff, is a Russian trained in Italy and will be an unknown quantity here until he has been heard.

It was a courteous and intelligent gesture of Dr. Koussevitzky to invite Mlle. Nadia Boulanger to conduct the orchestra in Faure's Requiem. She will be teaching in Radcliffe this winter and will be the first woman to lead the Boston Symphony in the regular series of concerts. She has trained a great many of the most celebrated composers of today and is altogether one of the most remarkable musicians of this generation. Last winter she visited Boston and gave a number of concert-lectures, and she is known to hundreds of Americans through her classes at the Fontainebleau Conservatory in the summer.

Paul Hindemith also visited this country last spring, chiefly in order to be the center of the Coolidge Festival in Washington. This season he is returning and will play one of his own viola concertos with the orchestra. A visit of great interest will be that of the chorus of the University of Helsingfors, Finland. This group has been in existence since 1883, and Sibelius has written all his choral works with it in mind. Walter Gieseking, the famous pianist, has not been heard in Boston for several years, so that his visit should be keenly anticipated. Rachmaninoff will play his own Rhapsody with the orchestra, an event which was scheduled for last season and had to be suddenly called off. At another time we shall go more particularly into the discussion of Schumann's violin concerto, which Yehudi Menuhin is taking the rounds of the American and European orchestras. For the moment it may be said that Mr. Menuhin will not give the first performance of it, as was announced with great eclat in a number of papers. Apparently it will first be heard in Germany; and Miss Jelly d'Aranyi will play it in London in October with the B. B. C. Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult a month before Mr. Menuhin will give the first American performance in St.

EVE. RECORD
Chelsea, Mass.
OCT 1 - 1937

Koussevitzky As Players See Him

To many regular attendants at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open its 57th season at Symphony hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, the gestures of its great leader, Serge Koussevitzky, are a marvel of eloquence and grace which rival the artistic delights of the music itself. Yet this impression is gained, of course, from sitting back of him in the auditorium. Thousands of his devotees must have yearned to watch him face to face, as his musicians see him.

Here is how Koussevitzky looks from the stage. The observations were made by a newspaper reporter who smuggled himself into a choral group appearing several times with the orchestra last season in Symphony hall.

As Koussevitzky takes his place before his "desk" (the music stand), he does not brusquely and loudly tap on it with his stick, to signal "attention" to the orchestra. He seems to make a prayerful pause of an instant, with head slightly bent. Then for a moment he sweeps his glance over the faces of the musicians. His breathing seems to indicate suppressed excitement. Next he sets himself, and stretches his hand out rather deliberately to pick up his baton from the music rack. Suddenly he sweeps both hands upward. Again he eyes the musicians until there is breathless attention on the part of the orchestra and audience alike. Down come the arms, swift, but gliding, and the sound of music rises.

As the playing proceeds, the hands, body, and face of Koussevitzky work together with amazing powers of expression. His face at times is seraphic, at times demoniac. With arms and body he seems to turn an emotional actor of tremendous power, a painter in bold colors and rugged masses, or a painter of opposite character—one using faint pastel hues, and brush-strokes of the utmost delicacy. Often he irresistably gives the impression of a sculptor chiseling from solid rock a magnificent image to which he imparts sublime symmetries.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
OCT 1 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57th Season Plans Announced.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 57th season in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 8 and 9. This will be the 14th successive year of Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the orchestra. Dr Koussevitzky, including as usual a large representation of the classic masterpieces in the Friday and Saturday series, announces a special emphasis upon the works of Mozart and Beethoven. The conductor, who is also a tireless proponent of what is important in the music of our own day, will bring forward a number of new and significant compositions, both European and American.

Soloists for the Friday and Saturday series will include Walter Gieseking (in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto), Sergei Rachmaninoff (in his own Rhapsody), Emma Boynet (in a concerto of Mozart), Jascha Heifetz (in Beethoven's concerto), and Yehudi Menuhin (in the concerto of Brahms). Heifetz will also introduce to this country the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Menuhin will present a posthumous concerto of Schumann now released to the world for the first time. Paul Hindemith, the noted German composer, will appear as viola player in a concerto of his own. Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French musician, will also conduct. The Helsinki chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius.

There will be two guest conductors, each for a week in mid-season—Georges Enesco, the distinguished Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, and Daniele Amfitheatroff, a young Russian conductor who is to make his first visit to America.

The season will include, in addition to the 24 pairs of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, a shorter double series of six Monday evenings and six Tuesday afternoons. The orchestra will also visit the following cities for series or single concerts: Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Hartford, Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J., Northampton, Springfield and Worcester.

Traveler
'URDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1937

Symphony Season Opens Next Week

Serge Koussevitzky has called the first rehearsal next Monday morning at Symphony Hall in preparation for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season there next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program for the first pair of conecrts will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, No. 3 in E flat major, and the second symphony of Sibelius in D major.

This will be the orchestra's 57th season, and the 14th under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, exceeding the terms of any previous conductor.

It is still possible to obtain season tickets for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, during which the following assisting artists will appear: Walter Gieseking, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Emma Boynet, Jascha Heifetz, Yehudi Menuhin, Paul Hindemith and as guest conductors — Georges Enesco, Daniele Amfitheatrof and Nadia Boulanger.

Globe Oct 3

Boston Symphony Season Will Begin Next Friday

The 57th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin with the concerts at 2:30 next Friday afternoon and at 8:15 Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. Dr Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, his 14th consecutive year in this post. The initial program will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

The first rehearsal has been called for tomororw morning. Willem Valkenier will head the horn section, which will include Harry Shapiro and Paul Keaney. These two, together with Louise Came, second harp, and James Pappoutsakis, who joins the flute section, are Boston musicians.

Season tickets are still obtainable for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series. During the season the following artists will appear as soloists: Walter Gieseking, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Emma Boynet, Jascha Heifetz, Yehudi Menuhin and Paul Hindemith. Georges Enesco, Daniele Amfitheatrof and Nadia Boulanger will be guest conductors.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

OCT 2 - 1937

Chopin and Koussevitzky In New Record Albums

By Robert C. Bagar.

An album of the Chopin Polonaises enters into the picture of recent recordings via RCA-Victor. Arthur Rubinstein is the artist, and the group includes several, notably the "Military" and the E flat major, op. 22, which are too frequently projected in recital as merely virtuoso pieces de resistance.

The brilliance and fire required of a performer to do the works justice are considerably in evidence where they are supposed to be in evidence, yet these qualities are the least of the recorder's possessions, it might truly be said, for he practically dedicates himself to the task of bringing out their structures.

But it must not be thought that the pianist is concerned solely with the intellectual or—shall we say?—architectural considerations. On the contrary, poetry and grandeur and a kind of stately ecstasy have their important functions in these often scintillating interpretations.

Besides the numbers specified here the series includes also the Polonaises C sharp minor and E flat minor, op. 26; the C minor, op. 40; the F sharp minor, op. 44; the A flat major, op. 53; the Fantasy in A flat major, op. 61, and the Andante Spianato, op. 22.

* * *

Koussevitzky Waxings.

Under RCA-Victor auspices the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, has lately made recordings of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture of Tschaikowsky, the Ravel "Bolero" and the Erik Satie "Gymnopedie," the last two in one album.

With regard to the playing of the Tschaikowsky opus, the Boston organization does itself proud. There is a fine co-operation and balance in the performance—things for which this group is famous. And Mr. Koussevitzky's reading, it is safe to say, is filled with a devotional fervor. Everyone knows his particular fondness for the music of the great Russian melodist.

8

THE BOSTON HERALD, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1937

pens Friday; Ne

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its 57th season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is Dr. Koussevitskys 14th season with the orchestra, a record unequaled by any of his predecessors.

Spiking the Critical Guns; Publicity and Propaganda

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

We have become so accustomed nowadays to publicity that we ought to be able to distinguish one kind from another, the insidious from the blatant, the dignified from the clever. In volume and pugnacity propaganda has swollen with the times; and at its worst in music, as in the other arts, it tags along after the Hollywood model. Thus a singer who has appeared on the screen draws so much attention in the press that an unknowing reader might think that a Patti or a Melba had returned to earth.

Publicity has many ways of forcing attention, not all of them bad. Sheridan in "The Critic" and Dickens in the ingenious ways that Bob Sawyer sought to attract trade to his surgery pointed to the amusing side of this business. Then there are some current magazines where the advertisements are fully as interesting as the reading matter. Today we live by publicity, though we should use a little discretion in swallowing it. Recently we have come across two examples which invite some discussion and a weighing of merits. One of these is the immense amount of space that has been given over to the return of Yehudi Menuhin and his scheduled performances of the so-called "lost" Violin Concerto of Schumann.

This work was written by Schumann in 1853, together with a Violin Fantasy, for Joachim. A year later the composer became insane; and Joachim never let the two violin works out of his hands. Recently the rights to publish and perform the Concerto have been released by the heirs of Schumann and Joachim. The Fantasy was arranged by Fritz Kreisler and played by him on his American tour last year. Kreisler had heard it played by Joachim and had listened to the opinion of Brahms that someone should separate the wheat from the chaff and thereby do Schumann's memory justice. This Mr. Kreisler attempted to do; and now we are told in Menuhin's press releases that no arrangement was needed in the Fantasy and that he will play the original text of the Concerto on his forthcoming tour.

This business about the Schumann Concerto "broke the news" in late August and with a considerble bang. That irresponsible in late August and with a considerable bang. That irresponsible article in the New York Times, in which he made the unguarded statement that the Concerto would have "its first public performance anywhere with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann, conductor, in St. Louis, Nov. 12" and "thereafter" in other cities of America and Europe. Other papers took up the cry, and Mr. Menuhin had a very flattering boost for his energy in securing a forgotten masterpiece and his courage and honesty in announcing it to be played exactly as Schumann had written it.

Unfortunately the London Times in a short item had given the game away somewhat earlier than all this hue and cry by announcing that the Concerto would be performed by the B. B. C. Orchestra under Sir Adrian Boult at the opening concert in October and that Miss Jelly d'Aranyi would be the soloist. There was no mention of Mr. Menuhin; and it later turned out that the actual first performance would take place in Leipzig in early October. Now all this would not matter very much, so long as we hear the Concerto. Indeed Messrs. Evans and Salter, Mr. Menuhin's managers, in a long release to music editors in the United States we careful to say nothing about the "world premiere" and conc trated their enthusiasm on Mr. Menuhin's efforts.

All the newspaper accounts have done a great deal to the reputation of Mr. Menuhin; but clearly they did not whole story. Such a bias makes one a little doubtful a purity of Mr. Menuhin's intentions. We all know what a linist he is and we certainly welcome him back to the conce if only because some of us are a little tired of reading a "exile" from it. But it is not ungenerous to be a bit susp so much publicity. Hollywood should have taught us a le that head.

Cont.

In short let us wait and hear what the Concerto has to offer. Mr. Menuhin has assured us that the original text will be strictly adhered to, and that does him scholastic credit. Still, Schumann—though a composer of marvelous invention and creative genius—had his faults. An orchestral conductor has to be very careful to temper the thickness of the instrumentation of the symphonies, a characteristic which Schumann indulged in so as to render performances fool proof. He was not always happy in ending a work. It is just possible that Mr. Kreisler may have been right in arranging the Fantasy and that Joachim may have been sincere in guarding Schumann's reputation by not playing the works.

At any rate we shall be in a position to judge for ourselves when later in the season the Boston Symphony will give the Schumann Concerto, with Mr. Menuhin as soloist. Let us hope that it will come up to the wildest expectations, for great violin concertos are not too common. Let us also keep a free mind to listen to the Concerto and not be foolishly beguiled by its romantic history and the amount of talk that has preceded its disclosure. For the moment our discussion of Mr. Menuhin's plans has left no space for the consideration of the other example of musical propaganda, one which presents a quite different problem. It has to do with Wagner and can conveniently wait over until a later date.

GRANDOPERA HERE THIS WEEK

Oct. 3 Post

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

ALL IN the same season, the Symphony Orchestra engages a woman guest-conductor, Nadia Boulanger, and a woman second harpist, Louise Came. Miss Came, the first of her sex to occupy that post in a decade, replaces Mr. Caughey, who has resigned, while upon the resignation of Mr. Freiberg, Wilhelm Valkenier moves up to the head of the horn section. Two new members of this octet are Harry Shapiro and Paul Keaney. These, together with Miss Came and James Pappoutsakis, who joins the flute section, are Boston musicians. Thus does the percentage of native-born members of the orchestra gradually increase.

A new departure in the coming season, and one so sensible that it is surprising it was not thought of before, is the combining of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series into six juxtaposed pairs of concerts, after the manner of those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with the same programmes for each. Time, trouble and expense will thus be saved all around, with no one a whit the worse for it. These paired concerts will come during six successive months, the first falling on Oct. 25 and 26. At one pair Daniele Amfitheatrof, one of the mid-season guest-conductors, will make his appearance. The soloists will be Raya Garbousova, the young Russian 'cellist; Robert Casadesus, the French pianist, as yet unheard here; Orlando Barera, the Italian violinist, another newcomer, and Messrs. Burgin and Bedetti of the orchestra, who will be heard in Brahms' Double Concerto for Violin and Violincello. The programmes will be confined to established master-works, old and new.

* * * *

Dark, so far as music is concerned, until Dr. Koussevitsky inaugurates the Symphony season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening with performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Second of Sibelius, Symphony Hall will be the scene of many concerts other than those of the orchestra. A week from Sunday Mr. Kreisler will start the ball rolling with a recital of music for the violin, and to him a week later succeed the Wagnerian Festival Singers. On Thursday evening, November 4, Rosa Ponselle, absent from Boston concert stages for more than five years, will be heard in recital under the auspices of the Christopher Shop. On Sunday afternoon, Nov. 1, the Don Cossacks will give the first concert of Aaron Richmond's Symphony Hall series, which will later offer Kirsten Flagstad, the Philadelphia Orchestra, Marion Anderson and Shan-Kar.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS START ON FRIDAY

Serge Koussevitzky has called the first rehearsal tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall in preparation for the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This will be the orchestra's 57th season, and the 14th under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, who has now exceeded the term of any previous conductor. Wilhelm Valkenier will head the horn section, which will also include Harry Shapiro and Paul Keaney These two, together with Louise Came, second harp, and James Pappoutsakis, who joins the flute section, are Boston musicians.

It is still possible to obtain season tickets for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series, during which the following assisting artists will appear: Walter Gieseking, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Emma Boynet, Jascha Heifetz, Yehudi Menuhim, Paul Hendemith, and, as guest conductors, Georges Enesco, Daniele Amfitheatrof and Nadia Boulanger.

The program for the first pair of concerts is as follows:

Beethoven......	Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica"
Sibelius.......	Symphony No. 2 in D major

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

OCT 3 - 1937

Old Favorites Placed In Victor's Record Set

Nelson Eddy Sings Numbers From Family Song Book; Toscanini Makes Brahms Series With Variations.

By Jay Walz.

In its search for new recording material this month Victor called in its scouts from the little explored sections of the classical repertoire; set them to looking about closer to home. And there, as so frequently happens, they found some things that had been overlooked in the mad rush to other pastures.

If there is anything of Brahms, outside the symphonies, that Toscanini admirers like most from the baton of their maestro, it is probably the Variations on the Haydn Theme. And this month we have them pressed on the disks of Victor Set M-355. The two records present Toscanini as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

The set is a gem of the month, and one badly needed for the Brahms section of our record shelves. I like this performance because Toscanini carries out, without emotional stint or intellectual complex, what Brahms, writing without emotional or intellectual angles, made of the Haydn tune. The variations have that quality of spontaneous fever that swing fans note in Benny Goodman's quartet—that is to say the creative genius of the composer raises them, time after time, to the overflow point, so that they threaten to break down the banks of their carefully directed stream—the original theme.

The recording is done sensitively and packs a wallop.

* * * *

Equally impressive as controller of the boundless tonal sea of the symphony orchestra is another new Victor record (14415) which gives us the Introduction to Moussorgsky's "Knowantchina." Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony gets the opportunity to pull all the orchestral stops ~~needed~~ to re-create the scene in which Moussorgsky opens his opera (it's Moscow). And they are not a few. This is one of Moussorgky's great moments, and the Boston Symphony in this recording makes you feel it was also one of Russia's.

Symphony and Opera Begin Fall Musicales

Above

By Ruth Marsters Oct. 3/37
MUSIC EDITOR

With the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week, the music season in Boston may properly said to be formally begun.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, now entering upon his fourteenth successive year as conductor of the orchestra, has called the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall tomorrow morning in preparation for the opening program which will consist of Sibelius' Sec- Symphony in D major and the "Eroica"—Beethoven's Third Symphony in E flat major.

The personnel of the orchestra is much the same in its 57th season as it was in its 56th. Differences announced are that Wilhelm Valkenier will head the horn section this year, that two new names—Harry Shapiro and Paul Keaney—are included in the same section, that James Pappoutsakis joins the flute section, and that Louise Came will play the second harp. (The newcomers are, without exception, Boston musicians.)

Various announcements concerning the new season's repertoire have been made in these columns during the last several weeks.

The list of guest artists engaged to appear during the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series of concerts includes as soloists, Walter Geiseking, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Jascha Heifetz, Yehudi Menuhin, Paul Hindemith—as conductors, Geroges Enesco, Daniele Amfitheatrof and Nadia Boulanger.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

[illegible]

WORDS

About Music

And Musicians

BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra bookings under Serge Koussevitzky's baton make interesting concert statistics for the season.

The orchestra's schedule includes a total of 108 appearances, 63 of which are in its native Boston, 8 in nearby Cambridge, 10 in New York and 5 each in Brooklyn and Providence.

Hartford will hear the orchestra twice, an denthusiasts willing to drive for their music may hear two concerts in New Haven, one in Northampton, one in Springfield and even one in Worcester.

Also included in the season's tours are one concert each in Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cincinnati, two in Pittsburgh, one each in Philadelphia, New Brunswick and Montclair.

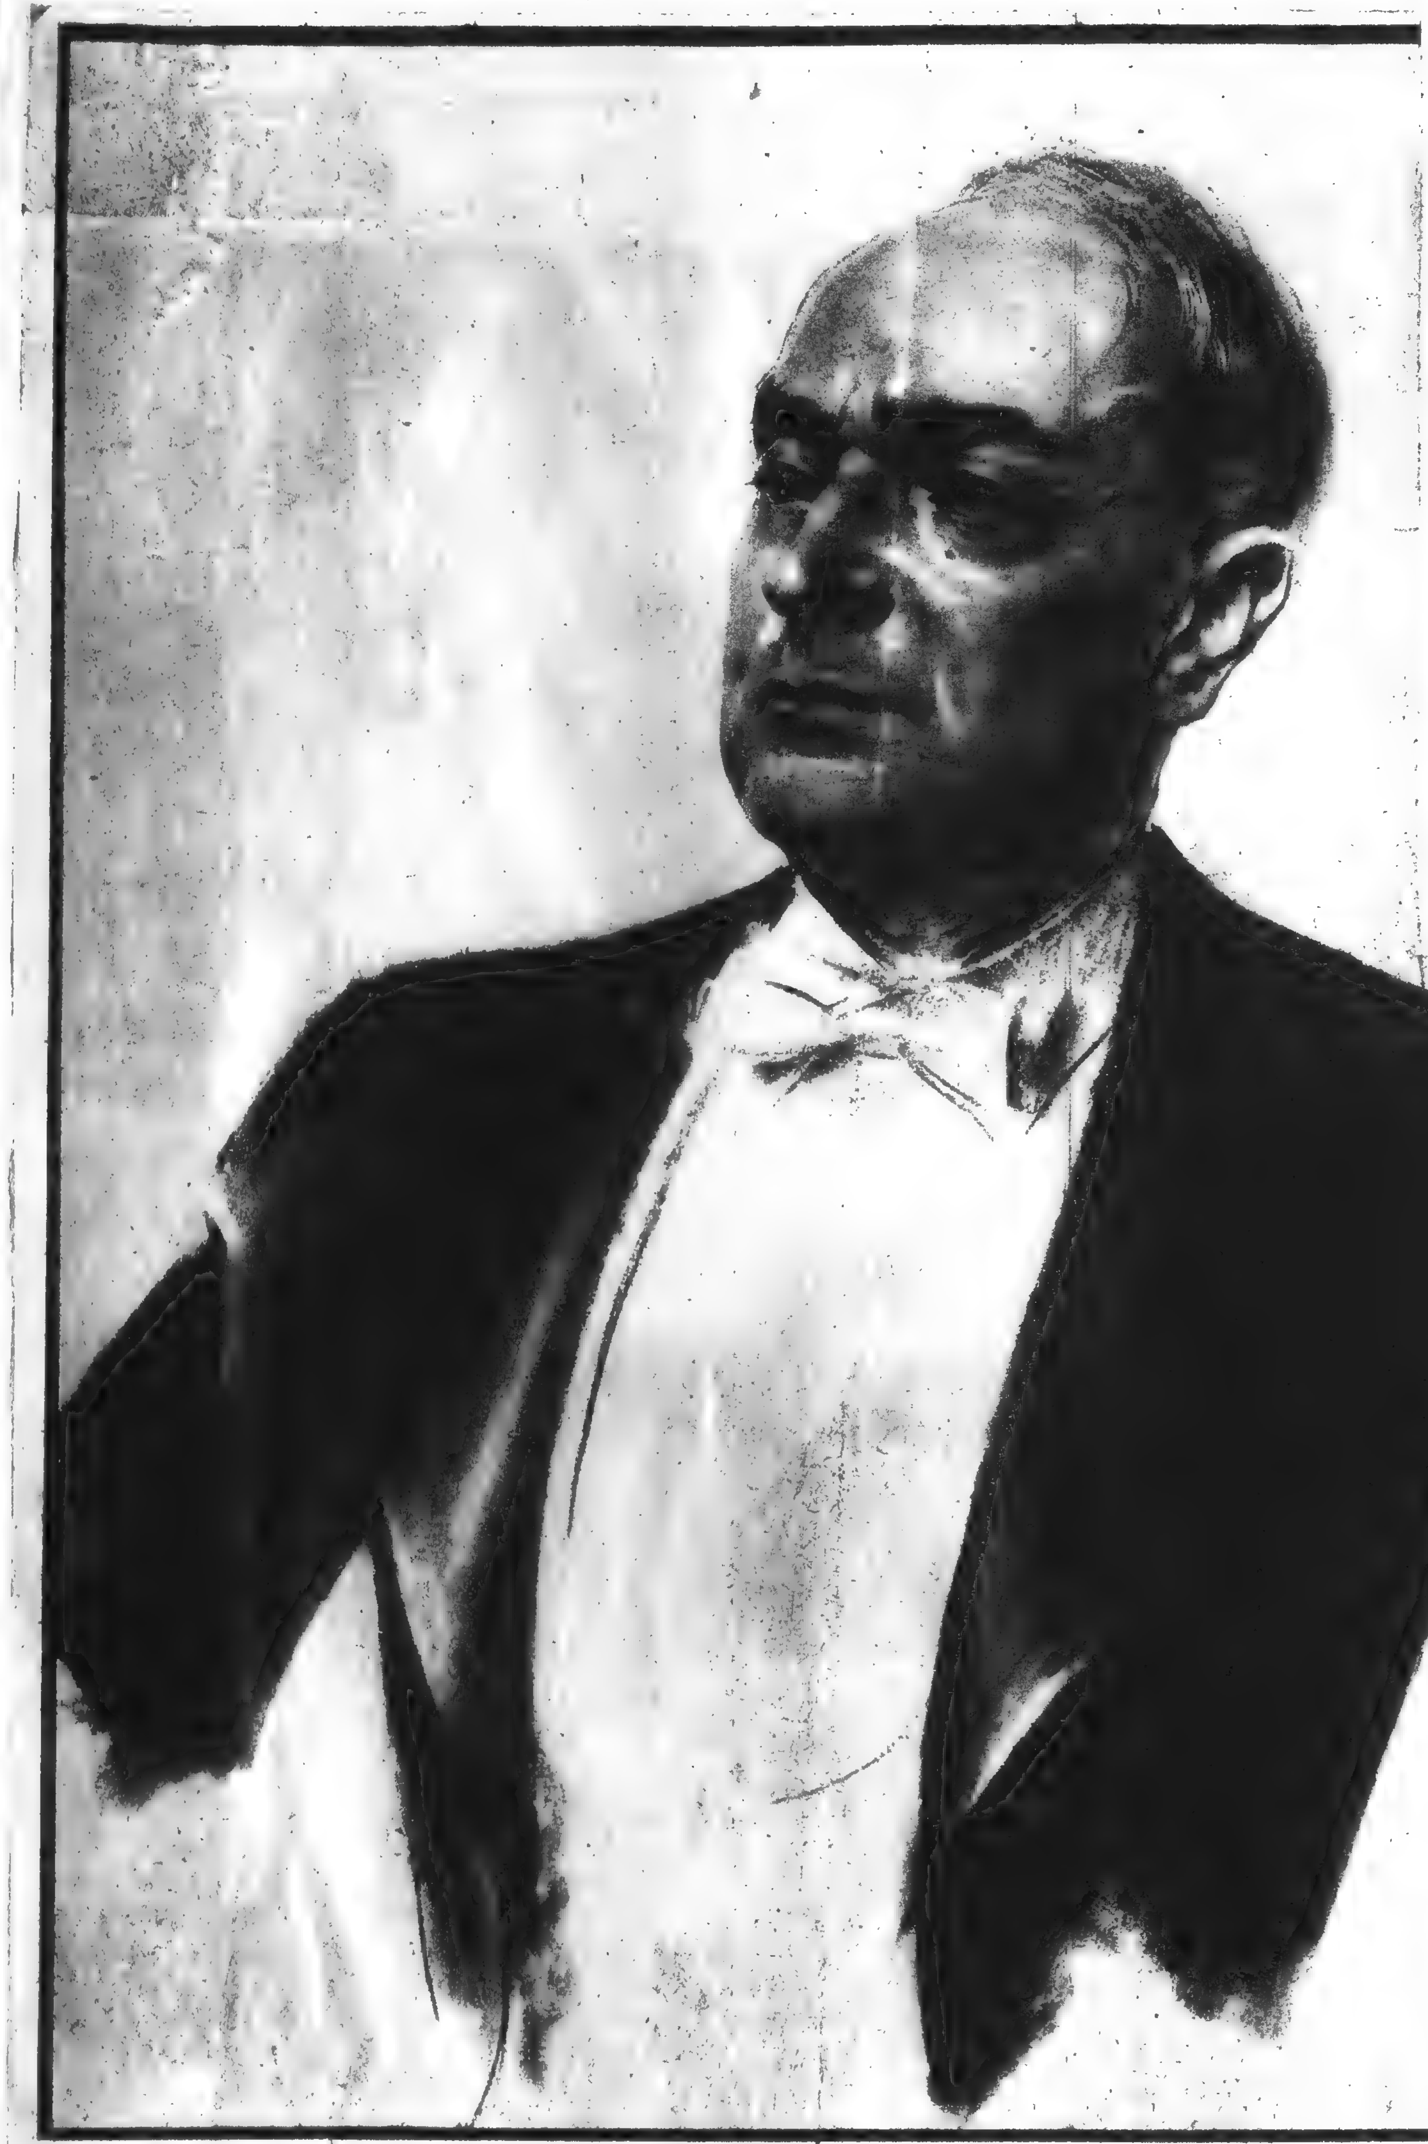
The Hartford dates are Nov. 16 and other dates are on Jan 4 at the Bushnell. Other dates are New Haven on Nov. 17 and Mar. 9, Northampton on Mar. 8, Springfield on Mar. 30 and Worcester on Apr. 12.

* * *

9

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 3 - 1937



Above . . . DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose first concert of the current series in Providence will be given on nineteenth of this month, from a chalk portrait by Alexander Iacovleff, retiring director of Boston Museum of Fine Arts School. Right . . . MARTHA BAIRD (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen of this city) who will be the piano soloist with the organization for the concert of November 9.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

OCT 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Starts Season October 8

Koussevitzky Entering Fourteenth Successive Year as Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-seventh season in Symphony Hall in Boston, on Friday, October 8. This will be the fourteenth successive year of the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky. The season will include twenty-four pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and a shorter double series of six Monday evenings and six Tuesday afternoons. The orchestra also will visit the following cities for series or single concerts: Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Hartford, Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J.; Northampton, Springfield and Worcester.

The Friday and Saturday series will include a large representation of the great masterpieces of the symphonic repertory. Mr. Koussevitzky announces a special emphasis upon the works of Mozart and of Beethoven. The conductor will bring forward a number of new compositions, both European and American.

Soloists for the Friday and Saturday series will include Walter Gieseking, in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto; Sergei Rachmaninoff, in his own rhapsody; Emma Boynet, in a concerto of Mozart; Jascha Heifetz, in Beethoven's concerto, ~~and Yehudi~~ Menuhin, in the concerto of Brahms. Heifetz also will introduce to this country the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Menuhin will present a posthumous concerto of Schumann now released to the world for the first time. Paul Hindenmith, the noted German composer, will appear as viola player in a concerto of his own. Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French musician, also will conduct. The Helsinki Chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius. There will be two great conductors, each for a week in mid-season—Georges Enesco and Daniell Amfitheatroff.

Mr. Koussevitzky will perform the following works for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: The second suite from Roussel's ballet, "Bacchus et Arianne"; Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" and overture on Russian themes; Malipiero's second symphony will be given its first American performance; Bartok's music for strings and percussion; a concerto for orchestra by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer and a concert version of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Card Game." Scores by American composers will include Edward Burlingame Hill's new third ~~symphony, Aaron~~ Copland's "Statements," and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby, with the composer as organist.

The five pairs of Carnegie Hall concerts will, with the exception of one Friday, be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, November 18 and 20; January 6 and 8; February 11 and 12; March 10, 12 and 31, and April 2.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

OCT 3 - 1937

Koussevitzky Promises Schedule Of New Music Performances

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces notable new music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its pending 57th season, the 14th under his conductorship.

Koussevitzky will introduce these scores for first hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

The Second Suite from the Ballet "Bacchus et Arianne," by Albert Roussel, the French composer who died last month, will be performed (together with a repetition of the Symphony in G minor No. 3 which Roussel dedicated to this orchestra). George Gershwin will be remembered by his performance of "An American in Paris." Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije," and his Overture on Russian Themes will be played, together with his Second Violin Concerto (Heifetz as soloist).

A second symphony of Francesco Malipiero will have its first hearing in America. There will also be Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, a Concerto for Orchestra by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer, and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Card Game."

Scores by American composers will include the new Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland's "Statements," and a Concerto for Organ and Orchestra by Leo Sowerby, in which the composer will play the organ part. Two choral works of Sibelius, still unknown in America — "The Origin of Fire," and "Captive Queen" will be performed by this orchestra in conjunction with the Helsinki University Chorus.

A Concerto for Viola and Orchestra, by Paul Hindemith, will be performed with the composer as soloist. Emma Boynet will appear in a Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, by Mozart. Nadia Boulanger, a distinguished visitor from France, will conduct Faure's "Requiem."

There will be two guest conductors in midseason — George Enesco, the famous Roumainian composer and virtuoso, and Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor of Russian birth and Italian training who is about to make his first visit to America.

Symphonic Season Will Open Oct. 8

Boston Orchestra to Put Works of Beethoven, Mozart to Fore

BOSTON, Sept. 25.—(AP)—One of the world's outstanding protagonists of modern music, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor, will place special emphasis this year on the works of Mozart and Beethoven during the orchestra's 57th season, opening Oct. 8.

While not overlooking new works, the orchestra will point to the classics, the annual announcement said tonight. To this end, Walter Gieseking will appear as piano soloist in the Beethoven Emperor concerto; Emma Boynet, in a Mozart piano concerto, and Jascha Heifetz in a Beethoven violin concerto.

Woman to Conduct

On the other side of the ledger, however, the major innovation will be the first female conductor in the orchestra's history — Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, of France—and the first performances in America of the Helsinki Chorus, which will introduce two notable works of Sibelius.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught the late George Gershwin orchestration in Paris nine years ago when the latter wrote his "American in Paris," will conduct only one selection, Faure's Requiem, in February.

Cont.

Other soloists will be Serge Rachmaninoff, playing his own piano rhapsody; Yehudi Menuhin, who will give the recent posthumously released Schumann violin concerto, and Paul Hindemith, German composer, who will play his own viola concerto.

Two guest conductors will appear for a week each in mid-season—Georges Enesco, Rumanian, and Daniele Amfitheatroff, Russian, who will make his first visit to America.

Personnel Little Changed

The personnel of the orchestra will show few changes. Heinrich Lorbeer, a 72-year-old horn player, has retired after 45 consecutive years, a record orchestra officials said was unsurpassed. He will be replaced by Paul Kearney, 25-year-old Boston youth. There also will be a new second harpist.

The orchestra will play concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., Ann Arbor, Mich.; Toledo and Cincinnati, O.; Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, Pa.; New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J.; Northampton, Springfield, Worcester, and Cambridge, Mass.; Providence; and New Haven and Hartford, Conn.

LEADER

[illegible]

OCT 7 - 1937

Symphony Season Will Open Friday

Rehearsals have been going on this week for the opening performances of the Boston Smphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

This will mark the orchestra's fifty seventh season and the fourteenth under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, exceeding the term Koussevitzky, exceeding the terms of any previous conductor.

The advance ticket sale has been quite rapid and good houses are

---

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 3 - 1937

Above . . . DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose first concert of the current series in Providence will be given on nineteenth of this month, from a chalk portrait by Alexander Iacovleff, retiring director of Boston Museum of Fine Arts School. Right . . . MARTHA BAIRD (Mrs. Arthur M. Allen of this city) who will be the piano soloist with the organization for the concert of November 9.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

OCT 3 - 1937

Boston Symphony Orchestra Starts Season October 8

Koussevitzky Entering Fourteenth Successive Year as Conductor

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its fifty-seventh season in Symphony Hall in Boston, on Friday, October 8. This will be the fourteenth successive year of the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky. The season will include twenty-four pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, and a shorter double series of six Monday evenings and six Tuesday afternoons. The orchestra also will visit the following cities for series or single concerts: Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, Providence, New Haven, Hartford, Rochester, Buffalo, Ann Arbor, Toledo, Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J.; Northampton, Springfield and Worcester.

The Friday and Saturday series will include a large representation of the great masterpieces of the symphonic repertory. Mr. Koussevitzky announces a special emphasis upon the works of Mozart and of Beethoven. The conductor will bring forward a number of new compositions, both European and American.

Soloists for the Friday and Saturday series will include Walter Gieseking, in Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto; Sergei Rachmaninoff, in his own rhapsody; Emma Boynet, in a concerto of Mozart; Jascha Heifetz, in Beethoven's concerto, and Yehudi Menuhin, in the concerto of Brahms. Heifetz also will introduce to this country the new concerto of Prokofieff, and Menuhin will present a posthumous concerto of Schumann now released to the world for the first time. Paul Hindemith, the noted German composer, will appear as viola player in a concerto of his own. Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French musician, also will conduct. The Helsinki Chorus, journeying from Finland to America for the first time, will appear with this orchestra in Boston and New York, introducing to this country two notable works of Sibelius. There will be two great conductors, each for a week in mid-season—Georges Enesco and Daniele Amfitheatrof.

Mr. Koussevitzky will perform the following works for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra: the second suite from Roussel's ballet "Bacchus et Arianne"; Prokofieff's music for the film, "Lieutenant Kije" and overture on Russian themes; Malipiero's second symphony will be given its first American performance; Bartok's music for strings and percussion; a concerto for orchestra by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer, and a concert version of Stravinsky's ballet, "The Card Game." Scores by American composers will include Edward Burlingame Hill's new third symphony, Aaron Copland's "Statements" and a concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby, with the composer as organist.

The five pairs of Carnegie Hall concerts will, with the exception of one Friday, be given on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons: November 18 and 20; January 6 and 8; February 11 and 12; March 10, 12 and 31 and April 2.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

OCT 3 - 1937

Koussevitzky Promises Schedule Of New Music Performances

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY announces notable new music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during its pending 57th season, the 14th under his conductorship.

Koussevitzky will introduce these scores for first hearing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

The Second Suite from the Ballet "Bacchus et Arianne," by Albert Roussel, the French composer who died last month, will be performed (together with a repetition of the Symphony in G minor No. 3 which Roussel dedicated to this orchestra). George Gershwin will be remembered by his performance of "An American in Paris." Prokofieff's music for the film "Lieutenant Kije," and his Overture on Russian Themes will be played, together with his Second Violin Concerto (Heifetz as soloist).

A second symphony of Francesco Malipiero will have its first hearing in America. There will also be Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, a Concerto for Orchestra by Michael Starokadomsky, a Soviet composer, and a concert presentation of a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Card Game."

Scores by American composers will include the new Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill, Aaron Copland's "Statements," and a Concerto for Organ and Orchestra by Leo Sowerby, in which the composer will play the organ part. Two choral works of Sibelius, still unknown in America — "The Origin of Fire," and "Captive Queen" will be performed by this orchestra in conjunction with the Helsinki University Chorus.

A Concerto for Viola and Orchestra, by Paul Hindemith, will be performed with the composer as soloist. Emma Boynet will appear in a Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, by Mozart. Nadia Boulanger, a distinguished visitor from France, will conduct Faure's "Requiem."

There will be two guest conductors in midseason — Georges Enesco, the famous Roumainian composer and virtuoso, and Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor of Russian birth and Italian training who is about to make his first visit to America.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Symphonic Season Will Open Oct. 8

Boston Orchestra to Put Works of Beethoven, Mozart to Fore

BOSTON, Sept. 25.—(AP)—One of the world's outstanding protagonists of modern music, Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra Conductor, will place special emphasis this year on the works of Mozart and Beethoven during the orchestra's 57th season opening Oct. 8.

While not overlooking new works, the orchestra will point to the classics, the annual announcement said tonight. To this end, Walter Gieseking will appear as piano soloist in the Beethoven Emperor concerto; Emma Boynet, in a Mozart piano concerto, and Jascha Heifetz in a Beethoven violin concerto.

Woman to Conduct

On the other side of the ledger, however, the major innovation will be the first female conductor in the orchestra's history — Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, of France—and the first performances in America of the Helsinki Chorus, which will introduce two notable works of Sibelius.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught the late George Gershwin orchestration in Paris nine years ago when the latter wrote his "American in Paris," will conduct only one selection, Faure's Requiem, in February.

Cont.

Other soloists will be Serge Rachmaninoff, playing his own piano rhapsody; Yehudi Menuhin, who will give the recent posthumously released Schumann violin concerto, and Paul Hindemith German composer, who will play his own viola concerto.

Two guest conductors will appear for a week each in mid-season — Georges Enesco, Rumanian, and Daniele Amfitheatroff, Russian, who will make his first visit to America.

Personnel Little Changed

The personnel of the orchestra will show few changes. Heinrich Lorbeer, a 72-year-old horn player, has retired after 45 consecutive years, a record orchestra officials said was unsurpassed. He will be replaced by Paul Kearney, 25-year-old Boston youth. There also will be a new second harpist.

The orchestra will play concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., Ann Arbor, Mich.; Toledo and Cincinnati, O.; Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, Pa.; New Brunswick and Montclair, N. J.; Northampton, Springfield, Worcester, and Cambridge, Mass.; Providence; and New Haven and Hartford, Conn.

LEADER

OCT 7 - 1937

Symphony Season Will Open Friday

Rehearsals have been going on this week for the opening performances of the Boston Smphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

This will mark the orchestra's fifty seventh season and the fourteenth under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, exceeding the term Koussevitzky, exceeding the terms of any previous conductor.

The advance ticket sale has been quite rapid and good houses are

The Attitude of the Creative Musician

B. Trans. ——— Oct. 9/37

"It Is Not Only on Nights of Storm That the Soul Comes to Flower," Maeterlinck Says. One Must Dream Dreams and Be Able to Realize Them.

By REDFERN MASON

"We should listen to music like a little child."

William Arms Fisher nodded and Charles Wakefield Cadman smiled approval. We were seated, the three of us, in the restaurant of an uptown hotel, talking "about all things and a few others." The atmosphere was carefree and cogitative.

Mr. Fisher is a Californian with a chunk of New England granite in his composition, but, at the same time, the kindliest soul in the world. Cadman is one of the ever young, a sort of American leprehaun, but with moments when, like Epicurus, he doubts most things.

"Listen like a child," he echoes; "that's it. Strip your mind of prepossessions and inhibitions and hear Beethoven in much the same spirit as you would look at the dawn if you saw it for the first time in your life."

"The first time," muttered Fisher, "when was that, I wonder? Probably when Neolithic man was scratching sketches of bison and reindeer on the walls of his cave."

"He may have been musical too," I suggest.

Fisher assents. "The first song was probably sung by the first lover; or was it the first mother dandling her first born? The lover would seem to come first; yet he must have had a mother. It's the hen and the egg over again."

"You're right about the content of music anyhow," interjects Cadman. "Song is the portrayal of what we are inside; it is the story of our life, the folks we have met, what happened to us in the everyday commerce of life."

"In that case what becomes of absolute music?" It is the scribe who speaks.

"Absolute music," snorts Cadman; "there's no such thing. When a melody comes singing into your consciousness it is reflection of a mood; it may be the echo of some long forgotten conversation with a dear one; you may, without knowing it, be repeating a phrase of some composer who impressed you when you were a child."

Fisher meditates. "Nothing happens by accident," he observes, in the tone of one who is thinking aloud. "How did the score of 'Tristan' come to be written? You may smile; but isn't there a curious likeness between the idyll of Tristan and LaBeale Ysoude and that of Wagner and Frau Wesendonck? A believer in reincarnation would say that the musician and the knight of the Table Round were one and the same person in different existences. One can't lay down the law, of course; but you know the old French saying: 'The heart has its reasons which reason doesn't know.' So it is with things spiritual."

He glances at Cadman and quotes: "There are more things 'twixt Heaven and Earth, Horatio, than was ever dreamed of in your philosophy."

"Oh, I've had my Theosophical apprenticeship," answers Cadman; "at the lowest estimate, it is a beautiful dream. I take it you think that men like Wagner and Beethoven do not merely express their own outlook on life, but are influenced; in some way by the World Spirit. Perhaps it is true. Still, I would like to think that I have something which is my very own. Why do people fall in love? 'Because you are you,' as Kipling says, and to me it seems a pretty good reason."

"Aren't you getting a bit—shall I say metaphysical?" I interrupted. "You remember the old Scotchman's definition of Metaphysics? 'Metafeesicks,' said he; "When ane mon explains till anither mon what he doesna understand himself, that's metafeesicks.'" Cadman chuckles.

"The spirit which denies," quotes Fisher; "but don't forget that, while Mephistopheles willed negation and destruction, the World Spirit converted his desires into something creative."

And, eyeing the composer of the "Land of the Skyblue Water" thoughtfully, he runs on: "After all, Cadman, you do react to the world about you. You had to come to New England for your 'Witch of Salem'; your violin concerto is of the West Western, with cosmic flashes here and there. You may pretend to be incredulous; yet I think you must feel, if you indulge yourself in rumination, that the whole universe thrills in sympathy when something beautiful comes into being."

"Maybe we trouble ourselves too much," muses Cadman, "instead of doing as well as we can what comes first to our hand. What is your idea of the creative attitude?" And he turned to me.

"I'll tell you a story," I reply. "There is out West an artist, Laura Armer, and she devotes herself to the study of the Redskins. She spent a year with the Navajos, doing her best to get at the true inwardness of the tribal soul. But it always seemed to elude her. One day, when she was wandering on the mesa, an old Indian stopped her. He knew, by intuition, what was going on in her mind. 'My dear,' he said, 'THE WAY IS BEAUTIFUL. BE STILL.'"

"There you have it," cries Fisher triumphantly; be quiet and listen to your own soul."

"Then I've learned wisdom without knowing it," replies Cadman. A dozen years ago I began an opera on an aboriginal theme. John La Fleche, chief of the Omahas, told me a story, and it was dramatic, much more so indeed than Redskin tales usually are. I worked away on it and I think there is some of my best music in it. Still I could not satisfy myself and I put the score away. A few months ago I took it out again and today I see things I didn't see before. Something had happened to me mentally in the interim."

"And now you've reached the moment of precipitation," I suggest.

"You cannot hurry mind processes," observes Fisher. "'The wind bloweth where it listeth' as the good book says. Think of Beethoven and how he wrote a dozen variants before he hit upon the final, inevitable four note theme that opens the Fifth Symphony."

"I have Redskin melodies in plenty," continues Cadman; "the difficulty is to make modern music of them and yet preserve their primitive quality."

"You make me think of Dvorak," comments Fisher. 'Many people have good ideas,' he said to me, 'but only the artist knows how to use them.'"

Koussevitzky Opens Fifty-Seventh Symphony Season

Trans. ——— Oct. 9/37

Program Consists of Two Symphonies, the "Eroica," and the Sibelius No. Two

By Redfern Mason

Yesterday was the feast day of Boston's uncanonized saint of music, Henry Lee Higginson, and people from every State in New England took part in the celebration, which, of course, was the first Symphony concert of the season.

And the program was one of which Mr. Higginson would have approved, for it opened with the classic "Eroica" and concluded with the modern, but by no means modernistic Second Symphony of Jan Sibelius.

Music is Janus faced; it looks forward and backward, and Serge Koussevitzky, last in succession of Boston's great series of conductors, is not content to have an audience of yea-sayers to any particular school or period. He wants his hearers to be lovers of what is good in the music of all times and every people.

And his public is responsive. It is doubtful whether anywhere there is a body of more serious-minded listeners than we have in Boston.

They applauded concert-master Burgin when he came on the stage, and when Mr. Koussevitzky entered, audience and orchestra stood up to greet him.

Then came the great chord in E flat which opens the work in which Beethoven tells his worship of the genus hero. He had in mind Bonaparte, as all the world knows; but when the Corsican assumed the imperial purple, the composer tore up the dedication in disgust. So we can forget Napoleon; after all, Beethoven did not portray an individual; he immortalized a type.

Fortunately for us no two interpretations of a masterpiece are identical. Conductors, like composers and the great public, are forever changing. If it were not so, a phonograph record would be final. Koussevitzky would be the first to admit that he hears more in the "Eroica" every time he gives it. Yesterday that beautiful theme for wood wind struck on the ear with deepened significance. Those half dozen notes are a veritable signature of Beethoven. They are solace; they caress, like the touch of a kind hand on a fevered brow.

Like a tale told by a Homer or Chaucer the pageant unfolded. That funeral march is no mere wailing in crepe and plush; there is triumph in its mourning, albeit the grief is heartfelt. Just as Chopin prophesies national rebirth in his funeral march, Beethoven foresees resurrection and a greater life when the hero has "shuffled off this mortal coil."

The Scherzo awakened a new fancy. That trepidation of strings fell on my ear like the fluttering of the wings of an infinite multitude of spirits welcoming the hero into the beyond. Beethoven, it will be remembered, made a study of Irish songs and actually uses the melody of one of them in one of the symphonies. Did he come across the legend of Tirnanog, the Land of the Ever Young? Of course, one does not take fancies of this kind too seriously, but Beethoven himself was one of the Ever Young and, like Carolan, he may have had his fairy mistress to inspire him.

The Scherzo and the Finale were delightfully played. Koussevitzky is at his best in music of a rarefied distinction.

After the intermission we come under the spell of Sibelius. It was like going into another world.

Sibelius scorns the idea of his being a "literary" composer. We can take him at his word. But, at the same time, we must not forget Saint Beuve's dictum that the experiences of our first seven years are the real matter of artistic creation. It is true, as Mr. Burk tells us in his excellnet notes, that the Finnish composer was in Italy when he was occupied with this symphony. But the content is cogent evidence that his haert was in Finland.

It is beautiful music, much more nebulous than the Beethoven. Hawthorne, with his love for the eerie, would have revelled in it, but Emerson, with his preference for the logical and the concrete, would have been all ears for the Bethoven.

The orchestra liked both, and played them both with an admirably adaptable sympathy. We thrilled at the light-footed grace of the strings in the Scherzo of the "Eroica" and rejoiced in the heraldic blare of the horns in the Trio of the same movement. And, in the same breath, one can recall the glory of the conclusion of the Sibelius. It is not for nothing that Finland has pensioned her gifted son, so that he may sing his country's praises. Maybe one of these days the United States will copy her example and encourage young Americans to make music to the glory of Columbia.

News of the Symphony Orchestras

Trans ——— Oct. 9/37

An important change has been made in the shaping of the Tuesday afternon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Instead of being planned along historical lines or according to some other guiding principle, as in the past, they will simply repeat the programs played at the other short series of concerts on Monday evenings. In thus combining, in a sense, the two series, the schedule has also been changed so that the Tuesday afternoon concert will in each case fall immediately after the Monday evening. The pairs will be given more or less monthly—on Oct. 25-26, Dec. 27-28, Jan. 17-18, Feb. 21-22; March 21-22 and April 18-19. As in the past, the afternoon concerts will begin at three.

Among the soloist for the series will be Raya Garbousova, the well-liked young Russian 'cellist; Robert Casadesus, the French pianist, and Orlando Barera, Italian violinist, new to Boston. Daniele Amfitheatrov will conduct the January pair of concerts. And one of the programs will contain the Brahms double concerto for violin and 'cello, with Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti of the orchestra for soloists.

Conflict

The new N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra has become a reality. Rehearsals have been conducted in Radio City, New York, for several days by Artur Rodzinski and will continue under his direction for five weeks. Thereafter Pierre Monteux will take charge and conduct the orchestra's opening program on Nov. 13 as well as those of the following two weeks. For the next five weeks Mr. Rodzinski will be the conductor. Then, on Christmas night, Arturo Toscanini will begin his series of ten weeks, to be followed by five more under Rodzinski.

From many sources there has been adverse comment about the time of the concerts, Saturday night, because it conflicts with regular subscription concerts of many American symphony orchestras. The assurance given, when Toscanini's engagement was first announced, that the projected concerts would not conflict with the familiar Sunday afternoon broadcast concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, has been followed. But the N. B. C. officials, avoiding the metaphorical frying-pan, have hopped into the fire. Even the Philharmonic-Symphony Society is not unaffected, for it has Saturday evening student concerts at fairly frequent intervals. Given a choice between paying for a concert under, say, Barbirolli and traveling some distance for the privilege, and, on the other hand, staying at home to hear gratis a concert under Toscanini, even though it come from a machine, what is the impecunious student likely to do?

THE 57TH SEASON BEGINS

When Dr. Koussevitzky lifts his baton this afternoon in Symphony Hall and the two opening chords of the Eroica Symphony are sounded, the 57th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will have begun. The musicians on the stage and the people in the auditorium will be almost exactly the same as they were a year or more ago. One of the signs of a great orchestra should be a certain stability. Unsettled conditions may be more exciting for a journalist to write about, but they are usually unhealthy for art.

At this point we may pause and ask what significance the Boston Symphony has outside of its artistic importance. To truck drivers and policemen on Huntington avenue it must be an intolerable nuisance every Friday afternoon. To the city of Boston it ought to be a source of pride, though it is doubtful in the extreme if City Hall gives a rap whether it exists or not. The taxes have been paid, and the only other official (the censor) who might take an interest in its proceedings will hardly exercise himself over the eroticism of Richard Strauss!

Its significance, then, is subtle. It is something, when the culture of Boston is being sneered at, to be able to wave the Boston Symphony at the critic. It is something to be able to say that we are up with the times where modern musical thought is concerned. It is something that a person cannot attend the concerts intelligently without acquiring some knowledge of history, literature and artistic style that is implied by the music.

It is related that one of Major Higginson's sons once complained when he had overdrawn his account: "If my father can support a symphony orchestra he ought to be able to support me." It does not matter whether this is true, so long as it recalls to mind that Major Higginson saved the citizens of Boston an immense amount of labor even if his son felt neglected. That labor has to be done and is being done most capably today by other people, notably the trustees and also the general public. There is still room for expansion in that public and for building a source of permanent support for the orchestra.

Boston Herald
Oct. 9/37

Boston Symphony Opens Season

B. Her. Oct. 9/37

First Friday Afternoon Concert Attracts a Brilliant Audience

Mrs. Barrett Wendell, Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld And Mrs. Horace Homer Soule Among Members Of Society Present

By PAULINE WARREN

Yesterday the opening of the 57th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place and the vast audience that filled Symphony Hall and rose loyally in one great body to greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came from seashore and country estates and from travels in foreign lands in order to be present at this first Friday concert that always marks the official opening of the winter season in town. When Dr. Koussevitzky lifted his baton and the opening chords of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony were sounded, many seats in the lofty hall held the same occupants as in the early days of these concerts. The same Friday symphony seat has been kept in many a family for a whole generation, only to be passed along with the family portraits and silver, from mother to daughter.

It seemed like a great home-coming yesterday with greetings exchanged and questions asked as to the summer's festivities and plans for the approaching winter. When the last roar of applause finally died down after the stirring strains of the Sibelius symphony in D major, and Dr. Koussevitzky was allowed to leave the stage, the audience departed to the many gleaming motors waiting outside, and felt that, in spite of wars and famines and unsettled world conditions their beloved symphony would continue to brighten their lives.

To describe the audience would be like reading pages from The Social Register as practically everyone was present. In her usual aisle seat on the right was Mrs. Barrett Wendell. Across the hall, also in familiar seats were Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, wearing luxurious sables with her black costume and a brilliant comb glittering in her snow white hair, and her sister, Mrs. Horace Homer Soule, also in black. With them were their niece, Mrs Francis Rogerson, and Mrs. Soule's daughter, Mrs. Thomas Nicolson Dabney.

Across the aisle from Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hornblower was Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, wearing a raspberry red blouse and hat with her gray tailored suit. Mrs. W Rodman Peabody and her daughter, Miss Anne Peabody prefer balcony seats, and also sitting in the balcony were Mrs. John T. Bottomley and her daughter, Miss Ellen Bottomley. Also listening from there was Mrs. Daniel A. de Menocal, very trim all in black.

Chatting in the lobby with the Rev. Palfrey Perkins was Mrs. Augustus N. Rantoul, wearing a gray tweed cape with her black gown. Her daughter, Miss Charlotte Rantoul, topped her hydrangea blue frock with a long brown coat with which she wore a small brown turban on her sleek black locks. Mrs. Robert Livermore, all in black, was accompanied by her newly-married daughter, Mrs. Charles Woodard (Gwendolen Livermore), who wore a smart plaid suit and a rust hat banded with green. Another recent bride present was Mrs. Edward Wigglesworth Grew, Jr. (Molly Harlow), whose suit of the new grape shade was brightened by a yellow blouse.

The day being crisp and cool, there were many sumptuous furs worn. With her brown ensemble Mrs. Sydney Harwood wore a waist length cape of sable, and Mrs. Freeman Hinckley wore a stunning silver fox scarf with her black costume. Also wearing a silver fox scarf was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, whose high-crowned black hat was banded with white. Mrs. Horatio Lamb wore a cape of silky black monkey fur with her gray suit, and with her was her daughter, Miss Aimee Lamb. Mrs. Allan Forbes wore sables with her black gown.

Although the audience was principally made up of older subscribers, there were many of the younger generation present. Miss Jane Ragie looked very piquante in a rust tweed suit, and Miss Betty Albers was appealingly pretty in beige with a tiny pointed cap atop her blonde hair. Miss Dorothy Preston had a single orchid pinned on the lapel of her black suit and her sister, Miss Patricia Preston, was conversing animatedly with a group of friends during the intermission.

There were even several members of the very youngest set in the enthusiastic audience. Twelve-year-old Edward A. Taft, Jr., was applauding loudly, as was young Louise Minot, small daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James L. Minot. With Mrs. Augustus W. Soule was her young daughter, Marjorie.

With her black gown Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., wore a coat of lipstick red, and Mrs. William B. Long's chamois yellow jacket exactly matched the jaunty quill in her black hat with its rolled back brim. Sitting with Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, who wore a caped suit of Oxford gray, was Mrs. Arthur Blake. Her daughter, Miss Leslie Blake wore a scarlet fez and matching Ascot with her black suit. Mrs. Basil Gavin, who left soon after the concert for New York, where she and Mr. Gavin will spend the week-end, postponed her trip long enough to be present.

Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson wore a silver fox scarf and a becoming tam with her brown suit, and Mrs. William Dana Orcutt also wore silver fox with her biege gown. Mrs. Richard King Thorndike's tweed suit had a green and beige checked jacket, and Miss Jane Megrew wore emerald green. Mrs. Ernest B. Dane, Jr., was very charming in a platinum gray tailleur with which she wore a silver fox scarf and a black off-the-face hat with a flaring veil. Mrs. Morgan Harris's black suit had a vivid red Ascot and her hat was slate gray.

Among the many others present were Mrs. Roland Nickerson and her daughter, Mrs. Nickerson Sears, Mrs. A. Wilder Pollard, Miss Elizabeth Carter Leland, Miss Mary Elizabeth Lowe, Mrs. Sedgwick Marquand, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Mrs. Robert Belknap, Mrs. Stephen Wentworth Gifford, Jr., Mrs. Richard P. Waters, Jr., Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. A. O. Barker, Mrs. John Adams, Mrs. Edmund Sears Kelley, Mrs. Faneuil Adams, Mrs. Adolph Leeds, Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville Bell, Miss Jeannie Robinson, Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mrs. Edward Harding, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. William H. Coburn and Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French.

Brilliant Performance Marks Opening of Symphony Season

Globe Oct. 9/37

Boston Warmly Welcomes Dr Koussevitzky And Orchestra as 57th Series Begins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its 57th season at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Dr Serge Koussevitzky, cordially welcomed, conducted glowing performances of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and the Second Symphony by Sibelius.

Thus are briefly recorded the bare facts of what was far more than just the start of a concert season. When, each Autumn, the virtuosi of the Boston orchestra assemble to be directed by a foremost conductor, what really happens is a cultural event of the highest importance. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the priceless treasures of the world; its artists are gathered from many countries; the public which sits before them is eager for great music which is the heritage of the modern world. No specious conceits of "national" art intrude; only motives of the best performance of the finest music govern players and leader.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

He began at his eloquent best.

The outward aspects of an opening Symphony concert are a ceremonial of long standing. Yesterday was no exception. Richard Burgin, the concert master, received a burst of applause as he took his place. At the first appearance of Dr Koussevitzky the audience rose to applaud, remained standing until a familiar self-depreciating gesture invited them to resume seats.

Program Superbly Chosen

The membership of the orchestra is little changed. The Friday audience, too, is perhaps as little altered in proportion to numbers. The length of years which Boston subscribers hold the same seats is for the most part not a matter of habit, but rather one of pride at its best estate. In the more expensive sections of Symphony Hall, each succeeding Autumn finds debutantes and young men, who were not there a twelvemonth before. So, too, the appearance of the balconies reflects the coming of new students to conservatories and colleges. Otherwise the scene remains the same.

Yet fashions never rest. One had thought the request that women take of their hats, carried in the program books years ago, had vanished forever. Anno domini 1937, however, finds attention called ". . . to the growing tendency to wear hats which obstruct the view of others," and to the proper remedy therefor.

The program, assembling Beethoven and Sibelius, was superb for an opening concert, because the "Eroica" and the Sibelius D major Symphony are music of elemental substance. Beethoven the prophet and Sibelius the bard! Both are "classics," one historic, the other in his own lifetime. Since every composer develops his art in his own way and in his own time, these two works cannot be compared on the same ground.

Dr Koussevitzky at Best

The "Eroica" is a tonal proclamation of the ultimate destiny of man freed from bondage, though the spiritual self-destruction of the first Bonaparte who crowned himself Emperor, precipitated its dedication to "the memory of a great man." No less tumultuous is Sibelius' D major Symphony, but its passion is inward and poetic.

Perhaps in all his 13 years here, Dr Koussevitzky has not equaled, for sheer strength, his reading of the first movement of the "Eroica" yesterday. It was breathtaking. With Sibelius, almost the same might be said.

Next week there will be two scores new to Boston by Prokofieff—the incidental music to the film "Lieut Kije" and a Russian Overture. The same composer's "classical Symphony" will be played, together with the tone poems "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel," by Richard Strauss.

C. W. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

SUN

Oct. 9, 1937

The New Records

Two Bach Cantatas — A Mendelssohn Quartet—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Notable Single.

That early and admirable specimen of impressionism with which Moussorgsky prefaced his "Khowantschina" has been superbly recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra on Victor No. 14415. As an interpretation of the dawn rising over Moscow's Red Square (before it resounded to the tramp of marching men) it is unparalleled in nineteenth century Russian music. The performance by the conductor and the orchestra indicates that their view of it is an equally exalted one. And the engineers have completed the catalogue of merits with an uncommonly fine recording.

NEW YORKER

NEW YORK, N. Y.

Providence Journal

Oct. 10/37

To Play Beethoven Symphony

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and an orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," by Prokofieff, form the program which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert here this season in the Metropolitan Theatre a week from Tuesday night.

The novelty of the bill, the Prokofieff composition, opus 60, is divided into five parts titled "Birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troika" and "Burial of Kije." It will be played at the opening of the second half of the program.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

OCT 9 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY OPENS SYMPHONY SEASON

Boston, Oct. 8—(AP)—As Serge Koussevitzky took the conductor's stand to open the Boston Symphony orchestra's 75th season today in Symphony hall, the capacity audience rose as one to applaud the Russian-born musician who began his 14th consecutive year here.

The conductor chose Beethoven's Eroica symphony and Sibelius's Second symphony with which to open the season.

Next week the orchestra will present the first of numerous new compositions to be heard for the first time in America—the Russian overture and the Lieutenant Kije orchestral suite, both by the Soviet composer—Pianist Prokofieff.

American

URDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1937

57th Symphony Delights With Beethoven

Orchestra to Repeat Program This Evening

By RUTH MARSTERS

The Promethean splendours of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony imparted a sonorous opening to the 57th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday.

The audience, of capacity size, and made up largely of season subscribers to the series, was almost as familiar in personnel as was the orchestra, which, as is known, changes very little from year to year.

But the atmosphere, for all its familiarity, was not without an electrifying quality of its own. Pride in the orchestra, which Dr. Koussevitzky has raised to an unparalleled standard of performance in his 13 years as conductor, the anticipation of a season which promises brilliantly — these may have had something to do with it.

UNFORGETTABLE

Beethoven's Third Symphony, the expressed favorite of the composer, and certainly not lacking in favoritism elsewhere, was followed by Sibelius Second Symphony, one in which Dr. Koussevitzky is particularly happy.

In fact the orchestra has seldom sounded better. Its vast dynamic range, its myriad colors, its depth and warmth of tone, delicacy, precision, rhythmic solidity—these were contributing factors to the performance. The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

Next week's program will be devoted to music of Prokofieff and Strauss.

The shorter series of Monday and Tuesday concerts will be combined into pairs of concerts similar in program this season.

Soloists announced for the series include Raya Garbousova, young Russian 'cellist, Robert Casadesus, pianist, and Orlando Barera, violinist. Daniele Amfitheatrof, Russian by birth and Italian by training, will appear as guest conductor in this series in January.

Her. Oct. 9/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 5t7h season was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky began his 13th season as conductor. There was a capacity audience present to hear and applaud the following program:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sibelius

A concert of music that was in every sense magnificent opened the Boston Symphony's 57th season, one which promises to be remarkably interesting. The program by unwritten custom was conventional, in that it was thoroughly familiar to the orchestra's regular subscribers. There may be surprises and novelties in store; but yesterday's concert could only have been astonishing if it had been poorly played. This was emphatically not the case.

The interpretation of both symphonies was on the vigorous side, and there was a moment or two of stridency. Still it must be remembered that neither work has anything to gain by over refinement. The Sibelius 2nd Symphony, after a slow movement of fearful and barbaric gloom and a scherzo of restless energy, emerges into a song of arrogant triumph. The last three movements of the Eroica have much in common with this emotional transition, except that Beethoven's mood is one of radiant joy and high spirits.

Solemn commentators in the past have sometimes found the scherzo and finale of the Eroica an anticlimax. But a prolongation of the spirit of either the first movement or the funeral march would be intolerable; nor is vivacity out of place. The antante of the Sibelius becomes more amazing in its penetration into the depths of melancholy the more it is heard. The finale can pall, though it did not yesterday.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were, then, in exuberant form. The music was played with intense vitality. Subtleties were not disregarded—that goes without saying; but the chief impression was that we heard each symphony as a whole so that the relation of each movement to the other was clearer. The audience, having applauded Mr. Burgin and risen to greet Dr. Koussevitzky, remained after each work to recall the conductor and indicated their approval by the somewhat inadequate means of clapping and stamping. On such occasions it would be better, even if embarassing, to shout!

There is little to report in the way of changes in the orchestral scene. The most important is that Mr. Valkenier is now first horn, a position which his unfailing artistry on that difficult instrument richly deserves. There is a new 'cello in Mr. Tortelier, a new flute in Mr. Pappoutsakis and a new second harp in Miss Came.

Sartorially it may be worth observing that all the men in the orchestra and the conductor now wear short coats. Philip Hale would have given a detailed account, with quotations from Herkimer Johnson, on such a theme. It is also sociologically interesting to observe that, after an absence of two years, the notice about the ladies' hat nuisance has crept back into the program. Only now the warning "roars as gently as any sucking dove." Gone, apparently forever, is the angry majesty of the law in that "City of Boston, revised regulation of 1898," when it must have been sorely needed.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program will be devoted to works of Prokofieff and Strauss.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JOURNAL

OCT 9 - 1937

KOUSSEVITZKY HAILED

Capacity Audience Welcomes Hub Symphony Orchestra Leader

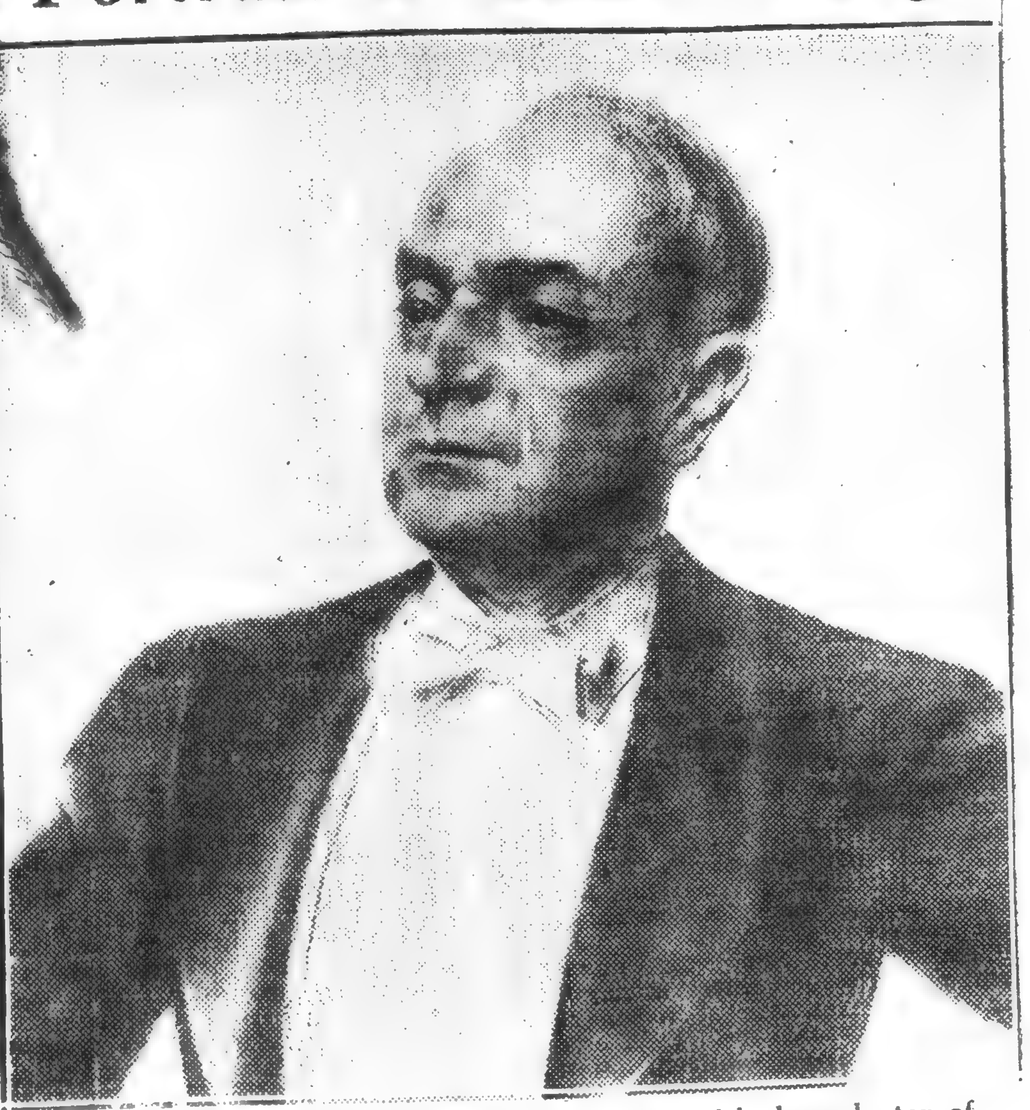
Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP)—As Serge Koussevitzky took the conductor's stand to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57th season today in Symphony Hall, the capacity audience arose as one to applaud the Russian-born musician who began his 14th consecutive year here.

Next week the orchestra will present the first of numerous new compositions to be heard for the first time in America—the Russian overture and the Lieutenant Kije orchestral suite, both by the Soviet composer-pianist Prokofieff.

Col. 2-6

12

Portrait of Koussevitzky



A striking portrait in red chalk of the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, drawn by Alexander Iacovleff. This is the first newspaper publication of the drawing, considered by many as the most faithful action portrait of the world famous maestro at the height of his career. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the fifty-seventh season of the orchestra with the paired programmes of last night and Friday afternoon.

SOCIAL CALENDAR

Wednesday—Debutante tea, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis and Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis, 125 Hope street. Meeting, Rhode Island Historical Society, 68 Waterman street, 8.

Thursday—Meeting. National Society Colonial Dames in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, home of Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel on Brown street, 3:30. Lecture, Rhode Island Wellesley Club, Froebel Hall, 3.

Friday—Fall meeting of the Junior League of Providence, Agawam Hunt, 2:30.

Saturday—Dessert bridge, St. Xavier's Alumnae, Providence Biltmore.

Oct. 17—Public lecture by Mr. John B. Archer on Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, 4.

Oct. 19—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre. Concert of Chamber Music by the Stradivarius Quartet, auspices of the Mary C. Wheeler School, Wheeler Memorial Hall on Cabot street, 11:45 a. m.

Oct. 20—Reception by invitation, Audubon Society of Rhode Island in co-operation with biology and botany departments of Brown University to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Audubon Society of Rhode Island, Crystal Room, Alumnae Hall, 4:30-6; public lecture, Audubon Society of Rhode Island, Brown University, evening. Fourth Annual Bridge, St. Francis de Sales Guild, Providence Biltmore ballroom, 8.

Oct. 21—Trafalgar Day observance, British Empire Club, Providence Biltmore ballroom.

Oct. 22—Annual Smith College Club supper dance, Agawam Hunt.

Oct. 25—Play, "The Guardsman,"

Music News and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will break with custom this season in the matter of programs for the Tuesday afternoon concerts. This series will share the programs and soloists of the Monday evening concerts. Thus the two series will form six pairs of concerts resembling the orchestra's main series on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Monday and Tuesday concerts will be played on consecutive days as follows: Oct 25-26, Dec 27-28, Jan 17-18, Feb 21-22, March 21-22 and April 18-19. As usual, the Monday programs will begin at 8:15 and those on Tuesdays at 3. Dr Koussevitzky will present symphonic masterpieces both old and new. The list of soloists includes Raya Garbousova, the young Russian cellist; Robert Casadesus, French pianist, and the Italian violinist, Orlando Barera, new to Boston. Daniele Amfitheatrof, who will be one of the guest conductors during Dr Koussevitzky's midseason vacation, will direct the January pair of concerts. A notable feature of the series will be a performance of Brahms' "Double Concerto" for violin and cello, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster, and Jean Bedetti, first cellist, as soloists.

SYMPHONY OFFERS NEW PROKOFIEFF WORKS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its 57th season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, likewise opening the series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening.

Serge Koussevitzky will devote the Boston program to the music of Serge Prokofieff and Richard Strauss. Two new works of the Russian composer will then have their first hearing in this country. One is the orchestral suite which he has made from his incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije," which was produced in Russia in 1933. The film and consequently the music is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "the birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troica," and "Burial of Kije." The other new piece is a Russian overture which Prokofieff composed in 1936. It is based upon themes of folk character and scored for large orchestral forces. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" will also be played. Two tone poems of Strauss will conclude the concerts—"Death and Transfiguration," and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The program for Cambridge will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

SYMPHONY to do STRAUSS MELODIES

Oct 16

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

LIKE those who pronounced the doom of Richard Wagner, the critics who tried to dispose of Richard the Second have thus far spoken too soon. The "Downfall of Strauss," celebrated by Lazare Samknsky in his "Music of Our Day," seems farther away than ever.

This week the most eminent of German composers or, if you prefer, the most notable of living composers, is twice in the news. In Boston, at the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, sharing a programme with Prokofieff, he will be represented by his "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a grouping which Dr. Koussevitzky first attempted two seasons ago, while from New York comes word that Edward Johnson, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, plans to feature Strauss in the season which now impends. "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will, for the first time, be in the active repertory simultaneously. Mr. Johnson further says that he hopes to make the New York public Strauss-conscious as they have been made Wagner-conscious since the advent of Madame Flagstad. The singer for Salome was not mentioned in the dispatch from which this information is gleaned, but the Elektra will be Rosa Pauly, who sang the music so notably at a philharmonic concert last winter; and in "Der Rosenkavalier" Lotte Lehman will offer her today inimitable impersonation of the princess.

Would that Boston might hear this "Rosenkavalier" next spring, even if Mme. Lehman may then have returned to Europe. "Salome" and "Elektra" are too much to hope for, although we were once blessed with the latter at the Boston Theatre. The pit of our opera house, we are assured, is hardly commodious enough for the orchestra which Strauss exacts in these once "sensational" works, while with "Salome," though the rest of the world takes it now quite for granted, there would probably be here the additional obstacle of censorship: "Give a dog a bad name, etc."

Continued From Page 11

Returning to Dr. Koussevitzky's programme, the pieces by Prokofieff, which will precede the tone poems of Strauss, are the music for the film "Lieutenant Kije," which is described as light and satirical, and an Overture on Russian Themes, both new to this country, together with the "Classical" Symphony, which is now an old story at Symphony Hall.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PENSION FUND CONCERT

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON

Tuesday Afternoon, October 12, 1937, at 5:15

This ticket will admit one member of the Orchestra at 67 Milk Street.

G. E. JUDD, Manager

MONDAY-TUESDAY SERIES

On Monday evening, Oct. 25, and Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 26, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first pair of concerts of the shorter series of six, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, according to the plan announced for this year, will present the same program at the two concerts. The remaining pairs will be given on Dec. 27-28. Jan. 17-18, Feb. 21-22, March 21-22 and April 18-19. The soloists will be Raya Garbousova, the young Russian 'cellist; Robert Casadesus, the French pianist; Orlando Barera, the Italian violinist. Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's virtuoso soloists, will be heard in Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello. Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor yet to be heard in America, will be guest conductor of the January pair of concerts.

Amusements Trav Oct 16 Amusements

5000 BANKERS HEAR SYMPHONY

First National Bank's Party Popular

Speakers and Day's Session Criticize New Deal

By LOUIS M. LYONS

Names not on the program of the American Bankers' Association convention spoke to the bankers last night in the most popular assembly of any of their sessions here. Wagner and Haydn, Schubert and Tchaikovsky, interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew 5000 bank convention delegates into the spacious quarters of the First National Bank to provide one of the most distinctive programs Boston has ever offered to a convention.

It was something new for a bank meeting. It was what many of the bankers came for and what their wives insisted on coming for. Wives from Des Moines and Fargo, Tucson and Omaha made their banker husbands get last-minute reservations when they heard that a Boston Symphony concert was to be a part of the proceedings.

Party on Lavish Scale

Heavy draperies muffled the sounds of the party on the first floor. At that Koussevitsky, once threw up his hands and stepped down from his dais, unwilling to compete with the party sounds from under his feet. But he yielded to an appealing outburst of handclapping and returned to lead into the whispered opening of Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia.

The party was on a lavish and colorful scale. The bank had thrust its business into the vaults and turned its cashiers' cages into sumptuous bars through which flowed an unstinted supply of such nectar as carries bankers through their arduous conventions. The counters for customers' checks became buffet stands for lobster cutlets and fish cakes, and hors d'oeuvres of an abundance and diversity sufficient for the debutante parties for all Winter.

ALFRED H. HASTINGS
Treasurer Springfield Institution for Savings.

The main floor of the bank was turned into a concert hall. The 55-piece orchestra was seated on the dais where the first-string executives of the city's biggest bank have their desks. There at 5:15 Serge Koussevitsky, amid the adoring whispers of the feminine part of the audience, turned his back upon the leading bankers of America and led the orchestra into the opening strains of Haydn's Symphony in G Major.

Just to see Koussevitsky perform was worth the railroad fare for many a distant visitor. He was a good show. Even his well-known temperament was in evidence and for a moment threatening. The improvised concert hall conditions could not be perfect. Only a fraction of those attending could be seated for the musical program. The rest, on the floor below, were hospitably plied with caviar and cocktails, anchovies and highballs until an intermission gave a chance for a reshuffle of seats.

Critics of Administration

The evening's symphony made an acceptable close to a convention day that had heard an anvil chorus of banker critics of the Administration at Washington. Led off by Dr Glenn Frank, the recently deposed president of the University of Wisconsin, featured speakers on the bank program had seemed to vie with one another in finding hard names to call the New Deal.

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

Lowell-Courier Citizen Oct-13, 1937

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season auspiciously with its programs of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the Catchall there has already been an account of the reception accorded to Dr. Koussevitzky as he took his place on the conductor's stand. As we can testify personally, there were similar scenes on Saturday evening, when the great audience rose to welcome him, tributes to the conductor and the orchestra that were renewed after each of the two symphonies which comprised the program. Boston and vicinity, clearly, has lost none of its enthusiasm for this great orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to present two symphonies, both tried and well-beloved compositions, the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the Second of Sibelius. Both, as it seemed to this listener, were played superbly. The heroic and elegaic nature of the former was impressive throughout as Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it, guiding the musicians without the customary baton. The funeral march was especially fine. There was no mistaking that the audience was deeply moved by the performance.

In the Sibelius symphony Dr. Koussevitzky achieved results that brought out to the full contrasts, color and climax, a really thrilling performance. Into the music it was evident that he entered with especial sympathy and understanding of the composer's objectives. On the part of the orchestra, and notably in the case of the strings, it was a virtuoso performance.

The programs for this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening include the Classic Symphony and the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kiji" and the Russian Overture by Prokofieff, the latter for its first performance in the United States, to be followed by "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss.

In Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler, eminent violinist, will give his customary recital, with Carl Lamson at the piano.

NO BROADCAST BY SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Off Air After Three Years

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not being broadcast by radio this year after being featured for three seasons. One reason advanced was that while the high artistic merit of performances was apparent, the hour of broadcast was the most sought by commercial patrons and the loss of sponsored programmes was tremendous, in addition to the large sum paid the orchestra.

Evidences have multiplied enormously, however, that the Boston Symphony broadcasts won the most substantial and the most elite, as well as the most popular section of American audiences to radio during the period that they were on the air. Illuminating proof of this was the reaction of the audience of the American Bankers Association at the concerts given by the orchestra in the First National Bank. A good part of this audience had become familiar with the orchestra through the national broadcasts.

Edward A. Taft, the chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a statement declares that this year $30,000 will be needed to pay the taxes on Symphony Hall, plus interest on the mortgage, and that $60,000 more will be needed to cover all other operating requirements. The point is made that "the $90,000 involved is less than the amounts needed by the great majority of other orchestras of this country to cover their annual operating deficits."

There is accumulating information of the growth of a movement to find some kind of sponsorship for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to insure it a permanent place on the air with one of the three great broadcasting companies.

ADMIRES SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Post:

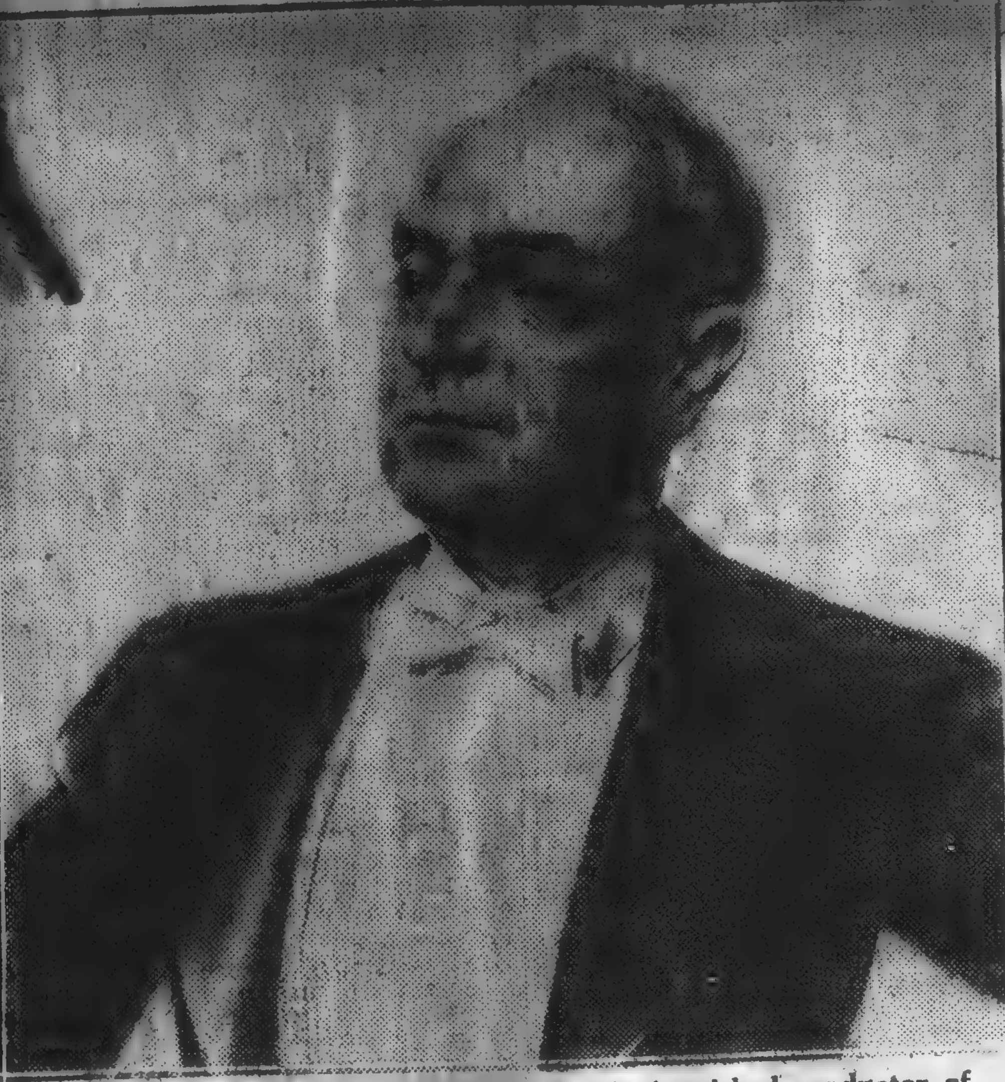
Sir—With my wife I am in your historic city attending the convention of the American Bankers' Association. My dear wife proposed accompanying me in the hope that while here she could hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose music we enjoyed so much in other years over the radio.

Through the courtesy of the First National Bank we heard them last night. What a wonderful orchestra it is, what marvelous tone and what technical perfection. I wonder do you people of Boston realize what you possess. On all sides in that great bank hall last night I heard nothing but admiring expressions from my 3000 fellow bank men.

I write this that you may know how much the world outside Boston appreciates your orchestra. F. N. L.

Chicago.

Portrait of Koussevitzky



A striking portrait in red chalk of the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, drawn by Alexander Iacovleff. This is the first newspaper publication of the drawing, considered by many as the most faithful action portrait of the world famous maestro at the height of his career. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the fifty-seventh season of the orchestra with the paired programmes of last night and Friday afternoon.

Pot Oct 14

Providence Journal, Sun, Oct. 10/37

SOCIAL CALENDAR

Wednesday—Debutante tea, Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis and Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis, 125 Hope street. Meeting, Rhode Island Historical Society, 68 Waterman street, 8.

Thursday—Meeting, National Society Colonial Dames in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, home of Mrs. T. I. Hare Powel on Brown street, 3:30. Lecture, Rhode Island Wellesley Club, Froebel Hall, 3.

Friday—Fall meeting of the Junior League of Providence, Agawam Hunt, 2:30.

Saturday—Dessert bridge, St. Xavier's Alumnae, Providence Biltmore.

Oct. 17—Public lecture by Mr. John B. Archer on Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, 4.

Oct. 19—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre. Concert of Chamber Music by the Stradivarius Quartet, auspices of the Mary C. Wheeler School, Wheeler Memorial Hall on Cabot street, 11:45 a. m.

Oct. 20—Reception by invitation, Audubon Society of Rhode Island in co-operation with biology and botany departments of Brown University to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Audubon Society of Rhode Island, Crystal Room, Alumnae Hall, 4:30-6; public lecture, Audubon Society of Rhode Island, Brown University, evening. Fourth Annual Bridge, St. Francis de Sales Guild, Providence Biltmore ballroom, 8.

Oct. 21—Trafalgar Day observance, British Empire Club, Providence Biltmore ballroom.

Oct. 22—Annual Smith College Club supper dance, Agawam Hunt.

Oct. 25—Play, "The Guardsman."

SYMPHONY OFFERS NEW PROKOFIEFF WORKS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its 57th season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, likewise opening the series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on Thursday evening.

Serge Koussevitzky will devote the Boston program to the music of Serge Prokofieff and Richard Strauss. Two new works of the Russian composer will then have their first hearing in this country. One is the orchestral suite which he has made from his incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije," which was produced in Russia in 1933. The film and consequently the music is light and satirical in character—the movements describing "the birth of Kije," "Romance," "Kije's Wedding," "Troica," and "Burial of Kije." The other new piece is a Russian overture which Prokofieff composed in 1936. It is based upon themes of folk character and scored for large orchestral forces. Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" will also be played. Two tone poems of Strauss will conclude the concerts—"Death and Transfiguration," and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The program for Cambridge will consist of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, No. 3, Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Music News and Comment

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will break with custom this season in the matter of programs for the Tuesday afternoon concerts. This series will share the programs and soloists of the Monday evening concerts. Thus the two series will form six pairs of concerts resembling the orchestra's main series on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings. The Monday and Tuesday concerts will be played on consecutive days as follows: Oct 25-26, Dec 27-28, Jan 17-18, Feb 21-22, March 21-22 and April 18-19. As usual the Monday programs will begin at 8:15 and those on Tuesdays at 3. Dr Koussevitzky will present symphonic masterpieces both old and new. The list of soloists includes Raya Garbousova, the young Russian cellist; Robert Casadesus, French pianist, and the Italian violinist, Orlando Barera, new to Boston. Daniele Amfitheatrof, who will be one of the guest conductors during Dr Koussevitzky's midseason vacation, will direct the January pair of concerts. A notable feature of the series will be a performance of Brahms' "Double Concerto" for violin and cello, with Richard Burgin, concertmaster, and Jean Bedetti, first cellist, as soloists.

SYMPHONY to do STRAUSS MELODIES

Pot Oct 10

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

LIKE those who pronounced the doom of Richard Wagner, the critics who tried to dispose of Richard the Second have thus far spoken too soon. The "Downfall of Strauss," celebrated by Lazare Samknsky in his "Music of Our Day," seems farther away than ever.

This week the most eminent of German composers or, if you prefer, the most notable of living composers, is twice in the news. In Boston, at the symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday, sharing a programme with Prokofieff, he will be represented by his "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a grouping which Dr. Koussevitzky first attempted two seasons ago, while from New York comes word that Edward Johnson, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera Company, plans to feature Strauss in the season which now impends. "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier" will, for the first time, be in the active repertory simultaneously. Mr. Johnson further says that he hopes to make the New York public Strauss-conscious as they have been made Wagner-conscious since the advent of Madame Flagstad. The singer for Salome was not mentioned in the dispatch from which this information is gleaned, but the Elektra will be Rosa Pauly, who sang the music so notably at a philharmonic concert last winter; and in "Der Rosenkavalier" Lotte Lehman will offer her today inimitable impersonation of the princess.

Would that Boston might hear this "Rosenkavalier" next spring, even if Mme. Lehman may then have returned to Europe. "Salome" and "Elektra" are too much to hope for, although we were once blessed with the latter at the Boston Theatre. The pit of our opera house, we are assured, is hardly commodious enough for the orchestra which Strauss exacts in these once "sensational" works, while with "Salome," though the rest of the world takes it now quite for granted, there would probably be here the additional obstacle of censorship: "Give a dog a bad name, etc."

Continued From Page 11

Returning to Dr. Koussevitzky's programme, the pieces by Prokofieff, which will precede the tone poems of Strauss, are the music for the film "Lieutenant Kije," which is described as light and satirical, and an Overture on Russian Themes, both new to this country, together with the "Classical" Symphony, which is now an old story at Symphony Hall.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

PENSION FUND CONCERT

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON

Tuesday Afternoon, October 12, 1937, at 5:15

This ticket will admit one member of the Orchestra at 67 Milk Street.

G. E. JUDD, Manager

MONDAY-TUESDAY SERIES

On Monday evening, Oct. 25, and Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 26, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the first pair of concerts of the shorter series of six, in Symphony Hall. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, according to the plan announced for this year, will present the same program at the two concerts. The remaining pairs will be given on Dec. 27-28. Jan. 17-18, Feb. 21-22, March 21-22 and April 18-19. The soloists will be Raya Garbousova, the young Russian 'cellist; Robert Casadesus, the French pianist; Orlando Barera, the Italian violinist. Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti, the orchestra's virtuoso soloists, will be heard in Brahms' Double Concerto for violin and violoncello. Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor yet to be heard in America, will be guest conductor of the January pair of concerts.

12

5000 BANKERS HEAR SYMPHONY

First National Bank's Party Popular

Speakers and Day's Session Criticize New Deal

Globe Oct 13

By LOUIS M. LYONS

Names not on the program of the American Bankers' Association convention spoke to the bankers last night in the most popular assembly of any of their sessions here. Wagner and Haydn, Schubert and Tchaikovsky, interpreted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, drew 5000 bank convention delegates into the spacious quarters of the First National Bank to provide one of the most distinctive programs Boston has ever offered to a convention.

It was something new for a bank meeting. It was what many of the bankers came for and what their wives insisted on coming for. Wives from Des Moines and Fargo, Tucson and Omaha made their banker husbands get last-minute reservations when they heard that a Boston Symphony concert was to be a part of the proceedings.

Party on Lavish Scale

Heavy draperies muffled the sounds of the party on the first floor. At that Koussevitsky, once threw up his hands and stepped down from his dais, unwilling to compete with the party sounds from under his feet. But he yielded to an appealing outburst of handclapping and returned to lead into the whispered opening of Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia.

The party was on a lavish and colorful scale. The bank had thrust its business into the vaults and turned its cashiers' cages into sumptuous bars through which flowed an unstinted supply of such nectar as carries bankers through their arduous conventions. The counters for customers' checks became buffet stands for lobster cutlets and fish cakes, and hors d'oeuvres of an abundance and diversity sufficient for the debutante parties for all Winter.

ALFRED H. HASTINGS
Treasurer Springfield Institution for Savings.

The main floor of the bank was turned into a concert hall. The 55-piece orchestra was seated on the dais where the first-string executives of the city's biggest bank have their desks. There at 5:15 Serge Koussevitsky, amid the adoring whispers of the feminine part of the audience, turned his back upon the leading bankers of America and led the orchestra into the opening strains of Haydn's Symphony in G Major.

Just to see Koussevitsky perform was worth the railroad fare for many a distant visitor. He was a good show. Even his well-known temperament was in evidence and for a moment threatening. The improvised concert hall conditions could not be perfect. Only a fraction of those attending could be seated for the musical program. The rest, on the floor below, were hospitably plied with caviar and cocktails, anchovies and highballs until an intermission gave a chance for a reshuffle of seats.

Critics of Administration

The evening's symphony made an acceptable close to a convention day that had heard an anvil chorus of banker critics of the Administration at Washington. Led off by Dr Glenn Frank, the recently deposed president of the University of Wisconsin, featured speakers on the bank program had seemed to vie with one another in finding hard names to call the New Deal.

MOMENTS MUSICAL

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

Lowell-Courier Citizen Oct-13, 1937

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season auspiciously with its programs of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the Catchall there has already been an account of the reception accorded to Dr. Koussevitzky as he took his place on the conductor's stand. As we can testify personally, there were similar scenes on Saturday evening, when the great audience rose to welcome him, tributes to the conductor and the orchestra that were renewed after each of the two symphonies which comprised the program. Boston and vicinity, clearly, has lost none of its enthusiasm for this great orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to present two symphonies, both tried and well-beloved compositions, the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the Second of Sibelius. Both, as it seemed to this listener, were played superbly. The heroic and elegaic nature of the former was impressive throughout as Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it, guiding the musicians without the customary baton. The funeral march was especially fine. There was no mistaking that the audience was deeply moved by the performance.

In the Sibelius symphony Dr. Koussevitzky achieved results that brought out to the full contrasts, color and climax, a really thrilling performance. Into the music it was evident that he entered with especial sympathy and understanding of the composer's objectives. On the part of the orchestra, and notably in the case of the strings, it was a virtuoso performance.

The programs for this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening include the Classic Symphony and the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kiji" and the Russian Overture by Prokofieff, the latter for its first performance in the United States, to be followed by "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss.

In Symphony hall next Sunday afternoon, Fritz Kreisler, eminent violinist, will give his customary recital, with Carl Lamson at the piano.

NO BROADCAST BY SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Off Air After Three Years

Post Oct 15

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not being broadcast by radio this year after being featured for three seasons. One reason advanced was that while the high artistic merit of performances was apparent, the hour of broadcast was the most sought by commercial patrons and the loss of sponsored programmes was tremendous, in addition to the large sum paid the orchestra.

Evidences have multiplied enormously, however, that the Boston Symphony broadcasts won the most substantial and the most elite, as well as the most popular section of American audiences to radio during the period that they were on the air. Illuminating proof of this was the reaction of the audience of the American Bankers Association at the concerts given by the orchestra in the First National Bank. A good part of this audience had become familiar with the orchestra through the national broadcasts.

Edward A. Taft, the chairman of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a statement declares that this year $30,000 will be needed to pay the taxes on Symphony Hall, plus interest on the mortgage, and that $60,000 more will be needed to cover all other operating requirements. The point is made that "the $90,000 involved is less than the amounts needed by the great majority of other orchestras of this country to cover their annual operating deficits."

There is accumulating information of the growth of a movement to find some kind of sponsorship for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to insure it a permanent place on the air with one of the three great broadcasting companies.

ADMIRES SYMPHONY

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—With my wife I am in your historic city attending the convention of the American Bankers' Association. My dear wife proposed accompanying me in the hope that while here she could hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose music we enjoyed so much in other years over the radio.

Through the courtesy of the First National Bank we heard them last night. What a wonderful orchestra it is, what marvelous tone and what technical perfection. I wonder do you people of Boston realize what you possess. On all sides in that great bank hall last night I heard nothing but admiring expressions from my 3000 fellow bank men.

I write this that you may know how much the world outside Boston appreciates your orchestra. F. N. L.

Chicago.

(13)

ORCHESTRA READY FOR TOSCANINI

92 Musicians Selected for Maestro's Series on Radio Starting on Christmas

N.Y. Times

NOTED PLAYERS IN GROUP

Mischakoff, Once the Winner of Rubinstein First Prize, Is the Concertmaster

Oct. 14/37

The complete roster of ninety-two musicians of the new symphony orchestra now being rehearsed for the ten-week broadcast series, which Arturo Toscanini will conduct beginning Christmas night over a nation-wide network, was announced late yesterday by the National Broadcasting Company.

Following a five-week period of rehearsal under the baton of Artur Rodzinsky, who will later conduct ten concerts, Pierre Monteaux will direct the first broadcast on Nov. 13. The orchestra is expected to be heard over one one of the largest networks ever assembled for a music series.

The new symphony is said to be the result of months of searching for the best available instrumentalists during which more than 700 applicants from America and Europe were heard.

Once Won Rubinstein Prize

Heading the roster as concertmaster is Mischa Mischakoff, formerly of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and for many years first violinist of the Mischakoff String Quartet. He is a "gold medal" graduate of the Imperial Conservatory of Music in Moscow, and won the Rubenstein first prize of 1,200 gold rubles. After extensive concert work he became associated with the New York Symphony under Walter Damrosch, and later was concertmaster under Leopold Stokowski in Philadelphia. Mr. Mischakoff owns a Stradivarius violin valued at $50,000.

The first assistant concertmaster is Jacques Gasselin, who at the age of fifteen years won first prize in violin playing at the Paris Conservatoire and two years later became an outstanding soloist with European orchestras.

The second assistant concertmaster is Henri Nosco, who also studied at the Paris Conservatoire, the composer Saint Saens having passed upon his admission to that institution, predicting the violinist would win the violin prize in his first year, which so happened. Third assistant concertmaster is Remo Bolognini, who made his début in his native Buenos Aires at the age of seven, and was a noted child prodigy.

Others First Violinists

Other first violinists are: Samuel Antek, Litman Barenblat, Arcadie Birkenholz, Philip Frank, Rafael Galindo, Josef I. Gingold, Boris Koutzen, Samuel Rabinowitz, Ralph Silverman, Sylvan Schulman, Stefan Sopkin and Herman Weinberg.

The second violin concertmaster is Edwin Bachman, who was a professor at the Curtis Institute of Music, Philadelphia, and also has played with outstanding orchestras and chamber-music groups. Other second violinists are: Saul Sharrow, Henry Clifton, Tobias Bloom, Ben Feldhan, Luigi Ferrara, William Gegner, Maurice Goldoner, Frank Gurowitsch, Theodore Katz, Julius Risman, Kolman Smit, Seymour Suskind and Paul Winter.

The other musicians are:

Viola Section—Carleton Cooley, William Primrose, Leon Fletiman, Arthur Granick, Maurice Helfand, Louis Kievman, Edward Kreiner, Eli Lifschey, Reuben Metz, Sol Patchook, Tibor Serly and Jacques Tushinsky.

Cellists—Oswaldo Mazzucchi, formerly of the Colon Opera, first cellist; Jascha Schwarzmann, Edgar Lustgarten, Milton Prinz, Gdal Saleski, Harvey Shapiro, Alan Shulman, Ernst Silberstein, Carl Stern and Morris Stonzek.

Double Bass—George Torke, Henry Greenberg, George Koukly, Samuel Levitan, David Oliver, Philip Sklar and John Van de Graff.

Flutists—John Wummer and Hendrik De-Vries.

Flutist and Piccolo—Ben Gaskins.

Oboes—Robert Bloom, Filippo Ghnignatti and Rene Corne (the latter two also play the English horn).

Clarinet—Augustin Duques, Louis Green and Georges Grisez.

Bassoon—William Polisi, Leonard Sharrow and Abraham Reines (also contra-bassoonist).

French Horn—Albert Stagliano, Henry Hilmer, Arturo Cerino, Joseph Rescigno and Fred Dultgen.

Trumpet—Bernard Baker, Humbert Pannino, Frank Venezia and Sol Klass.

Trombone—Armand Ruta, Jack Epstein and Gerhard Warms.

Tuba—William Bell.

Percussion—Karl Glassman, kettle drums and tympani; David Gulskoff, bass drum; Harry Edison, drummer, and David Grupp, percussion accessories.

Harp—Edward Vito and Laura Newell.

Celeste—Vladimir Brenner.

First Novelties of Symphony Season

Trans., Oct. 14/37

Two living composers supply the music for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Symphony concerts of this week. Serge Prokofiev provides a new "Russian" Overture, a symphonic suite of music written for the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije," and the familiar "Classical Symphony." The Overture will receive its first American performance at these concerts; similar honors go to the concert in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, this evening, however, when the Suite will be heard for the first time in this hemisphere.

Prokofiev wrote his incidental music for the film "Lieutenant Kije" for the Belgoskino studio in 1933. The symphonic suite derived from the film music appeared in 1934. First given in Moscow, it has been performed in Paris and Venice during the present year. The film is based on the tale of the Russian czar, a little mad, and frightful in his anger, who so misread the name of a military officer in an official report as to form "Kije," a name which did not exist. Fearing the wrath of the czar on being informed of his mistake, the court preferred to create a fictitious personage to assume the non-existent name—non-existent, at least, before the czar's imagining.

Droll adventures follow in orthodox fashion. Kije is born (I Allegro) to martial strains of a trumpet off-stage, a snare-drum piccolo and rhythmic brass. He has his romance (II. Andante) to music that is sensuous and suggestive. Here a tenor saxophone replaces the original voice part. Kije's wedding (III. Allegro Fastoso) is graciously divided between pomp and sentiment with the latter predominating. He visits a tavern (IV. Troika) and hears a song in sleighing-rhythm; with this text:

"A woman's heart is like an inn:
All those who wish go in;
And they who roam about
Day and night go in and out."

The fifth section depicts the death and burial of Kije: relief and rejoicing in mock-somber dress. The trumpet off-stage is heard again; the soldier's fictitious existence is reviewed in quotations from the earlier movements.

Rather in the style of the "Classical Symphony," the music is gay, vivacious, witty, yet deeply felt for all its tongue-in-cheek seriousness. Prokofiev's explosive modulations and incisive orchestration are everywhere evident. All the instruments of his orchestra are treated as non-transposing instruments, clarinets and horns being written in C, the English horn in the alto-clef; the double-bass part appears briefly on the treble-clef.

The "Russian" Overture was completed and performed in Moscow during 1936. It is based on a folk-like theme of strong Slavic implications which is tossed about through the orchestra in manifold development and coloring. A contrasting theme sings in strings and horns. There is much episodic material in the free structure, but the cantabile melody reappears in the expected place before the end of the work, which is broad, exuberant, sonorous almost to excess.

G. H. L. S.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Trans. Oct. 16/37

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, sometimes known as the giant symphony, will be revived after more than 30 years at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Introduced by Wilhelm Gericke in February, 1906, it was then repeated in the same month. Dr. Muck conducted the symphony in the spring of 1913, and repeated the work twice in the following season.

The second part of the program will consist of excerpts from Richard Wagner, including (for the first time in many years at these concerts) Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Music—the finale of "The Valkyrie." The part of Wotan will be sung by Mack Harrell. "The Ride of the Valkyries," will also be played, and the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

NEW SYMPHONIES HEARD

N.Y. Times — Oct. 16/37

Boston Orchestra Played Russian Music of Serge Prokofiev

BOSTON, Oct. 15 (AP).—Two recent compositions by the Soviet composer, Serge Prokofiev, received their first performances in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

Though the works, a symphonic suite written for the Russian film "Lieutena Kije" and the "Russian Overture" received only a mild reception, the critics were warm in their praise for the first.

Trans., Oct. 16/37

MACK HARRELL

Baritone Soloist for the Closing Pages of "Die Walkuere" at Next Week's Symphony Concerts

---

Globe

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Dr Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday. Third program. The Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler will be revived for the first time here in 23 years. The work, consisting actually of five movements, is divided in three parts. It was composed in 1901-02, and was introduced to Boston by this orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke in February, 1906. The Fifth Symphony was repeated in that same month. Dr Muck performed it in 1913 and twice the following season. The present revival has long been planned by Dr Koussevitzky. The second half of the program will consist of Wagner excerpts and will bring Mack Harrell as soloist in "Wotan's Farewell" from "Die Walkuere." Mr Harrell is a young American baritone and has given recitals here. "The Ride of the Valkyries," also from "Die Walkuere," and the Introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" will be played.

Oct. 17

Symphony Concert Delights With Prokofieff's Scores

Amer. Oct. 16/37

By RUTH MARSTERS

Prokofieff and Richard Strauss are the two contemporary composers to whom Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has devoted the second program of the Boston Symphony season.

At yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60, and the same composer's Russian Overture, Op. 72, were given their first performance before a Boston audience.

The Suite is taken from incidental music written for the film of the same name. The story is one which serves as fertile ground for Prokofieff's effervescent humour.

The picture is not known here but according to program notes "Lieutenant Kije" is a character created by wise courtiers expressly to avoid contradicting a Czar who has mistakenly assumed such a person to exist.

In the Suite the story is told with that nicety of detail and conciseness of style which place Prokofieff in the ascendency as a writer of program music.

But if this is a score that sparkles and delights, the same can hardly be said of the "Russian Overture." It is hard indeed to understand such labored and forced efforts from this source.

The "Classical Symphony," with its lucidity, spontaneity, and wit, was not as well performed as it has been on previous occasions. The strings in particular lacked their usual precision and flexibility. It is, of course early in the season, and therefore conceivable that the orchestra is not as yet in its best playing form.

The performances given the two Strauss works, "Death and Transfiguration," and "Till Eulenspigel's Merry Pranks," left, on the other hand, little to be desired. They fairly glowed with vitality and the poetry which Dr. Koussevitzky's reading instilled into them.

The same program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

The program of the next regular pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include Mahler's Fifth Symphony and in addition Wagnerian excerpts will be performed with assisting soloists.

The shorter series of six pairs of concerts will open in Symphony Hall on Monday evening, October 25, and Tuesday afternoon, October 26.

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY'S NEW PLAN FOR SHORT SERIES

B. Post Oct. 17/37

Seasoned observers recognize that for the 57th season Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts interest a greater number of youthful subscribers than in any previous cycle. The personality and interpretative genius of Serge Koussevitsky acclaim his leadership for the 14th consecutive season, the longest term to be served by any conductor of Boston Symphony. His new plan for the short season will present the same programme at the Monday evening and Tuesday concerts for the series of six, opening Monday evening, Oct. 25, and the following afternoon, with the final pair in early week on the eve of April 18 and on Patriots' Day. For the January pair, the guest conductor is to be Daniels Amfitheatrof, yet to be heard in America.

Following the opening concert, youthful enthusiasts commented appreciatively on the symphonies, comparing the classical Beethoven and the contemporary Sibelius.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

The Jewish Advocate

By JULES WOLFFERS

Oct. 15/37

Symphony in Brilliant Opening

Low-Price Opera Well Received—Federals in Fine Form

It has been said of Boston that she is content to live in memories of the past. While it may be true that leadership in all the arts can no longer be claimed for the quondam Athens of America, there is, however, one institution which can justly claim to be second to none the world over. The musically wise will hardly start with surprise when we reveal this institution to be the Boston Symphony Orchestra which, under the leadership of its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opened its fifty-seventh season last week. The program, typical of such occasions, consisted of the Beethoven Third and the Sibelius Second, both symphonies familiar and well loved by Boston audiences.

Richard Strauss has said that there are no orchestras—only conductors. This statement may be considered extreme yet there is a considerable element of truth in it, for if one seeks an explanation of the factors which make the Boston Symphony what it is, the answer will be found in the person of one man. This reflects no discredit on the members of the orchestra, as fine a group of musicians as one could hope to ensemble, and we disagree with Strauss to the extent of stating the truism that a good workman needs good tools. But it is Dr. Koussevitzky who transforms this group of skilled soloists into a living, responsive medium, who transmits through the orchestra the genius of a Beethoven, a Sibelius.

Of last week's performance but one word need be said — superb! Beethoven's hero may have had feet of clay, but Beethoven's music is far too great to portray any one man—this music is the essence of man's essential and potential nobility, of man's struggle against the false, of the indestructibility of truth, of man's eventual triumph and vindication. The Sibelius, powerful a work as it is, has elements which the later Sibelius eradicated. It might be unkind to say that the kettledrums speak for themselves, but in the finale, particularly, one almost hears a too self-conscious striving for effect. In both works, Dr. Koussevitzky's readings were magnificently conceived, and as magnificently executed.

SYMPHONY GIVES TWO NEW WORKS

Post — Oct. 16/37

Prokofieff's Film Suite and Overture for First Time

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whether by accident or design, the Symphony season is beginning with a series of two-composer programmes. Last week it was Beethoven and Sibelius; this week it is Prokofieff and Strauss, and next week Mahler will be paired with Wagner. But, as against the two symphonies which made the first programme, that of yesterday afternoon and this evening lists no less than five pieces, three of them from the hand of the engaging Russian.

PROKOFIEFF AMUSING

In less time than it took to play the "Eroica" a week ago, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday disposed of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, the suite drawn from the music to the film, "Lieutenant Kije," and the so-called "Russian Overture." The two last named, by the way, were both heard for the first time in Boston and the overture for the first time in this country. To this music, all in an exuberant, even a humorous key, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration" made excellent foil; and "Till Eulenspiegel," coupled with it for a second time in two years, ended the concert on a cheerful note, even if poor Till does meet his fate on the gallows.

Beyond any composer of our day, Prokofieff has the faculty of being amusing. Yesterday, like the unflagging humor of the social "funnyman," this wittiness began at length to pall. As a rule, Prokofieff knows when he has said enough; is more fully conscious of that fact, indeed, than most composers. But his reiteration of a certain fetching tune in the "Kije" suite came near to becoming irritating; and the final movement might profitably be shortened.

Overture a Brilliant Work

Otherwise, this music to a satirical film anent an officer "created" to cover up a Czar's misreading of a name, is clever to a degree and well deserves to remain in the active repertory. The overture seemed on a first hearing to be less individual, but it is exceedingly brilliant and, as suggested above, often amusing as well. Some day the average concert-goer may learn that certain things, even in symphonic music, were actually meant to provoke a smile and will not always wear the grave face which he, or particularly she, considers becoming to so solemn an affair as a symphony concert.

We have heard the "Classical" Symphony only from Dr. Koussevitzky, while the other pieces were brand new yesterday, and yet it was easy to believe that the performances of all three pieces could not have been more felicitous.

Strauss Eloquently Played

In the case of the tone poems of Strauss, however, the same conjecture came close to being a certainty. "If "Death and Transfiguration" has ever been more eloquently played in Symphony Hall, this writer, for one, is not aware of the fact; and he has been hearing it there at frequent intervals over a period of more than 30 years and from such conductors as Dr. Muck, Mr. Toscanini and Strauss himself.

More than any other of the tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration" may lapse into theatricality and pathos. Yesterday it began and continued upon a noble and lofty plane. Such magnificant utterances was, in fact, a little hard on the succeeding "Till," even though more than one commentator has told us that the latter is Strauss' finest achievement. But it was not long before the gusto of this Rondo "after the old-fashioned roguish manner" carried all before it.

Globe Oct 16/37

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last shall be first in this account of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday. "Till Eulenspiegel," coming at the end of the program, provided the real climax of the afternoon. Not only one of the finest things Richard Strauss ever wrote, but a masterpiece of all music, the tone poem completely overshadowed the new "Lieutenant Kije" suite and the Russian Overture by Serge Prokofieff which were heard earlier. Dr Koussevitzky also included upon a lengthy list Porkofieff's "Classical Symphony," and another instrumental tour de force by Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

Although "Till Eulenspiegel" was created in that esthetically impossible time—the 1890s—it is more modern than last year's hats. None of its freshness has gone, none of its captivating wit. Even the last choked squeal of Till upon the scaffold remains a dynamic and a surprising touch.

In a sense it is probably true that no conductor and no first-rank orchestra could fail with this composition. On the other hand, only virtuosi with complete sympathy of style and feeling could produce so magnificent a performance as yesterday. Dr Koussevitzky now reads the score better than ever.

Those who rail at Strauss for what they consider his "old-fashioned" idiom and his enormous orchestra are not justified in speakinf harshly of "Till Eulenspiegel." Nor are they justified in so treating "Death and Disfiguration," because that work is still a marvel of instrumentation, though its substance now seems platitude. Dr Koussevitzky's instinct for making programs was right, as usual, when it placed "Death and Disfiguration" before "Till Eulenspiegel." The most gorgeous web of orchestral sound cannot make convincing a doubtful idea.

Prokofieff composed his "Lieutenant Kije" score in 1933 as incidental music for a Soviet film. The present performances are the first in Boston. Czar Nicholas I of Russia, according to the story of the film, misread a military report in such fashion as to convince him there was a "Lieutenant Kije" in his service. There wasn't, so the Czar's courtiers, afraid to risk imperial wrath by pointing out the mistake, promptly invented the character.

It naturally follows that Prokofieff's music—set in five parts—was intended to be humorous. And so it is—provided you are aware of Prokofieff's intention. Otherwise the music would likely not be effective. The instrumentation is deft and brilliant, with just a suggestion that Prokofieff was not unaware of Stravinsky's ballet, "Baiser de la Fee."

The Russian Overture, composed in 1936 and heard for the first time in the United States yesterday, is another and less fortunate matter. Apart from Prokofieff's characteristic ingenuity in manipulation of rhythms, the pretentious score is seemingly amorphous in form, noisily—not to say clumsily—orchestrated, and over-long almost to the point of being tiresome.

Prokofieff was at his best, however, in his "Classical Symphony." Twenty years of existence have had no diminishing effect upon the cleverness and the pure beauty of this music, which neither pokes fun at Mozart nor sets out to put tonal new wine into old bottles of form. Once again it proved wholly delightful.

This program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr Koussevitzky will consummate a desire long in his mind: revival of Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony, unheard in Boston for more than 20 years. The program will be completed with three Wagner excerpts, the Introduction to Act III of "Die Meistersinger," "Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music" from "Die Walkuere" (Mack Harrell, baritone soloist), and the "Ride of the Valkyries." C. W. D.

Monitor

OCTOBER 16, 1937 —New England News— 11

Dr. Koussevitzky Plays Soviet Music

For the first time in his career, so far as available records show, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conducting this week music from Soviet Russia. Hitherto, at Boston Symphony concerts, Soviet music has been left to Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, to produce at those moments when he relieves his chief. This time, the chief himself ventures into those dread regions. Thus is musical history made under our ears.

True, the dragon in this instance is only our old friend Serge Prokofieff, who was a famous composer long before he returned a few years ago to labor in the land of his birth, under the Bolshevik egis. Moreover, the new music he contributes to this week's programs is no more revolutionary than earlier works of his to which we are accustomed. Indeed, if these recent scores are Marxist propaganda, it must be a very subtle variety, for they are nothing like as violent as the "Scythian" Suite or "Sept, Ils Sont Sept."

Still, these new pieces must be acceptable, for the moment, to the Soviet authorities, for Prokofieff, the last we knew, was still at large. Tomorrow, perhaps, it will be discovered that these scores are formalistic. Let us hope that by that time Prokofieff will be back in Paris.

Prokofieff's orchestral suite drawn from his music to the motion picture, "Kije," which had its first American performance in Cambridge Thursday evening, is also on the Friday and Saturday programs this week; his Russian Overture was heard yesterday in Symphony Hall for the first time in this country.

The plot of the film is amusing. Tsar Nicholas I misreads a report, taking the last syllable of an officer's name, "ki," and the Russian expletive "je," which follows it in the report, as forming a surname. Since this name did not exist, the courtiers, rather than tell the Tsar he had made a mistake, found it necessary to invent both the name and an officer to fit it. The film depicts the consequent to-do.

The music which was written to accompany it is full of wit and fancy. With the most economical means it achieves a playful characterization. Trumpet and fife and drum and Little-Lead-Soldier rhythms are much relied on. Themes in the style of folk songs are used for the tender moments. Heard as an accompaniment to the film, the music is probably completely satisfying. In the concert hall it sometimes seems arid and sometimes a little dull.

As music it does not compare at all with the "Classical" Symphony, which preceded it on the program. There, the charming and clever effects are produced by purely musical means, with the orchestra of the late eighteenth century. In the suite, even with the aid of saxophone, triangle, cymbals, tambourine, sleighbells, harp, celesta and piano, one cannot clearly see the imaginary lieutenant nor visualize his adventures. There is hardly enough musical substance here to make an orchestral suite.

The Russian Overture employs tunes in folk-music style, too, and it also resorts to a tremendous battery, to violent assaults of orchestral sonority and to dazzling orchestral colors. Here again, though, the musical content is slight. The peroration comes close to being mere noise. Conservatives perhaps will seize upon this piece as subversive. But they may quiet their fears. This sort of thing sounds fearsome but it's perfectly harmless—even respectable, for it is in the direct "1812" tradition. It was performed yesterday in a tense manner that did not tend to clarify it.

The second half of the program was given over to Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel." L. A. S.

The Arts in Boston

Symphony Hall Exhibition

Simultaneously with the first concerts of the season at Symphony Hall there is being shown an exhibition of pictures and sculptures. The policy of hanging exhibitions in the large foyer is to continue during this season. The initial display shows careful planning and is one of the best ever shown in this improvised art gallery.

The exhibition is twofold. It consists of a number of oils and water colors, a retrospective of summer work. Included are typical examples: a pastoral of Holland by Anthony Thième, a covered bridge by J. B. Irving, a seacoast subject in the better manner of Stanley Woodward, picturesque scene of fishing by Charles Gruppe, a simplified portrayal of "Moonlight, Mount Desert" by John Aiken. John C. E. Taylor provides a meticulously wrought Camellia, while Esther Williams exhibits her increasing interest in circus and animal life in the portrait of a horse, entitled "Solo."

Jon Corbino makes romantic material out of the granite quarries at Rockport, while Elinor Goodridge does a familiar scene at Bearskin Neck. Both these painters seem inclined to the dramatic import of darkened color and looming shadow. In fact, it is interesting to observe how the tendency today is away from the assertive, bright hues of impressionism. Black and brown and chiaroscuro seem to have come back as a reaction to pure color.

The second part of the show consists of work from the skillful hand of the Hungarian-born Karoly Fülop. Eminently suited to a Symphony Hall exhibition, his sculptures and panels treat in fanciful, decorative manner musical and poetic themes. Mr. Fülop's fanciful figures carved of wood have the decisive line patterns, the stylization and rhythm of medieval design brought into Europe by nomads from the East. There was a time when this style would have been looked upon as grotesque and barbaric, but today we have grown expansive in our tastes, relishing the very features which are associated with remote and Asiastic origins. One carved group, "Beggars," is more plastic in handling. Included are small fiddle and large bass, both beautifully incorporated in the sculptural pattern. This piece is enhanced with generously applied color. D. A.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR
OCT 16 1937

Two compositions by Soviet composer, Prokofiev—"Lieutena Kije" and "Russian Overture"—presented in America for first time by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ORCHESTRA DRIVE ENTERS LAST WEEK

Tomorrow Will Begin Final Campaign for Subscriptions Here

The campaign for subscriptions to the Providence Symphony Orchestra concerts enters its second and last week tomorrow.

Mrs. Ada Holding Miller, chairman of the campaign, is being assisted by the following workers: Mrs. John McGreevy, Mrs. William J. Cummings, Mrs. Joseph Micarelli, Mrs. Peter Forsyth, Miss Nanci Walker, Mrs. Arthur Wilkinson, Miss Marjorie Farnell, Miss Liiian Migliori, Miss Loretta Gagnon, Miss Esther Greenberg, Mrs. James Church, Miss Ruth Tripp, Pavel Bytovetski, Mrs. Carl W. Haffenreffer, Mrs. Ruth Schoonman, Mrs. Walter Peirce, Miss Elizabeth Hope, Miss Ruth Cambell, Miss Dorothy Jones.

Miniatures Are Featured In Symphony Program

B. Trans Oct. 16/37

New Works of Prokofieff Are Given Along with Huge Scores of Richard Strauss

By Redfern Mason

Hidden away in the personality of Serge Koussevitzky is a gentle ironist. "You think I am a miniaturist," he seems to say, "well, so I am, but I can paint on a big canvas, too." So for yesterday's Symphony he played three numbers of the Russian Prokofieff, superb thumbnail stuff with the exception of the overture, and two tone poems of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel."

Prokofieff is apparently persona grata with the Soviet Union; but he who looks for Marxian symptoms in his composition will not easily find them unless perhaps it be in the ironic "Lieutenant Kije," which is a picture of a person who only existed in the imagination. Because the Tsar made a mistake in reading a name, a man had to be created to wear it; otherwise the "little father" of all the Russias would appear fallible, like other people, and that, of course, is an intolerable idea.

So "Lieutenant Kije" comes into being, becomes a soldier, marries and eventually is gathered to his fathers. Perhaps that is Marxian mockery; but, however that may be, the idea leads Prokofieff to the composition of excellent music. Our Boston audience enjoyed it immensely. After all a Soviet composer is human; he can dream dreams and see visions. People would have enjoyed the work almost as much if Mr. Burk had not let them into the secret in his program notes. It mattered little that they had never heard the work before. There it was bubbling over with Slav merriment and occasionally wistful with Slav romance.

In the "Classical Symphony," also of Prokofieff, which opened the concert, we heard a sort of tabloid classic, law abiding as a score of Haydn, to whom, rather than to Mozart, the Russian composer seems to lean. It is a symphony that children will love, just as they love "Papa" Haydn. There are moments in it that sparkle like a page of Scarlatti. But the atmosphere is different. Instead of the burning brightness of the Italian sky, Prokofieff gives us the mist that broods over the Steppes.

The "Russian Overture" has been called "savory"; but the term is a belittling one. Here is fine music, full of color and emotion; but nobody save the rankest amateur would have the courage to analyse it on a first hearing. If a new work can be understood at first hearing, there is nothing original about it. Prokofieff's work is not of that class, and the grandeur of the conclusion argues an idealism the significance of which people will appreciate only on further acquaintance.

Turn now to "Tod und Verklarung," a composition which, though written nearly half a century ago, has still unfathomed depths. We all are freemen in our dreams, and in the visions of his dying hero Strauss pictures longing and aspirations. Genius throbs in it, and admirably Mr. Koussevitzky realized it in tone. That glorious phrase for brass, repeated again and again, is music which has the bloom of immortality, and I am sure that the whole audience was grateful to our brass section for the nobility with which they gave expression to it.

In putting "Till Eulenspiegel" last the director probably was disposed to "seek repose upon a humbler theme." If ever there was a tale of "once upon a time," even though it does not end with "and they lived happily ever afterwards," it is this of "Till Owlglass, as the Elizabethans called him. It is impish, insolent, and finally querulously pathetic. Something of the humor of Gilbert's "assistant tormentor" is in it. The orchestra played it with abandon, not forgetting to put the terror of doom in those ponderous chords which herald the ending of this prankish gnome of the German folk.

Boston Symphony to Open Providence Season Tuesday

Program for Metropolitan Theatre Concert Includes Prokofieff Suite Never Heard Before in City.

LED by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence series of concerts Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre, bringing two old symphonic friends and introducing a new suite taken from a film score by a noted modern composer. This is the orchestra's 57th season and the 14th of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

The suite, by the Russian, Serge Prokofieff, is an arrangement of the incidental music he wrote for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," produced in 1933. It is described as light and satirical in character and illustrates in its five movements the birth of Kije, romance, Kije's wedding, troika and the burial of Kije.

This work was first presented in America at the concert Dr. Koussevitzky gave at his first appearance of the season in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last Thursday. Likewise played were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," both of which will be repeated here Tuesday. The program follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major,
"Eroica," opus 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro molto
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, opus 60 .. .. Prokofieff
I. Birth of Kije
II. Romance
III. Kije's Wedding
IV. Troika
V. Burial of Kije
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," opus 28.. .... Strauss

This afternoon at 4 o'clock a lecture on the Boston Symphony's program will be given by John B. Archer in the Providence Public Library. It will be illustrated at the piano by Miss Ruth Tripp. The lecture, which is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, is free to the public.

Considers Music Real Human Need

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will lead the orchestra in a program opening with Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony at the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening. His eyes flashed as he went on to say:

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy.. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express wtihin the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

The reporter reflected that in this statement Koussevitzky unintentionally was giving an insight into his own genius. His extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation in his conducting were forcefully hinted by the mental grasp and emotional sensibility which he revealed as he talked.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 16 1937

NEW SOVIET WORKS PLAYED

Boston, Oct. 15.—(AP)—Two recent compositions by the Soviet composer Serge Prokofiev received their first performances in America today at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzy conducting. Though the works, a symphonic suite written for the Russian film "Lieutenant Kije," and the "Russian Overture" received only a mild reception, critics were warm in their praise for the first.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY MAHLER COMPOSITION

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Post - Oct. 17/37

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

"MY time will come," said Gustav Mahler, whose path as composer was beset with many difficulties, but it may be doubted whether he realized just how slow the process was likely to be. The first symphonic work of his to be played in Boston was the Fifth or "Giant" Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky will revive at the concerts of this week. To Wilhelm Gericke we owed the initial performance, in February, 1906, and there was a repetition, by general request, a month later. Dr. Muck let us hear it again in the spring of 1913, and twice in the following season. Since that time it has gathered dust on the library shelf.

Of the other symphonies, the Second, with choral finale, was given here in 1918, at two special concerts, also under Dr. Muck. Mr. Monteux introduced to us the First, in 1923 (Mr. Mitropolous repeated it two seasons ago), and in 1928 Dr. Koussevitzky made his first contribution to the cause with the "Song of the Earth," which was soon followed by the Ninth Symphony, then unknown to America, though Mahler had died in 1911. Each of the last-named pieces has been thrice heard at Symphony Hall. Of the Third, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh and Eighth Symphonies we, as yet, know nothing, though Dr. Koussevitzk[illegible] other conductor, will, no doubt, reveal them to us, all in good time. Certainly we have heard, and are likely to hear, much of far less import.

The Mahler symphonies, like those of Bruckner, are all excessively long. At the concerts of this week the Fifth will be companioned only by three Wagnerian excerpts, the Introduction to act III. of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries" and, also from "Die Waulkuere," "Wotan's Farewell" and the Magic Fire Music, with Mack Harrell, a baritone of proven excellence hereabouts, as the singer.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

Echoes of Summer Shown at Symphony Hall

Those who visited exhibitions of painting at New England's summer art colonies during the past summer will recognize most of the 14 oils and water colors that compose the first display of the autumn season at Symphony Hall. It is a modest show, well selected, and so excellently hung that one may study each picture comfortably without distraction by too insistent demands on the part of its neighbors. Thus some achieve their just deserts much more than in their former appearances.

That is particularly true of Jon Corbino's "Granite," the richness of coloring, sound structure and luminosity of which was not always fully appreciated when it hung in the Rockport Art Association's gallery last summer. Here in this spacious and well-lighted position its strength and subtle tonality are immediately manifest. Herbert Barnett's "Sea Wall, Pigeon Cove," is another view of Cape Ann rocks which stands out for its steadfast solidity and deep richness of color woven into so harmonious a pattern.

One of Rockport's clear blue days is reflected in the rich blueness of the sea, "Off Loblolly Point," as depicted in oils by Galen Perrett. As for water color, Stanley Woodward contributes a very strong study of "Day's End." In that same medium Elinor Goodridge offers "In Port," the familiar fish house known as "Motive No. 1" seen darkly. John C. E. Taylor adds to his "Piping of Pan," a newly completed, greatly magnified study of a "Camellia" in manner suggestive of wood carving.

Esther Williams, Anthony Thieme, Jeannette B. Irving, Charles Gruppe, Eliot O'Hara and Yarnall Abbott are also represented by characteristic work. And one more water color that should be mention is "Moonlight, Mount Desert," by that talented young Wellesley painter, John Aiken.

A trio of wood carvings with painted backgrounds in the highly stylized and

Boston Sunday Post Oct. 17/37

Oils and water colors from New England summer colonies, also wood carvings and paintings by Karoly Fulop continue at Symphony Hall. Through Oct. 30.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
OCT 9 - 1937

BOSTON

CAPACITY AUDIENCE HAILS SYMPHONY LEADER

BOSTON, Oct. 8 (AP)—As Serge Koussevitsky took the conductor's stand to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 57th season today in Symphony Hall, the capacity audience arose as one to applaud the Russian-born musician who began his fourteenth consecutive year here.

ARCHER SPEAKS ON SYMPHONY

Prov. Bulletin - Oct. 18/37

A lecture on the program to be presented here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow night was given by John B. Archer yesterday afternoon at the Providence public library under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Mrs. Mary Colt Gross and Mrs. Ada Holding Miller were ushers.

Tea was served after the lecture at the club studios, 63 Washington street. Hostesses were Mrs. Elsie Lovell Hankins, Mrs. Mary Colt Gross, Miss Christine Gladhill and Miss Helaine Ames.

SOCIETY PARADES AT CONCERT HALL

Prov. Journal

Music Patrons Meet for First Time This Year as Boston Symphony Plays.

Oct. 20/37

EVENING GOWNS REVIEWED

Reunion of Providence First Families in Lobby of Metropolitan Is Colorful Affair

Providence society turned out in large numbers last evening for the first concert of the season presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Noted in the enthusiastic assemblage last evening were many who recently returned from extended stays at their country homes or from European trips and the gathering seemed to give the semblance of a reunion with friendly saluations frequently expressed.

During intermission the lobby was occupied with groups of music lovers attired in fashionable array which ranged from dinner gowns to the more formal evening frocks. Velvets, furred, self-trimmed or shirred; sheer chiffons, crepes, taffetas and lames were among the materials noticed in the throng. Some of the gowns were trimmed with sequins, brilliant shoulder clips of rhinestones or shot with silver and gold thread designs. Deep wine red, black, Coronation blue, autumn gold and aquamarine were some of the outstanding shades of the gowns.

Mrs. Edward D. Curtis was attired

Continued on Page 5, Column 4

MONDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1937

NOTABLE AUDIENCE ATTENDS SATURDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY

B. Globe

Dinner at Groton Hunt Club Will Precede Wedding Of Miss Helen Crocker and Mr Davis

Mrs Hamilton Osgood (facing camera) was among the many Bostonians at Symphony Hall Saturday for the second of this season's Saturday night concerts.

Boston has two Symphony audiences each week-end, those who meet Friday afternoons in one of the most noted of Boston audiences, and those who attend on Saturday evenings.

In the latter distinguished company this week-end were Mr and Mrs I. Tucker Burr, in their usual seats in the first balcony, left-hand side, with Mr Russell Codman and Mrs K. Crosby Choate nearby. Mrs Burr wore handsome black and pearls, and Mrs Choate a fascinating redingote tailleur of black and scarlet, with which she wore heavy silver bracelets and a silver necklace, her high black hat trimmed with scarlet feathers.

Others who heard the superb Strauss and the effective Russian overture new to Boston and America, included Mr and Mrs Hamilton Osgood, her lovely fair hair gleaming above simple suave black; Dr and Mrs Richard Peirson Strong (Grace Nichols), a black sealskin cape over her black gown; Mr William H. Hallowell, Miss Dorothea Merriman, escorted; Mr and Mrs Albert C. Titcomb, a little veiled black hat above her dark furs; Miss Elizabeth Mixter, in pale blue net; Miss Adele Hooper, in chic bottle green, her party including Mr H. Pennington Hale of New York.

nold, Mrs Charles J. Bullock, Mr Karl F. Becker, Mrs Clark Belden, Mrs Henry Billings, Mrs William F. Brooks, Mrs Ada C. Bradbury, Miss Susan C. Allison, Miss Ada A. Clark and Mrs Charles S. Fuller.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 9 - 1937

Koussevitzky Applauded Opening Boston Concert

Boston, Oct. 8.—(AP.)—As Serge Koussevitzky took the conductor's stand to open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifty-seventh season today in Symphony Hall, the capacity audience arose as one to applaud the Russian-born musician who began his fourteenth consecutive year here.

The conductor chose Beethoven's Eroica symphony, and Sibelius's second symphony, with which to open the season.

Next week the orchestra will present the first of numerous new compositions to be heard for the first time in America, the Russian overture and the Lieutenant Kije orchestral suite, both by the Soviet composer-pianist Prokofieff.

MONTCLAIR, N. J.
TIMES (Semi-Weekly)
OCT 8 - 1937

Boston Symphony Concert an Event

Orchestra to Return After Seven-Year Absence.

After an absence of seven years, the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Montclair High School on Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, as the extra event in connection with the Unity Concert Course series, will be one of the great musical events of the season in Montclair, as Koussevitsky is to be the conductor.

This great Russian, beginning his fourteenth successive season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the opinion of most musical critics is, since the departure of Toscaninni, the greatest conductor in this country. He is able to handle his orchestra with the greatest skill even under unfavorable conditions, as in the tent at the Berkshire Music Festival this Summer, when at times the heat was next to unbearable and at others torrents of rain fell.

As the Winter tour of the Boston Symphony is limited and usually only university towns and large cities are included, this season Montclair stands out in the list of cities to be visited, including Cambridge, New York, Brooklyn, Hartford, New Haven, Providence, Worcester, Northampton, Ann Arbor, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Cincinnati and New Brunswick.

Tickets should be reserved early in order to secure good seats at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street. Telephone Montclair 2-6770, from 9 to 11 A. M.

SYMPHONY CONCERT AT CAMBRIDGE THEATRE

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

Beethoven...Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.

Prokofieff..."Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60.

Strauss..."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in Rondo Form," Op. 28.

One of the most charming traditions of both the symphonic and the academic year, is the group of eight concerts given under the auspices of Harvard at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge. The programmes are usually a combination of pieces played the preceding and subsequent weeks.

Among others, one of the delights of watching an orchestra play a symphony is that the bows and gleaming curves of the horns move in corresponding rythms to the music, but in terms of light and action not sound, so that by watching, the listener is able to predict and interpret the music with his eyes as well as his ears.

The orchestra was warmly greeted, not a seat was empty and the audience settled down with an obvious air of anticipation. The Eroica was played briskly; Mr. Koussevitzky skillfully organized and clarified the confusing richness of the music, his restraint emphasizing the internal structure of the movements.

Nevertheless, Prokofieff's Lieutenant Kije was the high point of the evening. I believe that it is in connection with this piece that the following somewhat ironic story is told: The work of Prokofieff had been highly praised by certain of the Russian intellectuals who wrote in "Pravda" and "Izvestia." However, about the time of the performance of Lieutenant Kije, which was incidental music written as illustration to a cinema of the same name (1934), Stalin, by chance, heard the music of Prokofieff, evidently for the first time, and was revolted by his 'decadent and mocking manner.' Shortly afterwards, there was published a long article on Prokofieff deprecating his work, declaring him bourgeois, and deploring the taste of those who had previously praised him.

Curiously enough, the central theme of Lieutenant Kije seems a blood brother to morsels of swing jazz, and enunciated as it is by a tenor saxophone, it bore a definite if illicit relation to certain of Mr. Benny Goodman's triumphs of rhythm.

Perhaps the outstanding quality of Prokofieff as opposed to other modern composers, is his elfin wit and sophisticated sense of humor.

Till Eulenspiegel was a fitting finish.

This reviewer can only add that she disagrees with that superior old gentleman who was heard to mutter on leaving: "It means nothing at all to me."

Oct. 17/37

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR - TRIBUNE

HUB SYMPHONY HERE TONIGHT

Koussevitzky to Present New Prokofieff Suite at Metropolitan

Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a performance of a striking composition, "Suite from the Film: Lieut. Kiji," by Sergei Prokofieff, contemporary Russian master, with the opening of the Providence season at the Metropolitan Theatre tonight. This suite was introduced to an American audience only last Thursday at the Boston Symphony's Cambridge appearance in the Sanders Theatre.

It is described by Koussevitzky as a masterly piece of orchestration, the inspiration of which was a Russian legend concerning a blunder by the tsar, who misread an official report to name a non-existent "Lieut. Kiji." Since no courtier dared set the tsar right, all conspired to invent a complete account of the lieutenant's life even to his death and burial.

Prokofieff, in his suite, gives jovial and often witty musical expression to leading episodes in the spurious history of the fictitious hero, including the marriage, that never took place, to a fictitious bride. The evening's program will open with the Eroica of Beethoven. The new suite will come after the rest period, and the conclusion will be Richard Strauss' program masterpiece, "The Merry Pranks of Till Eulenspiegal."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 16 1937

..Music and Other Notes..

Koussevitsky brings the Boston Symphony to the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening at 8:15 for the opening concert of its series of five in Providence. The program opens with the Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, opus 55. Then follows an orchestral suite, "Lieut. Kije" by Prokofieff, a contemporary Russian composer. The tone-poem by Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks after the Old-Fashioned Rougish Manner—in Rondo Form," opus 28, closes the program. Thus a favorite symphony, a modern work (these must be heard) and a not-too-modern tone-poem offer something for all tastes and by their wide variety will bring out in contrast the fine points and high spots of whichever school the listener chooses to like best. Koussevitsky is a master at program building.

Beethoven's "Eroica" was written in 1804 and in it we find him expressing his sympathy for the struggles for freedom in France. His dedication on the cover of the manuscript reads, "Sinfonia Grande—Napoleon Bonaparte." Later this was changed to read "Sinfonia Eroica." The symphony has the traditional four movements and uses the restricted choice of keys, E flat, C minor-C major and E flat twice. The opening movement expresses the grandeur of the background of the great man. The hero dies and the second movement is the famous Funeral March, allegro assai. (A memorable performance of this Funeral March was given several years ago in Providence by the Boston Symphony in memory of Dr. W. H. P. Faunce.) The third movement, the Scherzo, allegro vivace. Trio is in a light and joyful rhythm. The strong, sonorous Finale, allegro molto, brings the symphony to an exuberant close.

This symphony was written at the beginning of Beethoven's deafness and from his "will" of Oct. 6, 1802, addressed to his brothers, he says (in Thayer's translation): "With joy I hasten toward death—if it comes before I shall have had occasion to unfold all my artistic capacities it will come too early for me despite my hard fate and I shall probably wish that it had come later." The "Eroica" was completed in 1804, but was not published until October, 1806. From a sketch book of Beethoven's, prob-[illegible]ly about 1806, we find this bit: [illegible] longer keep your deafness a secret—also not in matters of art."

Serge Prokofieff was born in Solnzevo in 1891. He was educated at the Petrograd Conservatory and studied with Liadow and Rimsky-Korsakoff in theory and composition and with Mme. Esipoff in piano. He left Russia in 1918 and has since lived in Japan, in United States and in Bavaria.

His style is remarkable for its strong rhythm, its short, incisive themes and crude harmonies. His form is not difficult and involved but is almost classical in its severity. He is an excellent pianist and his appearance in Providence some 10 years ago, when he played his own concerto with the Boston Symphony, stands out as a stimulating experience in new rhythms and strong, almost brutal, tone color. "Lieut. Kije" is opus 60 in Prokofieff's list of compositions and it will be interesting to see what has developed in the work of this modernist as he approaches middle life.

Strauss will be more readily understood as he takes Till through his merry career. This composition was written in 1896 and has become a favorite with symphony audiences. The gay humor of the trickery of this legendary rascal are cleverly depicted in sound by the clever orchestration. His death is vividly described but Strauss adds an epilogue containing the original "Till" theme so that one realizes he is not actually dead but will live forever.

John B. Archer will lecture on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Sunday, Oct. 17, at 4 p. m., in the Providence public library. This lecture is the first of a series under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

The Chaminade Club will hold its first fall meeting at Froebel Hall, Thursday, Oct. 21, at 11 a. m. Mrs. George Hail is the hostess and the affair is federation day. The musical program will be given by members of the Rossini Club of Portland, Me.

The New England grand opera company announces a performance of "La Boheme" on Nov. 4 at Metropolitan Theater, Providence.

The Providence Symphony orchestra presents a series of three concerts, the first of which will be given at Metropolitan Theatre, on Nov. 16, with Prof. Arthur B. Hitchcock of Brown University as piano soloist.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 18 1937

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Open Season Here Tomorrow Night with Program Featuring Beethoven, Strauss, Prokofieff

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opens its Providence season tomorrow night in Metropolitan Theatre with a well-made program, comprising Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica"; Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and a new suite by Prokofieff, "Lieutenant Kije."

The Prokofieff suite deserves special mention, because it is a work by a foremost modern and the performance here will be almost an American premiere. It was played last Friday in Boston for the first time in this country. Inclusion of this work is gratifying, because last season the symphony brought no new compositions at all in any of its five concerts.

The suite is made up from music written by Prokofieff for a Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije." The story concerns an imaginary person, the lieutenant, in whose existence the Czar believes. The courtiers dare not inform the Czar of his error, so they pretend to believe in Lieutenant Kije also, and they invent various stories about him. The parts of the suite are: "Birth of Kije." "Romance." "Kije's Wedding," "Troika," and "Burial of Kije."

Prokofieff played his own third Piano Concerto with the orchestra in Boston last season.

The "Eroica" opens the program. In its early days it was considered a formidable test of endurance, and the first published copies contained the following note: "Since this symphony is longer than an ordinary symphony, it should be performed at the beginning rather than at the end of a concert, either after an overture or an aria, or at the end of a concerto. If it be performed too late, there is the danger that it will not produce on the audience, whose attention will be already wearied by preceding pieces, the effect which the composer purposed in his own mind to attain."

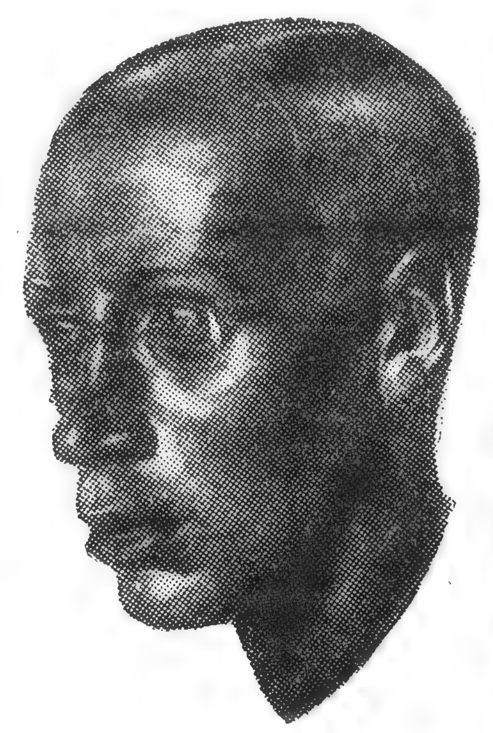
Beethoven composed the symphony in 1803 and 1804. The story is that it was written with Napoleon in mind and was to have been dedicated to him, but when Napoleon made himself Emperor, Beethoven, who was a Republican, furiously changed the dedication. Many legends and ingenious explanations of the symphony have been printed. The four movements are allegro con brio; marcia funebre, adagio assai; scherzo, allegro vivace, trio; finale, allegro molto.

The first performance was conducted by Beethoven at Prince Lobkowitz's in December, 1804. The next year it had its first performance in public at the Theater an der Wien.

"Till Eulenspiegel," the last item on the program, has been played here before by the orchestra and has always been received with delight. It is "after the old-fashioned roguish manner, in rondo form." In its early days—it was first performed in 1895—it was denounced by the critics as meaningless, crude and decadent. Strauss reluctantly provided a sort of program for the music, which depicts the career of Till Eulenspiegel, a roguish character of German folklore. He annoys market women, disguises himself as a pastor, mocks religion, has misgivings for doing so, courts a pretty girl, is refused, departs for other adventures and finally is hanged.

G. Y. L.

Serge Prokofieff



PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 18 1937

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Conducting, Will Open Season Here Tomorrow Night With Program Featuring Beethoven and Prokofieff

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

FOUNDED IN 1881 BY HENRY L. HIGGINSON

FIFTY-SEVENTH SEASON
1937-1938
[2]

MUSIC

Beethoven's "Eroica" and a New Offering in Music, "Lieutenant Kije" by Prokofieff, Feature Opening Concert of Boston Symphony

By G. Y. Loveridge

An interesting program splendidly played was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first contribution to this city's music season. The audience last night very nearly filled the Metropolitan Theatre, and the customary landslide of automobiles blocked all the neighboring highways.

The first concert is not only the occasion for renewing acquaintance with the orchestra and its famed leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, but also a time for informal visiting among the listeners. The drone of conversation, accompanied by the nervous voices of violins and the grunts of horns, creates a rather pleasant confuson. It makes an effective setting for the entrance of Dr Koussevitzky, who is to quiet the tumult and cause a more purposeful sound on the premises.

The conductor was greeted with enthusiasm. He bowed and smiled, apparently as glad to be back as the audience was to have him. Then he turned briskly to the business of the evening. Two crashing chords fired off Beethoven's "Eroica." and gave the listener to understand that it was the same Boston Symphony that took so vigorous a departure last season.

Dr Koussevitzy read the allegro zestfully. Long as it is, it held the attention, and it set up a truly heroic musical image, an image of ideas rather than of men. It was a virtuoso performance. One felt intensely the power of the young composer striking out for himself beyond the boundaries that great men preceding him had reached.

A good deal of ink has gone over the rollers in efforts to explain why Beethoven, if he had Napoleon or some other hero in mind when he wrote the symphony, buried him in chapter two and then went on to be humorous and lastly triumphant. Why is the second movement a funeral march? It will take only a little more ink to suggest that maybe Beethoven had observed that great men triumph more generally after death than before, that the extent of their conquests and also their defeats becomes apparent only slowly. It was so with Beethoven himself.

Or perhaps his only reason for putting the funeral march second was because it wouldn't be as effective for a last movement. As played last night, it did not have the same quality as the other parts, did not cohere as well, did not hold the listener with equal fascination.

The scherzo was a magnificent display of virtuosity. The precision of the horns and the stealthy chuckle of the bows bouncing on the strings were delightful. The orchestra spoke in tones that were bright and rich, and the perfect articulation of all these many parts was something to wonder at.

The finale swept along with such an air of triumph and certainty as only a master composer and a master interpreter can give. The balance and sensitivity of the orchestra and the delicate responsiveness of it, were magnificent. Dr. Koussevitzky was applauded heartily. The conductor waved the men to their feet.

After intermission, something new was heard—the suite "Lieutenant Kije," by Prokofieff. This music was written for a Soviet motion picture, the hero of which is the lieutenant. He does not really exist, but the Czar has a notion he does, and the courtiers are afraid to tell the Czar he is mistaken about anything. They invent adventures for the lieutenant and treat him as a real person.

For his hero, Beethoven got along without even trombones, but Prokofieff uses everything in sight, sleigh bells, saxophone, piano, celesta, and even something that isn't in sight, an off-stage trumpet. This music is lively and charming. The troika ride, for instance, with its sleigh-bells and the suggestion of the bassoon that an aristocrat is being thrown to the wolves.

This is not easy stuff to perform, however it may be to listen to. The off-stage trumpet produced some beautiful tenuous tones, a double-bass performed as a 'cello, a horn ventured precariously and successfully. There was spirit, wit, the surge of life in the whole thing, even when the lieutenant was being buried. Plainly it was one of the most merry funerals that ever took place.

The audience seemed to like it, and it is hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky will be encouraged to give us more new music. Much as the established fare is appreciated, one likes to sample something new now and then.

The program came to a riotous but orderly conclusion with the familiar antics of Till Eulenspiegel. Here again the performance was brilliant, and when Eulenspiegel was finally hanged everybody had to admit it was a neat job. Come to think of it, the mortality for the program was rather high, nearly equal to "Hamlet."

The program:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.
- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace: trio
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto

Prokofieff—"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60.
- I. Birth of Kije
- II. Romance
- III. Kije's Wedding
- IV. Troika
- V. Burial of Kije

Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," Op. 28.

The Stradivarius Quartet gave a recital in Memorial Hall, Wheeler School yesterday forenoon. The musicians are Wolfe Wolfinson, first violin; Bernard Robbins, second violin; Marcel Dick, viola, and Iwan d'Archambeau, 'cello.

Quartet in C-major, opus 33, No. 3 ("The Bird") .... Haydn
- Allegro moderato
- Scherzando
- Adagio
- Rondo presto

In An Old Castel .... Moussorgsky-Pochon
La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin .... Debussy-Pochon
Molly on the Sohe .... Percy Grainger
Quartet in B-flat major ("The Hunt") .... Mozart
- Allegro vivace assai
- Minuetto moderato
- Adagio
- Allegro assai

NORWOOD, MASS.
MESSENGER

[illegible]

Boston Symphony Breaks Rule

BOSTON—In connection with the American Bankers Association Convention being held the first three days of this week in Boston, on Tuesday, October 12, between five and seven o'clock, the Officers and Directors of the First National Bank of Boston will be hosts to the delegates and their guests at a recital at the Head Office of the bank by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conducting. Admission must necessarily be by ticket.

This will be the first time in twenty years that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given a recital in Boston outside of Symphony Hall. In 1917 it played at the Copley Plaza on the occasion of Major Higginson's 80th birthday; and the year before, the only time since it moved to Symphony Hall from the old Music Hall in 1900, being at the Boston Opera House, on the 300th anniversary celebration of William Shakespeare.

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1937

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTED THEM

SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

Providence Society Was Well Represented at the First Boston Symphony Concert of the Season at the Metropolitan Theatre Last Evening. Among Those to Attend Were (Top Left) Mr. Carl B. Marshall and His Daughter, Miss Meredith E. Marshall. (Top Right) Mrs. Tristram R. Coffin, Left, and Mrs. Walter S. Ball. (In Drop) Miss Kate M. White.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 11 1937

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND KOUSSEVITZKY OPEN NEW SEASON

Beethoven' Eroica and Sibelius' Second Heard At Symphony Hall

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Symphony Hall, which this week will be 37 years old, witnessed on Saturday the first evening concert of another season, once more under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The hall was filled to capacity with a crowd, conspicuously few of whom were in formal dress and there was a noteworthy sprinkling of young folk of high school and college age. This youthful note was reported evident on Friday afternoon by a representative of the orchestra's press department who was on hand to greet out-of-town critics. "This is not only the Boston Orchestra," he remarked affably, "we like to think of it as the New England Orchestra." He was told that Hartford was about to establish an orchestra, too, that, instead of belonging only to the capital city, was to be all of Connecticut's.

The evening had many lessons which could be argued toward that end. In the first place no one seemed to be there from a sense of duty either to the city of Boston or to the orchestra, but rather because they had need of the aesthetic provender that the concert supplied.

It is doubtful if the Boston Orchestra could have played as it did Saturday night without the stimulation which came to it from the audience. The higher acoustics is a two-way affair.

Two Symphonies

The simple record of the concert reduces itself to two symphonies by composers whom historical perspective may find not much farther apart than the quarter hour intermission that separated Beethoven's Third and that of Sibelius in D major. To encourage the affinity would be to remark upon the heroic mould and the uncompromising purposefulness of the two works, their breadth of vision and even the detail of spiritual relationship in the two scherzos.

The frame for this art had much to do with its potency. The physical properties of Symphony Hall are such as to challenge the orchestral palette to its boldest and its most delicate tints. Dr. Koussevitzky can have his way with the brass choir without tempering its poignancy; nor does he have to force the strings to be sure of their statement.

Understandable Music

The virtuosity of the orchestra, which Hartfod knows so well, did remarkable things with both of the mighty compositions programmed. The Eroica's last movement, which deserves to bear the title that Elgar long afterwards gave to a much more transparent composition, namely the "Enigma Variations," became cogent and powerful by the facile device of adequate presentation. Great music asks of executants nothing more than that seemingly temporizing term 'adequate.' It speaks for itself if given a chance.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his men also gave a chance to the great funeral march and to the revolutionary first movement; to the magnificent strains of Sibelius who early in his Second Symphony wrote pages that were like nothing if not mountain gods dancing in peasant costume. There were decrescendos and crescendos in the slow movement that seemed to transcend human instrumentality; and the climax of the finale which Sibelius must have known was redundent unless in the writing of it he fancied Koussevitzky's performance of it.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS
OCT 12 1937

FORTY-SIX YEARS OF MUSIC

When Dr. Koussevitzky lifted his baton last Friday afternoon to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first concert of its fifty seventh season, one familiar face was missing from among the musicians. After more than a half century of the French horn, most of it in the service of the Boston orchestra, Henry E. Lorbeer was retired recently.

We often read of long records of continuous service, in various positions, but musicians with whom Mr. Lorbeer has been associated in Boston believe that his 50-odd years must constitute close to a world's record for an instrument like the French horn. They are agreed that his continuous tenure of 46 years is the record in the Boston Symphony's history for any instrument.

Fifty-seven years are a good deal for any orchestra to achieve. But here is Mr. Lorbeer with that musical institution through all but 10 years of its life. What changes he must have seen, what variations in the trends of musical preference among the patrons since he played in his first concert, 46 years ago.

Engaged by Nikisch, the third conductor of the orchestra, who had preceded him here from Leipzig, where Mr. Lorbeer had also played under him, he played fourth horn. Then he was shifted, in the intricate composition of a symphony orchestra, to second horn where he remained more than 30 years, and finally he returned to his original position.

If Mr. Lorbeer, during the days of his retirement, were to set down his memories and observations of 46 years with the Boston Symphony, he would have a wealth of material on which to draw. When he came here, the musicians were predominantly German. Now there is a mere handful of his former countrymen. He, himself, became an American citizen years ago.

From now on, Mr. Lorbeer will take things leisurely. If ever the Symphony has occasion to play a score requiring eight French horns he will be called, but these occasions are not frequent. About the only regret he has is that, if he had stayed in Germany, he would have received from the government a much larger old age pension than he is receiving in Boston.

* * *

The Fifth Symphony in C-sharp minor of Mahler, which the composer himself regarded as a turning-point in his development as an artist, begins the program to be presented tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. There are three parts but really five movements, the first part consisting of a funeral march and as a development from it, a stormy allegro. The second part is a wild scherzo. The third part contains an adagietto, lightly instrumented, and, for close, the rondo-finale, of complicated construction, with the second theme serving for subject of a fugue.

The rest of the impending program is drawn from Wagner: the Introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger" and from "Die Walkuere," and "Ride of the Valykyries," 'Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Music." Mack Harrell will be the baritone soloist for the music of Wotan.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 13 1937

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season auspiciously with its programs of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. In the Catchall there has already been an account of the reception accorded to Dr. Koussevitzky as he took his place on the conductor's stand. As we can testify personally, there were similar scenes on Saturday evening, when the great audience rose to welcome him, tributes to the conductor and the orchestra that were renewed after each of the two symphonies which comprised the program. Boston and vicinity, clearly, has lost none of its enthusiasm for this great orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen to present two symphonies, both tried, and well-beloved compositions, the "Eroica" of Beethoven and the Second of Sibelius. Both, as it seemed to this listener, were played superbly. The heroic and elegaic nature of the former was impressive throughout as Dr. Koussevitzky interpreted it, guiding the musicians without the customary baton. The funeral march was especially fine. There was no mistaking that the audience was deeply moved by the performance.

In the Sibelius symphony Dr. Koussevitzky achieved results that brought out to the full contrasts, color and climax, a really thrilling performance. Into the music it was evident that he entered with especial sympathy and understanding of the composer's objectives. On the part of the orchestra and notably in the case of the strings, it was a virtuoso performance.

The programs for this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening include the Classic Symphony and the orchestral suite "Lieutenant Kiji" and the Russian Overture by Prokofieff, the latter for its first performance in the United States, to be followed by "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" by Strauss.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
OCT 16 1937

RECORDS

OUTSTANDING among several fine recent Victor releases is Beethoven's Sonata for 'Cello and Piano, Opus 102, No. 1, because of the wonderful slow introductions to its two movements and because of the playing of Casals, despite what appeared to be an occasional lack of balance and clarity in the recording of the two instruments (two records, $4; with album $4.50).

Chopin, I am convinced, suffers as much as Tchaikovsky from his performers. It is he who is sentimental in his least good music; it is they who sentimentalize his best, which includes some of the Polonaises recorded by Arthur Rubinstein (Victor: eight records, $16). I don't see how anyone with ears can fail to perceive the strength, the dramatic quality, as well as the loveliness, of these works, their richness and spontaneity and astonishing variety of invention. Rubinstein's playing is superb, and the recording excellent. As for Tchaikovsky, his "Romeo and Juliet" profits by a performance in which Koussevitzky for the most part does not think it necessary to make sure that we appreciate this or that detail; and the tonal splendor of the Boston Symphony is impressively recorded (Victor: three records, $6.50).

Another Victor set (two records, $4.50) offers an excellent performance of Bach's Violin Concerto in A minor by Menuhin and an orchestra under the direction of Enesco. Menuhin's playing is very fine; what it continues to lack is the impress of a commanding musical personality. And still another Victor set (three records, $6.50) offers the superb playing of the Budapest String Quartet in the rather feeble and perfunctory Quartet K 590 of Mozart, which Columbia issued recently in the performance of the Stradivarius group.

You are offered two versions of Beethoven's so-called "Moonlight" Sonata to choose from: one made by Paderewski (Victor: two records, $4.50), and one made by Egon Petri (Columbia: two records, $3); and I should choose neither. Petri's playing in the first movement is surprisingly mannered; but in this respect it is as nothing compared with Paderewski's in the other two movements, in which Petri's is very good.

Columbia has issued a set (three records, $5) of Beethoven's Quartet, Opus 18, No. 5, which I do not find very interesting, in an excellent and well-recorded performance by the Lener String Quartet. And another set (three records, $5) offers a Concerto for Viola and Chamber Orchestra arranged by Henri Casadesus from a work of Händel which is not identified. The music is enjoyable, the slow movement particularly so; the playing of the solo viola, William Primrose, is excellent; and the recording is very fine.

I heard these records in London; and, oh, the pleasure of the English Columbia's residue-free surfaces!

Mahler's Symphony Features Concert

By RUTH MARSTERS

After 23 years of interment in the archives of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's library, Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony was revivified in resplendent fashion at yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky's absorbed interest in the score was obvious to a point. To it he brought one of those rarely intensified and peculiarly electrifying readings which individualize him among conductors.

The orchestra was at its superb best through much of it.

The Funeral March with which the Symphony opens was veiled in an introspective twilight; the "Sturmisch bewegt" burst forth with torrential fury.

The tortuous Scherzo was accomplished with brilliant virtuosity.

No performance, however, could hide the irrelevancies of some of the horn passages. For one who knew the orchestra as well as Mahler is reputed to have as a conductor his sometimes seeming insensitiveness to it is difficult to understand. Perhaps it was simply that he tried to substitute a spot of color for a musical thought when his muse had momentarily escaped him.

The lovely Adagietto with which the third movement opens was exquisitely performed—the Rondo-Finale with appropriate sonority.

The audience was justified in its very apparent enthusiasm.

Dr. Koussevitzky devoted the last half of the program to Wagner.

Throughout the Introduction to Act III of "Die Meistersinger" and the excerpts from "Die Walkure," conductor, orchestra, and audience revelled in sheer tonal splendor.

"The Ride of the Valkyries," ever a favorite, was frankly enjoyed to the utmost.

"Wotan's Farewell," in which Mack Harrell assisted as soloist was slightly less effective partly because the orchestra was prone to drown out the voice. It is a very nice voice, and Mr. Harrell is evidently possessed of sensitive musicianship but he is not a dramatic baritone and the heroic score is one to which he is not best suited.

The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 18 1937

'COMMUTERS' PLAN' FOR HUB SYMPHONY

Persons May Attend Concerts Monthly under New Plan of Conductor

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra, generally regarded as the greatest and most aristocratic in the world.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—110 men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3 o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony Hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 25, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony Hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Me.; as far east as Hyannis, Mass.; as far west as Pittsfield, Mass.; as far south as New Bedford, Mass.; and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Conn. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Massachusetts.

NEW YORKER

P BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 17, 1937

SOCIAL EVENTS of the WEEK By PAULA PATTERSON

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 17 1937

Boston Symphony to Open Providence Season Tuesday

Program for Metropolitan Theatre Concert Includes Prokofieff Suite Never Heard Before in City.

LED by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence series of concerts Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre, bringing two old symphonic friends and introducing a new suite taken from a film score by a noted modern composer. This is the orchestra's 57th season and the 14th of Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership.

The suite, by the Russian, Serge Prokofieff, is an arrangement of the incidental music he wrote for the Soviet film, "Lieutenant Kije," produced in 1933. It is described as light and satirical in character and illustrates in its five movements the birth of Kije, romance, Kije's wedding, troika and the burial of Kije.

This work was first presented in America at the concert Dr. Koussevitzky gave at his first appearance of the season in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last Thursday. Likewise played were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," both of which will be repeated here Tuesday. The program follows:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major,
"Eroica," opus 55 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
IV. Finale: Allegro molto
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, opus 60 .... Prokofieff
I. Birth of Kije
II. Romance
III. Kije's Wedding
IV. Troika
V. Burial of Kije
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," opus 28.. .... Strauss

This afternoon at 4 o'clock a lecture on the Boston Symphony's program will be given by John B. Archer in the Providence Public Library. It will be illustrated at the piano by Miss Ruth Tripp. The lecture, which is under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club, is free to the public.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

OCT 19 1937

Hub Symphony Announces New "Commuters' Plan"

BOSTON, Oct. 18.—An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing or seeking single tickets for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

The new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—110. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3 o'clock.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 25, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22 and April 19.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 18 1937

COMMUTERS' PLAN FOR HUB SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PATRONS

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra, generally regarded as the greatest and most aristocratic in the world.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of twenty-four. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—one hundred and ten men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until three o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony Hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the magnificent playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 25, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

Boston Symphony's 57th season lures north shore colony to town for opening. Youthful devotees are Miss Lucille Swift, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George Swift of Commonwealth avenue, and Sydith Terrace, Beverly Farms; at right, Miss Dorothy Preston, daughter of Mrs. Harold G. Cutler, Beacon street, and Seven Pines, Beverly.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 19 1937

Catchall

The more I, a seasoned concert and theatre goer, read the critiques of Boston's musical and dramatic performances, the more I appreciate the fact that Philip Hales and H. T. Parkers don't grow on every bush. I suppose a critic, in order to command full respect, should be full of years and experience, rather than a snappy young chap with probably more than half his life before him. The trouble is that the younger men in that game feel it to be necessary to be "different" and especially to profess disdain for what pleases the million. The Romans had a word for it—"nil admirari." Now that seems to me a mistake. Once in a way, the million may actually like something genuinely good. As a matter of fact, they always have the last word anyhow. The things they continue to like are immortal. The queer things the critics profess to like are usually ephemeral. Most of all, I wonder if there can be real sincerity in the criticism which bases itself only on what the critic thinks will mark him as differing from the undiscriminating herd?

***

I noted one rather curious slip in the Boston Symphony program of last Friday-Saturday, where the commentator was speaking of the forthcoming performance of the Mahler symphony at the next ensuing concert. This titanic work has not been played at those concerts for 23 years—perhaps because of its length. But the program book went on to say: "The only Boston conductor besides Dr. Koussevitzky to perform this work was Wilhelm Gericke, who introduced it in 1906 and repeated it the same year. Dr. Muck played it twice in 1913, again in 1914." Now how can one reconcile the statement that Mr. Gericke was the only Boston conductor besides Koussevitzky to play it, with the immediately following statement that Dr. Mack played it twice in 1913 and again in 1914?

HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram

OCT 20 1937

The Wagnerian Festival Singers, who will open the Wagner concert series in Springfield tomorrow evening, made their American debut in New York's Town Hall last evening. They will open the concert season at Wellesley college on Thursday evening and will sing in Boston's Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon.

———

An important innovation has been made in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Those who cannot or do not wish to attend symphonic programs weekly may, according to the new arrangement, attend once a month on a subscription basis. These performances will comprise six paired programs instead of 24. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings or six on Tuesday afternoons, with an identical program.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: Oct. 25, Dec. 27, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday concerts are Oct. 26, Dec. 28, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, March 22 and April 19.

The arrangement was made because of the wide patronage of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Masachusetts, and many come from as far distant places as Bar Harbor, Me., and Waterbury, Conn.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 17 1937

Debutante and Brides Share Social Spotlight

Reception and Tea for Former and Pre-Nuptial Parties for Latter Enliven Past Week. Coming Week to be Busy One

By Alice E. Dyer

A VARIED and interesting program of social events occupied society's attention the past six days. First there was a reception and tea for one of the season's debutantes, then there were several pre-nuptial parties for brides-elect, afternoon meetings, followed by tea, and several luncheons, dinners and informal gatherings.

This week promises to be as busy as its predecessor. Already there is scheduled the first symphony concert of the season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday evening and another important event will be the annual supper dance of the Rhode Island Smith College Club which is to take place Friday evening at the Agawam Hunt.

* * *

4

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1937

SOCIETY PARADES AT CONCERT HALL

Music Patrons Meet for First Time This Year as Boston Symphony Plays.

EVENING GOWNS REVIEWED

Reunion of Providence First Families in Lobby of Metropolitan Is Colorful Affair

Providence society turned out in large numbers last evening for the first concert of the season presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Noted in the enthusiastic assemblage last evening were many who recently returned from extended stays at their country homes or from European trips and the gathering seemed to give the semblance of a reunion with friendly saluations frequently expressed.

During intermission the lobby was occupied with groups of music lovers attired in fashionable array which ranged from dinner gowns to the more formal evening frocks. Velvets, furred, self-trimmed or shirred; sheer chiffons, crepes, taffetas and lames were among the materials noticed in the throng. Some of the gowns were trimmed with sequins, brilliant shoulder clips of rhinestones or shot with silver and gold thread designs. Deep wine red, black, Coronation blue, autumn gold and aquamarine were some of the outstanding shades of the gowns.

Mrs. Edward D. Curtis was attired in a gown of cardinal red, the skirt was of crepe and the jacket was of matching brocade. A white fur cape added to her costume. She was accompanied by Mr. Curtis. Her sister, Mrs. Curtis B. Brooks, wore a black crepe spangled gown and a black velvet wrap. Mr. Brooks was with her. Mr. and Mrs. William S. Innis and their debutante daughter, Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis, were noted in the throng. Mrs. Innis was attired in a gown of black chiffon topped with a grey fur cape. Mrs. William Slater Allen was gowned in brown chiffon with which she wore a deep red velvet wrap.

Miss Sophie L. Mauran was gowned in black net worn over black organdie. Her gown was embroidered with flowers of red, green and white. A black wrap completed her attire. Miss Kate M. White and Miss Elizabeth G. White, twin daughters of Mrs. Nicholson White, wore black chiffon and brown chiffon dinner frocks, respectively. They were accompanied by their mother. Miss Nancy Dyer was seen wearing a finger-tip grey fur cape over a gown of grey and white printed chiffon.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Brown, Jr., attended. Mrs. Brown wore a black velvet evening wrap over a gown of black velvet. Miss Mabel B. Benedict wore a Royal blue brocaded evening coat trimmed with a brown fur collar worn over a wine color velvet dinner dress. Mrs. Gerald Wallace Harrington wore a colorful blue Japanese evening wrap embroidered with flowers and butterflies. Mr. Harrington accompanied her. Mr. and Mrs. Louis M. Ream and Mrs. Ream's daughter, Miss Eleanor Thresher, were noted in the audience. Mrs. Ream was attired in a gown of Royal blue lace with which she wore a ful cape. Miss Thresher wore a gown of black crepe made with a jacket. The bottom and the edge of the cuffs of the short-sleeve jacket were edged with gold sequins. Mrs. David Duncan wore a crepe gown of rust shade. Mrs. Eugene S. Graves was attired in black crepe over which she wore a long mink coat. Mrs. Henry C. Hart, Sr., wore a gown of black crepe and an evening wrap of blacket velvet.

Among others in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. William B. Greenough, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. William Davis Miller, Mrs. Frederic B. Read, Mr. Ashbel T. Wall, Jr., Miss Katharine Metcalf, Mrs. Frederic A. Wallace, Sr., Miss Mabel Van Norman, Mr. Malcolm G. Raworth and his daughter, Miss Roberta Raworth, Mr. and Mrs. Henry B. Gardner, Sr., Mrs. Sidney Clifford, Mrs. Hovey T Freeman, Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Preston, Mr. and Mrs. Wilson G. Wing, Mrs. Tristram R. Coffin, Mrs. Gammell Cross.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Richard Steedman, Mrs. William Gammell, Jr., Mrs. Robert H. Ives Goddard, Jr., Mrs. William Peace Hazard, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Fraser, Mrs. Henry Dyer Knight, Mrs. Nathaniel H. Gifford, Sr., Miss Jean P. Bradford, Mr. Thomas N. White, Mr. Benjamin L. Cook, Jr., and Mrs. William Kinsley Low.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

OCT 20 1937

Symphony Scores with Two Legends

Orchestra, Under Koussevitsky, Wins Audience with Sprightly Pieces.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, played its first concert of the season last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Opus 55, provided an auspicious opening number. The Allegro con brio, with its delightful insistence on the confident opening theme, the Funeral March with its restrained pathos, the exuberant Scherzo and the brilliant finale were all skillfully unfolded. In Beethoven's day this symphony marked an epoch in orchestral writing. With only two chords of introduction, it announces the themes directly. The beauty of the phrases and the unity of their exposition make this a noble tribute to the memory of a great man. When the Boston Symphony plays the "Eroica" one appreciates its depth of feeling and realizes why it has become immortal.

The Prokofieff Orchestral Suite, Opus 60, "Lieutenant Kije," is an elaboration of incidental music composed for a Soviet film. The lieutenant is a fictitious character who was created because the Czar read this impossible name into a military report. No one points out a Czar's error and so it became necessary to invent Kije. This Prokofieff does in part one of the music (Birth of Kije) by an offstage trumpet, a delicate roll of the snare drum and a shrill piccolo. The lieutenant appears with a decided military swagger and, having arrived, proceeds quickly to part two (Romance). Here a most ingratiating melody from the cellos is taken up by flutes, bassoons and celesta in interesting rhythm. Part three is Kije's Wedding, and a noisy one it was. The brass choir plays the theme in octaves and soon the smooth tone of a saxophone is heard. There is dancing and much gaiety. Part four (Troika) takes Kije for a sleigh ride with bells, castanets and muted trumpets, playing in a strong folk-dance rhythm. Part five (Burial of Kije) is a short resume of his life and he goes out as he came in, by the ruffle of the drum and the off-stage trumpet, which spins out an almost imperceptible thread of tone as the violins finish Kije for us. Prokofieff has done a delightful bit of humorous writing here and the audience appreciated this fact thoroughly. Solo players rose to acknowledge the insistent applause.

In contrast to the thin orchestration of the Russian came the Strauss number, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," Opus 28. This is also the tale of a legendary character, who went about his merry pranks with ease and agility. Till hopped from choir to choir and was never lost in the maze of beautiful tone color. He dashes through an amazing number of experiences and is brought realistically to a sad end on the gallows. The virtuosity of these musicians was fully apparent in this final number which could rarely have a more satisfactory interpretation.

The orchestra was at its customary high level of excellence and under Koussevitsky's baton they became a beautiful solo instrument on which he plays magnificently.

It is gratifying to look forward to four more concerts in the series.

R. T.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 21 1937

Boston Symphony Has Commuters' Plan

Patrons of Shorter Series Will Have Choice of Six Concerts

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be made which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra.

The concerts of the regular season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

Mr. Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—110 men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

Matinees at 3

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony Hall.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: Oct. 25, Dec. 27 Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 2, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: Oct. 26, Dec. 28, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, March 22, April 19.

Out of Town Patrons

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony Hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Maine; as far east as Hyannis, Mass.; as far west as Pittsfield, Mass.; as far south as New Bedford, Mass.; and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Conn. Subscribers are residents of 213 communities in Massachusetts.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

WAGNERIAN FESTIVAL SINGERS, at 3:30 this afternoon. A biographical item concerning this group will be found below. Their program of operatic excerpts, notably from the Wagner repertory, will include the closing trio from Gounod's "Faust," solos and duets from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Tannhaeuser," "Die Walkuere" and "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg"; Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffman," "Der Freischutz" by Weber, Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "Der Rosenkavalier" of Richard Strauss.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 8:15 tomorrow and 3 Tuesday afternoon. The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts this year will be conducted as six pairs, and the two series will share the same programs, the first of which will be as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 88; Prokofieff: Suite from incidental music to the film "Lieut Kije." Sibelius: Second Symphony.

The fourth program of the "regular" series will be played at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday, Dr Koussevitzky conducting. Walter Gieseking, the distinguished pianist who long since became a favorite hereabouts, will be soloist in the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven. This will be Mr Gieseking's first appearance at the Symphony concerts in three seasons. The Third Symphony of Albert Roussel will be played in memory of the French composer, who died in August. The program will begin with Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," a composition introduced here in 1930 and which is a tonal depiction of antique sculpture.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 24 1937

LISTENER TURNS CRITIC

Symphony Program Pace Is Called Too Fast

To the Radio Editor:

I do not agree that in the matter of radio we are getting only "crumbs." What we are actually getting is a succession of indigestible meals of quantity and not quality. Several factors have gone into the making of the present situation, such as too many broadcasts, too lengthy programs, the banal and often silly comments of announcers.

For symphonic concerts the idea seems to be to give at least eight or nine items, with the result that the performers are breathless, while the condition of the listeners is one of complete exhaustion. Instead of cutting programs in half so that everything could move along in an orderly manner, the pace is so feverish that the final chords of one number have hardly faded before the announcer is back again detailing the next item.

Now we are to have the Toscanini series. This gentleman is everywhere acknowledged as a great musician, and rightly so. However, there is more verbal nonsense indulged in about music and musical personalities than about any other subject under the sun, and in this respect Mr. Toscanini has not escaped. I dare to say that there is not one person in a million who, listening to a program broadcast by him and then being invited to listen to the same orchestra play the identical program conducted by, let us say, a Koussevitzky, a Reiner or a Klemperer, would be able to detect a particle of difference. Perhaps there are a very few people of the keenest musical perceptions who honestly could achieve this, but as for the majority of us, if we claim any such quality, we are just kidding ourselves.

Well, the plans are all made and Mr. Toscanini will shortly fire the first gun in the new tonal bombardment. To my mind, an ideal arrangement would be to have, at the most, weekly broadcasts by only two of the major orchestras. I don't care whether the conductor would be Barbirolli, Stokowski, Toscanini or any one of the other first-rank men. In this way we would all be saved from the wearying repetitions, the duplication of programs, etc., which abound under the present Barnum system, and our ears and emotions would retain their freshness and interest.

This plan would include Alfred Wallenstein and his Symphonic Strings. His broadcasts are little gems; not too long, and they usually give music of merit. In fact, Mr. Wallenstein seems to be one of the few aware that other music exists besides the overtures to "Russlan and Ludmilla," the "Magic Flute," "Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor," to mention only a few, and he makes use of his knowledge in a very refreshing manner. Also it would cut down the chances of being irritated by the constant affectations and imbecilities of announcers such as our being informed that a certain singer had sung at Baireuth, the name being pronounced as "Babe Ruth" with the second "b" omitted.

Nothing will be done to remedy the situation, of course; therefore, the only privilege left the poor listener is that of snapping off the machine when things get too bad, or, better still, not turning it on at all.

ALAN JOHNSEN.

West Reading, Pa., Oct. 21, 1937.

WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT

OCT 20 1937

BOSTON SYMPHONY ANNOUNCES PLANS

Arrangements Whereby Monthly Subscription Rate May Be Had

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitsky, world-famous conductor of the orchestra, generally regarded as the greatest and most aristocratic in the world.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening performance of an identical program.

Mr. Koussevitzy's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of twenty-four. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—one hundred and ten men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday evenings, or six on Tuesday evenings, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until 3 o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony Hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the magnificent playing the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The dates for the Monday evening concerts are: October 2, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: October 26, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony Hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Maine; as far as Hyannis, Mass.; as far west as Pittsfield, Mass.; as far south as New Bedford, Mass.; and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Conn. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Massachusetts

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 23 1937

$70,000 FOR MUSIC SHED

Project for Festival in Berkshires Still Requires $30,000

Almost $70,000 already has been contributed by some 1,000 persons to the $100,000 fund sought for the erection of a music shed to house the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival held annually at Tanglewood near Stockbridge, Mass.

Ambassador-at-Large Norman Davis, who is a Summer resident of Stockbridge, just before his recent sailing for Brussels to attend the Nine Power Conference, sent a note to the festival authorities wishing them success in financing the shed and enclosing a check for the fund.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
STAR - TRIBUNE

OCT 20 1937

MUSIC

A Seasonal Debut: The Boston Symphony Orchestra Returns to Providence with Two Old Favorites by Beethoven and Strauss and a New One From Russia by Serge Prokofieff, Well Received by An Enthusiastic Audience at the Metropolitan.

An enthusiastic Providence audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra upon their return to the Metropolitan Theatre last night, to open the 1937-38 season here, after an absence of six months. The program included two old favorites, Beethoven's Eroica Symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," by Richard Strauss. The feature however, was a brand new orchestral suite from Soviet Russia, "Lieutenant Kiji," by Serge Prokofieff, which the orchestra was playing for the second time in public.

The orchestra opened with the symphony, the third of Beethoven's nine. There is a legend that Beethoven intended to dedicate it to Napoleon and became enraged when Bonaparte made himself emperor, but this legend may be passed as it adds nothing to the music. The symphony is significant in that it is the first in which Beethoven found his individual style and divorced himself completely from his great predecessors, Haydn and Mozart.

BRILLIANT READING

Four parts make up the Eroica, the first an Allegro conbrio based on a military theme which the horns repeat throughout; the second, a dirge which sheds more and more beauty every time it is played; the third a magnifiicent scherzo for flying staccato strings with a bass brass choir in the middle, suggestive of the third movement of Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in form but not in matter; and the fourth movement, a finale that receives its verve and spirit in captivating syncopation and crisp string statements. Koussevitzky's reading, last night, was brilliant though formal, and the response of the orchestra was faultless.

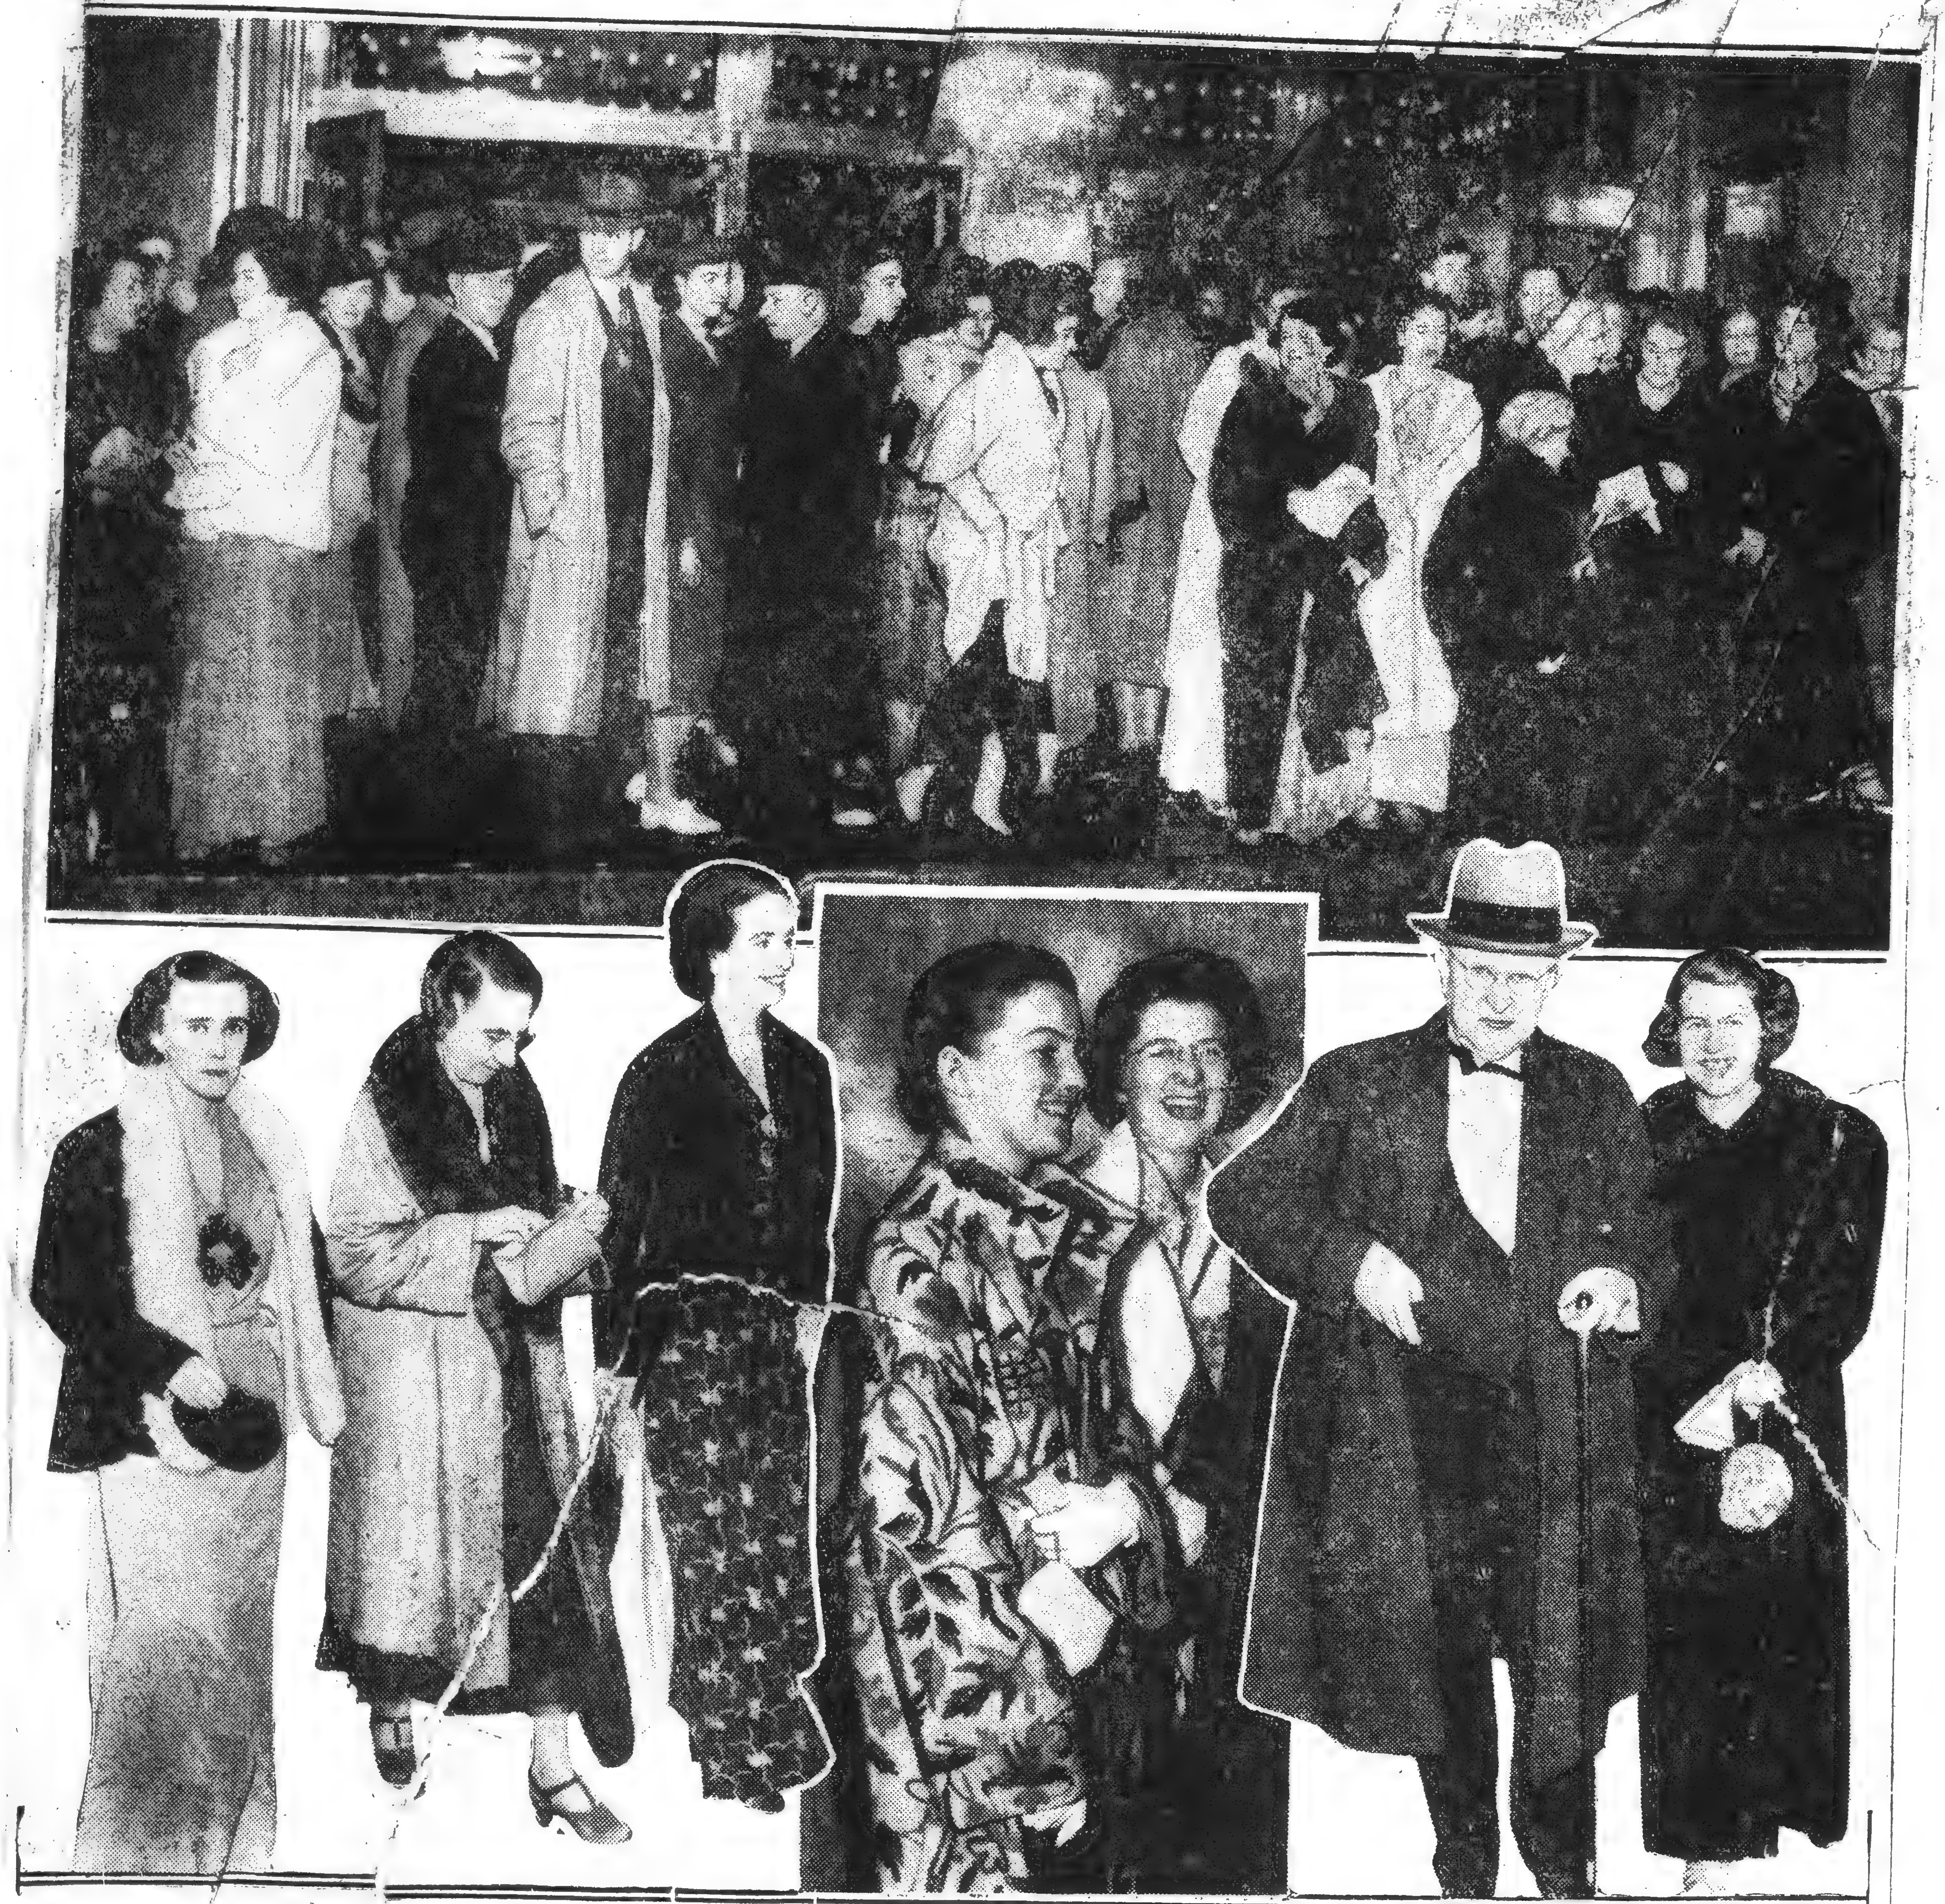
After the intermission came the new Russian work while Strauss was the conclusion. "Till Eulenspiegel" is always merry music, but it is annoying in that it daubs many melodies so pure one longs to hear their development. But Till trips away for more pranks instead, and only a framework for memory remains. The performance of this work was near sensational, yet slightly marred by the concert master, Richard Burgin, who failed to let us hear every note he was supposed to have played in his short solo violin passage.

Everybody was keyed for "Lieutenant Kiji" which received its American premiere in the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last Thursday. There was an excitement in hearing a new work, good enough at the outset for Dr. Koussevitzky to spend any time on, and this feeling crystalized into pleasure as the suite went along through its five movements which told in tone of the birth, romance, wedding, career and death of an officer whose fictitious creation was made necessary when courtiers dared not correct the error of a czar.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 20 1937

Under the Marquee: First Audience of the Concert Season



In the lower strip, a few arrivals for the Boston Symphony Concert last evening: Centre, Miss Patsy Richmond and her cousin, Miss Emily Nichols, of Portland, Or. Group left: Mrs. Richard H. Chase, Miss Helen G. Chase, Mrs. Frederic L. Chase, Jr. Pair at right: Mr. Rufus C. Fuller, Sr., and Mrs. Rufus C. Fuller, Jr.

Stylish Gowns Mark Audience at Symphony

Subscribers Attest Esteem for Dr. Koussevitzky at Concert Here

Twinkling lights on the marquee of the Metropolitan Theatre last evening flashed the message of the opening of Providence's concert season.

As the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled for their first program of 1937-38, fashionably-gowned subscribers streamed into the lobby to attest the esteem in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is held.

In the throng, formal dinner attire vied with stormy-weather costumes. "It always rains for the concerts," remarked a seasoned subscriber to the audience jamming into the theatre entrance. . . . So there were to be noted a number of women in street clothes. Miss Katharine Metcalf, a post-debutante, arrived in a black cloth coat trimmed with Persian lamb. Her hat was a youthful toque swirled with veiling.

The popularity of the fur cape as an evening wrap was exemplified by several in the audience, including Mrs. William S. Innis, who was accompanied by Mr. Innis and their debutante daughter, Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis. Whorls of blue fox draped Mrs. Innis's shoulders and underneath could be glimpsed a black sheer gown.

Miss Innis wore a black velvet wrap, highlighted by the lame of her frock that showed at the neckline.

Gray chinchilla, worn by Miss Nancy Dyer, made an attractive cape. She wore with it a satin gown of the same tone, with a printed design in white and shades of gray.

Mrs. Arthur M. Allen's cape was of taupe maribou, a foil for her clipped brown bob. Her gown was a pencil-slim model of black crepe.

One of the chunky fur jackets, sable brown, made an effective combination with a dark frock, as worn by Mrs. G. Pierce Metcalf.

At the intermission period, two sisters who chatted together, with their husbands, in the lobby were Mrs. Curtis B. Brooks and Mrs. Edward D. Curtis. The latter followed the current style of heavy jewelry by wearing long earrings with a lame and crepe gown; tawny red in tone. Mrs. Brooks was all in black. They are daughters of Mrs. Gammell Cross.

Miss Kate M. White wore a velvet mantel over a dress of black chiffon. Her twin sister, Miss Elizabeth G. White, and mother, Mrs. E. Nicholson White, also attended.

Mrs. William Slater Allen was gowned in brown chiffon with which she wore a deep red velvet wrap.

Miss Sophie L. Mauran wore black net over black organdie. Her gown was embroidered with flowers of red, green and white. A black wrap completed her attire.

AY, OCTOBER 23, 1

MAHLER'S FIFTH BIG SYMPHONY

Breath Taken Power of His Music Stirs Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A momentous revival, that of the Fifth Symphony of Mahler, took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Unheard at the Symphony Concerts since 1914, this well-named "Giant" Symphony deserves, both by reason of its intrinsic greatness and of its reception by yesterday's audience, to remain in the active repertory, to which Dr. Koussevitzky has at length restored it in a performance which proved a triumph for both composer and conductor.

IN FIVE MOVEMENTS

This C-sharp minor symphony, over an hour long, even with judicious cutting, runs in five movements and, after the manner of most of its fellows, begins in darkness and despair and rises to light and victory. The turn comes with the third movement, the Scherzo, an extraordinary blend of the graceful and the titanic, and at the conclusion of this movement yesterday there was applause, unacknowledged by the conductor, but wholly justified on psychological grounds.

There was applause, too, if here less warranted, after the ineffably tender Adagietto, scored with such consummate skill for strings and harp. And if the concluding movement, in which enormous contrapuntal complexity is wedded to breath-taking power, did not provoke quite the degree of tumult which some would have liked to see, there were three recalls for the exhausted conductor and enough of genuine and unmistakable enthusiasm to justify not only the performance of this symphony, but also to warrant in advance that of the others which we either do not know or have been allowed to forget.

Belongs With Giants

There still is, and no doubt for a long time will be, a Mahler question. Although he has been dead 26 years, Mahler as composer is still on the firing line, where all the giants of the past have had to stand until their right to place in the musical Pantheon was assured. There are those who would place Mahler in the exalted company of Bach and Beethoven, Mr. Mengelberg, for example, and there are those who would exclude him entirely from the company of the elect.

The crux of the matter seems to be that Mahler's music cannot always be listened to just as music; and some will not, or cannot, hear music in any other way. "It was humanity revealed," once wrote a former member of our orchestra, Allan Lincoln Langley, of his own gradual conversion to the Mahler cause, "with no lies, no extenuations, no hyprocrisy, no omissions. Beauty shone out fully as often as it does in human affairs; banality was there to torture, and disappoint to corrode. It was all in the music—one felt Mahler a kinship to the oraclar confessor, Walt Whitman: 'I am the man—I suffered, I was there.'"

Followed by Wagner

After so overpowering and exciting an experience as that offered by this Symphony and its almost unbelievably vivid and compelling projection at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men, any other music, even that of Wagner himself, might easily come as an anti-climax. And it was Wagner who yesterday unoccupied this unenviable place, with the Introduction to Act III of "Die Meistersinger," The Ride of the Valkyries, and Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Music from "Die Walkuere."

Mack Harrell, who yesterday was voice to Wotan, sang with artistry, polish and beauty of tone, but scarcely with the requsite authority and dramatic force. The orchestral performance was superb here as elsewhere, though the propriety of placing the Valkyrie's Ride on the programme of a Symphony Concert may be questioned, effective as those pages are in the opera house.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Revival of Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony yesterday afternoon was, from a purely musical point of view, the first "notable event" of the new Boston Symphony season. This vast and anomalous work had gone unheard here for more than 23 years—since Dr Muck conducted it in February, 1914, for the third and last time during his career at Symphony Hall.

Since the Symphony takes about an hour and 10 minutes to play—even with the several brief cuts made by Dr Koussevitzky—selection of the remainder of the program was a delicate matter. Dr Koussevitzky for the thousandth time showed his tact and skill by choosing three short Wagnerian excerpts: the Introduction to Act III of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkuere," and from the same music-drama of the "Ring," "Wotan's Farewell" and the "Magic Fire Music." The part of Wotan was sung by Mack Harrell, a young baritone living in Boston. This was his debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony.

Word that the hall was sold out, received before the concert began, suggested that Wagner more than Mahler was responsible. Yet the cordiality with which the Fifth Symphony was received tempts one to revise his opinion. There was spontaneous applause after the scherzo and the slow movement; at the end the audience applauded with more than customary warmth, and there were a few cries of "Bravo"! No doubt many present were, like this reviewer, making first acquaintance with the Fifth Symphony of a man whose music as a whole is little known here.

In a sense the concert ascended Olympus with Mahler and dwelled on the summit with Wagner. There is perhaps no more disputable or fascinating creative personality in modern music than that of Gustav Mahler. He aspired to write gigantic masterpieces illumined by soaring visions. He rivaled Richard Strauss in his command of writing brilliant polyphony for large orchestra. Not only did he absorb the technic of the masters, whose music he conducted, but he possessed an original voice of his own, a voice particularly conspicuous when Mahler's mind was occupied with fantasy or with sorrow and thought of death. In the "Lied von der Erde" he penned a searing spiritual testament which will remain a solitary masterpiece.

But elsewhere, as the truth now seems, Mahler's visions were sometimes almost earthbound by the bombast and commonplace speech which lie adjacent to magnificent passages. It was not a case of temporarily vanished inspiration, evidently, but rather a complex mind which did not possess the qualities of pure creative genius. Wagner wrote to just such excessive length as did Mahler, but the vitality and rich substance of Wagner's music almost abscure his prolixity. With Mahler that is unfortunately not always true.

The immensity of Mahler's vision, despite his flawed speech, nevertheless does account for the grandeur of many pages. The second half of the first songful theme in the funeral march of the Fifth Symphony might be a revival hymn, but the use to which Mahler puts it lends astonishing power. The second movement looks upward, the adagietto is ineffably tender. And there is great music in portions of the finale. Strangely enough, Mahler's originality was apparently not "developed"; it appears in such measures as the "Hunter's Funeral" of the First Symphony—which bears some resemblance to touches at the end of the second movement of the Fifth; the beginning of the last movement in the "Lied von der Erde" is prophesied in the first measures of the Fifth Symphony adagietto.

Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra performed the whole program marvelously. No other word would do. This was orchestral virtuosity and interpretive discernment at its greatest. The audience must have heard the "Ride of the Valkyries" many times, yet how fresh it sounded taken little faster than usual and played by a first-rank orchestra. The instrumentation was said to be Wagner's original in both "Die Walkuere" excerpts, and not the somewhat condensed version commonly used. It proved that even more strings than the Boston Symphony sections are necessary to balance increased woodwinds and brasses.

Mr Harrell sang Wotan's music beautifully, holding his own well enough against a large orchestra which, placed on the same level with the singer, must inevitably dim the vocal tone. C. W. D.

ARTHUR FIEDLER'S FATHER TO GIVE VIOLIN RECITAL

Seventy-eight-year-old violinist Emanuel Fiedler, father of Arthur Fiedler, leader of the Symphony Pop concerts, will give a recital tomorrow at 8:15 o'clock in Jordan Hall, playing Hebrew, gypsy and Hungarian melodies.

His daughter, Elsa, concert pianist, will accompany him. The program also will include Tania Turk, German soprano; Carl Barth, Symphony cellist, and Basil Prangaurish, viola.

Mr Fiedler was concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 20 years and also concert master of the Berlin Opera Comique.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 17 1937

Considers Music Real Human Need

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less—a necessity."

The words were spoken in tones of deep conviction by Serge Koussevitzky, great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will lead the orchestra in a program opening with Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony at the Metropolitan Theatre next Tuesday evening. His eyes flashed as he went on to say:

"Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy.. Their greatest music is the utterance which that experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express wtihin the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians, and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

The reporter reflected that in this statement Koussevitzky unintentionally was giving an insight into his own genius. His extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation in his conducting were forcefully hinted by the mental grasp and emotional sensibility which he revealed as he talked.

SYMPHONY CONCERT
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Prokofieff....Classical Symphony Op. 25
Prokofieff..."Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
Prokofieff.....Russian Overture Op. 72
Strauss......"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24
Strauss......."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28

On the surface this was a most peculiar concert, though in practice so unusual a program worked out very well indeed. Each of the Prokofieff works was quite different from the other, and the Strauss tone poems were likewise contrasted. It would be specious reasoning to say that you tired of one composer under such circumstances. It was, in fact, a stimulating program which was a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky's flair for contrivance in this field.

The program, with meticulous accuracy, stated that the "Lieutenant Kije" suite was played for the first time in Boston and the Russian Overture for the first time in America. We assume that the exception was made in the first instance because it had been played in Cambridge, Thursday night. Our general conclusion about these new works is that the overture has something permanent to offer in a limited department and that the suite needs a little more of the film than the program notes can convey.

"Lieutenant Kije" is entertaining music and only just falls short of standing on its own feet. As might be expected, it is on the thin side and full of repetitions that would be more effective when illustrating action. The "Romance" is mawkish; but the rest of the suite passes the time agreeably. No doubt the composer was justified in putting it together on that basis. For once it was good fun to listen to music about birth and death—and even transfiguration—that has flippancy and a touch of the mock heroic. Unquestionably it was enjoyed by the audience, thought it is possible to doubt whether further performances would enhance its qualities. The playing by the solo instruments was excellent in this piece. There were so many that Dr. Koussevitzky could only single out Mr. Kunze for the long double-bass solo.

The Russian Overture must have been conceived intentionally as a grandiose work. It is bombastic without being offensive. Prokofieff has written more exciting music than this in the Scythian Suite; but this overture, composed so much later, is more formal. It has something of the same barbaric splendor, but is less mystical and more orderly. We mentioned earlier that the overture may well have a permanent place in symphonic repertoire. This place could only be something on the order of that maintained by Berlioz's Roman Carnival Overture, in other words a short work of rather violent beauty.

Both the Strauss tone poems sounded particularly well yesterday. "Till Eulenspiegel" was played with incomparable deftness, with just the precision and rapidity of contrast that it requires. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were also in the vein for "Death and Transfiguration." There is no need to write about "Till"; it is there for all to enjoy, one of Strauss's most effective compositions. "Death and Transfiguration," on the other hand, has not much to offer a listener who is familiar with "Thus Spake Zarathustra." The later work is more inspired along somewhat the same lines, and its vulgarity (for that is one of the charms of Strauss's music) is more unashamed. In "Death and Transfiguration" we find more pretension and less skill. It stands, in the list of Strauss's works midway between the best and the worst. Yesterday, too, the marvellous interpretation cast it in a sympathetic light.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mahler's Symphony No. 5 and three works of Wagner will be heard.

TH

Dolores

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT
By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The third regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Mack Harrell, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the following program:

Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor..Mahler
Introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger".......................Wagner Ride of the Valkyries...........Wagner
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music from "Die Walkuere" Act 3.....Wagner

Mahler's Fifth Symphony had an amazingly cordial reception from yesterday afternoon's audience. This was a good sign first because it floated the rather lop-sided genius of Mahler for once on an even keel and, second, because it was a credit to the attentive powers of the audience. You cannot call the Friday afternoon public stuffy—and there used to be regrettable sneers on that head—if it is going to take Mahler to its bosom. For still another reason was the sincere applause a good sign, in that it was recognition of the extraordinary and successful efforts of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky to give the Symphony a faithful and inspired performance.

When this is said, we must return to our first point: an opinion of the merits of this symphony and of Mahler as a composer. No doubt the works of Mahler might have stood a better chance of success if it had not been for the persistent camp of devoted admirers, who could see nothing wrong with their idol. On the other hand the symphonies might have suffered complete neglect if it had not been for their propaganda. Still Mr. Burk could have spared us some of the ravings of the fanatical Paul Stefan. Our first point about the reception of the Fifth Symphony, however, was that for once it seemed to be appreciated on its own merits and not for what zealous admirers had said about it. Mahler himself would most likely have been proud of such understanding and such a performance.

For all that is remains a distinctly uneven work. The first section, or the first two movements, as you prefer, is magnificent music. Here Mahler, though long, was not laborious. The scherzo, to our mind, is not an effective movement. It has its brilliant pages scattered among the bad. The adagietto is for strings and harp and consists in one long and self-perpetuating melodic line. It might perfectly well go on all night and for us did, in fact, continue its mood of sentimental revery quite long enough. The finale is an example of what some call Mahler's profundity, but which can also be described as nothing more than massiveness, complexity and bombast.

The work of preparation for this long symphony — it lasts over an hour—was done with a high degree of intelligence. Mahler was justly suspicious of the virtuoso conductor and frequently put sarcastic exclamation points after the directions in the score. In this instance, however, the score was realized with remarkable fidelity, if a few reasonable cuts be excepted The orchestral playing was superb In particular the brass deserves great credit and, among them, Mr. Mager for his excellent trumpet work. Dr. Koussevitzky should receive the highest praise for his untiring efforts.

Just why Wagner should be considered the ideal composer to follow Mahler is a mystery. The introduction to Act 3 of "Die Meistersinger" is in the same mood as the adagietto from the Mahler Symphony. Mr. Harrell is a good singer of Lieder, but has not yet the experience or the feeling for dramatic music. Thus Wotan's Farewell was sung intelligently and not much more. Dr. Koussevitzky did little to temper the orchestra to the singer. Moreover his interpretations of Wagner seldom have an authentic ring. Why this is would take someone with intimate knowledge of and affection for the music-dramas to answer. There is no exact phrase with which to hit off a sense of disappointment yesterday; it was simply a foreign Wagner. Unpredictably enough, yesterday's hero was Mahler.

DRAMATIC PAGE

NN MU

NEW MUSIC A LEADER'S PROBLEM

The News of the World of Music

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THOSE who have followed the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past few years may have observed a gradual falling off in the number of new pieces played each season. For this growing shortage of novelties three reasons may be given: (1) that Dr. Koussevitzky is losing his own interest in the contemporary musical scene; (2) that he has been urged to go a little easier with modern music, and (3) that he finds less and less music which in his opinion is worthy of his and the orchestra's attention.

This last view of the case seems the most reasonable one, since Dr. Koussevitzky gives no other sign of slowing down, and the make-up of the programmes is supposed to be strictly his own affair. Moreover, other conductors are complaining that the supply of worthwhile novelties is running lower and lower. In New York the other day John Barbirolli, now beginning his second season as director of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, expressed himself freely on the matter to an interviewer from the Times.

After two months' reading of some 300 new scores by American, French, English, Italian, Russian and other composers, Mr. Barbirolli found music "that shows ingenuity and first-rate craftsmanship," but no "works of real talent, music that had something to say in its own right and said it with distinction and individuality." He will, of course, play some new music, every conductor must, including a composition by a 24-year-old American, Gardner Read, who won the first prize of $1000 offered by the Philharmonic Symphony Society for a major orchestral work. And he spoke with enthusiasm about a new Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, by the Hungarian, Bartok.

Mr. Barbirolli regretfully recalled conditions three decades ago (a convenient generalization) when men like Strauss, Debussy, Ravel and Stravinsky were at the height of their powers. Elsewhere in the interview he referred to Sibelius, here omitted, as a living composer who had produced great music.

It may be that the present crop of music is as empty as Mr. Barbirolli finds it. Even those less in a position to judge might hazard a similar opinion, but in the matter of music fresh from the composer's pen it is always easy to go wrong. In August, 1904, Sir Henry Wood offered at a promenade concert the first London performance of Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," now universally hailed as a masterpiece, yet the reviewers could see nothing in it and this remark from one of them is here quite pertinent: "As to the undiscovered genius, there appears to be good reason why he cannot be found. He simply does not exist, although there are plenty of clever imitators of current styles.

* * * *

In ancient times, we are told, there were three conductors presiding over what were held to be the three greatest orchestras in the world. Now it chanced that one of these, being especially zealous in the service of Apollo, decided that he would bring his art to great multitudes through the medium of the speaking pictures. And another, no less devoted, lent his mighty gifts to those who dispensed music freely through the air. But the third remained faithful to his own orchestra, diligently perfecting it, until it was widely said that the world had never before known its like. And of the three, Apollo judged that this one had served him the most worthily.

Sonority Rules the Symphony Concerts

By RUTH MARSTERS

Music Editor

Oct. 24 37

THE self-contain of a Boston Symphony audience was shattered this week when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Orchestra in a program of Mahler and Wagner in the third pair of Friday and Saturday concerts.

Certainly there was that in the tirelessly painstaking and zealously inspired reading the conductor brought to Mahler's Fifth Symphony in C minor on Friday afternoon which must have electrified the most apathetic.

This Symphony, rightly called the "Giant" Symphony in view of its stupendous proportions, had not been performed here since February, 1914. The success of its revival is due to a large extent to the quality of the performance itself.

How sustained in intensity it appeared through all its length! How glowing even its irrelevancies sounded! With what ingenuity the line was curved around the empty spots!

Not that the Symphony itself is without its singular merits.

* * *

IF MAHLER did not here achieve his ideal, it will generally be conceded that he achieved greatly none the less. The music, it is true, bears the stamp of a personality whose many facets never quite integrated into any specific pattern, and whose aims, accordingly, quite often exceeded his talents.

That he did not succeed in building a new Valhalla cannot be attributed solely to the fact that he too often stopped to dream by the way. On the other hand, though he appears to have tried to "mount upon his own head" according to Zarathustra's advice, he never quite reached the Nietchean depths.

The Dead March which opens the C minor Symphony is not without a pathos and beauty of its own. But it is too introspective to be as majestic as its orchestration would seem to intend.

The second part of the first movement, "Sturmisch bewegt," affords a first glimpse of the "storm and stress" which pervade the extraordinary Scherzo which follows.

Here indeed frenzy reaches a fine fury! The amazing proportions of this Scherzo would be sufficient to set it apart from all other.

The gentle loveliness of the Adagietto is of course doubly effective in contrast. It was exquisitely played, illiciting the always unusual applause between movements when the noisier movements had not.

The Rondo-Finale which concludes the altogether stupendous structure is perhaps the least interesting—perhaps we were just tired.

* * *

THE INTRODUCTION to Act III of "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," "The Ride of the Valkyries," "Wotan's Farewell and Fire Music" to which the last half of the program was devoted were given performances so splendidly, and at times so overwhelmingly sonorous, as to amount to sheer tonal revelry.

The soloist, Mack Harrell, sang Wotan's Farewell with sensitiveness. His voice, though of fine quality, lacks the weight necessary for this particular score. There was accordingly a lack of the heroic quality requisite to its performance.

MUSIC NEWS

Continued From Page 13

Seven years ago Dr. Koussevitzky introduced to us a Corsican composer, Henri Martelli, whose "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" seemed the music of one who had something to say. This individual composition will be repeated at the concerts of this week, and immediately after it will come the Third Symphony, in G minor, of Albert Roussel, as a memorial to the composer, who died last August. Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, with Walter Gieseking as the pianist, will be the concluding number.

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon will come the first of the now paired supplementary concerts. The programme for both will comprise a Symphony of Haydn, in G minor, No. 88, and two compositions already heard at the regular concerts, Prokofieff's music for the film, "Lieutenant Kije" and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

* * * *

To Symphony Hall this afternoon come the five vocalists who style themselves the Wagnerian Festival Singers: Hilda Konetsni, soprano; Martha Krasova, contralto; Henk Noort, tenor; Joel Berglund, baritone, and Alexander Kipnis, bass. To the two piano accompaniments of Richard Hageman and Karl Young they will offer airs and duets from "Tannhauser," "Die Meistersinger," "Rienzi," and "Die Walkuere" and also from "The Tales of Hoffman" "Der Freischuetz," "Don Giovanni," and "Der Rosenkavalier" with a trio from "Faust" for conclusion.

Tchaikovsky's Third Symphony, in D major, played here for the first and last time in December, 1899, will be heard this evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, in the third of a series of concerts by the State Symphony Orchestra, under Alexander Thiede, in which all of Tchaikovsky's symphonies are being played. At this concert Heinrich Gebhard will bear the piano part in a performance of Loeffler's "A Pagan Poem." The remaining number will be Dvorak's "Carnival Overture."

* * * *

Saturday afternoon at Jordan Hall, and the following afternoon as well, the Vienna Choir Boys will reappear in characteristic programmes of sacred and secular choral numbers, with an operetta in costume as special feature. On Saturday the operetta will be one based on music of Johann Strauss, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," and on Sunday, Offenbach's "Monsieur et Madame Denis."

* * * *

Emanuel Fiedler, 78-year-old violin virtuoso and the father of Arthur Fiedler, will be heard in a concert at Jordan Hall this evening, accompanied by his daughter, Elsa Fiedler, pianist. Also participating are Tania Turk, soprano, recently arrived from Germany; Carl Barth, 'cellist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Basil Prangoulis, viola. Mr. Fiedler will play Hebrew, Gypsy and Hungarian melodies.

23

Mahler's Fifth Symphony and Excerpts from Wagner

Trans. Oct 23/37

Wagner Numbers Thrill the Audience. Audience Is Deeply Interested in Mahler's Composition

By Redfern Mason

When music is completely explainable, it is second rate. But that rarely happens, for the composer, when deeply moved, reaches a point in which emotion loses itself in mysticism. Even the distinctly fleshly Wagner, in the glorious "Wotan's Farewell," which concluded yesterday afternoon's concert of the Symphony, makes the instruments say things that no words can utter.

It is Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony, the one in C sharp minor, that provokes these remarks. For Mahler had the temerity, on occasion, to tell people what his music meant. But the explanation did not explain and worse than that, it brought on a flood of comment that made "confusion worse confounded."

The right thing to do, in face of a new work, is not to read the program notes until after the performance. In the meantime you question your soul and ask what the composition has done to you. Then you can compare your impressions with those of the annotator.

One thing is sure. Mahler's symphony is stirring and sometimes beautiful, though the beauty lacks the aristocratic note of, say, Mozart, and the almost fatalistic throb of Beethoven.

Mahler was long winded. His symphony lasted an hour or thereabouts. But interest was sustained throughout. As in Beethoven's Fifth the composer is man battling with Fate, or at least interrogating his soul about the why and the wherefore of "this unfathomable world." The exordium is funereal; the second movement stormy; then there is an embattled Scherzo. Manifestly Mahler's cogitations did not make him happy, and he tells his mental troubles with extraordinary diversity of orchestral vividness. Here is ingenuity; here is learning, but they are the cleverness and the erudition of a Thomas Carlyle, to take a parallel from literature. Of Carlyle, Emerson once wrote that Carlyle was "a trip hammer with an Aeolian attachment." The phrase rather fits Mahler. His music is of the plebs; there is little of the patrician aboutit. A German would call his music "volksthumlich," meaning that it smacks of the folk.

After the Scherzo comes a pathetic Adagietto, in which Mahler seems to have lost heart. He would fain, like Cleopatra, indulge "immortal longings"; but finds himself mourning over a lost Paradise. In the Finale he takes heart of grace; he almost seems to believe, with Robert Louis Stevenson, in "the ultimate decency of things." There is even a suggestion of the chorale at the close. But the work as a whole does not encourage eternal illusions. Mahler hopes that all may be for the best, but he is by no means sure.

It was a relief, after the intermission, to listen to the glorious sounds of the introduction to the third act of "Die Meistersinger." We share the bitter sweet of old cobbler Sach's musing. After all

'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all.

and Richard had as many adventures in the Land of Heart's Desire as most of us, and no better love music than his has ever been written. To those horns we are indebted, likewise to the 'cello, that "sentimental uncle" of the orchestra.

Then came the Walkurenritt. Old Hans Richter, that demigod of Wagnerian conductors, established my ideal of this mythological "Ride." Would Serge Koussevitzky disappoint me? One fears the worst; but, at least, one can hope for the best. And, by all the gods of Asgard, the Russian rose to the top gallant of his genius and gave us a reading that I shall cherish alongside that of the tremendous old Saxon. The brass had the right Berseker note; the squealing of the reeds in those descending chromatic runs had an eerie deviltry about them. I could, in imagination, hear Flagstad chanting her "Hoyotoho." But this is perhaps unduly personal.

For the "Wotan's Farewell" we had Mack Harrell for soloist and, alas! there was no Brunnhilde, no scenic decor, none of the illusion of opera. If there had been I think people would have thought better of Mr. Harrell's singing than did some of the passersby. Mr. Harrell has a good voice; he sings with good enunciation and he puts feeling into the tone. If he is not a wounded god, like Friedrich Schorr, let it be remembered that many more years have passed over Schorr's head than over that of the young American. Schorr has so completely mastered technique that he obeys its laws without thinking about the matter. Harrell is technically self-conscious, and consequently the words sometimes lost the note of conviction. But he has youth on his side, and it is not inconceivable that we may yet hear him sing Wotan in our Boston Opera House.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins Monday Concert Series

By Moses Smith

The program, well assembled, that served to open the extra series of Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall last night was to be repeated in its exact form this afternoon for the beginning of the Tuesday matinee series. The consolidation of the two series, now undertaken, is probably a good thing, since it will cut down, to a certain extent, the labors of conductor and musician, while affecting few, if any, of the listeners adversely.

The audience of last night, a good company substantially filling the hall, seemed somewhat larger than that of last season and was so, according to conveyed information. It heard and applauded with enthusiasm practically impeccable performances of the Haydn Symphony in G major (No. 13 in the Breitkopf and Haertl listing); Prokofiev's Suite, drawn from his music for the Soviet movie, "Lieutenant Kije," and the Second Symphony of Sibelius.

The orchestral playing was of such a quality throughout the contrasting numbers of the program as to prompt the observation that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has never sounded better, certainly not within ready memory. The brilliance, sonority and virtuoso technic of this superlative group has for some years been a source of wonder at home and afield. But the orchestra seems this season actually to improve from concert to concert.

Similarly the conductor has apparently not exhausted his possibilities. We have been familiar, through thirteen years, with the freshness and exuberance of spirit with which he approaches each performance of a work, not matter how frequently it has been played before. But there was in his version of the Haydn Symphony last night not only the gaiety and sentiment of that charming work but also a classic poise which it has not always enjoyed at his hands. The result was a masterpiece of expression.

Prokofiev's humorous score sounded just as good as on first hearing. The Sibelius Symphony emerged in splendor.

Interesting Symphony Program; Mr. Stokowski's Debut

Oct. 24 23

Herald

By ALEXANDER W. WILLIAMS

There will be two interesting revivals of modern scores next Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall and, for the second part of the program, a distinguished visitor who has too long been absent from Boston. It may seem longer, since Walter Gieseking last played with the Boston Symphony, than April, 1935, when he was the soloist in the Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2. Some people thought it was an odd choice for a pianist whose surpassing ability was for polish and refinement of interpretation. Nevertheless he won an extraordinary ovation for a brilliant performance. Indeed the appause was so great that he gave an encore, playing Strauss' Serenade. At the time this caused considerable burrowing in the files to discover when the precedent had been broken before (by Paderewski in 1916), and there was some shaking of heads by the purists. In Mr. Gieseking's defense it should be said that he gave the encore as the result of a ludicrous verbal misunderstanding back-stage. It is unlikely that it will happen again.

Curiously enough on that occasion Mr. Gieseking's appearance came after the Roussel Symphony in G minor, which will be revived on next Friday's program. The third work is a revival of Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs." Martelli was born in 1895 in Corsica; and this work, which was written in 1928 and first played in the U. S. by the Boston Symphony in 1930, was inspired by four special bas-reliefs. The composer wrote to Mr. Hale: "These bas-reliefs, which are the expression of an art purely Assyrian, essentially realistic, enlivened halls of royal palaces. Faces are portrayed with great precision, and so it has justly been remarked that the idealistic solemnity which distinguishes so much of the Egyptian is found wholly lacking in the art of Assyria."

We ought not to have to say much on the subject of the late Albert Roussel's works, for they have been spoken of in high praise many times in these columns. Dr. Koussevitzky even went so far as to place this Third Symphony on a conservative Tuesday program not long ago. Although it does not sound stridently modern to ears accustomed to the varied fare at the regular concerts, we must confess that the Tuesday audience did not show any great enthusiasm. We once heard the Symphony conducted by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic, and the Friday afternoon audience there was apathetic. Boston, at the regular concerts, has been on the whole very friendly.

The Third Symphony is not an easy work to grasp at a first hearing, though it is certainly not exceptionally difficult. Arthur Hoeree, excerpts from whose forthcoming biography of Roussel have appeared in the latest issue of the Revue Musicale, divides the composer's works into four periods and allows him a unifying strain. It was Roussel's own belief that his latest works did not mark an abrupt cleavage with his earlier. Such as it is, then, this last period began with the Suite in F and continued through the Fourth Symphony, the "Rapsodie Famande" and the Trio and Cello Concerto, which were his last compositions. The Third Symphony has a good deal of gaiety in it, though not so much as the Fourth. At any rate it is an impressive and independent creation, which should be listened to with the closest attention.

Changing the subject from our own orchestra's prospects, we way take this opportunity to record our impression of Mr. Leopold Stokowski's recent aaventures in Hollywood. It will be recalled that the Philadelphia conductor has had his eye on the film capital for some time. We need only mention the appearance of Mr. Bing Crosby with the Philadelphia Orchestra in a broadcast in 1936. This was doubtless a good contact. Next Mr. Stokowski conducted an orchestra in a film; and now he emerges as a real live screen star in "100 Men and a Girl." Such is the reward of ambition and shrewd planning!

Let not his admirers take alarm that the conductor will be submerged in the other 99 men. No, he is the glamorous leader of a crack orchestra. He lives in a superb mansion, he is surrounded by obsequious menials, and on pain of death is anyone admitted to one of his rehearsals. Only the 15-year-old heroine, Miss Deanna Durbin, is successful in bearding the lion. This is Mr. Stokowski's big chance as a screen actor. It is all very well for him to wave the famous hands at a surprisingly metallic orchestra. We wish to hear the hero speak, either to demolish Miss Durbin in a voice of thunder or to accede with honeyed graciousness to her request that he conduct her father's orchestra of unemployed musicians. But he does neither. He complains gloomily about how much work he has to do; he is even petulant in an Olympianly remote manner.

We own that we were much more impressed in this picture with a truly remarkable music editor. This oily gentleman wormed a story out of Miss Durbin—only on the telephone, mind—about Mr. Stokowski and the unemployed orchestra. The magnificence of his office at first led us to believe that he was the publisher, but the paper's telephone operator put us wise to his real position. In any event, after getting the facts from Miss Durbin, he rushed into the city room and commanded the boys to stop all the presses. This was done, and that evening his story was plastered over the front page. The great man even remembered to instruct an underling to send a box of candy to Mr. Stokowski's supposed secretary. There, if you ask us, is a hero!

Symphony; Ba

Walter Gieseking, celebrated pianist, who will be the soloist at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall this week. He will play Beethoven's 5th concerto.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 24 1937

SIBELIUS 'READINGS'

Gentle Admonition to "Early Erroneous Commentators" on the Symphonies

By OLIN DOWNES

A VOICE, gently admonitory, raises itself from the pages of a recent program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, warning ~~readers~~ that the conclusions of "early commentators" who found the Second symphony of Jean Sibelius expressive of Northern nature, legend, revolution, and what not of the same sort, should be taken with a grain of salt. How does anybody know that Sibelius was thinking of these things when he wrote the Second symphony? As a matter of fact, he probably wasn't. How do we know that he probably wasn't? Because, as it transpires, a considerable part of the Second symphony was written by Sibelius, not when he was roving the wilds of Karelia, but when he was sojourning, in the Spring, in sunny Italy.

This shows how careful Northern composers should be when they write symphonies. A composer born in Finland who goes to Italy had better be careful. If he doesn't, he'll find that he has composed "Il Trovatore." The men who discuss his symphonies had better go slow too, or they will find that just when they thought Sibelius's orchestra was muttering of war and Northern Lights it was really depicting moonlight pouring down upon the Villa d'Este. And anybody with any sense would know that Sibelius wouldn't write like Sibelius if he were in the land of the Villa d'Este. His style would then become that of Monteverdi. It's lucky that he missed Naples, else we might have had hymns with guitar accompaniment to dolce far niente.

* * *

What music criticism needs, in the above and similar connections, is debunking. Why should music be construed to mean anything? What have a composer's race, past, environment or individual temperament to do with his creations? Every thoughtful and educated person knows that great art is international, and great music—just music. Sibelius has no more to do with Finland and the North than Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony, with its alleged Slavisms and wails of despair, has to do with the nation that begot Dostoievsky, or Beethoven's Fifth with that composer's ethical or temperamental reactions to his epoch. The Fifth symphony is simply music, and it is a pity that Schindler's legend of fate knocking at the door was ever promulgated. These people who find "meanings," scenes, dramas in music!

What is music, then? Music is a wonderful arrangement of tones in certain positions and patterns which for reasons we have not successfully analyzed gives us a certain esthetic pleasure—that is, if we are really cultivated people. We then derive from it, as the Greek philosopher said, a gentlemanlike joy. This orderly and symmetrical arrangement of the tones takes our minds off the real and urgent problems of existence and lifts us above them. Listening, we may soar off and take our Olympian ease in a non-existent land of abstractions, and pity those ignorant, sentimental fellows who are neither culturally nor temperamentally capable of rising above the human equation and the fairy story in art. But Beethoven knew better, and this knowledge is what gives his music universality. Wagner knew it, too, and likewise the youthful Sibelius.

* * *

We—the editorial we—that is to say, in this case, good old Downes—should be glad to know these things and to stand corrected, for "we" were among the erroneous "early commentators." What is worse, we are unregenerate. While we are not yet limping, purblind, or of a hoary gray hue, we persist in discovering the elemental Northern and magnificently ancestral thing in Sibelius's compositions, at least of the early symphonies and symphonic poems. These appear to us inalienable and unmistakable characteristics of the music. Nor can we easily believe that persons normally responsive to music, with any degree of imagination—a faculty still applicable to that art—and with even a little blood in their veins, can fail to find something of that spirit in the scores.

Whatever its form, music emanates from sources inseparable from the individual and the things deepest and truest in his personality. One or another aspect of the personality may be uppermost at the moment of creation and find expression in a manner that seems incongruous with various factors of the moment. Schubert, nearing his end penniless and in need, shouts his praise to the skies. Beethoven, in the terrible years of the Heiligenstadt Will, creates one of his most joyous works. It is none the less a true emanation of himself, a moment of triumph snatched from the very jaws of tragedy.

Proof and not contradiction of this principle is supplied by Sibelius's frequent denial of the intention of Northern nature-painting in his scores. He says that he writes simply the music that comes to him, and perfects it as well as he may in putting it on paper. That is what every composer does. It is not the business, and in many cases it is not in the power, of the composer to explain himself, although it should be said here that when composers such as Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, Debussy have explained themselves they have not done so in terms of abstract art, but in very vivid word-pictures of dramatic or poetic conceptions. When the composer, like a Beethoven, is not given to self-analysis or explication, it may well be the province and usefulness of outsiders to do him and his music this genuine service.

* * *

Sibelius, his birth and background being what they are, would have written the music he has written whether it had been composed in Florence or at Niagara Falls. If he had been born in America and come of Finnish ancestry, and lived his life here, he would have produced some other kind of music. As the years have passed, his scores have become far less those of a musical landscapist and romantic revolutionist in his art, and there are good and logical explanations of this. One is that prior to the composition of the Fourth symphony he drastically changed his conditions of living, getting out of Helsingfors and its many companionships, living a much quieter and introspective existence than in earlier years, and becoming, as a consequence, always more alone and individual in his music. This was in marked contrast to the period of the Second symphony, completed at a time of feverish nationalism, when Finland was under Russian rule, and he was one of a young band of artists and writers whose emotions were of a sort—granted the presence of a young composer of genius—to result in a Second symphony.

There are people, of the academic cast of mind, who persist in attempting to make one rule for everything in music; who would, if they could, put not only limitations but blinders on the art, and fit it to their own limited vision and experience. It is just as ridiculous and unperceptive to close the eyes to patent characteristics of certain compositions and their sources in race and personality as it is to make up silly legends about other works with which officious and impossible tales have obviously no connection. To read events, for example, as many people have, into Beethoven's Seventh symphony is as impertinent and beside the mark as it would be to deny an implicit meaning to symphonies Six or Nine (in the finale) by the same composer.

To which may be added the following: that the ultimate significance of an art work is determined not only by what its creator intended, or that of which he was conscious when he produced it, but also by the meanings and the values discovered in it by many individuals

---

A.M., Thurs., Oct. 28/37
Lowell

ELL COURIER CITIZEN

GOOD OUTLOOK FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Supplementary Matinee Series in Boston Well Attended—Evenings Popular.

It looks as if this is going to be a good symphony season in Boston. For the first matinee in the supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra Tuesday the hall was practically filled. Few vacant seats were to be seen. And the Monday evening concert told a similar story. In the audience I was told were music lovers from every state in New England. The Tuesday afternoon concerts are especially convenient for commuters.

There is the impression that the new plan of pairing these monthly supplementary concerts on two consecutive days, with identical programs, is going to work out well, both for the orchestra and for the hearers. For one thing, it is going to make possible more careful preparation, although the Boston orchestra never slights that. Since the audiences are different there is no good reason why the program should be changed for each.

Dr. Koussevitzky this time had set a classic work, the Symphony in G major by Papa Haydn, against compositions by two contemporary composers. If the older work by contrast seemed somewhat naive, it was nevertheless delightful to hear. And the orchestra brought out its beauty.

Prokofieff's suite "Lieutenant Kije," arranged from music which he had composed for a Russian moving picture, proved bright and amusing in a modern idiom, although more melodious and less bizarre than many works by his contemporaries. The muted trumpet call at the opening, sounding as if from afar, and gradually merged with a whisper of the strings, was a notably fine effect. On the whole, there was joviality in the musical episides of the life of a wholly imaginary character.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius, which we heard at the opening of the regular series, was repeated with all the virtuosity that marked its playing then. It is colorful and thrilling music, gradually worked up to a colossal climax. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra clearly felt its power. S. R. F.

Monitor Oct 23/37

A Mahler Symphony

For quasi-novelty in the program of the third pair of Boston Symphony concerts (Oct. 22-23) Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen to revive the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, in C sharp minor, unheard in Boston since 1914. So doing, he inevitably revived also the controversy over the merits of the composer, which shows no signs of subsiding.

Yet concerning Mahler and Bruckner, it is apparently useless to dispute. Certainly there is nothing in the Fifth Symphony to change opinions. It is characteristic Mahler, which to this commentator means that it is the expression of an individuality full of ideas and emotions, and profusely gifted, but wanting in the self-criticism, the selectivity, the judgment, the balance, the power of co-ordination which are necessary to make a creative artist.

Mahler must have felt this lack, for he evidently tried to compensate for it by much sound and much repetition. Alas, the sound and the repetitions serve only to emphasize the poverty of his invention and the derivative nature of his writing. Mahler makes a pathetic picture, but we shall be doing neither his memory nor the cause of music a service by overestimating a product which possesses the most deplorable features of Teutonic art.

As for Dr. Koussevitzky, he allowed himself to be carried away by the theatricality of this score. The performance had the success that the composer had assured it when he scored his final pages.

How far short of his aim Mahler fell was made the more evident by the second half of this program, which was composed of excerpts from the Wagnerian music dramas. Wagner is not without faults, but to perform his music after that of Mahler was to emphasize almost unkindly his genius. Even the Ride of the Valkyrs (one of the items), for all its onomatopoetic obviousness, is at worst one of the slips of a master. Whereas Mahler remains for the most part at the level of the Valkyrs' Ride and even of the "Träume."

For the real artistic satisfaction of the concert, we had to depend upon the Introduction to Act III of the "Meistersinger" and on the closing scene of "Walküre," with Mack Harrell to sing Wotan's Farewell. For Dr. Koussevitzky brought to the "Meistersinger" music the poetic quality which is his distinction, and the orchestra played gloriously for him.

And in the "Walküre" selection he and Mr. Harrell conspired to give the parting of Wotan and Brünnhilde its full human as well as musical significance. Mr. Harrell's voice, essentially a baritone, is perhaps a little light for the role, especially in the lower register, but its fine quality and his exceptional musical intelligence enabled him to give full dramatic and musical value to his lines. He was rewarded at the Friday concert by applause which compelled Dr. Koussevitzky to bring him back to the stage for a second time, while the orchestra stood. L. A. S.

The Arts in Boston

Lucas & Pritchard Studio

Dorothy French

In "You Can't Take It With You," Which Enters Its Eighth Week at the Plymouth on Monday

---

WORCESTER DAILY TELEGRAM, MONDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1937.

Social News

By MARION ROGERS

Polch-Scott Wedding Thanksgiving

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR SCOTT of 6 Ashmore road announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Manson Scott, to Franz Joseph Polch, son of Mr. and Mrs. Karl J. Polch of Weehawken, N. J.

Miss Scott was graduated from Classical High School and Mount Holyoke College. Her sorority is Pi Epsilon. She is a teacher at the Harriet Johnson Nursery School in New York, and returned there last night after spending a weekend in Worcester with her parents.

Mr. Polch was graduated from Stevens Institute in Hoboken, N. J., and is employed by the Norton Company.

The wedding will be a Thanksgiving ceremony at St. Luke's Episcopal Church.

Elwell-Young Engagement Announced

Mr. and Mrs. Frank A. Young of Shamokin, Pa., announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Margaret Birch Young, to Harrison Pierce Elwell, formerly of Worcester, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Higgins of 31 Wild Rose avenue.

Miss Young was graduated from Shamokin High School and Hood College. Mr. Elwell was graduated from Peekskill Military Academy in 1928. While in Worcester he was active in Y. M. C. A. work, being a member of the Junior Leaders' Corps and the swimming team. He was later swimming instructor at Camp Sangamon in Pittsford, Vt. He is now associated with Brown and Williamson Co., with headquarters in Sunbury, Pa.

The wedding will be in December.

The Junior League Garden Club will meet at 2.30 tomorrow in the home of Mrs. Warren G. Davis of 11 Otsego road, instead of the league rooms as previously announced. Mrs. Robert S. Sturtevant will talk on iris.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur F. Kelley of 87 Sagamore road are spending a vacation at The Inn at Buck Hill Falls, Pa.

Will Attend Boston Musical Events

Lists of subscribers for activities in Boston frequently contain names of women from Worcester County. There are two such lists on hand now. Several from this vicinity will go to Boston tomorrow to hear the Symphony and its conductor Serge Koussevitzky open a series of six 'commuters' matinees at Symphony Hall. They are Mrs. Clifford S. Anderson, Mrs. George M. Bassett, Mrs. Rockwood H. Bullock, Mrs. W. Irving Clark, Mrs. Jefferson W. Coe, Mrs. Walter Evans, Mrs. Aldus C. Higgins, Mrs. John W. Higgins, Mrs. Charles L. Morse, Mrs. R. Sanford Riley, Mrs. John W. Sheperdson, Mrs. Francis Henry Taylor, Mrs. Charles M. Thayer, Mrs. Sydney Webber, and Miss Edith M. Ward.

Several of the above names are repeated on the list of subscribers for the Morning Musicales. Richard Crooks, Metropolitan Opera tenor, will open the series Nov. 10 at the Hotel Statler. That list includes Mrs. Clarence S. Brigham, Mrs. Ripley P. Bullen, Mrs. W. Roy Carrick of East Douglas, Mrs. Ernest T. Clary, Mrs. Jefferson W. Coe, Mrs. Robert H. Coe, Mrs. Clare Hill Draper of Hopedale, Mrs. Henry Hooker Forbes, Mrs. Heywood Fox of Southbridge, Mrs. John W. Higgins, Mrs. Roger Kinnicutt, Mrs. George W. Knowlton, Jr., of Upton, Mrs. Charles A. Root of Uxbridge, Mrs. Harold J. Walter of Uxbridge, Mrs. Channing M. Wells of Southbridge, Mrs. J. Warren Venner and Mrs. C. Claflin Young.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER

OCT 25 1937

LOCAL PEOPLE TO ATTEND CONCERT AT SYMPHONY HALL

Residents of this district and every other point of the compass throughout New England will journey to Symphony Hall, Boston tomorrow. Their object will be to hear the Boston Sywphony Orchestra and its great conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, open a series of six "commuters' matinees." These concerts will be played monthly on Tuesdays, omitting November. For the special benefit of out-of-towners, the performances will not begin until three o'clock.

Music just played for the first time in the United States will be on this Tuesday's program. It is the amusing Suite from the Soviet Film "Lieutenant Kije." The work is by the celebrated living Russian composer, Sergei Prokofieff. He gives musical expression to a legend. This tells how a Czar, in reading a dispatch jumbled some words so as to form the non-existent name of "Lieutenant Kije." Since the courtiers dared not correct the Czar, they invented details of the birth, marriage and death of the imaginary officer. Koussevitsky will open the program with a delightful early example of the symphony—Haydn's Symphony Number Eighty-Eight. The Russian work will follow. The entire second half of the program will be devoted to the powerful Second Symphony of the illustrious contemporary Finnish master, Sibelius.

Some clubs eager to present music appreciation lectures have encountered discouraging financial and other difficulties in obtaining good musicians. But the Tuesday matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because of low subscription rates, have made it possible for groups of club members to hear the world's great masterpieces interpreted by Serge Koussevitzky and his one hundred and nine virtuosos.

Subscribers to Tuesday's concert from this district are:

Quincy—Mrs. R. J. Allen. Braintree—Mrs. Porter Brown, Mrs. George H. Wetherbee. Hingham—Mrs. Dudley M. Baker, Mrs. John L. Barry, Miss Emily F. Blaney, Mrs. Osborn M. Curtis, Jr., Mrs. Bartlett Guild, Mrs. Sydney Harrison. South Weymouth—Mrs. Charles G. Bascom, Frank E. Loud. East Weymouth—Mrs. S. L. Amsler. Wollaston—Mrs. Arthur G. Locke.

LOWELL COURIER-CITIZEN. THU

MOMENTS MUSICAL,

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

For the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week the program will include Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas Reliefs;" Roussel's Symphony in G minor and the Emperor Concerto of Beethoven. In the latter, the distinguished pianist will be Walter Gieseking.

The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon supplementary series by the orchestra began this week with identical programs. The compositions presented were Haydn's Symphony in G major; Prokofieff's suite "Lieut. Kije," originally written for a Russian motion picture film; the Second Symphony of Sibelius. The attendance at both of these concerts showed that there is a public for them outside the confines of Boston proper as well as within them.

The forthcoming release of the phonograph records of the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and various assistants under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, will mark the largest venture ever attempted by the Victor Company. There will be twenty five records divided into three albums, one each to be released—according to present plans—in January, February and March. The artistic importance of the undertaking need scarcely be stressed. One may be reminded, though, that the task was not made more easy by the fact that it was done during a concert performance in the presence of an audience filling Symphony Hall.

The albums will be accompanied by the entire text and by an article on the Passion form written by Dr. Archibald T. D ison.

A State Orchestra

Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday opened a new series in its winter program giving the first of six monthly programs which will be known unofficially as the "commuters' series." Their appeal, it is expected, will be especially strong for music lovers outside of Boston.

A capacity audience at the first program indicated that Dr. Koussevitsky and his orchestra have many followers in the commuting area, assuming that most of the audience had come from distant towns. Several Cape Cod listeners were in the audience that welcomed the new series.

This new appeal of the Boston Symphony to out-of-town listeners broadens the base upon which the orchestra is supported. It means that the Boston Symphony now becomes a Massachusetts orchestra rather than an organization supported almost entirely by the metropolitan area.

Certainly the state will welcome the added effort to accommodate music lovers from outside the city. There must be thousands of these followers of the orchestra scattered throughout the state who will attend the entire series of programs once they realize that the orchestra is adapting the program to the commuter's situation.

Boston Symphony is fortunate in having a management which is energetic enough to build its musical appeal broadly. This method not only will increase the season's patronage but it should have a definite influence in extending the cultural scope of Dr. Koussevitsky's programs.

Cape Cod Standard-Times, Hyannis, Oct. 27/37

Cape People Hear Symphony Music Given For Commuters

A number of Cape people were included in the capacity audience yesterday afternoon which greeted the inaugural concert in a series of Boston Symphony Orchestra "commuters' programs," given on six Tuesday afternoons of the music season in Symphony Hall.

The concerts, starting at 3 in the afternoon, are designed to extend the orchestra's appeal to all of Massachusetts and its neighboring states and if the enthusiasm of the first large "commuter" audience is a criterion, the series is assured a success.

Yesterday's program, given by the full orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, presented a contrast of classical and ultra-modern music preliminary to the major piece of the afternoon, Sibelius' Second Symphony.

Contrasts of Music.

The classical school was represented by the G Major Symphony No. 88 of Josef Haydn, a composition in which the "father of the symphony" was unusually free in his use of new harmonic ideas and tunes.

Serge Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije," contained musical whims and oddities characteristic of the present-day Russian composers. Off-stage drum and trumpet calls, a saxaphone and "bull fiddle" duet, eccentric dance tunes to the accompaniment of sleigh bells were a few of the modernities of the humorous music.

Considered by many the greatest work of the greatest living musician, the Sibelius Second Symphony was the climax of the program and was presented with such perfection that many listeners could not have asked for more. Passages of rich Finnish harmony often emerged like bursts of sunlight from moody, near-Slavic rhythms and melodies.

A hymn-like chant of woodwinds develops through the third movment of the symphony, uttering the poet's devotion to his art, and the full orchestra takes up the theme exultantly in the finale to form a triumphant conclusion to the great work.

Future programs of the "commuters' series" will come on Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 28, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, Mar. 22, and April 19.

THE MORNING MERCURY, NEW BEDFORD, MASS., FRIDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1937.

First Tuesday at Boston Symphony

Commuters' Series Opens; Patrons from New England Cities Attend

That the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has sent out invitations to New England newspapers in the territory served by a widely distributed list of subscribers to the Tuesday afternoon series of concerts by one hundred and nine virtuosos conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky calls for some retrospective history. The opening concert of the Tuesday matinees, beginning at three(rather than as on Friday at 2:30) to accommodate out-of-town patrons, was the occasion, and the idea behind the courtesy was that various communities might be informed of the advantages of this so-called "commuters' series."

Inquiries, following the program Tuesday afternoon, on the general subscription, found that the Eriday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts are subscribed almost to the record of pre-depression days when a relinquished seat was quickly taken up. In fact, applicants are now told that the "rush" seats are their only hope on Friday.

Supplementary Demand

It was because the pressure was so insistent that a shorter supplementary series for Monday evenings was instituted—possibly ten years ago. Often, the novelties of the regular pair of concerts were repeated at the next of the Monday series and Monday night Symphony came to be considered as the one of most finished performance.

Then classical Tuesdays were instituted. The accepted composers were represented and generally the programs followed a planned chronological or special trend course. Some of us who do not have to learn to like olives have looked upon the Tuesday ladies as reactionaries. Now a new system is announced. The Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon programs will be identical.

At each of the remaining five of this shorter series of six paired concerts, falling monthly (with the exception of November) through April, there will be some soloist feature. Raya Garbousova, brilliant young Russian 'cellist who played in the Friday and Saturday series two years ago, will be soloist at the next of the short series—Dec. 27, 28. Robert Casadesus, French pianist of the family of virtuosos on ancient instruments, will make his first appearance with the orchestra. Orlando Barbera, the Italian violinist, is a distinguished newcomer. Daniele Amfitheatrof, the conductor of Russian birth and Italian training, yet to be heard in America, will be guest conductor of the January pair of concerts. Richard Burgin and Jean Bedetti, first chairs in violin and 'cello of the orchestra, will be heard in Brahms' Double Concerto for Violin and Violincello.

Typical New England

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now that this supplementary series accommodates new subscribers, is becoming in essence the New England Symphony Orchestra. Ask for the makeup of its Monday and Tuesday patrons, and card index groups are pulled out indicating that there are substantial monthly pilgrimages to Symphony Hall, Boston shrine of the arts, from Vermont and New Hampshire towns; from Worcetser, Fall River, Plymouth, Gloucester and other localities. Plattsburg, New York, is the subscription town farthest removed.

The audience has a character of its own. They are "nice" people, intelligent people, but they are not the familiar types of old Bostonians, who attend on tradition and inheritance of location, with whom one has rubbed elbows for years on Friday afternoons. There are in particular, fewer debutante girls. College students, unable to secure reasonable seats for the original series, resort to the Tuesday matinees. There are many teachers listed. After study of types in auditorium and corridors Tuesday afternoon, it was realized that this audience is more genuinely representative of intellectual New England than, let us say, the present Saturday night throng.

The Program

For the first commuters' matinee, the program offered three distinct styles in music—the 17th century Haydn of the G major, No. 88; Prokofieff's gay, lightly taken "Lieutenant Kiji," Op. 60 and Sibelius' great Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 45.

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose infinitude of indicative gesture is one of the especial pleasures of attendance, played every shading of the Haydn so illuminatively in curve of arm or decisive drop; in summons and release; in a subtle moulding that seemed to have a single instrument obedient to his mind that one could fancy a musician deprived of hearing could sit, score in hand, before this performance with intense appreciation. There was a refinement of variation on the repeated theme of the Adagio, the treatment of the Menuetto as a semblance of conversational argument and a final turn of the hand that said: "n' import." Haydn's constant return to the beautiful theme of the Largo was one of the happy features of this symphony of essentially sunny aspect.

Prokofieff, grounded in the classics, is giving the world much light, rhythmic music with yet an air of aristocratic grace. For the wit of his scuttling measures that tell the life story of an officer who never existed save by an error made by Czar Paul I in reading a military report, we must thank a Soviet film that afforded opportunity for this incidental suite, deliciously inconsequential in its disposition of a diplomatically awkward incident. There is satirically military use of cornet, fife and drums.

A profoundly sympathetic reading of the Sibelius Second Symphony proved again Dr. Koussevitsky's renown as interpreter of the Finnish composer. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays Sibelius, we know one worthy of place with the great symphonists of past generations is being gloriously presented and perpetuated. To a neighboring Russian, there must be instinctive understanding of the mighty winds that sweep through the four movements—from tentative Allegretto to majestic Finale. Dr. Koussevitzky reveals the voice of a country. That he maintains so superbly the balance of choirs is a chief factor in the persuasive grandeur he brings out in the Allegro Moderato. In Tuesday's performance, as never before, one realized the molten gold of devotion given out by the brasses, yet never outplaying the cumulative mass; and the woodwinds gleamed unclouded through the sound texture.

New England commuters had inspiring memories of a felicitously made program to take on their homeward way.

A. C. R.

From N. H.

The Manchester Union--Oct. 27

and

The Manchester Leader---Oct. 27.

Enjoy 'Commuters Matinee'

Boston Symphony Delights Audience in First Program of Series

BY ESTHER M. GUILFOY.

BOSTON, Oct. 26—Maintaining its tradition for expert musicianship, the Boston Symphony orchestra, now in its 57th season, delighted large numbers of music lovers from every state in New England who practically filled Symphony hall this afternoon for the first in a series of "Commuters' matinees," presented under the able leadership of the orchestra's noted conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Painting delightful musical pictures, sometimes brilliant, sometimes subdued and sometimes strongly dramatic in hue, the orchestra was warmly acclaimed for its three artistic offerings.

Opening the program with the beautiful "Symphony in G Major, No. 88" by Haydn, the orchestra acquitted itself ably as it conveyed the lively brilliance, the pleasant recurring variations and the mincy strains of "Adagio: Allegro" and "Largo," then swept into the cheerful "Menuetto; Trio" with its rustic dance strains and hurdy-gurdy drones; and finally into the "Finale; Allegro con spirito," in which the musicians played vividly the movement in rondo form, emphasizing its rolling blares, little staccato touches and quiet pianissimo gradually growing to a powerful conclusion.

First Time in U. S.

Presented for the first time in this country, the second number, "Lieutenant Kije," Orchestra Suite, Op. 60, by Prokofieff, proved a delightful innovation. Ethereal music backstage which developed into a cornet fanfare followed by a military drum tattoo and the shrill song of the fife introduced the "Birth of Kije" in spectacular fashion, which was followed by the "Romance" in which Max Kunze played the excellent double bass solo. "Kije's Wedding," a melodic movement was quickly followed by Troika, a rhythmic tavern song interspersed with the gay pealing of sleighbells.

The "Burial of Kije," who happened to be only an imaginary lieutenant, was carried out in cheerful vein with only an occasional plaintive touch, as the orchestra summed up his career by repeating the cornet fanfare which had introduced him, the themes which had characterized his romance and wedding and the muted cornet strains, gradually dwindling into significance as Kije was returned to the insubstantial medium of his birth.

The program was brought to a striking climax with "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43" by Sibelius, in which the orchestra played with great exhuberance. Commencing with the sighing pulsation of the "Allegretto," the many elements were fused into a gradually mounting climax as the orchestra portrayed the drama with great crescendo effect. The lugubrious quality of "Tempo andante, ma rubato," with its stormy scales and undercurrent of whirring figures was cleverly carried by the orchestra which then launched the "Vivacissimo; Lento e suave," a tumultuous offering characterized by sharp but soft drum taps, and softly-rounded notes. The orchestra then with fire attacked "Finale: Allegro moderato," in zestful fashion, building up the melody into a striking display of musical fireworks.

The personnel of the orchestra is wide in range, the off-stage trumpet being played by 18-year-old Roger Boison, a full-fledged member of the orchestra, and the great crashing horn sounds in the big double quartet by 72-year-old Henry Lorbeer, for 50 years one of the nation's leading players of the horn.

During the intermission guests enjoyed visiting the various Symphony hall galleries in which were the interesting permanent collection of authentic old musical instruments ranging from the oldtime lute and hurdy-gurdy to the bass viol controlled with the knee grip. In another gallery were displayed summer paintings and wood carvings of Karoly Fulop as well as a collection of musical scores, original manuscripts and letters pertaining to composers whose works are being played at this time by the orchestra.

SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SECTION FIVE
WORCESTER, SUNDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1937.

Gieseking Symphony Soloist

Beethoven's Fifth Concerto Features Program

Amer Oct 30

By RUTH MARSTERS

With Walter Gieseking appearing as soloist in the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, and sundry music from the French to fill out the program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fourth Friday concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Beethoven's great Fifth Concerto in E flat is not one that has ever been allowed the dust of forgetfulness.

Since its first performance by this orchestra in 1882 it has had the benefit of seventeen soloists, among them the greatest virtuosos of the day. Paderewski, Harold Bauer, Josef Hofmann, Alfred Cortot and Rudolph Ganz are a few of those on the list.

Gieseking had previously performed this concerto with the orchestra in 1930. And because of the conspicuous niche the concerto holds in music literature, the likewise prominent place the soloist has won among concert pianists of the world the reappearance of both had been highly anticipated.

Yesterday's performance was in fact brilliantly accomplished and loudly acclaimed. But not quite as expected. The soloist appeared somewhat constrained on this particular occasion. His performance was a little rigid, a little forced. The mood was simply not upon him.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante defunte," exquisitely performed.

"Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" by the Corsican, Martelli followed with Roussel's rather strident Third Symphony in G minor completing an unusual program. (The same program will be given in this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

The program for next week's Friday and Saturday concerts will include Mendelssohn's Third Symphony in A minor, (the "Scotch" Symphony) and the "Hebrides" Overture.

The Perennial Hold Of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

ALTHOUGH TO Serge Koussevitzky and his one hundred and ten master musicians, the Boston Symphony Orchestra season does not begin until the eighth of October, this is the height of the season to one department of the orchestra's organization.

Day in and day out, now, people come to Symphony Hall from every point in Boston, and from more than two hundred other communities scattered through New England, although not a note of any musical instrument may be heard in the building. They peer into the deserted expanse of the famous auditorium, seek out certain seats, and occupy them with animated interest as they survey the empty stage this way and that.

These visitors who keep the concertless hall busy these days are intent on assuring themselves of season tickets. Some of them are merely paying for their reservations. They may have had the same seat for many seasons before. But they like to go in and sit a moment in the familiar location, while in fancy they review memorable performances they have heard there by Koussevitzky and his men. Mentally they visualize the masculinely graceful gestures of Koussevitzky, the marvelous expressiveness of his left hand, an occasional fleeting glimpse of the sensitive pantomime of his face. Meanwhile, they hear in imagination the far-famed tone and virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—a tone which visiting European critics say can be infinitely subtle, or of breath-taking power; a tone that even in its power is irridescent with the clear colors of the individual sounds of the instruments, balanced and fused to perfection.

A perennial fascination seems to grip those who become season ticket holders of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of the tickets are passed along in the same families among heirlooms handed down from Bostonian ancestors who occupy niches in history. You will always see a representative of certain families in certain particular seats. And so, probably, will the children of persons observing them there. During the great business depression, these tickets often were the last possession to be liquidated.

There was one family drama in which a man and his wife held on to a pair of tickets long after they had sacrificed other assets. Finally they sorrowfully agreed that they must give them up. But at the last moment, the husband refused to deprive his wife of hers, and with some heroism preserved it for her.

So much does a regular membership in the audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra mean to one woman, that she commutes yearly from England. Actually, she has been owner of a season ticket to all four series of concerts played in Symphony Hall—twenty-four each on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights, and six each on Tuesday afternoons and Monday nights. She arrives in Boston a little after the season starts, lives in a Boston hotel until the last concert, the last of April, then returns to England.

Due to the existence of concert series both in the daytime and the night, both weekly, and monthly, it is possible for a music lover near or far, or variously situated financially, to meet his individual needs in becoming a season ticket holder. In a way, one may go shopping for symphonic enjoyment.

And right now, the market hall is alive with shoppers.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

OCT 24 1937

Boston Symphony to Have First Woman Conductor

THE symphony orchestra of Boston, Mass., will have a woman guest conductor this season for the first time in its fifty-seven year history. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of France's distinguished musicians, will have this honor.

Upward of 270,000 mothers in soviet Russia are receiving large-family government benefits.

Lowell Evening Leader Oct. 27 (Mat. Eve.)

Supplementary Symphony Season Has Large Audience

Boston Orchestra Plays Haydn's [illegible] Symphony and Works By Prokofieff and Sibelius.

It looks as if this is going to be a good symphony season in Boston. For the first matinee in the supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday the hall was practically filled. Few vacant seats were to be seen. And the Monday evening concert told a similar story. In the audience I was told were music lovers from every state in New England. The Tuesday afternoon concerts are especially convenient for commuters.

There is the impression that the new plan of pairing these monthly supplementary concerts on two consecutive days, with identical programs, is going to work out well, both for the orchestra and for the hearers. For one thing, it is going to make possible more careful preparation, although the Boston orchestra never slights that. Since the audiences are different there is no good reason why the program should be changed for each.

Dr. Koussevitzky this time had set a classic work, the Symphony in G major by Papa Haydn, against compositions by two contemporary composers. If the older work by contrast seemed somewhat naive, it was nevertheless delightful to hear. And the orchestra brought out its beauty.

Prokofieff's suite "Lieutenant Kije," arranged from music which he had composed for a Russian moving picture, proved bright and amusing in a modern idiom, although more melodious and less bizarre than many works by his contemporaries. The muted trumpet call at the opening, sounding as if from afar, and gradually merged with a whisper of the strings, was a notably fine effect. On the whole, there was joviality in the musical episides of the life of a wholly imaginary character.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius, which we heard at the opening of the regular series, was repeated with all the virtuosity that marked its playing then. It is colorful and thrilling music, gradually worked up to a colossal climax. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra clearly felt its power. S. R. F.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Symphony Hall

Twenty-three years have sped their way since Dr. Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performed Mahler's Fifth Symphony three times in the short space of ten months, the last of these performances taking place February 27, 1914. From that date to last week's symphony concert Boston has had to live on the memory of Dr. Muck's interpretation of this composition—a difficult feat for those who may never have heard Dr. Muck conduct anything at all. After hearing Dr. Koussevitzky revive this work last week, one is forced to the conclusion that while Dr. Muck may have been over-enthusiastic, his zeal has much more justification than the long neglect Mahler's Fifth has suffered here.

This was the first time many of us have heard this titanic masterpiece: its effect was overpowering. In vain we listened for the many banal passages we were told to expect but our critical faculties must have deserted us, for we found the whole symphony interesting from start to finish. It is entirely possible that the genius of Koussevitzky may have made Mahler sound better than it actually is, but whatever the reason for the excellent impression it made, we hope we do not have to rely on our grandchildren to guide our tottering footsteps to the next performance of this inspiring and aspiring work of art.

The program was closed with three Wagner excerpts: Introduction to Act 3 from "Die Meistersinger," "The Ride of the Valkyries," and Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walkure." In the last named, Mack Harrell was the very accurate baritone soloist.

It is almost stating the obvious to say that the conductor and orchestra were sheer perfection. Boston has been taught to expect much from this group and rarely is Boston disappointed.

Monitor Oct 30

12

Gieseking Sym

The Arts in Boston

The first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth program of the season, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was a course in modern French music. The items were Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Défunte," Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor.

These three works were actually a study in three diverse aspects of the French genius: Ravel, the representative par excellence of the highly cultivated, perhaps overcivilized art of modern Paris; Martelli, the adoptive Frenchman, who adopts also the sophisticated French habit of drawing upon exotic cultures for atmosphere, and Roussel, the heir of the major tradition of Franck, which contains enough of the Teutonic element to save it from preciosity.

Nothing could be more expressive of the old Spanish Court than Ravel's formal score, with its touch of decadence. Martelli's sketches, which had their first public performance by the Boston orchestra seven years ago, are cleverly done, but are hardly up to the products of Prokofieff and Respighi, based on a similar esthetic formula.

Roussel's Third Symphony, likewise first performed here seven years ago, was one of the most considerable of the compositions written in honor of the Boston orchestra's fiftieth season. It was revived two years ago under Mr. Burgin's baton. Dr. Koussevitzky was well advised to keep it in the active repertory. It has a lively wit, and a greater depth than many typical French works. Its composer is less obviously afraid that he may let himself go too much and therefore too closely resemble a German. The symphony was received cordially but with appropriate restraint.

But of course it was Walter Gieseking that most of the audience had come to hear, and his performance of the "Emperor" Concerto, which touched remote heights of virtuosity and musical revelation, received the ovation it deserved. It was just, too, that the soloist should insist on sharing the honor with both Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, for without such brilliant co-operation as theirs the great work could not have come to such a realization. L. A. S.

Trans Oct 30

Part Four

elle Returns in Recital

Fine Reading of Concerto Follows Roussel Symphony

Varied Program Reaches Noble Climax in the "Emperor" Concerto, with Gieseking at Piano

By Redfern Mason

From Pandora's box of Hope, Serge Koussevitzky chose for the edification of the Symphony audience yesterday afternoon idyllic music of Ravel, music that attempted to interpret Assyrian sculpture, the cerebral music of Roussel and, to clarify the atmosphere, the same genius of Beethoven, as exemplified in the "Emperor" Concerto, with Walter Gieseking at the piano.

Listening to that dulcet Pavane, it was sad to think that its creator, Maurice Ravel, lies in melancholy eclipse. The Pavane used to be danced by nobles and ecclesiastics of the seventeenth century, and they spread their robes peacock-wise, as the name suggests. Often they sang while they danced, as in the exquisite "Belle qui tiens ma vie," or in the "pavins" beloved of Shakespeare. But in the present case Ravel adds a note of mourning; he is possibly thinking of some dead Infanta, like the one painted by Velasquez. But it is a sadness that does not hurt and the work, a lovely miniature, pleased rather than troubled the gentle fancy of the audience.

Then, with a wave of the baton, Mr. Koussevitzky summoned up far off Assyria, through the score of Henri Martelli, a Gallicized Italian, born in Corsica, who has dreamed over bas reliefs like the ones you may see in the Louvre and the British Museum, great tone representations of the hunt and of warfare. With these sinister images before him the composer attempts to bring back the spirit of Assurbanipal, when, cruel-lipped and vindictive, he commanded the slaughter to begin. Lacerating tones of brass, vicious drumbeats are contrasted with accents of oriental sensuality and, behind them all the desolation of the desert and the tuba roaring like the lion for his prey.

In spite of their merciless sensuality the four chapters of this "strange eventful history" do not jar too much on the sensibility of the hearer. Their interest is largely that of ancient tapestry; they evoke the past, but the process is also one of sublimation. Symphony goers will be grateful to the composer, for he brought intimately before them the tuba player, Mr. E. Adam, who, if he could not roar you gently "as 'twere any nightingale," like Bottom the weaver, did make the king of beasts a desolate and lonely soloist.

The Roussel number was his symphony in G minor, Op. 42, which has twice been performed by the Boston Symphony, but still, if I am not mistaken, is still "cavaire to the general." Roussel thought intensely, but his work is a tonal mosaic; the sense of development from a melodic proposition to a great aesthetic conclusion is lacking. His work, in one way, recalls the canvasses of the Pre Raphaelites, in which every leaf is realistically portrayed and every blade of grass pictured as if by photography. The details are brilliantly limned, but they seem to succeed one another haphazard, as if the composer were dominated by the fantasy of dreams rather than by formal logic.

The audience listened attentively, respectfully, but I fancy that many of them were wondering how much of the symphony they would remember after the concert.

But what a change when we came to the Beethoven. The thematic material of the great Concerto in E flat is as clean cut as the characters in a play of Sophocles. One recognizes the themes at every repetition and follows their fortunes as one does those of Oedipus or Antigone. The immortal phrases, which Beethoven was as laborious in choosing as ever was hero in the choice of his armor, become our friends; they sing themselves into our consciousness and remain with us lifelong, as masterly drawn as the figures of Hamlet and Ophelia.

Into this work Walter Gieseking plunged with the joy and exuberance of a devoted artist, and the orchestra, catching fire from his enthusiasm and inspired by the kindred spirit of the director, gave themselves to the work as if it were some musical treasure trove which they were playing for the first time. When you hear the Boston strings develop what I am tempted to call their organ tone, then you know the work of Nikisch and Muck and Koussevitzky has not been in vain.

And the audience kindled along with the players. There are qualities in silence, as Maeterlinck loves to insist, and yesterday the quality was one of a reverent delight. Beethoven's reputation, like that of Shakespeare, has its ups and downs; but the great public, that final arbiter of the esteem in which genius is held, does not go wrong forever.

People marvelled at the seemingly infinite gamut of shades of tone which Gieseking extracted from the clavier. Under his fingers the instrument was verily orchestral; it was own brother to strings and reeds; it was of the same kin as those noble horns. Listening, we felt that Beethoven forever reaching out towards the light and, with his deaf ears, grasping after eternal harmonies.

The performance was a triumph for the soloist, a triumph for the orchestra, a triumph for Koussevitzky and, I am bound to add, a triumph for the audience. For, as the French say, "To understand is to equal."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 30 1937

Orders of the Day

REPRESENTATIVES of the nation's bankers met in convention in Boston two weeks ago, and part of the entertainment arranged for them was a concert by the Boston Symphony—which was given, surprisingly enough, not in Symphony Hall but in the First National Bank. The bank, conscious of its obligations as host, issued special instructions to the guards who were to serve as ushers at the concert. They were to wear new black neckties. Before reporting for work they were to polish their shoes. And they were to be sure to brush their teeth.

P. T.

(176)

DAY, OCTOBER 30,

GIESEKING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Three Numbers by Latins Form Half of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Latin composers made their entrance into this season's Symphony Concerts yesterday in the persons of Ravel, Roussel and Henri Martelli. The audience, however, was less visibly, or audibly, stirred by this refreshing first half of the concert than it was by the ensuing performance of the familiar "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Walter Gieseking as pianist.

FOR THE FIRST TIME

Twenty-seven years ago Ravel made an orchestration of his piano piece, "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." Yesterday this singularly felicitous transcription was played by the Symphony Orchestra for the first time. In its discreet orchestral dress the Pavane brings to us, more pointedly and also more hauntingly than before, the flavor of a bygone day. Beyond even Debussy, who occasionally made such excursions into the past, has Ravel captured its spirit in such pieces as this exquisite Pavane and the Suite, "The Tomb of Couperin." The performance of the Pavane yesterday was a marvel of euphony and delicacy.

From the Corsican Martelli came yesterday the "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," given its world premiere here by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1930. The music seemed then to possess a definite individuality; an impression which was yesterday renewed and strengthened. As Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" had afforded Mr. Kunze opportunity to display his skill as soloist for the double-bass, so did the third of the four Bas-Reliefs, "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair," place in the spotlight Mr. Adam and his tuba. The effect of this long solo for a deep-voiced instrument, almost never thrust into such prominence, was peculiarly satisfying—a new tone sensation.

Roussel's Third

As memorial to Roussel, who died last August, Dr. Koussevitzky chose for performance the Third Symphony, in G minor, one of the works composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary season. It would be rash to call this a great symphony, but there is no presumption in pronouncing it a fine one, written at a time when the composing of notable symphonies had become almost a lost art. With Roussel unfortunately out of the picture, Sibelius and Vaughan-Williams appear as the two living composers who have wrought significantly in this exacting form.

The weakness of this Third Symphony, if weakness it be, is the intrusion of so much that is vigorous into the Adagio, producing very nearly the effect of four fast movements. Roussel has proved elsewhere that he is not incapable of expressive lyricism, as that element is understood in our day, even if he largely shuns it here. And from first to last this symphony has a tonic, vital quality. Abundantly melodious, it avoids at every turn the trite and obvious. The applause yesterday, while hearty, was less than piece and performance deserved.

Mr. Gieseking's Playing

As a rule it is best to adhere to the chronological order in programme building. But if some ears found Beethoven's orchestra somewhat bare after that of the triad of moderns and his adherence to traditional form and accepted formula a trifle bald after Roussel's ingenious evasion of them, most of the audience hailed the Concerto, or its performance, rapturously.

Mr. Gieseking's masterly, if somewhat detached and calculated version of the piano part was made known to us seven years ago. Yesterday it seemed essentially unchanged.

Lowell Evening Leader Oct. 27 (Wed. Eve.)

Supplementary Symphony Season Has Large Audience

Boston Orchestra Plays Haydn's [redacted] Symphony and Works By Prokofieff and Sibelius.

It looks as if this is going to be a good symphony season in Boston. For the first matinee in the supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday the hall was practically filled. Few vacant seats were to be seen. And the Monday evening concert told a similar story. In the audience I was told were music lovers from every state in New England. The Tuesday afternoon concerts are especially convenient for commuters.

There is the impression that the new plan of pairing these monthly supplementary concerts on two consecutive days, with identical programs, is going to work out well, both for the orchestra and for the hearers. For one thing, it is going to make possible more careful preparation, although the Boston orchestra never slights that. Since the audiences are different there is no good reason why the program should be changed for each.

Dr. Koussevitzky this time had set a classic work, the Symphony in G major by Papa Haydn, against compositions by two contemporary composers. If the older work by contrast seemed somewhat naive, it was nevertheless delightful to hear. And the orchestra brought out its beauty.

Prokofieff's suite "Lieutenant Kije," arranged from music which he had composed for a Russian moving picture, proved bright and amusing in a modern idiom, although more melodious and less bizarre than many works by his contemporaries. The muted trumpet call at the opening, sounding as if from afar, and gradually merged with a whisper of the strings, was a notably fine effect. On the whole, there was joviality in the musical episides of the life of a wholly imaginary character.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius, which we heard at the opening of the regular series, was repeated with all the virtuosity that marked its playing then. It is colorful and thrilling music, gradually worked up to a colossal climax. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra clearly felt its power.

S. R. F.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Advocate Oct 29

By JULES WOLFFERS

Symphony Hall

Twenty-three years have sped their way since Dr. Muck, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, performed Mahler's Fifth Symphony three times in the short space of ten months, the last of these performances taking place February 27, 1914. From that date to last week's symphony concert Boston has had to live on the memory of Dr. Muck's interpretation of this composition—a difficult feat for those who may never have heard Dr. Muck conduct anything at all. After hearing Dr. Koussevitzky revive this work last week, one is forced to the conclusion that while Dr. Muck may have been over-enthusiastic, his zeal has much more justification than the long neglect Mahler's Fifth has suffered here.

This was the first time many of us have heard this titanic masterpiece: its effect was overpowering. In vain we listened for the many banal passages we were told to expect but our critical faculties must have deserted us, for we found the whole symphony interesting from start to finish. It is entirely possible that the genius of Koussevitsky may have made Mahler sound better than it actually is, but whatever the reason for the excellent impression it made, we hope we do not have to rely on our grandchildren to guide our tottering footsteps to the next performance of this inspiring and aspiring work of art.

The program was closed with three Wagner excerpts: Introduction to Act 3 from "Die Meistersinger," "The Ride of the Valkyries," and Wotan's Farewell from "Die Walkure." In the last named, Mack Harrell was the very accurate baritone soloist.

It is almost stating the obvious to say that the conductor and orchestra were sheer perfection. Boston has been taught to expect much from this group and rarely is Boston disappointed.

Monitor Oct 30

12

Gieseking Sym

The Arts in Boston

The first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth program of the season, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was a course in modern French music. The items were Ravel's "Pavane pour une Infante Défunte," Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor.

These three works were actually a study in three diverse aspects of the French genius: Ravel, the representative par excellence of the highly cultivated, perhaps overcivilized art of modern Paris; Martelli, the adoptive Frenchman, who adopts also the sophisticated French habit of drawing upon exotic cultures for atmosphere, and Roussel, the heir of the major tradition of Franck, which contains enough of the Teutonic element to save it from preciosity.

Nothing could be more expressive of the old Spanish Court than Ravel's formal score, with its touch of decadence. Martelli's sketches, which had their first public performance by the Boston orchestra seven years ago, are cleverly done, but are hardly up to the products of Prokofieff and Respighi, based on a similar esthetic formula.

Roussel's Third Symphony, likewise first performed here seven years ago, was one of the most considerable of the compositions written in honor of the Boston orchestra's fiftieth season. It was revived two years ago under Mr. Burgin's baton. Dr. Koussevitzky was well advised to keep it in the active repertory. It has a lively wit, and a greater depth than many typical French works. Its composer is less obviously afraid that he may let himself go too much and therefore too closely resemble a German. The symphony was received cordially but with appropriate restraint.

But of course it was Walter Gieseking that most of the audience had come to hear, and his performance of the "Emperor" Concerto, which touched remote heights of virtuosity and musical revelation, received the ovation it deserved. It was just, too, that the soloist should insist on sharing the honor with both Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, for without such brilliant co-operation as theirs the great work could not have come to such a realization.

L. A. S.

Trans Oct 30

Part Four

elle Returns in Recital

Fine Reading of Concerto Follows Roussel Symphony

Varied Program Reaches Noble Climax in the "Emperor" Concerto, with Gieseking at Piano

By Redfern Mason

From Pandora's box of Hope, Serge Koussevitzky chose for the edification of the Symphony audience yesterday afternoon idyllic music of Ravel, music that attempted to interpret Assyrian sculpture, the cerebral music of Roussel and, to clarify the atmosphere, the same genius of Beethoven, as exemplified in the "Emperor" Concerto, with Walter Gieseking at the piano.

Listening to that dulcet Pavane, it was sad to think that its creator, Maurice Ravel, lies in melancholy eclipse. The Pavane used to be danced by nobles and ecclesiastics of the seventeenth century, and they spread their robes peacock-wise, as the name suggests. Often they sang while they danced, as in the exquisite "Belle qui tiens ma vie," or in the "pavins" beloved of Shakespeare. But in the present case Ravel adds a note of mourning; he is possibly thinking of some dead Infanta, like the one painted by Velasquez. But it is a sadness that does not hurt and the work, a lovely miniature, pleased rather than troubled the gentle fancy of the audience.

Then, with a wave of the baton, Mr. Koussevitzky summoned up far off Assyria, through the score of Henri Martelli, a Gallicized Italian, born in Corsica, who has dreamed over bas relies like the ones you may see in the Louvre and the British Museum, great tone representations of the hunt and of warfare. With these sinister images before him the composer attempts to bring back the spirit of Assurbanipal, when, cruel-lipped and vindictive, he commanded the slaughter to begin. Lacerating tones of brass, vicious drumbeats are contrasted with accents of oriental sensuality and, behind them all the desolation of the desert and the tuba roaring like the lion for his prey.

In spite of their merciless sensuality the four chapters of this "strange eventful history" do not jar too much on the sensibility of the hearer. Their interest is largely that of ancient tapestry; they evoke the past, but the process is also one of sublimation. Symphony goers will be grateful to the composer, for he brought intimately before them the tuba player, Mr. E. Adam, who, if he could not roar you gently "as 'twere any nightingale," like Bottom the weaver, did make the king of beasts a desolate and lonely soloist.

The Roussel number was his symphony in G minor, Op. 42, which has twice been performed by the Boston Symphony, but still, if I am not mistaken, is still "cavaire to the general." Roussel thought intensely, but his work is a tonal mosaic; the sense of development from a melodic proposition to a great aesthetic conclusion is lacking. His work, in one way, recalls the canvasses of the Pre Raphaelites, in which every leaf is realistically portrayed and every blade of grass pictured as if by photography. The details are brilliantly limned, but they seem to succeed one another haphazard, as if the composer were dominated by the fantasy of dreams rather than by formal logic.

The audience listened attentively, respectfully, but I fancy that many of them were wondering how much of the symphony they would remember after the concert.

But what a change when we came to the Beethoven. The thematic material of the great Concerto in E flat is as clean cut as the characters in a play of Sophocles. One recognizes the themes at every repetition and follows their fortunes as one does those of Oedipus or Antigone. The immortal phrases, which Beethoven was as laborious in choosing as ever was hero in the choice of his armor, become our friends; they sing themselves into our consciousness and remain with us lifelong, as masterly drawn as the figures of Hamlet and Ophelia.

Into this work Walter Gieseking plunged with the joy and exuberance of a devoted artist, and the orchestra, catching fire from his enthusiasm and inspired by the kindred spirit of the director, gave themselves to the work as if it were some musical treasure trove which they were playing for the first time. When you hear the Boston strings develop what I am tempted to call their organ tone, then you know the work of Nikisch and Muck and Koussevitzky has not been in vain.

And the audience kindled along with the players. There are qualities in silence, as Maeterlinck loves to insist, and yesterday the quality was one of a reverent delight. Beethoven's reputation, like that of Shakespeare, has its ups and downs; but the great public, that final arbiter of the esteem in which genius is held, does not go wrong forever.

People marvelled at the seemingly infinite gamut of shades of tone which Gieseking extracted from the clavier. Under his fingers the instrument was verily orchestral; it was own brother to strings and reeds; it was of the same kin as those noble horns. Listening, we felt that Beethoven forever reaching out towards the light and, with his deaf ears, grasping after eternal harmonies.

The performance was a triumph for the soloist, a triumph for the orchestra, a triumph for Koussevitzky and, I am bound to add, a triumph for the audience. For, as the French say, "To understand is to equal."

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 30 1937

Orders of the Day

REPRESENTATIVES of the nation's bankers met in convention in Boston two weeks ago, and part of the entertainment arranged for them was a concert by the Boston Symphony—which was given, surprisingly enough, not in Symphony Hall but in the First National Bank. The bank, conscious of its obligations as host, issued special instructions to the guards who were to serve as ushers at the concert. They were to wear new black neckties. Before reporting for work they were to polish their shoes. And they were to be sure to brush their teeth.

Post

(26)

DAY, OCTOBER 30,

GIESEKING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Three Numbers by Latins Form Half of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Latin composers made their entrance into this season's Symphony Concerts yesterday in the persons of Ravel, Roussel and Henri Martelli. The audience, however, was less visibly, or audibly, stirred by this refreshing first half of the concert than it was by the ensuing performance of the familiar "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Walter Gieseking as pianist.

FOR THE FIRST TIME

Twenty-seven years ago Ravel made an orchestration of his piano piece, "Pavane for a Dead Infanta." Yesterday this singularly felicitous transcription was played by the Symphony Orchestra for the first time. In its discreet orchestral dress the Pavane brings to us, more pointedly and also more hauntingly than before, the flavor of a bygone day. Beyond even Debussy, who occasionally made such excursions into the past, has Ravel captured its spirit in such pieces as this exquisite Pavane and the Suite, "The Tomb of Couperin." The performance of the Pavane yesterday was a marvel of euphony and delicacy.

From the Corsican Martelli came yesterday the "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs," given its world premiere here by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1930. The music seemed then to possess a definite individuality; an impression which was yesterday renewed and strengthened. As Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije" had afforded Mr. Kunze opportunity to display his skill as soloist for the double-bass, so did the third of the four Bas-Reliefs, "Lion and Lioness in Their Lair," place in the spotlight Mr. Adam and his tuba. The effect of this long solo for a deep-voiced instrument, almost never thrust into such prominence, was peculiarly satisfying—a new tone sensation.

Roussel's Third

As memorial to Roussel, who died last August, Dr. Koussevitzky chose for performance the Third Symphony, in G minor, one of the works composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary season. It would be rash to call this a great symphony, but there is no presumption in pronouncing it a fine one, written at a time when the composing of notable symphonies had become almost a lost art. With Roussel unfortunately out of the picture, Sibelius and Vaughan-Williams appear as the two living composers who have wrought significantly in this exacting form.

The weakness of this Third Symphony, if weakness it be, is the intrusion of so much that is vigorous into the Adagio, producing very nearly the effect of four fast movements. Roussel has proved elsewhere that he is not incapable of expressive lyricism, as that element is understood in our day, even if he largely shuns it here. And from first to last this symphony has a tonic, vital quality. Abundantly melodious, it avoids at every turn the trite and obvious. The applause yesterday, while hearty, was less than piece and performance deserved.

Mr. Gieseking's Playing

As a rule it is best to adhere to the chronological order in programme building. But if some ears found Beethoven's orchestra somewhat bare after that of the triad of moderns and his adherence to traditional form and accepted formula a trifle bald after Roussel's ingenious evasion of them, most of the audience hailed the Concerto, or its performance, rapturously.

Mr. Gieseking's masterly, if somewhat detached and calculated version of the piano part was made known to us seven years ago. Yesterday it seemed essentially unchanged.

27

URDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1937

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Gieseking, the first soloist of the new Boston Symphony season, gave a heavenly performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto at the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This great pianist's perfection of style and technic, and the poetic quality of his interpretation cast into shade the earlier portion of a program rather unusual so far as musical craftsmanship was concerned.

Dr Koussevitzky began the afternoon with Ravel's orchestration of his own piano piece, "Pavane For a Dead Infanta;" continued with Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" and the Third Symphony by the late Albert Roussel.

Superlatives were long since exhausted in the case of Mr Gieseking. In Boston he is a familiar and admired artist who visits us all too seldom. His sympathies extend to 18th century, romantic and modern music, and he plays each category with equal success. Though the "Emperor" Concerto may not be the best that Beethoven wrote, it is distinguished music and demands not only consummate execution but mental maturity. Mr Gieseking's treatment was absolutely superb.

The pianist was welcomed with a warmth extended by Bostonians only to favorites of thorough acquaintance. Applause between movements of the Concerto was generous, and at the end assumed the proportions of an "ovation." But Mr Gieseking did not play an encore, as he did on a memorable Friday afternoon two years ago last Spring, when his addition of Strauss' "Serenade" to the C minor Concerto of Rachmaninoff shattered tradition and took away a year's growth from many in the audience.

For some reason, perhaps because it is minor Ravel, the "Pavane For a Dead Infanta" had not before been played at a symphony concert. This is essentially simple music, given richness of color by Ravel's genius for the orchestra and unmistakably a product of before the war. It was almost amusing to hear from Ravel, 20 years a musical ironist, lush consecutive ninth chords for strings. No composer would dare to write that way nowadays.

Roussel's Third Symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died last August. First heard during the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary year, for which it was commissioned, the work has been repeated but a few times since. And already there are signs of decay. In fact the insistent vigor of all but the slow movement suggested a composer forcing himself, by the device of reiteration, to appear lively and humorous.

For substance alone, the slow movement is probably the high point of the symphony. Yet Roussel's finest quality: that of smooth facture, is evident from the first page to the last. The aristocratic manner of Roussel appears in all his music, and at least in his later work his voice is distinctly his own. Time may at length convince us, however, that such an art, flourishing in a period notable for creative dryness and monotony, was overrated because Roussel had few competitors of equal stature.

Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" had gone unheard in Boston since the first public performance, at Symphony Hall in 1930. Martelli, born in Corsica, strove to depict four bas-reliefs of ancient Assyria. He did so in a literal sort of way, showing genuine imagination only in the last tone-picture, "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal." Though he wrote elaborately for large orchestras, to which extra percussion instruments were added, his music does not sound vast and intricate. The intentional crudity of the score furthermore lacks the sweeping energy commonly associated with barbaric art. How differently would Ravel or Prokofieff have treated such a subject!

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture and "Scotch" Symphony will be presented, together with the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet."—C. W. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 24 1937

'Commuters' Plan' For Hub Symphony

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday night performance of an identical program.

Dr Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—one hundred and ten men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday nights, or six on Tuesday afternoons, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until three o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday night concerts are: Tomorrow, December 27, January 17, February 21, March 21, April 18. The Tuesday matinees are: Tuesday, December 28, January 18, February 22, March 22, April 19.

A census of Boston Symphony subscribers shows patronage extending far beyond Boston. Matinee audiences in traveling to Symphony hall for a single concert cover the equivalent of twice the distance around the world. Every Friday afternoon, listeners come from as far north as Castine and Bar Harbor, Me., as far east as Hyannis, as far west as Pittsfield, as far south as New Bedford, and as far to the southwest as Waterbury, Ct. Subscribers are residents of 216 communities in Massachusetts.

READING SYM

THE Reading Symphony Orchestra, which celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary this year, plans to make its current season an outstanding one in the history of serious music in the Pennsylvania community. The orchestra, under Hans Kindler, who enters his seventh year with the organization, will be augmented to ninety musicians, and guest artists will appear at every concert.

José Iturbi, pianist, will be heard with the orchestra next Sunday at the opening concert; Paul Althouse, Reading's own tenor, who began his musical career as soloist in a boy choir of that city, will sing Jan. 16, and Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist at the concert of Feb. 13. The final event, March 27, will feature Mozart's concerto for three pianos, which will be performed by the local pianists, Gertrude Sternbergh, Miriam Weise Heisler and Madeleine Brooke.

In addition to the regular series there will be two concerts for young people, as a result of the success of the Youth Concerts inaugurated last year in Reading. For these events all the public schools of the city cooperated last season by making study of the orchestra programs a part of the regular curriculum.

Originally numbering but fifty members, the Reading Symphony Orchestra now has seventy-five on its roster, only fifteen of whom are professional musicians. A [illegible] the players are residents of Philadelphia who perform on instruments not available in Reading. The rest are local musicians drawn from every walk of life.

Of the original orchestra, there are three members still in the service of the present organization. One of these is Otto Wittich, who has been the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor from the start.

It is a usual custom in small cities for the members of the orchestra to play without remuneration. But all performers in the Reading Symphony Orchestra have been paid from the beginning. This is due in large measure to the generosity of the audiences and to the efficiency of the Reading Musical Foundation, which subsidizes the orchestra for a certain amount each year.

Since its inception, Hugo Schumann, leading Reading industrialist, has served as the orchestra's president. Despite the extra expense involved in preparing this year's celebration, he and the board of directors have kept the subscription rate the same as in the past, prices ranging from $5 to $3, with a half rate on the $3 subscriptions to school children and music students. These prices have obtained for a number of years, in the face of rising costs of maintenance.

MUSIC

CONCERNING ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

By OLIN DOWNES

RIGHT now, in a place some distance from New York, a symphony orchestra is in a turmoil because the conductor, after testing each member of the orchestra by having him play, unidentified, behind a screen, has requested the retirement of ten players and their replacement with new men, most if not all of whom are younger than those invited to leave the organization. It must be understood that these replacements have not to do with wage scales or with any issue between the conductor and the rules of the Musicians Union. Nor are the merits or demerits of the players concerned known to this writer. But the principle involved is one worth considering as a theory of general application to the policies of all symphonic organizations, union or non-union, local or foreign, far or near. Granted the soundness of the conductor's judgment (in the case at issue he is a conductor of wide experience and international reputation); even granting the possibility of a test performance that belied a player's ability, the basic question seems very similar to one which confronted the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago—namely, the question of the quality of the orchestra, as contrasted with the feelings and problems of the dismissed players.

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky came to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1924-25 he was quick to praise the orchestra and its lofty traditions, exemplified in the performances as well as by the reputation that the celebrated orchestra bore everywhere. At the end of his season, however, he recommended the retirement of twenty-four musicians, and the infusion of new blood in the persons of twenty-four new players. There was a good deal of consternation when his recommendation was made known. There were expostulations, not only from the men and the friends of the men, who naturally opposed these changes, but even from some quarters connected with the management of the orchestra. It was realized that all the twenty-four men whose positions were threatened had pupils, families and supporters in town; that their dismissal would affect certain elements of the Boston Symphony's public unfavorably; that the departure of twenty-four men at one time would make heavy demands upon the orchestra's pension fund. There were plenty of reasons to go slow. To all of them Koussevitzky gave a plain and unequivocal reply. He asked, in effect, which was preferred by Boston—an orchestra of the very first rank, or a home for musicians.

* * *

The question was not one of unionism. This was a nonunion orchestra. It was a matter of music, and Koussevitzky carried his point. There was a fuss, a big fuss, and considerable dissension. Some of it came out in the newspapers. The ultimate consequence was that the Boston Symphony, having gone through a number of disastrous experiences resulting from circumstances of the World War, and a strike very injurious to its membership, again forged to the front and has since retained that position as one of the two or three leading orchestras of the world.

Or put it another way. Some time ago, abroad, a conductor who was preparing a historic Wagner performance called his secretary. "Write me a letter." The letter was addressed to one of the singers with whom he had been rehearsing. In outline it read, "Dear Mr. . . . I have noticed your fatigue at our rehearsals and the fact that you are not very well. Would it not be best if you took a few days' rest at some near-by pleasant resort?" This, of course, was a direct request for resignation. The secretary said, "But master, that is a hard letter to write to an artist who has done such great and honorable service." The master answered, "Whom am I defending? That artist or Richard Wagner?"

It is a point of view not always appreciated, often hardly understood by those to whom art is a matter of a much needed job or a chance to make a lot of money. The bigger issue would be to them idealistic nonsense—the defense of the music of Richard Wagner. The only pity is that there are so few, among either the leaders or the rank and file of musicians, who look so high and cut so clean.

* * *

The orchestral field in this country is a big one, which is constantly widening. There is a growing need of orchestral players. A number of institutions are turning out material to meet this need. Nevertheless, there is a dearth of first-class men, particularly noticeable this year, which has seen in New York and in Pittsburgh the formation of two new symphony orchestras. It may seem astonishing that this is the case, at a time of so much unemployment, and so many musicians on the payroll of the government. But it is so, and it is so principally because politics and commercialism reign to the extent that they do in the ranks of orchestral musicians, who are, logically, deeply concerned with jobs and wage scales, but not nearly as concerned as they could afford to be with musical values.

But these values could be established without preaching or pressure from any outside quarter to bring it to pass, if the biggest and most influential musical institution in the country took it upon itself to enforce them. The reference, of course, is to the Musicians Union and its exceptional position.

* * *

We would like to see this Union, formed years ago to save musicians from the outrageous and intolerable treatment they often had experienced in previous times, more unified and more formidable than it is. Having enforced minimum wage scales and other rulings indispensable for the proper treatment of its members, it would seem that the Musicians Union is in a position to develop itself, and strengthen its prestige from the inside. It could have such strict laws regarding the competency and musicianship of its members that a Union endorsement of a player would in itself be a guarantee to a prospective employer of the player's ability.

There was a time in the Middle Ages when unionism in the form of the guilds showed that spirit and took pride in its accomplishments, and would not tolerate incompetency. If a shoemaker sold an inferior pair of shoes the act would shame him and lessen his rank in his organization. A baker was conscious of his duties, jealous of his dignity and concerned with his obligations.

If some student of sociology came along at this moment he would probably interpose that such ideals on the part of workers had been lost through their exploitation by employers in later periods, and as a consequence of their having no personal interest in their accomplishment or any incentive to give the public good work and good measure. And that would in part be true. But a very strong weapon that a modern union could wield in an artistic field would be forged by its own insistence upon at least as high levels of knowledge and efficiency as would be asked of its members by any outside individual or organization.

* * *

If this were done, and coupled with sound and skillful diplomacy, the position of musical unionism would gradually become invincible. It could elevate musical standards and not, as in too many present cases, depress them in the name of economic equality. Suppose that when a conductor asked for a first horn he were told that in plain fact no man good enough for the first horn's position was at present available; that as a substitute, if strictly necessary, a man of somewhat inferior tone and technic could be supplied until a person of the proper caliber were found, and that the union machinery would set at once to work to find him. Suppose that, the minimum wage established, there were grades of ability and experience which had to be attained before the union would permit a player to enter the more highly paid class of performers. Suppose the union had not only its own training schools, but some modern equivalent of an apprentice and journeyman's system whereby the younger members gradually gained the knowledge, skill and taste of real artists. Suppose a ruling were made against a man who knew nothing but the methods and the technic of jazz being just as available as another man for a position in a symphony orchestra. Suppose that the union and employers with whom it has dealings could meet together, as others have done, in a way of mutual accommodation, not to see what could be squeezed out or squeezed down when it came to financial arrangements, but to find ways and means, not impossible, whereby longer engagements for players and more liberal agreements regarding time for the rehearsing of finished performances could be arranged.

* * *

There are plenty of other "supposes." It costs nothing to speak of that which can be dismissed as impractical or entirely Utopian. But the glory of artistic achievement and the payment of a wage that insures a life worth living are not incompatible. Greatly desired changes, in one form or another, will take place, in a time when all sorts of adjustments are occurring, slowly in comparison to the need, rapidly in comparison with the tempo of the former century. They are due to be felt in music as in all the other ways that affect living. In the meantime a merely intelligent, therefore artistic as well as practical, objective on the part of every one concerned with music would work for the benefit of business, and art, and the public.

TIME
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 25 1937

Canapés and Compromise

When the Boston fire of 1872 threatened to destroy the First National Bank, its cash was removed for several days and worried bankers set up a day & night watch over it. Meanwhile they were fed by Boston's famed Parker House. One day last week the Parker House again went to the First National's assistance. Ten minutes after closing, workmen set about removing grills, glass desk tops, accounting machines and money from the bank's vaulted granite lobby and into their place went 12,000 glasses, 700 trays, 2,000 qt. of liquor, 3,000 qt. of soda and ginger ale.

Next day there arrived 50 lb. of caviar, 200 lb. of lobster, 10,000 fish balls, 12,000 tea sandwiches, 100 boxes of cigars, 6,000 packages of cigarets. That afternoon none other than Sergei Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra mounted a temporary dais, tuned up while into the clattery room for cocktails and canapés crammed some 4,000 men & women attending the 63rd annual convention of the American Bankers Association. In a din so constant that Maestro Koussevitzky once threw up his hands and stamped off the stage, the orchestra proceeded to play.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 26 1937

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Haydn, Prokofieff, Sibelius Works Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at Symphony Hall there was inaugurated the new regime of paired Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts, with the same programme for each. On this initial list were two items which had already been played this season at the regular concerts, the Suite made from Prokofieff's music for the Russian film, "Lieutenant Kije," and the second Symphony of Sibelius. As preface to these quite dissimilar works came, as representative of yet another style and period, Haydn's 88th Symphony in G major.

That Haydn was able, with all his other work, to write as many as 104 symphonies, is in itself remarkable. There are a lot of notes, even in a symphony of Haydn. But that there should have been so many fine symphonies among them, is more remarkable still. Haydn's level of achievement was high. If he knew how to write poor music, that fact has been mercifully withheld from us.

The symphony of last evening, composed in 1787 as one of a dozen written for a Parisian society, is one of the best, ranking easily with the 12 composed for London. It is not too much to say that its slow movement, the nobly songful Largo in D major, is the finest specimen of its kind in all 18th century music. Even Beethoven surpassed it only once or twice. The performance accorded this movement last evening was both eloquent and restrained and it afforded us a new appreciation of Haydn as orchestral colorist. The other and gayer portions of the Symphony fared no less well.

With the witty music of Prokofieff and the magnificent Symphony of Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky and [illegible] chestra repeated [illegible] audience, which virtu [illegible] was suitably enth

(27)

URDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1937

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Gieseking, the first soloist of the new Boston Symphony season, gave a heavenly performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto at the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This great pianist's perfection of style and technic, and the poetic quality of his interpretation cast into shade the earlier portion of a program rather unusual so far as musical craftsmanship was concerned.

Dr Koussevitzky began the afternoon with Ravel's orchestration of his own piano piece, "Pavane For a Dead Infanta;" continued with Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" and the Third Symphony by the late Albert Roussel.

Superlatives were long since exhausted in the case of Mr Gieseking. In Boston he is a familiar and admired artist who visits us all too seldom. His sympathies extend to 18th century, romantic and modern music, and he plays each category with equal success. Though the "Emperor" Concerto may not be the best that Beethoven wrote, it is distinguished music and demands not only consummate execution but mental maturity. Mr Gieseking's treatment was absolutely superb.

The pianist was welcomed with a warmth extended by Bostonians only to favorites of thorough acquaintance. Applause between movements of the Concerto was generous, and at the end assumed the proportions of an "ovation." But Mr Gieseking did not play an encore, as he did on a memorable Friday afternoon two years ago last Spring, when his addition of Strauss' "Serenade" to the C minor Concerto of Rachmaninoff shattered tradition and took away a year's growth from many in the audience.

For some reason, perhaps because it is minor Ravel, the "Pavane For a Dead Infanta" had not before been played at a symphony concert. This is essentially simple music, given richness of color by Ravel's genius for the orchestra and unmistakably a product of before the war. It was almost amusing to hear from Ravel, 20 years a musical ironist, lush consecutive ninth chords for strings. No composer would dare to write that way nowadays.

Roussel's Third Symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died last August. First heard during the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary year, for which it was commissioned, the work has been repeated but a few times since. And already there are signs of decay. In fact the insistent vigor of all but the slow movement suggested a composer forcing himself, by the device of reiteration, to appear lively and humorous.

For substance alone, the slow movement is probably the high point of the symphony. Yet Roussel's finest quality: that of smooth facture, is evident from the first page to the last. The aristocratic manner of Roussel appears in all his music, and at least in his later work his voice is distinctly his own. Time may at length convince us, however, that such an art, flourishing in a period notable for creative dryness and monotony, was overrated because Roussel had few competitors of equal stature.

Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" had gone unheard in Boston since the first public performance, at Symphony Hall in 1930. Martelli, born in Corsica, strove to depict four bas-reliefs of ancient Assyria. He did so in a literal sort of way, showing genuine imagination only in the last tone-picture, "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal." Though he wrote elaborately for large orchestras, to which extra percussion instruments were added, his music does not sound vast and intricate. The intentional crudity of the score furthermore lacks the sweeping energy commonly associated with barbaric art. How differently would Ravel or Prokofieff have treated such a subject!

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture and "Scotch" Symphony will be presented, together with the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet."—C. W. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 24 1937

Commuters' Plan' For Hub Symphony

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday night performance of an identical program.

Dr Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—one hundred and ten men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday nights, or six on Tuesday afternoons, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until three o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday night concerts are: Tomorrow, December 27, January 17, February 21, March

SOLUTION: Win with ace and ruff the heart deuce. Lead club to ace. Lead heart jack. West must cover ruff in dummy. Lead out all trumps

---

READING SYMPHONY JUBILEE

THE Reading Symphony Orchestra, which celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary this year, plans to make its current season an outstanding one in the history of serious music in the Pennsylvania community. The orchestra, under Hans Kindler, who enters his seventh year with the organization, will be augmented to ninety musicians, and guest artists will appear at every concert.

José Iturbi, pianist, will be heard with the orchestra next Sunday at the opening concert; Paul Althouse, Reading's own tenor, who began his musical career as soloist in a boy choir of that city, will sing Jan. 16, and Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist at the concert of Feb. 13. The final event, March 27, will feature Mozart's concerto for three pianos, which will be performed by the local pianists, Gertrude Sternbergh, Miriam Weise Heisler and Madeleine Brooke.

In addition to the regular series there will be two concerts for young people, as a result of the success of the Youth Concerts inaugurated last year in Reading. For these events all the public schools of the city cooperated last season by making study of the orchestra programs a part of the regular curriculum.

Originally numbering but fifty members, the Reading Symphony Orchestra now has seventy-five on its roster, only fifteen of whom are professional musicians. A few of the players are residents of Philadelphia who perform on instruments not available in Reading. The rest are local musicians drawn from every walk of life.

Of the original orchestra, there are three members still in the service of the present organization. One of these is Otto Wittich, who has been the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor from the start.

It is a usual custom in small cities for the members of the orchestra to play without remuneration. But all performers in the Reading Symphony Orchestra have been paid from the beginning. This is due in large measure to the generosity of the audiences and to the efficiency of the Reading Musical Foundation, which subsidizes the orchestra for a certain amount each year.

Since its inception, Hugo Schumann, leading Reading industrialist, has served as the orchestra's president. Despite the extra expense involved in preparing this year's celebration, he and the board of directors have kept the subscription rate the same as in the past, prices ranging from $5 to $3, with a half rate on the $3 subscriptions to school children and music students. These prices have obtained for a number of years, in the face of rising costs of maintenance.

MUSIC

CONCERNING ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

By OLIN DOWNES

RIGHT now, in a place some distance from New York, a symphony orchestra is in a turmoil because the conductor, after testing each member of the orchestra by having him play, unidentified, behind a screen, has requested the retirement of ten players and their replacement with new men, most if not all of whom are younger than those invited to leave the organization. It must be understood that these replacements have not to do with wage scales or with any issue between the conductor and the rules of the Musicians Union. Nor are the merits or demerits of the players concerned known to this writer. But the principle involved is one worth considering as a theory of general application to the policies of all symphonic organizations, union or non-union, local or foreign, far or near. Granted the soundness of the conductor's judgment (in the case at issue he is a conductor of wide experience and international reputation); even granting the possibility of a test performance that belied a player's ability, the basic question seems very similar to one which confronted the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago—namely, the question of the quality of the orchestra, as contrasted with the feelings and problems of the dismissed players.

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky came to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1924-25 he was quick to praise the orchestra and its lofty traditions, exemplified in the performances as well as by the reputation that the celebrated orchestra bore everywhere. At the end of his season, however, he recommended the retirement of twenty-four musicians, and the infusion of new blood in the persons of twenty-four new players. There was a good deal of consternation when his recommendation was made known. There were expostulations, not only from the men and the friends of the men, who naturally opposed these changes, but even from some quarters connected with the management of the orchestra. It was realized that all the twenty-four men whose positions were threatened had pupils, families and supporters in town; that their dismissal would affect certain elements of the Boston Symphony's public unfavorably; that the departure of twenty-four men at one time would make heavy demands upon the orchestra's pension fund. There were plenty of reasons to go slow. To all of them Koussevitzky gave a plain and unequivocal reply. He asked, in effect, which was preferred by Boston—an orchestra of the very first rank, or a home for musicians.

* * *

The question was not one of unionism. This was a nonunion orchestra. It was a matter of music, and Koussevitzky carried his point. There was a fuss, a big fuss, and considerable dissension. Some of it came out in the newspapers. The ultimate consequence was that the Boston Symphony, having gone through a number of disastrous experiences resulting from circumstances of the World War, and a strike very injurious to its membership, again forged to the front and has since retained that position as one of the two or three leading orchestras of the world.

Or put it another way. Some time ago, abroad, a conductor who was preparing a historic Wagner performance called his secretary. "Write me a letter." The letter was addressed to one of the singers with whom he had been rehearsing. In outline it read, "Dear Mr. . . . I have noticed your fatigue at our rehearsals and the fact that you are not very well. Would it not be best if you took a few days' rest at some near-by pleasant resort?" This, of course, was a direct request for resignation. The secretary said, "But master, that is a hard letter to write to an artist who has done such great and honorable service." The master answered, "Whom am I defending? That artist or Richard Wagner?"

It is a point of view not always appreciated, often hardly understood by those to whom art is a matter of a much needed job or a chance to make a lot of money. The bigger issue would be to them idealistic nonsense—the defense of the music of Richard Wagner. The only pity is that there are so few, among either the leaders or the rank and file of musicians, who look so high and cut so clean.

* * *

The orchestral field in this country is a big one, which is constantly widening. There is a growing need of orchestral players. A number of institutions are turning out material to meet this need. Nevertheless, there is a dearth of first-class men, particularly noticeable this year, which has seen in New York and in Pittsburgh the formation of two new symphony orchestras. It may seem astonishing that this is the case, at a time of so much unemployment, and so many musicians on the payroll of the government. But it is so, and it is so principally because politics and commercialism reign to the extent that they do in the ranks of orchestral musicians, who are, logically, deeply concerned with jobs and wage scales, but not nearly as concerned as they could afford to be with musical values.

But these values could be established without preaching or pressure from any outside quarter to bring it to pass, if the biggest and most influential musical institution in the country took it upon itself to enforce them. The reference, of course, is to the Musicians Union and its exceptional position.

* * *

We would like to see this Union, formed years ago to save musicians from the outrageous and intolerable treatment they often had experienced in previous times, more unified and more formidable than it is. Having enforced minimum wage scales and other rulings indispensable for the proper treatment of its members, it would seem that the Musicians Union is in a position to develop itself, and strengthen its prestige from the inside. It could have such strict laws regarding the competency and musicianship of its members that a Union endorsement of a player would in itself be a guarantee to a prospective employer of the player's ability.

There was a time in the Middle Ages when unionism in the form of the guilds showed that spirit and took pride in its accomplishments, and would not tolerate incompetency. If a shoemaker sold an inferior pair of shoes the act would shame him and lessen his rank in his organization. A baker was conscious of his duties, jealous of his dignity and concerned with his obligations.

If some student of sociology came along at this moment he would probably interpose that such ideals on the part of workers had been lost through their exploitation by employers in later periods, and as a consequence of their having no personal interest in their accomplishment or any incentive to give the public good work and good measure. And that would in part be true. But a very strong weapon that a modern union could wield in an artistic field would be forged by its own insistence upon at least as high levels of knowledge and efficiency as would be asked of its members by any outside individual or organization.

* * *

If this were done, and coupled with sound and skillful diplomacy, the position of musical unionism would gradually become invincible. It could elevate musical standards and not, as in too many present cases, depress them in the name of economic equality. Suppose that when a conductor asked for a first horn he were told that in plain fact no man good enough for the first horn's position was at present available; that as a substitute, if strictly necessary, a man of somewhat inferior tone and technic could be supplied until a person of the proper caliber were found, and that the union machinery would set at once to work to find him. Suppose that, the minimum wage established, there were grades of ability and experience which had to be attained before the union would permit a player to enter the more highly paid class of performers. Suppose the union had not only its own training schools, but some modern equivalent of an apprentice and journeyman's system whereby the younger members gradually gained the knowledge, skill and taste of real artists. Suppose a ruling were made against a man who knew nothing but the methods and the technic of jazz being just as available as another man for a position in a symphony orchestra. Suppose that the union and employers with whom it has dealings could meet together, as others have done, in a way of mutual accommodation, not to see what could be squeezed out or squeezed down when it came to financial arrangements, but to find ways and means, not impossible, whereby longer engagements for players and more liberal agreements regarding time for the rehearsing of finished performances could be arranged.

* * *

There are plenty of other "supposes." It costs nothing to speak of that which can be dismissed as impractical or entirely Utopian. But the glory of artistic achievement and the payment of a wage that insures a life worth living are not incompatible. Greatly desired changes, in one form or another, will take place, in a time when all sorts of adjustments are occurring, slowly in comparison to the need, rapidly in comparison with the tempo of the former century. They are due to be felt in music as in all the other ways that affect living. In the meantime a merely intelligent, therefore artistic as well as practical, objective on the part of every one concerned with music would work for the benefit of business, and art, and the public.

TIME
CHICAGO, ILL.

OCT 25 1937

Canapés and Compromise

When the Boston fire of 1872 threatened to destroy the First National Bank, its cash was removed for several days and worried bankers set up a day & night watch over it. Meanwhile they were fed by Boston's famed Parker House. One day last week the Parker House again went to the First National's assistance. Ten minutes after closing, workmen set about removing grills, glass desk tops, accounting machines and money from the bank's vaulted granite lobby and into their place went 12,000 glasses, 700 trays, 2,000 qt. of liquor, 3,000 qt. of soda and ginger ale.

Next day there arrived 50 lb. of caviar, 200 lb. of lobster, 10,000 fish balls, 12,000 tea sandwiches, 100 boxes of cigars, 6,000 packages of cigarets. That afternoon none other than Sergei Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra mounted a temporary dais, tuned up while into the clattery room for cocktails and canapés crammed some 4,000 men & women attending the 63rd annual convention of the American Bankers Association. In a din so constant that Maestro Koussevitzky once threw up his hands and stamped off the stage, the orchestra proceeded to play.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 26 1937

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Haydn, Prokofieff, Sibelius Works Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at Symphony Hall there was inaugurated the new regime of paired Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts, with the same programme for each. On this initial list were two items which had already been played this season at the regular concerts, the Suite made from Prokofieff's music for the Russian film, "Lieutenant Kije," and the second Symphony of Sibelius. As preface to these quite dissimilar works came, as representative of yet another style and period, Haydn's 88th Symphony in G major.

That Haydn was able, with all his other work, to write as many as 104 symphonies, is in itself remarkable. There are a lot of notes, even in a symphony of Haydn. But that there should have been so many fine symphonies among them, is more remarkable still. Haydn's level of achievement was high. If he knew how to write poor music, that fact has been mercifully withheld from us.

The symphony of last evening, composed in 1787 as one of a dozen written for a Parisian society, is one of the best, ranking easily with the 12 composed for London. It is not too much to say that its slow movement, the nobly songful Largo in D major, is the finest specimen of its kind in all 18th century music. Even Beethoven surpassed it only once or twice. The performance accorded this movement last evening was both eloquent and restrained and it afforded us a new appreciation of Haydn as orchestral colist. The other and gayer portions of the Symphony fared no less well.

With the witty music of Prokofieff and the magnificent Symphony of belius, Dr. Koussevitzky and chestra repeated recent audience, which virtu was suitably enth

Globe

(27)

URDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1937

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Gieseking, the first soloist of the new Boston Symphony season, gave a heavenly performance of Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto at the concert in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. This great pianist's perfection of style and technic, and the poetic quality of his interpretation cast into shade the earlier portion of a program rather unusual so far as musical craftsmanship was concerned.

Dr Koussevitzky began the afternoon with Ravel's orchestration of his own piano piece, "Pavane For a Dead Infanta;" continued with Henri Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" and the Third Symphony by the late Albert Roussel.

Superlatives were long since exhausted in the case of Mr Gieseking. In Boston he is a familiar and admired artist who visits us all too seldom. His sympathies extend to 18th century, romantic and modern music, and he plays each category with equal success. Though the "Emperor" Concerto may not be the best that Beethoven wrote, it is distinguished music and demands not only consummate execution but mental maturity. Mr Gieseking's treatment was absolutely superb.

The pianist was welcomed with a warmth extended by Bostonians only to favorites of thorough acquaintance. Applause between movements of the Concerto was generous, and at the end assumed the proportions of an "ovation." But Mr Gieseking did not play an encore, as he did on a memorable Friday afternoon two years ago last Spring, when his addition of Strauss' "Serenade" to the C minor Concerto of Rachmaninoff shattered tradition and took away a year's growth from many in the audience.

For some reason, perhaps because it is minor Ravel, the "Pavane For a Dead Infanta" had not before been played at a symphony concert. This is essentially simple music, given richness of color by Ravel's genius for the orchestra and unmistakably a product of before the war. It was almost amusing to hear from Ravel, 20 years a musical ironist, lush consecutive ninth chords for strings. No composer would dare to write that way nowadays.

Roussel's Third Symphony was played in memory of the composer, who died last August. First heard during the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary year, for which it was commissioned, the work has been repeated but a few times since. And already there are signs of decay. In fact the insistent vigor of all but the slow movement suggested a composer forcing himself, by the device of reiteration, to appear lively and humorous.

For substance alone, the slow movement is probably the high point of the symphony. Yet Roussel's finest quality: that of smooth facture, is evident from the first page to the last. The aristocratic manner of Roussel appears in all his music, and at least in his later work his voice is distinctly his own. Time may at length convince us, however, that such an art, flourishing in a period notable for creative dryness and monotony, was overrated because Roussel had few competitors of equal stature.

Martelli's "Assyrian Bas-Reliefs" had gone unheard in Boston since the first public performance, at Symphony Hall in 1930. Martelli, born in Corsica, strove to depict four bas-reliefs of ancient Assyria. He did so in a literal sort of way, showing genuine imagination only in the last tone-picture, "The Army and Musicians of Ashurbanipal." Though he wrote elaborately for large orchestras, to which extra percussion instruments were added, his music does not sound vast and intricate. The intentional crudity of the score furthermore lacks the sweeping energy commonly associated with barbaric art. How differently would Ravel or Prokofieff have treated such a subject!

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture and "Scotch" Symphony will be presented, together with the tone poem "Tapiola" by Sibelius, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet."—C. W. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 24 1937

Commuters' Plan' For Hub Symphony

An innovation in the operating plans of the Boston Symphony orchestra is to be made, which musical authorities predict will prove of great significance to hundreds outside the ranks of confirmed weekly symphony concertgoers. The announcement comes from Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra.

The concerts of the "regular" season are played every week except when the orchestra is on tour. Patrons have the choice of subscribing, or seeking single tickets, for a Friday afternoon or a Saturday night performance of an identical program.

Dr Koussevitzky's new plan offers to those who cannot, or do not wish to, attend symphonic programs weekly, the opportunity to attend once a month. These performances will comprise six paired programs, instead of 24. Hence the subscription cost will be lower than for the longer series, although the full strength of the orchestra will play—one hundred and ten men. Patrons of the shorter series will have the choice of six concerts on Monday nights, or six on Tuesday afternoons, with an identical program.

To those living outside Boston, the Tuesday matinees will offer the convenient feature of not commencing until three o'clock. Music-loving out-of-towners, it is thought, will find this an advantage. They may visit or shop in Boston in the forenoon and early afternoon, and then "top off" the day by going in mid-afternoon to Symphony hall to enjoy the expressive conducting of Koussevitzky and the playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The dates for the Monday night concerts are: Tomorrow, December 27, January 17, February 21, March

SOLUTION: Win with ace and ruff the heart deuce. Lead club to ace. Lead heart jack. West must cover ruff in dummy. Lead out all trumps

---

N. Y. Times - Oct. 31/37

READING SYMPHONY JUBILEE

THE Reading Symphony Orchestra, which celebrates its twenty-fifth anniversary this year, plans to make its current season an outstanding one in the history of serious music in the Pennsylvania community. The orchestra, under Hans Kindler, who enters his seventh year with the organization, will be augmented to ninety musicians, and guest artists will appear at every concert.

José Iturbi, pianist, will be heard with the orchestra next Sunday at the opening concert; Paul Althouse, Reading's own tenor, who began his musical career as soloist in a boy choir of that city, will sing Jan. 16, and Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist at the concert of Feb. 13. The final event, March 27, will feature Mozart's concerto for three pianos, which will be performed by the local pianists, Gertrude Sternbergh, Miriam Weise Heisler and Madeleine Brooke.

In addition to the regular series there will be two concerts for young people, as a result of the success of the Youth Concerts inaugurated last year in Reading. For these events all the public schools of the city cooperated last season by making study of the orchestra programs a part of the regular curriculum.

Originally numbering but fifty members, the Reading Symphony Orchestra now has seventy-five on its roster, only fifteen of whom are professional musicians. A few of the players are residents of Philadelphia who perform on instruments not available in Reading. The rest are local musicians drawn from every walk of life.

Of the original orchestra, there are three members still in the service of the present organization. One of these is Otto Wittich, who has been the orchestra's concertmaster and assistant conductor from the start.

It is a usual custom in small cities for the members of the orchestra to play without remuneration. But all performers in the Reading Symphony Orchestra have been paid from the beginning. This is due in large measure to the generosity of the audiences and to the efficiency of the Reading Musical Foundation, which subsidizes the orchestra for a certain amount each year.

Since its inception, Hugo Schumann, leading Reading industrialist, has served as the orchestra's president. Despite the extra expense involved in preparing this year's celebration, he and the board of directors have kept the subscription rate the same as in the past, prices ranging from $5 to $3, with a half rate on the $3 subscriptions to school children and music students. These prices have obtained for a number of years, in the face of rising costs of maintenance.

Times N.Y. Oct 31 37

MUSIC

CONCERNING ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

By OLIN DOWNES

RIGHT now, in a place some distance from New York, a symphony orchestra is in a turmoil because the conductor, after testing each member of the orchestra by having him play, unidentified, behind a screen, has requested the retirement of ten players and their replacement with new men, most if not all of whom are younger than those invited to leave the organization. It must be understood that these replacements have not to do with wage scales or with any issue between the conductor and the rules of the Musicians Union. Nor are the merits or demerits of the players concerned known to this writer. But the principle involved is one worth considering as a theory of general application to the policies of all symphonic organizations, union or non-union, local or foreign, far or near. Granted the soundness of the conductor's judgment (in the case at issue he is a conductor of wide experience and international reputation); even granting the possibility of a test performance that belied a player's ability, the basic question seems very similar to one which confronted the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago—namely, the question of the quality of the orchestra, as contrasted with the feelings and problems of the dismissed players.

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky came to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1924-25 he was quick to praise the orchestra and its lofty traditions, exemplified in the performances as well as by the reputation that the celebrated orchestra bore everywhere. At the end of his season, however, he recommended the retirement of twenty-four musicians, and the infusion of new blood in the persons of twenty-four new players. There was a good deal of consternation when his recommendation was made known. There were expostulations, not only from the men and the friends of the men, who naturally opposed these changes, but even from some quarters connected with the management of the orchestra. It was realized that all the twenty-four men whose positions were threatened had pupils, families and supporters in town; that their dismissal would affect certain elements of the Boston Symphony's public unfavorably; that the departure of twenty-four men at one time would make heavy demands upon the orchestra's pension fund. There were plenty of reasons to go slow. To all of them Koussevitzky gave a plain and unequivocal reply. He asked, in effect, which was preferred by Boston—an orchestra of the very first rank, or a home for musicians.

* * *

The question was not one of unionism. This was a nonunion orchestra. It was a matter of music, and Koussevitzky carried his point. There was a fuss, a big fuss, and considerable dissension. Some of it came out in the newspapers. The ultimate consequence was that the Boston Symphony, having gone through a number of disastrous experiences resulting from circumstances of the World War, and a strike very injurious to its membership, again forged to the front and has since retained that position as one of the two or three leading orchestras of the world.

Or put it another way. Some time ago, abroad, a conductor who was preparing a historic Wagner performance called his secretary. "Write me a letter." The letter was addressed to one of the singers with whom he had been rehearsing. In outline it read, "Dear Mr. . . . I have noticed your fatigue at our rehearsals and the fact that you are not very well. Would it not be best if you took a few days' rest at some near-by pleasant resort?" This, of course, was a direct request for resignation. The secretary said, "But master, that is a hard letter to write to an artist who has done such great and honorable service." The master answered, "Whom am I defending? That artist or Richard Wagner?"

It is a point of view not always appreciated, often hardly understood by those to whom art is a matter of a much needed job or a chance to make a lot of money. The bigger issue would be to them idealistic nonsense—the defense of the music of Richard Wagner. The only pity is that there are so few, among either the leaders or the rank and file of musicians, who look so high and cut so clean.

* * *

The orchestral field in this country is a big one, which is constantly widening. There is a growing need of orchestral players. A number of institutions are turning out material to meet this need. Nevertheless, there is a dearth of first-class men, particularly noticeable this year, which has seen in New York and in Pittsburgh the formation of two new symphony orchestras. It may seem astonishing that this is the case, at a time of so much unemployment, and so many musicians on the payroll of the government. But it is so, and it is so principally because politics and commercialism reign to the extent that they do in the ranks of orchestral musicians, who are, logically, deeply concerned with jobs and wage scales, but not nearly as concerned as they could afford to be with musical values.

But these values could be established without preaching or pressure from any outside quarter to bring it to pass, if the biggest and most influential musical institution in the country took it upon itself to enforce them. The reference, of course, is to the Musicians Union and its exceptional position.

* * *

We would like to see this Union, formed years ago to save musicians from the outrageous and intolerable treatment they often had experienced in previous times, more unified and more formidable than it is. Having enforced minimum wage scales and other rulings indispensable for the proper treatment of its members, it would seem that the Musicians Union is in a position to develop itself, and strengthen its prestige from the inside. It could have such strict laws regarding the competency and musicianship of its members that a Union endorsement of a player would in itself be a guarantee to a prospective employer of the player's ability.

There was a time in the Middle Ages when unionism in the form of the guilds showed that spirit and took pride in its accomplishments, and would not tolerate incompetency. If a shoemaker sold an inferior pair of shoes the act would shame him and lessen his rank in his organization. A baker was conscious of his duties, jealous of his dignity and concerned with his obligations.

If some student of sociology came along at this moment he would probably interpose that such ideals on the part of workers had been lost through their exploitation by employers in later periods, and as a consequence of their having no personal interest in their accomplishment or any incentive to give the public good work and good measure. And that would in part be true. But a very strong weapon that a modern union could wield in an artistic field would be forged by its own insistence upon at least as high levels of knowledge and efficiency as would be asked of its members by any outside individual or organization.

* * *

If this were done, and coupled with sound and skillful diplomacy, the position of musical unionism would gradually become invincible. It could elevate musical standards and not, as in too many present cases, depress them in the name of economic equality. Suppose that when a conductor asked for a first horn he were told that in plain fact no man good enough for the first horn's position was at present available; that as a substitute, if strictly necessary, a man of somewhat inferior tone and technic could be supplied until a person of the proper caliber were found, and that the union machinery would set at once to work to find him. Suppose that, the minimum wage established, there were grades of ability and experience which had to be attained before the union would permit a player to enter the more highly paid class of performers. Suppose the union had not only its own training schools, but some modern equivalent of an apprentice and journeyman's system whereby the younger members gradually gained the knowledge, skill and taste of real artists. Suppose a ruling were made against a man who knew nothing but the methods and the technic of jazz being just as available as another man for a position in a symphony orchestra. Suppose that the union and employers with whom it has dealings could meet together, as others have done, in a way of mutual accommodation, not to see what could be squeezed out or squeezed down when it came to financial arrangements, but to find ways and means, not impossible, whereby longer engagements for players and more liberal agreements regarding time for the rehearsing of finished performances could be arranged.

* * *

There are plenty of other "supposes." It costs nothing to speak of that which can be dismissed as impractical or entirely Utopian. But the glory of artistic achievement and the payment of a wage that insures a life worth living are not incompatible. Greatly desired changes, in one form or another, will take place, in a time when all sorts of adjustments are occurring, slowly in comparison to the need, rapidly in comparison with the tempo of the former century. They are due to be felt in music as in all the other ways that affect living. In the meantime a merely intelligent, therefore artistic as well as practical, objective on the part of every one concerned with music would work for the benefit of business, and art, and the public.

TIME
CHICAGO, ILL.
OCT 25 1937

Canapés and Compromise

When the Boston fire of 1872 threatened to destroy the First National Bank, its cash was removed for several days and worried bankers set up a day & night watch over it. Meanwhile they were fed by Boston's famed Parker House. One day last week the Parker House again went to the First National's assistance. Ten minutes after closing, workmen set about removing grills, glass desk tops, accounting machines and money from the bank's vaulted granite lobby and into their place went 12,000 glasses, 700 trays, 2,000 qt. of liquor, 3,000 qt. of soda and ginger ale.

Next day there arrived 50 lb. of caviar, 200 lb. of lobster, 10,000 fish balls, 12,000 tea sandwiches, 100 boxes of cigars, 6,000 packages of cigarets. That afternoon none other than Sergei Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra mounted a temporary dais, tuned up while into the clattery room for cocktails and canapés crammed some 4,000 men & women attending the 63rd annual convention of the American Bankers Association. In a din so constant that Maestro Koussevitzky once threw up his hands and stamped off the stage, the orchestra proceeded to play.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 26 1937

SYMPHONY IN FIRST MONDAY

Haydn, Prokofieff, Sibelius Works Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening at Symphony Hall there was inaugurated the new regime of paired Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon Symphony concerts, with the same programme for each. On this initial list were two items which had already been played this season at the regular concerts, the Suite made from Prokofieff's music for the Russian film, "Lieutenant Kije," and the second Symphony of Sibelius. As preface to these quite dissimilar works came, as representative of yet another style and period, Haydn's 88th Symphony in G major.

That Haydn was able, with all his other work, to write as many as 104 symphonies, is in itself remarkable. There are a lot of notes, even in a symphony of Haydn. But that there should have been so many fine symphonies among them, is more remarkable still. Haydn's level of achievement was high. If he knew how to write poor music, that fact has been mercifully withheld from us.

The symphony of last evening, composed in 1787 as one of a dozen written for a Parisian society, is one of the best, ranking easily with the 12 composed for London. It is not too much to say that its slow movement, the nobly songful Largo in D major, is the finest specimen of its kind in all 18th century music. Even Beethoven surpassed it only once or twice. The performance accorded this movement last evening was both eloquent and restrained and it afforded us a new appreciation of Haydn as orchestral colorist. The other and gayer portions of the Symphony fared no less well.

With the witty music of Prokofieff and the magnificent Symphony of Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky and chestra repeated recent audience, which virtua was suitably enth

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 20 1937

Music

Brilliant Performance Given by Boston Symphony in First Concert of Season.—New Music by Prokofieff Gets a Hearing With Beethoven and Strauss.

By G. Y. Loveridge

An interesting program splendidly played was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first contribution to this city's music season. The audience last night very nearly filled the Metropolitan Theatre, and the customary landslide of automobiles blocked all the neighboring highways.

The first concert is not only the occasion for renewing acquaintance with the orchestra and its famed leader, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, but also a time for informal visiting among the listeners. The drone of conversation, accompanied by the nervous voices of violins and the grunts of horns, creates a rather pleasant confuson. It makes an effective setting for the entrance of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is to quiet the tumult and cause a more purposeful sound on the premises.

The conductor was greeted with enthusiasm. He bowed and smiled, apparently as glad to be back as the audience was to have him. Then he turned briskly to the business of the evening. Two crashing chords fired off Beethoven's "Eroica," and gave the listener to understand that it was the same Boston Symphony that took so vigorous a departure last season.

Dr Koussevitzy read the allegro zestfully. Long as it is, it held the attention, and it set up a truly heroic musical image, an image of ideas rather than of men. It was a virtuoso performance. One felt intensely the power of the young composer striking out for himself beyond the boundaries that great men preceding him had reached.

A good deal of ink has gone over the rollers in efforts to explain why Beethoven, if he had Napoleon or some other hero in mind when he wrote the symphony, buried him in chapter two and then went on to be humorous and lastly triumphant. Why is the second movement a funeral march? It will take only a little more ink to suggest that maybe Beethoven had observed that great men triumph more generally after death than before, that the extent of their conquests and also their defeats becomes apparent only slowly. It was so with Beethoven himself.

Or perhaps his only reason for putting the funeral march second was because it wouldn't be as effective for a last movement. As played last night, it did not have the same quality as the other parts, did not cohere as well, did not hold the listener with equal fascination.

The scherzo was a magnificent display of virtuosity. The precision of the horns and the stealthy chuckle of the bows bouncing on the strings were delightful. The orchestra spoke in tones that were bright and rich, and the perfect articulation of all these many parts was something to wonder at.

The finale swept along with such an air of triumph and certainty as only a master composer and a master interpreter can give. The balance and sensitivity of the orchestra and the delicate responsiveness of it, were magnificent. Dr. Koussevitzky was applauded heartily. The conductor waved the men to their feet.

After intermission, something new was heard—the suite "Lieutenant Kije," by Prokofieff. This music was written for a Soviet motion picture, the hero of which is the lieutenant. He does not really exist, but the Czar has a notion he does, and the courtiers are afraid to tell the Czar he is mistaken about anything. They invent adventures for the lieutenant and treat him as a real person.

For his hero, Beethoven got along without even trombones, but Prokofieff uses everything in sight, sleigh bells, saxophone, piano, celesta, and even something that isn't in sight, an off-stage trumpet. This music is lively and charming. The troika ride, for instance, with its sleigh-bells and the suggestion of the bassoon that an aristocrat is being thrown to the wolves.

This is not easy stuff to perform, however it may be to listen to. The off-stage trumpet produced some beautiful tenuous tones, a double-bass performed as a 'cello, a horn ventured precariously and successfully. There was spirit, wit, the surge of life in the whole thing, even when the lieutenant was being buried. Plainly it was one of the most merry funerals that ever took place.

The audience seemed to like it, and it is hoped that Dr. Koussevitzky will be encouraged to give us more new music. Much as the established fare is appreciated, one likes to sample something new now and then.

The program came to a riotous but orderly conclusion with the familiar antics of Till Eulenspiegel. Here again the performance was brilliant, and when Eulenspiegel was finally hanged everybody had to admit it was a neat job. Come to think of it, the mortality for the program was rather high, nearly equal to "Hamlet."

The program:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55.
  I. Allegro con brio.
  II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
  III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace; trio
  IV. Finale: Allegro molto
Prokofieff—"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60.
  I. Birth of Kije
  II. Romance
  III. Kije's Wedding
  IV. Troika
  V. Burial of Kije
Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Op. 28.

The Stradivarius Quartet gave a recital in Memorial Hall, Wheeler School yesterday forenoon. The musicians are Wolfe Wolfinson, first violin; Bernard Robbins, second violin; Marcel Dick, viola, and Iwan d'Archambeau, 'cello.

Quartet in C-major, opus 33, No. 3 ("The Bird") ....Haydn
  Allegro moderato
  Scherzando
  Adagio
  Rondo presto
In An Old Castel ......Moussorgsky-Pochon
La Fille aux Cheveux de Lin ....Debussy-Pochon
Molly on the Sohe ....Percy Grainger
Quartet in B-flat major ("The Hunt") ....Mozart
  Allegro vivace assai
  Minuetto moderato
  Adagio
  Allegro assai

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 20 1937

MUSIC

Beethoven's "Eroica" and a New Offering in Music, "Lieutenant Kije" by Prokofieff, Feature Opening Concert of Boston Symphony

By G. Y. Loveridge

An interesting program splendidly played was the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first contribution to this city's music season. The audience last night very nearly filled the Metropolitan Theatre, and the customary landslide of automobiles blocked all the neighboring highways.

(Etc. as above review)

WOBURN, MASS.
TIMES

OCT 27 1937

RESIDENTS ALL OVER N. E. CAME TO BOSTON TO HEAR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Resients of this district and every other point of the compass throughout New England journeyed to Symphony Hall, Boston yesterday, their object being to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, open a series of six "commuters' matinees." These concerts will be played monthly on Tuesdays, omitting November. For the special benefit of out-of-towners, the performances will not begin until three o'clock.

Music just played for the first time in the United States was on today's program. It is the amusing Suite from the Soviet Film "Lieutenant Kije." The work is by the celebrated living Russian composer, Sergei Prokofieff. He gives musical expression to a legend. This tells how a Czar, in reading a dispatch jumbled some words so as to form the non-existent name of "Lieutenant Kije." Since the courtiers dared not correct the Czar, they invented details of the birth, marriage and death of the imaginary officer. Koussevitzky opened the program with a delightful early example of the symphony—Haydn's Symphony Number Eighty-Eight. The Russian work followed. The entire second half of the program was devoted to the powerful Second Symphony of the illustrious contemporary Finnish master, Sibelius.

Some clubs eager to present music appreciation lectures have encountered discouraging financial and other difficulties in obtaining good musicians. But the Tuesday matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because of low subscription rates, have made it possible for groups of club members to hear the world's great masterpieces interpreted by Sergei Koussevitzky and his one hundred and nine virtuosos.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

OCT 27 1937

WOMAN CONDUCTOR Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, well-known French musician and conductor, will come to America in January to conduct several concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 29

See next page and one beyond for "Tues. afternoon concert" reviews, Oct. 27, 29.

TO CONDUCT IN BOSTON—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES-STAR

OCT 27 1937

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

OCT 27 1937

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

1937

TRENTON, N. J.
TIMES

ELIZABETH, N. J.
JOURNAL

OCT 27 1937

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH

1937

ST. JOSEPH, MO.
NEWS-PRESS

OCT 30 1937

MORGANTOWN, W. VA.
POST

OCT 28 1937

[illegible]

Jewish Advocate

29

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

While it is not possible for all people to gratify to the full their love of travel, a journey on the magic carpet of tone can, to the musically minded, prove a very acceptable substitute. Music knows no limitations of time or space as those fortunate enough to attend the fourth pair of Symphony concerts last week can testify.

Dr. Koussevitzky showed us a glimpse of sixteenth century Spain in Ravel's transcribed piano-piece, "Pavane for a Dead Infanta," in which the composer portrays the stately dance veiled in tender melancholy. The Spanish princess, now but a handful of dust, Ravel conveys, once trod the courtly measure in dignified splendor—not a new conceit this, but charming nevertheless.

Then at one swoop we were hurled backwards in time two thousand years to the barbaric magnificence of the Assyrian empire. The Corsican, Martelli, was in 1928 inspired to write a suite suggested by four Assyrian bas-reliefs, depicting a winged Jinnee, a dance, a lion and lioness, and the army and musicians of Ashurbanipal. This suite, performed with savage vigor by the orchestra, although not to be considered great music, might perhaps lend itself readily as an addition to choreographic repertoire—dancers take notice.

Back to the present now with Roussel's third Symphony, a vibrant work—well-knit and concise. Roussel does not disdain the past but he is thoroughly modern for all that. Was it accident or design that we heard the obstreperous strains of "Collegiate" as one of the themes?

Then came that superb pianist, Walter Gieseking, to transport us to the cosmic with Beethoven's marvelous Concerto No. 5. This was a performance by a giant of a giant's music. Gieseking is a paragon of all the pianistic virtues; he does not play his music—he lives it. The tremendous ovation accorded the soloist, the conductor and the orchestra, was an accurate judgment of surpassing merit.

Would you travel far and wide to strange lands and foreign peoples? Would you explore the infinite with the noble souls of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms? Would you see the exotic—the supernatural—the bizarre? Would you visit the land of elfs and fays? Then come to Symphony Hall; Koussevitzky will conduct you, first class and in no mean fashion.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 31 1937

Boston Symphony Season To Be Discussed at Tea

The members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be entertained at tea by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the committee, at her residence, 40A Monroe Place, on Nov. 8. Plans for the series of five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be made.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, vice chairman of the Brooklyn committee in charge of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League committee will make reports.

The series of five philanthropic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Science of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are the vice chairmen of the latter committee.

The 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will open Friday evening, Nov. 19. The other dates in the series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1. Mrs. Davenport announced the acceptance of seven new members of the Brooklyn committee: Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood and Miss Elizabeth Wright.

Members of Mrs. Badger's Junior League committee include: Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

Serving on the committee of Brooklyn residents sponsoring the orchestra in Brooklyn are: Sumner Ford, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Alvard Finn, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Theodore L. Frothingham, Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham.

Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Althea McCammon, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Frank Melville Jr., Miss Lillie Meurer, Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt.

Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross, Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Hon. William R. Bayes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Miss Anne Chapman, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Hon. Frederic E. Crane, Mrs. Frederic L. Cranford, Mrs. Walter HT. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Hon. Norman S. Dike, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val.

S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefson, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Miss Gertrude Van Brunt, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, MHrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Hon. George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 31 1937

CONCERNING ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

By OLIN DOWNES

RIGHT now, in a place some distance from New York, a symphony orchestra is in a turmoil because the conductor, after testing each member of the orchestra by having him play, unidentified, behind a screen, has requested the retirement of ten players and their replacement with new men, most if not all of whom are younger than those invited to leave the organization. It must be understood that these replacements have not to do with wage scales or with any issue between the conductor and the rules of the Musicians Union. Nor are the merits or demerits of the players concerned known to this writer. But the principle involved is one worth considering as a theory of general application to the policies of all symphonic organizations, union or non-union, local or foreign, far or near. Granted the soundness of the conductor's judgment (in the case at issue he is a conductor of wide experience and international reputation); even granting the possibility of a test performance that belied a player's ability, the basic question seems very similar to one which confronted the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago—namely, the question of the quality of the orchestra, as contrasted with the feelings and problems of the dismissed players.

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky came to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1924-25 he was quick to praise the orchestra and its lofty traditions, exemplified in the performances as well as by the reputation that the celebrated orchestra bore everywhere. At the end of his season, however, he recommended the retirement of twenty-four musicians, and the infusion of new blood in the persons of twenty-four new players. There was a good deal of consternation when his recommendation was made known. There were expostulations, not only from the men and the friends of the men, who naturally opposed these changes, but even from some quarters connected with the management of the orchestra. It was realized that all the twenty-four men whose positions were threatened had pupils, families and supporters in town; that their dismissal would affect certain elements of the Boston Symphony's public unfavorably; that the departure of twenty-four men at one time would make heavy demands upon the orchestra's pension fund. There were plenty of reasons to go slow. To all of them Koussevitzky gave a plain and unequivocal reply. He asked, in effect, which was preferred by Boston—an orchestra of the very first rank, or a home for musicians.

* * *

The question was not one of unionism. This was a nonunion orchestra. It was a matter of music, and Koussevitzky carried his point. There was a fuss, a big fuss, and considerable dissension. Some of it came out in the newspapers. The ultimate consequence was that the Boston Symphony, having gone through a number of disastrous experiences resulting from circumstances of the World War, and a strike very injurious to its membership, again forged to the front and has since retained that position as one of the two or three leading orchestras of the world.

Or put it another way. Some time ago, abroad, a conductor who was preparing a historic Wagner performance called his secretary. "Write me a letter." The letter was addressed to one of the singers with whom he had been rehearsing. In outline it read, "Dear Mr. . . . I have noticed your fatigue at our rehearsals and the fact that you are not very well. Would it not be best if you took a few days' rest at some near-by pleasant resort?" This, of course, was a direct request for resignation. The secretary said, "But master, that is a hard letter to write to an artist who has done such great and honorable service." The master answered, "Whom am I defending? That artist or Richard Wagner?"

It is a point of view not always appreciated, often hardly understood by those to whom art is a matter of a much needed job or a chance to make a lot of money. The bigger issue would be to them idealistic nonsense—the defense of the music of Richard Wagner. The only pity is that there are so few, among either the leaders or the rank and file of musicians, who look so high and cut so clean.

* * *

The orchestral field in this country is a big one, which is constantly widening. There is a growing need of orchestral players. A number of institutions are turning out material to meet this need. Nevertheless, there is a dearth of first-class men, particularly noticeable this year, which has seen in New York and in Pittsburgh the formation of two new symphony orchestras. It may seem astonishing that this is the case, at a time of so much unemployment, and so many musicians on the payroll of the government. But it is so, and it is so principally because politics and commercialism reign to the extent that they do in the ranks of orchestral musicians, who are, logically, deeply concerned with jobs and wage scales, but not nearly as concerned as they could afford to be with musical values.

But these values could be established without preaching or pressure from any outside quarter to bring it to pass, if the biggest and most influential musical institution in the country took it upon itself to enforce them. The reference, of course, is to the Musicians Union and its exceptional position.

* * *

We would like to see this Union, formed years ago to save musicians from the outrageous and intolerable treatment they often had experienced in previous times, more unified and more formidable than it is. Having enforced minimum wage scales and other rulings indispensable for the proper treatment of its members, it would seem that the Musicians Union is in a position to develop itself, and strengthen its prestige from the inside. It could have such strict laws regarding the competency and musicianship of its members that a Union endorsement of a player would in itself be a guarantee to a prospective employer of the player's ability.

There was a time in the Middle Ages when unionism in the form of the guilds showed that spirit and took pride in its accomplishments, and would not tolerate incompetency. If a shoemaker sold an inferior pair of shoes the act would shame him and lessen his rank in his organization. A baker was conscious of his duties, jealous of his dignity and concerned with his obligations.

If some student of sociology came along at this moment he would probably interpose that such ideals on the part of workers had been lost through their exploitation by employers in later periods, and as a consequence of their having no personal interest in their accomplishment or any incentive to give the public good work and good measure. And that would in part be true. But a very strong weapon that a modern union could wield in an artistic field would be forged by its own insistence upon at least as high levels of knowledge and efficiency as would be asked of its members by any outside individual or organization.

* * *

If this were done, and coupled with sound and skillful diplomacy, the position of musical unionism would gradually become invincible. It could elevate musical standards and not, as in too many present

29 cases, d econom when a horn he no man horn's p able; tha necessar ferior to supplied caliber w union ma to work t

the mini there were perience w before the player to e class of p union had schools, bu lent of an man's syste members knowledge, artists. Su made again nothing but technic of ja able as anot in a sympho that the uni whom it has together, as way of mutu

not to see what could be squeezed out or squeezed down when it came to financial arrangements, but to find ways and means, not impossible, whereby longer engagements for players and more liberal agreements regarding time for the rehearsing of finished performances could be arranged.

* * *

There are plenty of other "supposes." It costs nothing to speak of that which can be dismissed as impractical or entirely Utopian. But the glory of artistic achievement and the payment of a wage that insures a life worth living are not incompatible. Greatly desired changes, in one form or another, will take place, in a time when all sorts of adjustments are occurring, slowly in comparison to the need, rapidly in comparison with the tempo of the former century. They are due to be felt in music as in all the other ways that affect living. In the meantime a merely intelligent, therefore artistic as well as practical, objective on the part of every one concerned with music would work for the benefit of business, and art, and the public.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 28 1937

GOOD OUTLOOK FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Supplementary Matinee Series in Boston Well Attended—Evenings Popular.

It looks as if this is going to be a good symphony season in Boston. For the first matinee in the supplementary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra Tuesday the hall was practically filled. Few vacant seats were to be seen. And the Monday evening concert told a similar story. In the audience I was told were music lovers from every state in New England. The Tuesday afternoon concerts are especially convenient for commuters.

There is the impression that the new plan of pairing these monthly supplementary concerts on two consecutive days, with identical programs, is going to work out well, both for the orchestra and for the hearers. For one thing, it is going to make possible more careful preparation, although the Boston orchestra never slights that. Since the audiences are different there is no good reason why the program should be changed for each.

Dr. Koussevitzky this time had set a classic work, the Symphony in G major by Papa Haydn, against compositions by two contemporary composers. If the older work by contrast seemed somewhat naive, it was nevertheless delightful to hear. And the orchestra brought out its beauty.

Prokofieff's suite "Lieutenant Kije," arranged from music which he had composed for a Russian moving picture, proved bright and amusing in a modern idiom, although more melodious and less bizarre than many works by his contemporaries. The muted trumpet call at the opening, sounding as if from afar, and gradually merged with a whisper of the strings, was a notably fine effect. On the whole, there was joviality in the musical episides of the life of a wholly imaginary character.

The Second Symphony of Sibelius, which we heard at the opening of the regular series, was repeated with all the virtuosity that marked its playing then. It is colorful and thrilling music, gradually worked up to a colossal climax. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra clearly felt its power.

S. R. F.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the sixth pair of concerts of its season in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 12 and 13. Jacques Fevrier, a French pianist as yet unheard in this country, will appear as soloist in Ravel's Pianoforte Concerto for the Left Hand. M. Fevrier, who made a special study of the score with Ravel, performed it a fortnight ago in Paris with outstanding success, Ravel being present. He has been invited to come to America and appear in the work with this orchestra in Boston and New York. The concerto was written for Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, and had its first American performances by him under Koussevitzky's direction in 1934.

The little symphony in A major (K. 201) which Mozart wrote at the age of 18, and which was introduced at these concerts last season, will be repeated. The program will conclude with Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

79

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

While it is not possible for all people to gratify to the full their love of travel, a journey on the magic carpet of tone can, to the musically minded, prove a very acceptable substitute. Music knows no limitations of time or space as those fortunate enough to attend the fourth pair of Symphony concerts last week can testify.

Dr. Koussevitzky showed us a glimpse of sixteenth century Spain in Ravel's transcri[illegible] [illegible], "Pavane for a D[illegible]d In[illegible]," in which the composer portrays the stately dance veiled in tender melancholy. The Spanish princess, now but a handful of dust, Ravel conveys, once trod the courtly measure in dignified splendor—not a new conceit this, but charming nevertheless.

Then at one swoop we were hurled backwards in time two thousand years to the barbaric magnificence of the Assyrian empire. The Corsican, Martelli, was in 1928 inspired to write a suite suggested by four Assyrian bas-reliefs, depicting a winged Jinnee, a dance a lion and lioness, and the army and musicians of Ashurbanipal. This suite, performed with savage vigor by the orchestra, although not to be considered great music, might perhaps lend itself readily as an addition to choreographic repertoire—dancers take notice.

Back to the present now with Roussel's third Symphony, a vibrant work—well-knit and concise. Roussel does not disdain the past but he is thoroughly modern for all that. Was it accident or design that we heard the obstreperous strains of "Collegiate" as one of the themes?

Then came that superb pianist, Walter Gieseking, to transport us to the cosmic with Beethoven's marvelous Concerto No. 5. This was a performance by a giant of a giant's music. Gieseking is a paragon of all the pianistic virtues; he does not play his music—he lives it. The tremendous ovation accorded the soloist, the conductor and the orchestra, was an accurate judgment of surpassing merit.

Would you travel far and wide to strange lands and foreign peoples? Would you explore the infinite with the noble souls of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms? Would you see the exotic—the supernatural—the bizarre? Would you visit the land of elfs and fays? Then come to Symphony Hall: Koussevitzky will conduct you, first class and in no mean fashion.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

OCT 31 1937

Boston Symphony Season To Be Discussed at Tea

The members of the Brooklyn committee for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be entertained at tea by Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the committee, at her residence, 40A Monroe Place, on Nov. 8. Plans for the series of five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be made.

Mrs. Edward C. Blum, vice chairman of the Brooklyn committee in charge of boxes; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, new chairman of the Junior League committee will make reports.

The series of five philanthropic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Science of which Edward C. Blum is chairman of the Board of Trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are the vice chairmen of the latter committee.

The 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will open Friday evening, Nov. 19. The other dates in the series are Friday evening, Jan. 7; Thursday evening, Feb. 10; Friday evening, March 11, and Friday evening, April 1. Mrs. Davenport announced the acceptance of seven new members of the Brooklyn committee: Mrs. Ernest Ash, Theodore Fitch, Frank Hancock, Mrs. Robert E. Henry, Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, Mrs. Maud B. Wood and Miss Elizabeth Wright.

Members of Mrs. Badger's Junior League committee include: Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Miss Edith Warren.

Serving on the committee of Brooklyn residents sponsoring the orchestra in Brooklyn are: Sumner Ford, Mrs. Merrill N. Foote, Mrs. Alvard Finn, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis, Mrs. Charles W. Franklin, Theodore L. Frothingham, Mrs. George H. Gartlan, Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin, Mrs. Charles R. Gay, Mrs. Emil Goetsch, Miss Louise Goetze, Miss Theodora Goldsmith, Mrs. William B. Greenman, Mrs. J. Morton Halstead, Mrs. William Peter Hamilton, Walter Hammitt, Mrs. James M. Hills, Mrs. Roy Hart, Mrs. Earle P. Huff, Mrs. Russell S. Hume, Mrs. O. Paul Humpstone, William T. Hunter, Henry A. Ingraham.

Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. William A. Jewett, Mrs. Frederick L. Johanns, Ralph Jonas, James H. Jourdan, Mrs. Hans V. Kaltenborn, Jacob C. Klinck, David H. Lanman, Charles D. Lay, Mrs. Robert B. Lea, Mrs. John Eadie Leech, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. W. H. Lohman, Miss Hilda Loines, Mrs. Frederick D. MacKay, Miss Althea McCammon, Mrs. Charles J. McDermott, Mrs. William W. Marshall, Mrs. E. P. Maynard Jr., Mrs. Frank Melville Jr., Miss Lillie Meurer, Miss Irene Miles, Dr. Raymond B. Miles, Miss Ida A. Mollenhauer, Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, Neilson Olcott, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Frank H. Parsons, Mrs. Charles Elwell Perkins, James H. Post, Mrs. Charles E. Potts, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt.

Mrs. Richardson Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, G. William Rasch, Mrs. Frank Reynolds, Miss Jessie Righter, Mrs. Donald Ross, Dr. Joseph Dana Allen, Juan A. Almirall, John Anderson, Dr. Frank L. Babbott, Hon. William R. Bayes, Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum, Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley, Mrs. Samuel T. Brown, Mrs. Otis Swan Carroll, Mrs. Thomas F. Casey, Miss Anne Chapman, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Ellwood Colahan, Miss Frances H. Coutts, Mrs. Gordon Weir Colton, Hon. Frederic E. Crane, Mrs. Frederic L. Cranford, Mrs. Walter HT. Crittenden, Mrs. Russell V. Cruikshank, Dr. John H. Denbigh, Hon. Norman S. Dike, Mrs. Mary Childs Draper, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Guy Du Val.

S. Raymond Estey, Mrs. F. R. Schepmoes, Mrs. John D. H. Schulz, Mrs. Helen Warren Seeley, Robert Alfred Shaw, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. William Slater, Mrs. Harold Irving Small, Mrs. W. C. Spelman, Mrs. Ernest K. Tanner, Mrs. Franklin Taylor, Miss Marion J. Terry, Thornton C. Thayer, Carl H. Tollefson, Mrs. Walter Truslow, Miss Gertrude Van Brunt, Dr. Joshua M. Van Cott, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian Van Sinderen, Mrs. James P. Warbasse, Mrs. Edwin Carrington Ward, Mrs. Clarence Waterman, MHrs. Walter F. Wells, Mrs. George Whittlesey, Mrs. J. B. Whitney, Mrs. William H. Whitton, Hon. George Albert Wingate, Mrs. Harry Michael Wingle, R. Huntington Woodman and Mr. and Mrs. Philip N. Youtz.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 31 1937

CONCERNING ORCHESTRA PERSONNEL

By OLIN DOWNES

RIGHT now, in a place some distance from New York, a symphony orchestra is in a turmoil because the conductor, after testing each member of the orchestra by having him play, unidentified, behind a screen, has requested the retirement of ten players and their replacement with new men, most if not all of whom are younger than those invited to leave the organization. It must be understood that these replacements have not to do with wage scales or with any issue between the conductor and the rules of the Musicians Union. Nor are the merits or demerits of the players concerned known to this writer. But the principle involved is one worth considering as a theory of general application to the policies of all symphonic organizations, union or non-union, local or foreign, far or near. Granted the soundness of the conductor's judgment (in the case at issue he is a conductor of wide experience and international reputation); even granting the possibility of a test performance that belied a player's ability, the basic question seems very similar to one which confronted the Boston Symphony Orchestra some years ago—namely, the question of the quality of the orchestra, as contrasted with the feelings and problems of the dismissed players.

* * *

When Serge Koussevitzky came to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1924-25 he was quick to praise the orchestra and its lofty traditions, exemplified in the performances as well as by the reputation that the celebrated orchestra bore everywhere. At the end of his season, however, he recommended the retirement of twenty-four musicians, and the infusion of new blood in the persons of twenty-four new players. There was a good deal of consternation when his recommendation was made known. There were expostulations, not only from the men and the friends of the men, who naturally opposed these changes, but even from some quarters connected with the management of the orchestra. It was realized that all the twenty-four men whose positions were threatened had pupils, families and supporters in town; that their dismissal would affect certain elements of the Boston Symphony's public unfavorably; that the departure of twenty-four men at one time would make heavy demands upon the orchestra's pension fund. There were plenty of reasons to go slow. To all of them Koussevitzky gave a plain and unequivocal reply. He asked, in effect, which was preferred by Boston—an orchestra of the very first rank, or a home for musicians.

* * *

The question was not one of unionism. This was a nonunion orchestra. It was a matter of music, and Koussevitzky carried his point. There was a fuss, a big fuss, and considerable dissension. Some of it came out in the newspapers. The ultimate consequence was that the Boston Symphony, having gone through a number of disastrous experiences resulting from circumstances of the World War, and a strike very injurious to its membership, again forged to the front and has since retained that position as one of the two or three leading orchestras of the world.

Or put it another way. Some time ago, abroad, a conductor who was preparing a historic Wagner performance called his secretary. "Write me a letter." The letter was addressed to one of the singers with whom he had been rehearsing. In outline it read, "Dear Mr. . . . I have noticed your fatigue at our rehearsals and the fact that you are not very well. Would it not be best if you took a few days' rest at some near-by pleasant resort?" This, of course, was a direct request for resignation. The secretary said, "But master, that is a hard letter to write to an artist who has done such great and honorable service." The master answered, "Whom am I defending? That artist or Richard Wagner?"

It is a point of view not always appreciated, often hardly understood by those to whom art is a matter of a much needed job or a chance to make a lot of money. The bigger issue would be to them idealistic nonsense—the defense of the music of Richard Wagner. The only pity is that there are so few, among either the leaders or the rank and file of musicians, who look so high and cut so clean.

* * *

The orchestral field in this country is a big one, which is constantly widening. There is a growing need of orchestral players. A number of institutions are turning out material to meet this need. Nevertheless, there is a dearth of first-class men, particularly noticeable this year, which has seen in New York and in Pittsburgh the formation of two new symphony orchestras. It may seem astonishing that this is the case, at a time of so much unemployment, and so many musicians on the payroll of the government. But it is so, and it is so principally because politics and commercialism reign to the extent that they do in the ranks of orchestral musicians, who are, logically, deeply concerned with jobs and wage scales, but not nearly as concerned as they could afford to be with musical values.

But these values could be established without preaching or pressure from any outside quarter to bring it to pass, if the biggest and most influential musical institution in the country took it upon itself to enforce them. The reference, of course, is to the Musicians Union and its exceptional position.

* * *

We would like to see this Union, formed years ago to save musicians from the outrageous and intolerable treatment they often had experienced in previous times, more unified and more formidable than it is. Having enforced minimum wage scales and other rulings indispensable for the proper treatment of its members, it would seem that the Musicians Union is in a position to develop itself, and strengthen its prestige from the inside. It could have such strict laws regarding the competency and musicianship of its members that a Union endorsement of a player would in itself be a guarantee to a prospective employer of the player's ability.

There was a time in the Middle Ages when unionism in the form of the guilds showed that spirit and took pride in its accomplishments, and would not tolerate incompetency. If a shoemaker sold an inferior pair of shoes the act would shame him and lessen his rank in his organization. A baker was conscious of his duties, jealous of his dignity and concerned with his obligations.

If some student of sociology came along at this moment he would probably interpose that such ideals on the part of workers had been lost through their exploitation by employers in later periods, and as a consequence of their having no personal interest in their accomplishment or any incentive to give the public good work and good measure. And that would in part be true. But a very strong weapon that a modern union could wield in an artistic field would be forged by its own insistence upon at least as high levels of knowledge and efficiency as would be asked of its members by any outside individual or organization.

* * *

